PREFACE

TO THE

FOURTH VOLUME OF THE SECOND EDITION.

THE general nature and deſign of the BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA have been ſufficiently explained in the Prefaces to the preceding volumes. What, therefore, I conſider as at this time principally neceſſary, is to mention ſome circumſtances more immediately relative to the volume which is now preſented to the public.

Perhaps the great length of Captain Cook's article may ſeem to require ſome obſervation. It never was my intention to give a ſhort account of that illuſtrious Navigator, whoſe diſcoveries and adventures furniſh ſuch a copious fund of inſtruction and entertainment. If the narrative had been written ſolely for the Biographia, I do not think that it would have been much ſhorter than it now is. Having, however, been requeſted to publiſh a ſeparate life of the Captain, I determined to inſert it in the preſent work, without mutilation. In fact, long as it is, it is only an abridgement of what is contained in a great number of large volumes. But to have given an abridgment of an abridgment would have rendered the article jejune and imperfect, and would have deprived my readers of what they had a right to expect:—ſuch an exhibition of the real character and the important tranſactions of Captain Cook, as is ſuitable to the nature and deſign of our undertaking.

With regard to the length of this and other articles, it deſerves particularly to be conſidered, that the Biographia is not intended for the preſent age alone, but alſo for poſterity. Narratives, which, on account of their recording recent facts that are generally known, may be thought by ſome critics to be too much extended, will become of more and more conſequence in proceſs of time. The numerous volumes of Captain Cook's Voyages, for inſtance, with their minute nautical details, will be leſs ſtudied, by the generality of readers at leaſt, in a future courſe of years, than at preſent, when the tranſactions they relate are freſh in the memory, and have excited an univerſal attention. But many perſons of the next and ſucceeding generations, will be ſatisfied with ſhorter accounts, and be pleaſed with ſuch a hiſtory as is here offered to the public; and which, though no more than an abridgment, is, nevertheleſs, purpoſely rendered ſo large as to ſatisfy their curioſity, and to enable them fully to conceive how extraordinary were Captain Cook's Diſcoveries, and how eminent his abilities and character.

The obſervations now made will apply to another article, of very conſiderable extent, which is that of Chatterton. The queſtion whether this wonderful young man was the author of the poems that have been aſcribed to Rowley, is one of the moſt curious literary queſtions that has been agitated in any age or country. But the diſcuſſion of it is diffuſed through a number of publications and pamphlets, that in time will become ſcarce. It will, therefore, be no ſmall gratification to poſterity to find ſuch an ample hiſtory of the controverſy in the Biographia Britannica.

Upon the ſame principle, it is part of our plan to give copious accounts of the writings of learned men, if they have been in any degree eminent. This is the only way of doing them that full juſtice, to which, by their merits, they are entitled. From the accumulation of new books, and the revolutions of literary faſhion, even works of no ſmall reputation come to be neglected. I could produce numerous proofs of the truth of this aſſertion, were it my preſent buſineſs to enlarge upon the ſubject. Many valuable productions which, in my youth, it would have been a diſgrace to a man of education not to have read, are now, in a conſiderable degree, laid aſide. They have been diſplaced by others, that will ſhare the ſame fate. The works that are ever freſh, and ever young, are, comparatively ſpeaking, ſmall in their number, and limited in their objects. It is in repoſitories like ours, that our deſcendants will ſee the worth of their predeceſſors, and the figure they made in their day.

I ſhould have added with reſpect to Chatterton, that Mr. Croft, who originally propoſed to write his life, was too much engaged in his own grand undertaking, to be able to do it in the time I wiſhed; and the matter could not be delayed any longer. I applied, therefore, to my ingenious and learned friend, the Rev. Dr. George Gregory, to take the taſk upon him; and I may venture to ſay, that he has diſcharged it in a manner that will give univerſal ſatisfaction. The fairneſs and candour with which he has ſtated the evidence on both ſides, is entitled to particular praiſe. Mr. Croft will diſcern, with pleaſure, the aid that has been derived from his "Love and Madneſs" in drawing up the article.

As I proceed in the work, I have ſtill greater and greater reaſon to mention with gratitude the aſſiſtance which I continue to receive. The names of ſeveral reſpectable Gentlemen will occur in their proper places. To Michael Collinſon, Eſq; the Rev. Dr. Conybeare, Sir Joſeph Banks, Sir Hugh Palliſer, the Rev. Mr. Huntingford, the Earl of Buchan, and a Gentleman who wiſhes to conceal his favours, my thanks are particularly due.

For communications of a more general nature, I am greatly indebted to Lord Arden. His Lordſhip has moſt obligingly permitted me to have the inſpection of the Manuſcript Biographical Collections of his noble grandfather, the firſt Earl of Egmont. The uſe I have already been able to make of theſe valuable materials, will be ſeen in the Addenda and in other places. By the continued favour of Lord Arden, great advantage may be derived to the Biographia, with regard to future articles.

I muſt here expreſs, with the ſincereſt concern, the loſs which this work has ſuſtained, by the deceaſe of two excellent and learned friends, the Rev. Mr. Duncombe of Canterbury, and John Baynes, Eſq; of Lincoln's Inn. Mr. Duncombe watched over the Biographia with a kind of parental tenderneſs. The Corrigenda and Addenda will diſplay the attention that he paid to the laſt volume.

There are three lives in the preſent volume, for which I am wholly indebted to the gratuitous communications of my friends. Mr. Richardſon, Profeſſor of Humanity in the Univerſity of Glaſgow, well known by ſeveral elegant publications, and eſpecially by his admirable Eſſays on ſome of the Characters of Shakeſpeare, has favoured me with the article of Craig, a late excellent Divine in Scotland. Mr. Hayley, whom I muſt ever mention in terms of the higheſt affection and reſpect, has given me the Life of Craſhaw the Poet. Through the good offices of my worthy and ingenious friend Mr. Chriſtie, I have obtained from Mr. Chalmers, of Throgmorton Street, an account of Alexander Cruden. All theſe articles will ſpeak for themſelves, and ſhow that they conſtitute valuable ornaments of the work. With reſpect to the Life of Cruden it muſt be mentioned, that having happened to put it into a wrong drawer, it ſlipped my memory when it ſhould have been introduced in p. 544. I have, therefore, annexed it to Chatterton, in the Appendix to Letter C.

The Preface to the preſent volume cannot be diſmiſſed without ſaying ſomething concerning the long delay of its appearance; and the rather, as I formerly expreſſed ſo ſtrong a belief of a more ſpeedy publication. What I then advanced, was written with the greateſt ſincerity; but unexpected hindrances have occurred. In the firſt place, I beg leave to recite a remark which I have made in my Life of Dr. Lardner. It is as follows: "Thoſe who are not themſelves "engaged in important and extenſive literary undertakings, can have but an "imperfect conception of the difficulties to be ſurmounted, the diſappointments "to be incurred, the books to be procured and waited for, the dates to be ſet-"tled, the facts to be aſcertained, and the various other cauſes which often

" occaſion delays, that muſt be far more unpleaſant to the writer than they " can poſſibly be to any reader whatever."

In the ſecond place, I muſt requeſt that the immenſe quantity of new matter now publiſhed may be taken into conſideration. This fourth volume includes only 218 pages of the old work. The freſh materials occupy conſiderably more than two thirds of the book; and the vaſt diſproportion of what has been furniſhed by myſelf will ſtrike every reader. The additions to the former articles, which, in many caſes, will be found ſo great, are, with the exception of a ſingle inſtance, entirely my own. This, I muſt be permitted to ſay, is a very important and difficult part of the undertaking; and whoever ſhould attempt to conduct the Biographia without particularly attending to ſo weighty an object, would deprive it of the perfection and uſefulneſs to which it ought to be carried. The mere inſertion of new lives would not atone for ſo capital a defect.

Thirdly, I ſhould ſtill have been able to have finiſhed the volume much ſooner, if it had not been for a particular circumſtance. Partly with a view to accelerate the work, I gave up an employment I had long held, as one of the Tutors in Coward's Academy, then ſubſiſting at Hoxton. But, ſince that time, another inſtitution, of a more extenſive and important nature, having been formed amongſt the body of people with whom I am immediately connected, my aſſiſtance in it was thought to be deſirable. Accordingly, it hath demanded my time and my labour, and will continue to demand my principal attention. Whatever part, therefore, I may hereafter take in the Biographia, I will no longer make any promiſes concerning it, or be amenable to the public, with regard to the appearance of the ſucceeding volumes. But no delay of the work is hence to be apprehended: for the proprietors have determined to call in ſuch effectual aid as ſhall entirely preclude diſappointment and complaint.

CORRIGENDA AND ADDENDA

TO THE

First Volume of the Biographia Britannica.

ADDISON (Joseph), p. 63.

IN Sir John Hawkins's Life of Dr. Samuel Johnſon, there is the following paſſage concerning Addiſon. "I find an opinion gaining ground not much to the advantage of "Mr. Addiſon's ſtyle, the characteriſtics whereof are feebleneſs and inanity. I ſpeak of "that alone, for his ſentiments are excellent and his humour exquiſite. In ſome inſtances "he adopts vulgar phraſe, as when he calls an indiſcreet action a piece of folly, and too "often uſes the expletive verb along, thus, Come along with me. Yet I am not willing "to deprive him of the honour implied in Johnſon's teſtimony, 'that his proſe is the 'model of the middle ſtyle.' But if he be but a mediocriſt, he is ſurely not a ſubject of "imitation; it being a rule, that of examples the beſt are always to be ſelected (a)." Sir John Hawkins, whenever he ſpoke of Addiſon, ſeemed doomed to be unfortunate. That he ſhould be ſo ignorant of the diſtinctions of language laid down by all the rhetoricians, as to ſuppoſe that Dr Johnſon intended to characterize Mr. Addiſon as a mediocriſt in compoſition, would be incredible, were it not aſcertained by the fact.

(a) Life of Dr. Samuel Johnſon, p. 270, 271.

Mr. Heron, in his "Letters of Literature," has made ſome remarks upon Mr. Addiſon's Critical Errors. But, at the ſame time, he acknowledges that Addiſon is one of his moſt favourite writers, and that nothing but his ſacred love of critical equity could have induced him to execute the ungrateful taſk he had undertaken. "The beſt "writers," adds Mr. Heron, "are perhaps the moſt liable to faults of a certain kind, in "like manner as fertile ground is, where no grain is ſown, fertile of weeds. Strong "weeds ſpeak a rich ſoil, nearly as much as ſtrong corn; yet they ought to be rooted "up that they may not injure the harveſt (b)." In a preceding letter, Mr. Heron declares, that Addiſon is a proſe writer of the firſt rank (c). The opinion of this author, who is not uſually laviſh of his praiſes, forms a contraſt, that does no honour to the judgment of Sir John Hawkins.

(c) Ibid. p. 419.

Warburton, in a letter to Mr. Concanen, inſerted in the Supplement to Shakeſpeare, has pointed out ſome places in which Mr. Addiſon has taken the ſentiments of his Cato from the works of Cicero (d).

(d) Supplement to Shakeſpeare, vol. i. p. 223, 224.

Lord Egmont, in his manuſcript collections, has related an inſtance of Mr. Addiſon's jealouſy with regard to his reputation. Having heard that a Gentleman had for his diverſion turned eight lines of Cato into burleſque, he could not reſt, till, by the interpoſition of a friend, he prevailed upon the author to burn them. As to Mr. Addiſon's principles, he told Lord Egmont, that an honeſt Engliſhman is a Tory in church matters, and a Whig in politics.

ADRIAN IV. p. 67.

In Mr. Berington's Hiſtory of the Lives of Abeillard and Heloiſa, there is an entertaining account of this Pope. The concluſion is as follows: "Thus, in the midſt of an "agitated ocean, of which he himſelf was the principal mover, comfortleſs and diſſatisfied, lived Adrian the Fourth. He ſaw the end of four years and nine months, "when he died in 1159, eſteemed by the Roman Court, whoſe patrimony he had increaſed by ſome conſiderable acquiſitions, and praiſed for his diſintereſtedneſs, which "he carried to a pitch of affected inſenſibility; for he permitted his mother, who ſaw him "raiſed to the Popedom, and who ſurvived her ſon, barely to ſubſiſt on the alms ſhe "collected in the church of Canterbury (a)."

(a) Hiſtory, &c. P. 353—360.

AKENSIDE (MARK), p. 107.

Sir John Hawkins, in his Life of Johnſon, has drawn Dr. Akenſide's character ſomewhat at large; and it is, with a few exceptions, highly to the Doctor's advantage. "Akenſide," ſays Sir John, "was a man of religion and ſtrict virtue, a philoſopher, a "ſcholar, and a fine poet. His converſation was of the moſt delightful kind, learned, "inſtructive, and, without any affectation of wit, chearful and entertaining (a)."

(a) Life of Johnſon, p. 242—248.

ANDREWS (LAUNCELOT), p. 188.

In the Britiſh Muſeum, is a manuſcript diſcourſe, by Biſhop Andrews, againſt a ſecond marriage, after ſentence of divorce with a former match, the parties then living. It was written in 1601 (a).

(a) Ayſcough's Catalogue, p. 291.

ANSON (GEORGE), p. 221.

In this article, p. 216, we have ſpoken of the Hiſtory of Anſon's Voyage as having been written by Mr. Robins, though it was publiſhed under the name of Mr. Walter, Chaplain to the Centurion. A general and uncontradicted report had for many years prevailed, that the work was drawn up by Mr. Robins. Nor was this report one of thoſe vague rumours the original and foundation of which cannot be aſcertained; for it was grounded on poſitive teſtimony. Dr James Wilſon had publicly aſſerted the fact, in the ſhort account of Mr. Robins, which he prefixed to his edition of the mathematical tracts of that ingenious writer. We have not the book at hand; but the following extract from the Monthly Review for November, 1761, will be ſufficient for our purpoſe. "But that literary performance of Mr. Robins, which obtained the greateſt ſhare of "public notice, though the real writer did not appear, was the compilement of Lord "Anſon's Voyage to the South Seas, publiſhed in the name of Mr. Walter, Chaplain to "the Centurion. Mr. Walter, it is true, had compiled, as we are now informed, a "detail of this important voyage; but, upon inſpection, it being found to be little more "than extracts from the Journals, Mr. Robins was employed to compleat an entire new "work; which is the voyage in the preſent form; and which is deſervedly and univerſally "conſidered as a Maſter-piece (a)."

(a) Monthly Review, vol. xxv. p. 335, 336.

Thus has the matter hitherto ſtood. But ſo late as the preſent year (1789), and a few days previouſly to the writing of this note, a letter upon the ſubject has been put into our hands by Mr. John Walter, Bookſeller at Charing Croſs. It is addreſſed to that Gentleman by Mrs. Walter, the widow of the publiſher of the voyage, and is as follows:

"SIR,

"I am informed that the Biographia Britannica inſinuates that Mr. Robins, and not "Mr. Walter, was the writer of Lord Anſon's Voyage round the world.

"I ſhall therefore take it as a favour, if you will put me in the way of correcting "ſo great a miſtake. During the time of Mr. Walter's writing that voyage, he viſited "me almoſt daily previous to our marriage, and I have frequently heard him ſay how "cloſely he had been engaged in writing for ſome hours to prepare for his conſtant at"tendance upon Lord Anſon at ſix every morning for his approbation, as his Lordſhip "overlooked every ſheet that was written. At ſome of thoſe meetings Mr. Robins "aſſiſted, as he was conſulted in the diſpoſition of the drawings; and I alſo know that "Mr. Robins left England (for he was ſent to Bergen-op-zoom) ſome months before the "publication of that book; and I have frequently ſeen Mr. Walter correct the proof "ſheets for the printer.

"You may perhaps wonder that Mr. Walter never took any ſteps to contradict the aſ"ſertion; but that wonder will ceaſe, when I tell you that for four years before his "death (which was in 1785) he laboured under very ſevere and painful illneſſes, and "therefore never heard any thing but newſpaper ſquibs, which he looked upon with "contempt. But as it now appears to be publiſhed in a work that will be handed down "to poſterity—that Mr. Walter was not the real author; I think it a duty incumbent "upon me to endeavour to clear his memory from any imputation of duplicity. Nor "can it be ſuppoſed that any man would write a book for another to ſhare the greateſt "part of the advantages. Theſe and many other reaſons make me apply to you, as I "ſhould ſuppoſe that, as a relation to the deceaſed, you would be anxious for his fame, as "well as,

"SIR,

"June 16th, 1789. "JANE WALTER."

We ſhall make no other comment on this letter than to obſerve, that it is highly worthy of attention. If it ſhall give ſuch full ſatisfaction to our readers, as to convince them that Mr. Walter was the writer of the voyage in its preſent form, we ſhall rejoice in having had an opportunity of doing juſtice to an injured character.

ATTERBURY (FRANCIS), p. 348.

In 1787, Mr. Nichols publiſhed a fourth volume, in octavo, of "The epiſtolary Correſpondence, Viſitation Charges, Speeches, and Miſcellanies, of the Right Reverend Francis Atterbury, D. D. Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter. With Hiſtorical Notes." From this publication ſeveral farther particulars may be learned concerning that eminent Prelate.

Lord Egmont, upon the authority of Biſhop Sherlock, relates, that Atterbury, in early life, was of Whig principles, and that the firſt perſon who diverted him from his bias to thoſe principles was Biſhop Burnet, who, in King William's reign, prevented his being made Chaplain to the Earl of Portland. Some time after the acceſſion of King George the Firſt, when a breach fell out between the Earl of Sunderland and Lord Townſhend, Dr. Atterbury entered into connections with the former Nobleman, and promiſed to ſupport all his meaſures, on condition of his ſucceeding to the Biſhopric of Wincheſter, on the death of Sir Jonathan Trelawny. When that event happened, Atterbury was with Lord Sunderland at five o'clock in the morning, to claim his promiſe. The Earl, it ſeems, either could not or would not keep his word; for Trimnell obtained Wincheſter; and the Biſhop of Rocheſter ſo deeply reſented the diſappointment, that he threw himſelf entirely into the worſt of the Tory ſchemes. This Dr. Sherlock ſaid he knew to be true; to which he added, that Atterbury, from his youth, ſet out with a reſolution to be a great man at any rate.

Some extraordinary effects are related, by Lord Egmont, of this Prelate's reſtleſs temper. When he was in the Pretender's ſervice, he procured to himſelf the charge of paying the penſions allowed to the Chevalier's half-ſtarved adherents at St. Germain's. This was a very poor and unthankful office; and yet, becauſe he could not be eaſy without ſome employment or other, he did not reſt till he got General Dillon diſplaced, who had it before; repreſenting, by ſundry letters to his Maſter, that Dillon defrauded theſe perſons. Nay, there was not a nurſe wanting to any of the Pretender's children, then at Rome, but the Biſhop would take upon him, from France, to recommend a woman, deſcribing her temper, complexion, hair, and other circumſtances. Lord Egmont juſtly obſerves, that theſe are things which were ſcarcely to be believed, excepting by thoſe who were in the ſame place with him when the tranſactions paſſed.

BARCLAY (JOHN), p. 589.

A ſketch of the Life of John Barclay has been compoſed by Sir David Dalrymple, Bart. Lord Hailes. Not having had the good fortune to meet with it, we cannot, at preſent, make that uſe of the reſpectable and learned Author's production which we could have wiſhed to have done.

TO THE SECOND

Volume of the Biographia Britannica.

BAXTER (Andrew), p. 27.

A Valuable correſpondent, with a particular reference to note [D], has ſent us the following remarks upon this article.

" No one likes ſcepticiſm leſs than I do, and yet the life of Andrew Baxter, from the " information of his ſon, makes one a ſceptic. I knew his manner of life ſo well, that I " was confounded at ſeeing that he ſpake German and Dutch with eaſe, that he was " elegant in his dreſs, and that the Ladies at Utrecht were much pleaſed with his conver- " ſation. He underſtood Low Dutch, which he told me was a good language, but " hardly ever ſpake a word of it; and, I dare ſay, never uttered a ſentence of German " in his life. His dreſs was plain and ſimple, not that of a priggiſh Frenchman, but of " a mathematician who was not a ſloven. I am pretty well perſuaded, that while in the " Low-Countries, he never had any converſation with women, of lower or higher degree, " unleſs it were to aſk for the bill, at an ordinary, or deſire the ſervant-maid to bring up " turf for his chimney. As to his preſiding at an ordinary, that alſo is a mere illuſion— " his ſon did not know Mr. Baxter ſo well as I did, while he reſided at Utrecht. I " remember very well that his ſon only ſaw him for a few days, whereas I ſaw him daily " for more than two years. I do not think that he was afflicted with the gout at all: " he generally obſerved a regimen on account of the gravel, for he ſuffered much by what has " been termed flagellum eruditorum. In ſhort he was a plain, decent, good-humoured man, " who paſt all his time, but what was beſtowed at his meals, in meditation and ſtudy; " and his manner of life was, on the whole, the reverſe of what his ſon, from imperfect " and tranſient obſervation, ſuppoſed it to have been."

BEAUMONT (Lewis), p. 86.

Mr. Hutchinſon, in his Hiſtory and Antiquities of the County Palatine of Durham, has given a copious account of this Prelate (a). The Biſhop's intereſt was powerful; but, throughout the whole of his life, he appears to have been in himſelf a very inſignificant character, both in Church and State (b).

(a) Vol. i. p. 266—284.
(b) Ibid. p. 275.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER, p. 100.

In the Supplement to the Edition of Shakeſpeare's Plays publiſhed in 1778, it is ingeniouſly and deciſively ſhewn by Mr. Steevens, that Shakeſpeare had no hand in writing the play of the " Two noble Kinſmen." It has not been proved, by evidence of any kind, that he had the ſlighteſt connection with Beaumont and Fletcher (a).

(a) Vol. ii. p. 169, &c.

BEK (Anthony), p. 148.

A large account of this Prelate may be ſeen in the firſt volume of Hutchinſon's Hiſtory and Antiquities of Durham, p. 228—258.

BENNET (HENRY), EARL OF ARLINGTON, p. 193.

In the Supplement to the third volume of "State Papers collected by Edward, Earl of Clarendon," is a more copious account of Sir Henry Bennet's character than that which is given in the noble Hiſtorian's Life and Continuation (a). It is too long to be inſerted in this place.

(a) Supplement, p. lxxx—lxxxiv.

BENTLEY (RICHARD), p. 247.

"Let me now gather," ſays Mr. Boſwell, in his Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides, (p. 201) "ſome gold duſt,—ſome more fragments of Dr. Johnſon's converſation.—He "ſaid, he thought very highly of Bentley; that no man now went ſo far in the kinds of "learning that he cultivated; that the many attacks on him were owing to envy, and to "a deſire of being known, by being in competition with ſuch a man; that it was ſafe "to attack him, becauſe he never anſwered his opponents, but let them die away. It "was attacking a man who would not beat them, becauſe his beating them would "make them live the longer. And he was right not to anſwer; for, in his hazardous "method of writing, he could not but be often enough wrong; ſo it was better to leave "things to their general appearance, than own himſelf to have erred in particulars."

BERKLEY (GEORGE), p. 262.

A few ſtrictures on Biſhop Berkley's ſyſtem of ideas occur in the firſt volume of Lord Monboddo's "Origin and Progreſs of Language (a);" and a very elaborate examination of that ſyſtem may be ſeen in the ingenious and worthy Dr. Reid's "Eſſays on the Intellectual Powers of Man (b)."

(a) P. 119-122. 134.

BIRCH (THOMAS), p. 323.

Sir John Hawkins, in his life of Johnſon, has given a ſhort account of Dr. Birch, favourable as to character, but ſevere with reſpect to his ſtyle (a). The Doctor's language, it is true, was not ſtudiouſly elegant, nor indeed very animated; but, in general, it was natural, eaſy, and unaffected. It is pleaſant enough, and a curious circumſtance in the hiſtory of the human mind, that Sir John Hawkins ſhould have preſumed to criticize the ſtyle of our writers.

(a) P. 206—210.

BORLASE (WILLIAM), p. 426.

In the Addenda prefixed to our third volume, we have ſaid, upon the authority of the Gentleman's Magazine, that Dr. Borlaſe was Vice-Warden of the Stannaries. But the Rev. Mr. Penneck hath informed us that this is a miſtake. It was the Rev. Walter Borlaſe, Doctor of Laws, the elder brother, who was Vice-Warden of the Stannaries. The Rev. William Borlaſe, the ſubject of our article, never held that office: neither was he Doctor of Laws, as is aſſerted, p. 424, but Doctor of Divinity.

BOYD (MARK ALEXANDER), p. 459.

Lord Hailes has written a Life of Mark-Alexander Boyd, in which he appears with leſs ſplendour than in the accounts that have been given by Sir Robert Sibbald and other writers. In this reſpect his Lordſhip diſplays greater accuracy and greater judgment. With regard to Boyd's "Epiſtolæ Heroidum," Lord Hailes thinks that they are puerile, flimſy, and incorrect; but of the "Hymni" he entertains a better opinion. Theſe he owns to be a work of merit, and that the beauties of the performance do more than atone for its defects. In Boyd's Copy-Book of Letters, preſerved in the Advocate's Library at Edinburgh, there is one very remarkable, concerning theological ſubjects, addreſſed to a young friend. His Lordſhip gives an extract from it, and declares, that if there were nothing of the works of Boyd extant but this Letter, he might ſtill be pronounced to have been a man of genius. "His Life," ſays Lord Hailes, "affords an important leſſon, "and which cannot be too frequently inculcated on young minds, that perſeverance in "ſtudy is neceſſary for all who aim at becoming uſeful."

TO THE SECOND VOLUME.

BOYLE (JOHN), EARL OF CORK AND ORRERY, p. 527.

Of this Nobleman Dr. Johnſon ſaid, that he was a feeble-minded man. Upon the publication of Dr. Delany's Remarks on his Book concerning Swift, he was ſo much alarmed that he was afraid to read them. Dr. Johnſon comforted him, by telling him that they were both in the right; that Delany had ſeen moſt of the good ſide of Swift,—Lord Orrery moſt of the bad.—If his Lordſhip had been rich, Dr. Johnſon declared that he would have been a very liberal patron. "His converſation was like his writings, neat "and elegant, but without ſtrength. He graſped at more than his abilities could reach; "tried to paſs for a better talker, a better writer, and a better thinker, than he was "(a). It will be remembered, that Dr. Johnſon was perhaps too ready to depreciate the abilities of thoſe perſons whoſe minds were not ſo energetic as his own.

BOYS (JOHN), p. 531.

By the favour of the Rev. Dr. Pollok, of Grittleton, near Chippenham, Wilts, we are enabled more accurately to ſpecify the work of Mr. Boys mentioned in note [G]. The Doctor has a copy of this very ſcarce book, which is in 12*mo.* and the title of which is, "Veteris Interpretis cum Beza aliiſq; recentioribus Collatio in Quatuor Evangeliis et "Apoſtolorum Actis, in qua annon ſæpius (*) —— juſta ſatis Cauſa hi ab illo diſceſſerint "Diſquiritur. Autore Johanne Boiſio, Eccleſiæ Elienſis Canonico. Opus Auſpiciis Re-"verendi Præſulis, Lanceloti, Wintonienſis Epiſcopi, τὲ μακαρίτε, cæptum et perfectum." Londini Typis T. Roycroft, Impenſis R. Beaumont, 1655.

(*) The word happens to be torn in Dr. Pollok's Paper.

Dr. Pollok has farther informed us, that J. C. Wolfius, in his Curis Philolog. T. i. Prefatio, p. 11. ſays of this book, "Liber infrequentiſſimus et rariſſime occurrens." See, likewiſe, Vogt. Cat. Lib. rar.

BRIGGS (HENRY), p. 589.

Dr. Charles Hutton, in his Introduction to his "Mathematical Tables," has made a curious and important diſcovery, highly to Mr. Briggs's honour. It is, that he was the inventor of the famous binomial Theorem, hitherto univerſally aſcribed to Sir Iſaac Newton, and alſo of the differential Calculus, which, in England at leaſt, has always been given to the ſame author; but which John Bernoulli, after diſputing the claim of Sir Iſaac, gave to M. Paſcal, who was not born till long after it had been taught by Mr. Briggs. That Sir Iſaac Newton looked on theſe two Diſcoveries as his own, cannot be juſtly diſputed; and Dr. Hutton ſeems fully ſatisfied that he was utterly ignorant of what had been done, on theſe heads, by Briggs. The Doctor aſſigns, as a reaſon for ſuppoſing ſo, that Newton owed almoſt every thing to genius, and very little to reading; which is undoubtedly the caſe (a).

BROUGHTON (HUGH), p. 613.

From Mr. Ayſcough's Catalogue it appears, that many Theological Manuſcripts by Hugh Broughton are preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum (a).

(a) Catalogue, p. 25—27.

BROWNE (SIR THOMAS), p. 637.

In the Britiſh Muſeum are a great number of Sir Thomas Browne's Manuſcripts, on different ſubjects. The titles of them may be ſeen by referring to Mr. Ayſcough's Catalogue; and they will ſerve ſtill farther to evince the extent and variety of Sir Thomas's learning. There are, likewiſe, in the ſame noble repoſitory, ſeveral manuſcripts of his ſon's, Dr. Edward Browne.

BROWNE (SIMON), p. 647.

Some manuſcripts by Mr. Simon Browne are in the Britiſh Muſeum; and among the reſt, a Verſion of the Pſalms, from the firſt to the thirteenth (a).

(a) Ayſcough's Catalogue, p. 27.

Teſtimonies without end might be collected, to the excellency of Buchanan as a ſcholar. We ſhall content ourſelves with adding one ſhort paſſage, from Dr. Johnſon's Journey to the Weſtern Iſlands of Scotland, p. 5, 6. "At an hour ſomewhat late we came to St. "Andrews, a city once archiepiſcopal; where that Univerſity ſtill ſubſiſts in which "philoſophy was taught by Buchanan, whoſe name has as fair a claim to immortality as "can be conferred by modern latinity, and perhaps a fairer than the inſtability of ver-"nacular languages admits."

BULL (JOHN), p. 695.

In the third volume of Dr. Burney's admirable Hiſtory of Muſic, very lately publiſhed, ſome account is given of Dr. John Bull. His abilities on the organ and virginal appear to have been truly wonderful. It is remarkable that Dr. Bull is the only perſon on the liſt of Muſic Profeſſors at Greſham College, who ſeems to have been able to inform by theory, or amuſe by practice, thoſe who attended the muſical lectures (a). A ſtriking perverſion this of a noble inſtitution! and highly to the diſhonour of the electors.

(a) Gen. Hiſtory of Muſic, vol. iii. p. 106, 107.

We refer to Dr. Burney's work for an account of William Bird, an excellent muſical compoſer and practitioner in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James the Firſt (b). This eminent Muſician would have had an article in the Biographia, if the editor, at the time of the publication of the ſecond volume, had been ſufficiently acquainted with his merit.

CORRIGENDA AND ADDENDA

TO THE THIRD

Volume of the Biographia Britannica.

BURNET (THOMAS), p. 20.

A Gentleman, who has not informed us to whom we are endebted for the obligation, has favoured us with the following ſtricture upon this article.

" The authors of the Biographia Britannica have fallen into a ſmall miſtake with re-" ſpect to the editions of Burnet's Archæologiæ Philoſophicæ. The original writer of the " life having aſſerted that the ſecond edition was printed in 1733, Dr. Kippis was naturally
" led to conclude that the dialogue between Eve and the Serpent appeared only in the firſt
" edition: The fact is, the ſecond edition, which is in my poſſeſſion, bears date 1728,
" and contains the offenſive dialogue in queſtion, which has, therefore, probably been " read by more perſons than Dr. Kippis apprehends. This edition of 1728 contains alſo
" the two letters ad virum clar. A. B. in which the author profeſſes his willingneſs to " give up every haſty and indiſcreet expreſſion which may be found in his work: and " adds, Et colloquium illud inter Evam et Serpentem, quod nonnullis diſplicere audio;
" vel ſiquid ſit præterea cognatæ indolis, amputari et abſcindi ſine dolore patiar. It
" ſeems that in 1733 he kept his word. The dialogue is indeed ridiculous enough, and " I do not wonder at its giving offence to the greater part of the Clergy of his day. At " preſent, I ſuppoſe, his remarks will be deemed acute and ſenſible."

BURNET (GILBERT), p. 41.

To the account of Biſhop Burnet's writings it may be added, that he was the author of a pamphlet in Defence of the Partition Treaty, for which Lord Somers was impeached (a).

In p. 38, we have ſaid, that we know not what became of the Biſhop's two daughters; Mary and Elizabeth. This defect, by the aid of that valuable correſpondent whom we have ſo often mentioned, we are now able to ſupply. Mary was married to David Mitchel, Eſq; the nephew of Admiral Mitchel, well known in the days of King William. She was a woman of a ſingular genius; what in French would be called naive, and in Engliſh, an oddity. Her temper was friendly and benevolent; ſhe ſpake what ſhe thought ſtrongly; and was not free from prejudices of the Whig kind. The children ſhe had are all now deceaſed. Elizabeth, the Biſhop's other daughter, became the wife of Mr. Weſt, Chancellor of Ireland in the reign of George the Firſt, and was the mother of Richard Weſt, Eſq; the companion of Mr. Horace Walpole and Mr. Gray. There are no deſcendants left of Biſhop Burnet. The laſt was honeſt Captain Burnet of the Navy, and he was only a natural ſon of Governor Burnet's. But he had an animus paternus to the Burnet family.

Sir Thomas Burnet was diſtinguiſhed for the evenneſs of his temper; of which the following inſtance is recorded. Dining with a friend, the coachman, who was waiting, ſpilt ſome ſoup or gravy on his cloaths. While they were rubbed, he ſaid, with great good humour, " Let me adviſe you, friend, for the future, to greaſe nothing but your " wheels (b)."

(b) From the communications of Mr. Duncombe.

Notwithſtanding the large additions that have been made to Biſhop Burnet's Article, it might ſtill be increaſed, were we to accumulate all the various ſtrictures which have been made on this Prelate and his writings. We ſhall content ourſelves with taking notice of what has been ſaid by a few recent authors. Dr. Warton, in his Eſſay on Pope, (vol. ii. p. 293, 294) has quoted, without diſapprobation, a very ſevere, but, in our opinion, a very unjuſt character, which is given of the Biſhop's Hiſtory of his own Time, by the late Mr. Hampton, the tranſlator of Polybius.

Dr. Johnſon thought more candidly upon the ſubject. Taking up the Biſhop's hiſtory, he ſaid, " The firſt part of it is one of the moſt entertaining books in the Engliſh language;

" while he went about every where, ſaw every where, and heard every where. By the " firſt part, I mean ſo far as it appears that Burnet himſelf was actually engaged in what " he has told; and this may be eaſily diſtinguiſhed (c)."

(c) Boſwell's Journal, p. 353.

Mr. Alexander Cunningham appears to have had the utmoſt diſlike to Burnet. Indeed, in his Hiſtory of Great Britain, lately publiſhed, he always expreſſes himſelf with ſo much malignity concerning our Prelate, that it confutes itſelf, and clearly proves that, in this caſe, he did not write from a regard to truth, but from perſonal enmity.

BURTON (JOHN), p. 49.

" As to Dr. Burton of Eton," ſays our correſpondent, " the way in which he became " the huſband of Mrs. Littleton was well known at the time. He found the widow and " her daughters at the parſonage houſe, and deſired them to remain there. Some time " after, a neighbouring clergyman happened to call on him, and found Mrs. Littleton " ſhaving John Burton. He told him that the thing was indecent, and ought to be ſet to " rights. Burton propoſed marriage, and was accepted. From my memory of the Lady, " ſhe was not young; a faded genteel little woman. In ſome of his Greek effuſions he " calls her φαννιδιον."

BUSBY (RICHARD), p. 56.

Buſby's face, on his monument, is ſaid to have been copied from a caſt taken after his death, as he would never ſit for his picture (a).

(a) From Mr. Duncombe's communications.

Once, in a large company, Dr. Buſby ſat at table between Mrs. South and Mrs. Sherlock. The converſation turned upon wives. Dr. Buſby ſaid that he believed wives, in general, were good; " though, to be ſure, there might be a bad one here, and a bad " one there (b)."

(b) From our other correſpondent.

BUTLER (JAMES), DUKE OF ORMOND, p. 80.

Among the various letters of the Marquis of Ormond, that occur in the Clarendon State Papers, there is a very curious one to Sir Edward Hyde, relative to the character of King Charles the Second, in the time of his exile. It is dated on the 27th of January, 1657-8, and is as follows: " I muſt now freely confeſs to you, that what you have written " of the King's unſeaſonable impatience at his ſtay at Bruges, is a greater damp to my " hopes of his recovery than the ſtrength of his enemies, or the weakneſs and backward- " neſs of thoſe that profeſs him friendſhip. Modeſty, courage, and many accidents may " overcome thoſe enemies, and unite and fix thoſe friends; but I fear his immoderate " delight in empty, effeminate, and vulgar converſations, is become an irreſiſtible part " of his nature, and will never ſuffer him to animate his own deſigns and other's actions " with that ſpirit which is requiſite for his quality, and much more to his fortune.

" This to any but to you or him, from any (unleſs a very few) but from me, or from " me at any other time were too bold a lamentation, for ſo God knows it is. That God " bleſs him, and fit him for his work (a)."

(a) Clarendon's State Papers, vol. iii. p. 387.

Unhappy indeed was the ſituation of ſuch virtuous men as Ormond, Hyde, and Nicholas, in the ſervice of ſo profligate a maſter. While they ſuffered exile and poverty for their adherence to his cauſe, they had no conſolation ariſing from his good qualities; and in the proſpect of his reſtoration, they had few hopes of an uſeful and honourable reign.

BUTLER (SAMUEL), p. 93.

In the European Magazine, for September, 1788, (p. 175, 176) is the following anecdote concerning this writer. " Butler, the author of Hudibras, though he was a man of " extraordinary wit and fancy, though his merits deſerved a much better fate, is ſaid to " have ſtarved; which extremity of poverty was owing to his own pride and folly. His " neceſſities were too well known to all his acquaintance, to leave him a poſſibility of con- " cealing them from them; and yet his pride was ſo intolerable, that it was the moſt " difficult thing in the world to compel him to accept of any aſſiſtance, though offered in " the moſt friendly and genteel manner.—There was a Gentleman of his acquaintance, " and of a conſiderable fortune, who over a bottle one night had made a cleanly convey- " ance of a purſe of a hundred guineas into his pocket, which he did not at all perceive. " The next morning Butler, finding it there, was extremely uneaſy, and conſidered what " company he was in the day before, and found that it could be nobody but the very

" Gentleman that did it. He dreſſed himſelf, and went to his chambers, and carried " with him the money; charged him with the affront, and went away in a pet, leaving " the money behind him."

This ſtory is extracted, by the Editor of the European Magazine, from a book now rather uncommon, entitled, " Miſcellania Aurea, or the Golden Medley," printed in 1720.

Some of the inhabitants of the pariſh of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, having lately heard that ſo eminent a man as Butler had been buried in the church-yard, and regretting that neither ſtone nor inſcription recorded the event, entered into a ſubſcription to erect ſomething to his memory. Accordingly, they have had a monument put up in the portico of the church, bearing the Poet's buſt, which was taken from that erected by Alderman Barber, in Weſtminſter Abbey. The following lines were contributed by Mr. O'Bryen, and are engraved on the ſtone beneath the medallion.

" A few plain men, to pomp and pride unknown,
" O'er a poor bard have raiſed this humble ſtone,
" Whoſe wants alone his genius could ſurpaſs,
" Victim of zeal! the matchleſs Hudibras!

" What tho' fair freedom ſuffered in his page!
" Reader, forgive the author—for the age—
" How few, alas, diſdain to cringe and cant,
" When 'tis the mode to play the ſycophant!

" But oh! let all be taught from Butler's fate,
" Who hope to make their fortune by the great,
" That wit and pride are always dangerous things,
" And little faith is due to Courts and Kings (a)."

(a) Gentleman's Magazine, for 1786. p. 1145.

BUTLER (JOSEPH), p. 103.

We have ſaid (p. 101, 102) that our Prelate's charge, printed at Durham, is the only one of his publications which ever produced him a direct literary antagoniſt. This, however, does not appear to be ſtrictly true; for, in the year 1737, there was publiſhed a pamphlet, entitled, " Remarks on Dr. Butler's ſixth Chapter of the Analogy of Religion (a)."

(a) Gentleman's Mag. vol. vii. p. 374.

Another miſtake into which we were led, was the ſaying, that the Rev. Dr. Nathaniel Forſter was the Biſhop's Executor and Reſiduary Legatee. He was Executor, but not Reſiduary Legatee. What remained, after the five hundred pounds given to the Society for propagating the Goſpel, was ordered to be equally divided among all the Biſhop's nephews and nieces by conſanguinity, and their children. His direction for the burning of his manuſcripts was thus expreſſed: " It is my poſitive and expreſs will, that all my " Sermons, Letters, and Papers whatever, which are in a deal box directed to Dr. Forſter, " and now ſtanding in my Library at Hampſtead, be burnt without being read by any " one, as ſoon as may be after my deceaſe (b)."

(b) From the information of the Rev. Peter Forſter, of Hedenham, Norfolk.

A ſecond edition of our Prelate's Charge to his Clergy, was publiſhed in 1786, by Dr. Halifax, then Lord Biſhop of Glouceſter, but now of St. Aſaph; together with a large Preface, giving ſome account of the character and writings of the author. In this Preface, which contains many uſeful and important obſervations, the Right Reverend Editor has entered into an elaborate defence of Dr. Butler, againſt the accuſation of his having died in the Communion of the Church of Rome. We thought it ſufficient, very briefly to take notice of a calumny, which originated in bigotry and folly, and which had almoſt ceaſed to be remembered; and we think ſo ſtill. If we had entertained a different opinion, it was in our power to have related ſeveral particulars concerning the controverſy, which were not known to the Biſhop of St. Aſaph.

BYROM (JOHN), p. 123.

As the Fellows of Trinity College, in Cambridge, are allowed to hold their Fellowſhips, without taking orders, eight years, it is probable that Mr. Byrom did not quit his ſo ſoon as is repreſented in p. 121, but that he held it till his marriage (a).

(a) From Mr. Duncombe's communications.

CALAMY (DR. EDMUND), p. 145.

To the account of the French Prophets it may be added, that one of them went to Sir Thomas Parker, Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, and told him, from the Lord, that that he was to iſſue a Noli proſequi, with regard to ſome of his brethren. The anſwer was, that if he had come from the Lord, he would have been directed to the Attorney-General, whoſe buſineſs it was to do ſuch things.

Several compoſitions of Mr. Nicholas Fatio, chiefly of an aſtronomical nature, may be ſeen in the ſeventh and eighth volumes of the Gentleman's Magazine.

CAMDEN (WILLIAM), p. 175.

This year (1789) has appeared, in three volumes, folio, an edition of Camden's Britannia, tranſlated from the edition publiſhed by the author in 1607, enlarged by the lateſt diſcoveries, and illuſtrated with a new ſet of maps, and other copper-plates, by Richard Gough, Eſq. The work is the reſult of many years travel, inquiry, and labour. Of Mr. Gough I have no reaſon to ſpeak with perſonal reſpect: but not any circumſtance of that kind ſhall ever induce me to depart from the exerciſe of juſtice or of candour; or prevent my declaring, that, from his eminent character as an Antiquary, and the extent of his topographical knowledge, there can be no doubt but that his edition of the Britannia is a performance of great conſequence and value.

CAMPBELL (JOHN), DUKE OF ARGYLE, p. 208.

The circumſtance of his falling out of a window, mentioned in p. 200, is certain. He was then at Lethington, in Lothian, where his grandmother, the Ducheſs Dowager of Lauderdale is underſtood to have reſided. The Duke of Argyle had but an imperfect recollection of the accident. All that he could remember was as follows: "He had been taken to viſit "his grandfather while in priſon. The harſh ſound of iron bolts, when the priſon doors "were opened and ſhut, affected him much. Having been left in a room at Lethington "by himſelf, he heard ſome ſound of the opening of a door like that which he had heard "in priſon. This terrified him, and in his confuſion, he flew to an open window, and "fell over." That this happened at the very hour of his grandfather's execution, is probably no other than a popular and ſuperſtitious ſtory.

The Duke of Argyle's monument was erected by his widow, and coſt three times the ſum that had been left by Sir Henry Fermer (a).

(a) From our former correſpondent.

In p. 202, read, "by the loſſes ſuſtained at the battle of Almanara."

CAMPBELL (ARCHIBALD), EARL OF ISLAY, AND DUKE OF ARGYLE, p. 209.

He ſold his regiment, and with the price was allowed to purchaſe the office of Juſtice-General for Scotland, held by the old Earl of Cromerty.

In p. 209, for "Highlanders," read "Highland Gentlemen who had been engaged in the Rebellion." "It is fit," ſays our valuable correſpondent, ſo often referred to, "that impartial hiſtorians ſhould reprobate the cry of the day as to Highlanders and Re-"bels being ſynonymous. More Highlanders appeared in arms, during the Rebellion in "1745, for Government than againſt it. Had the Highlanders been unanimous on the "ſide of the Pretender, he would have marched with 20,000 men, inſtead of 5,500, into "England."

It is added by our correſpondent, that Lord Chatham took credit to himſelf, in Parliament, for the meaſure of employing in the Royal Army the natives of the Highlands who had been formerly diſaffected; and that "Something might have been made of ſo mixed "a character as that of Archibald, Duke of Argyle, in which there were great abilities "with great weakneſſes; ambition, checked by caution; activity, overpowered by indo-"lence; and a ſpirit of minuteneſs, little conſiſtent with extenſive knowledge."

CAMPBELL (JOHN), DR. p. 215.

Dr. Campbell looking once into a pamphlet at a Bookſeller's ſhop, liked it ſo well as to purchaſe it; and it was not till he had read it half through, that he diſcovered it to be his own compoſition. This he told the late Mr. David Hume (a).

(a) From the ſame correſpondent.

Dr. Johnſon, in a converſation during his Tour, ſaid, "I think highly of Campbell. "In the firſt place, he has very good parts. In the ſecond place, he has very extenſive "reading; not, perhaps, what is properly called learning, but hiſtory, politics, and, in "ſhort, that popular knowledge which makes a man very uſeful. In the third place, he "has learnt much by what is called the Vox viva. He talks with a great many people."

Dr. Johnſon one day called on Dr. Campbell, and they talked of Tull's Huſbandry. Dr. Campbell ſaid ſomething, and Johnſon began to diſpute it. "Come," ſaid Dr. Campbell, "We do not want to get the better of one another: we want to increaſe each other's ideas." This Dr. Johnſon took in good part, and the converſation then went on coolly and inſtructively (a).

CAPEL (ARTHUR), LORD CAPEL, p. 226.

This Nobleman ordered that his heart ſhould be preſerved and kept at Haddam-Hall, till his Royal Maſter was buried with due funeral honours, which he was ſure muſt ſoon happen from the reſtoration of his ſon. His Lordſhip directed that then his heart ſhould be laid at Charles the Firſt's feet. When Haddam-Hall was in part pulled down, about the year 1701, the heart was found in a ſilver box, embalmed with ſpices; and, by the direction of the ſecond Earl of Eſſex, it was buried as near Lord Capel's body as poſſible (a).

(a) Communicated by the late Dr. Paul Wright, from the papers of the late Pulter Foreſter, Eſq.

CAPEL (ARTHUR), EARL OF ESSEX, p. 232.

Paul Bomeney, who is repreſented, p. 228, as a French ſervant, that was ſuppoſed to have murdered the Earl of Eſſex, is ſaid by others to have been an Italian, and that his proper name was Bomini (a).

(a) From Mr. Duncombe's communications.

CARTE (THOMAS), p. 269.

"Carte's life of the Duke of Ormond," ſaid Dr. Johnſon, "is conſidered as a Book "of Authority, but it is ill written. The matter is diffuſed in too many words; there is "no animation, no compreſſion, no vigour. Two good volumes in duodecimo might "be made out of the two in folio (a)."

(a) Boſwell's Journal, p. 367.

CARTERET (JOHN), LORD CARTERET, EARL GRANVILLE, p. 280.

Earl Granville, amidſt all his ſtruggles for place and power, had an affectation of ſaying, "I love my fire ſide;" which humour was well expoſed by Mr. Hawkins Browne, in a copy of verſes, entitled, "The Fire Side: a paſtoral ſoliloquy." Lord Carteret's letter on the Battle at Dettingen was much ridiculed at the time, and the only excuſe for it was his Lordſhip's intoxication—not merely with joy (a).

In giving his judgment concerning men of high office in the ſtate, Earl Granville ſometimes ſpoke too incautiouſly for a politician. Having been aſked who wrote the King's ſpeech in a certain year, he ſaid, "Do you not ſee the blunt pen of the old Attorney?" meaning Lord Hardwick.

It was not always in his power to conceal the pangs of diſappointed ambition. He made a preſent of a copy of the Polyglot Bible, which the Doctor got bound in an elegant manner. When Lord Granville ſaw the book in its new dreſs, he ſaid, "You have "done with it as the King has done with me: He made me fine, and he laid me by (b)."

In Lord Egmont's manuſcripts are ſome curious traits of Earl Granville's character. He was one of thoſe politicians who make religion ſubſervient to the ſtate. The conſidering the kingdom of Chriſt as a ſeparate kingdom from thoſe of this world he counted abſurd. On the contrary, he maintained that Chriſtianity is incorporated with civil government as ſand with lime, each of which by itſelf makes no mortar. Where he imagined that the public intereſt might receive prejudice by Chriſtianity, he was againſt its being taught. He hoped, therefore, never to ſee our Negroes in America become Chriſtians, becauſe he believed that this would render them leſs laborious ſlaves. On the ſame principle, he was againſt any attempts to convert the American ſavages. In learning Chriſtianity, they would fall into the uſe of letters, and a ſkill in the arts being the conſequence, they would become more formidable to the plantations. Purſuing a ſimilar train of reaſoning, Lord Granville wiſhed to God that the Pope might never turn Proteſtant, or the Italians ceaſe to be Papiſts, for then we ſhould ſell them no fiſh. He was glad that the Clergy ſent abroad to our Plantations were immoral and ignorant wretches, becauſe they could have no influence over the inhabitants, as better and wiſer men would have; and who would uſe that influence, for the purpoſe of inſpiring the Planters with a ſpirit of independence on their mother country. He was hoſtile to the ſcheme of ſending Biſhops to America. Theſe, he thought, would labour to bring the ſeveral ſects to one religion; whereas the ſecurity of that people's dependence on England he conceived to ariſe from their mutual diviſions. He was an enemy, likewiſe, to the improvement of our Colonies in learning. This, he ſaid, would take off their youth from wholly attending to trade, fill them with ſpeculative notions of government and liberty, and prevent the education of the ſons of rich Planters in England, where they contract a love to this kingdom, and when grown old, come back and ſettle, to the great increaſe of our wealth. Even at home he was againſt charity ſchools, and was not for having the vulgar taught to read, that they might think of nothing but the plow, and their other low avocations. Such were Earl Granville's political ſentiments, concerning which our readers will make their own reflections.

(a) From Mr. Duncombe's communications.

(b) From the communications of our other correſpondent.

CHAUCER (GEOFFREY), p. 481.

We learn, from the European Magazine, that, in a periodical work, called "The Univerſal Viſitor, or Monthly Memorialiſt," conducted by Chriſtopher Smart and Richard Rolt, there was printed a life of Chaucer, by Dr. Johnſon. In this piece the Doctor declares, that Chaucer, if not the greateſt, was, without controverſy, the moſt univerſal genius that ever exiſted. Whether he wrote in proſe or verſe, ſeriouſly or humorouſly, he was equally himſelf; equally incomparable: and when we reflect, that he had the language in a manner to make as he wrote it, what amazement does it afford! There is not a ſingle ſpecies of poetry in which this great man has not left ſome ſpeciments of his excellency. Dr. Johnſon then proceeds to confirm his aſſertion by particular inſtances (a).

CHEYNE (GEORGE), p. 499.

It was in conſequence of Dr. Pitcairn's advice, that Mr. Cheyne was induced to quit the ſtudy of theology for that of phyſic. He was at that time a Tutor in a private Gentleman's family (a).

CHICHLEY (HENRY), p. 505.

The ſmall figures of the Apoſtles and Cardinal Virtues, on Archbiſhop Chichley's tomb in Canterbury Cathedral, are ſuppoſed, from the elegance of the ſculpture, which is ſuperior to any then known in England, to have been carved in Italy (a).

In 1783, a Life of Henry Chichelé, accurately and neatly written, founded on the beſt authorities, and containing an appendix of original papers, was publiſhed by Mr. Spencer, Fellow of All Souls College. The laſt ſection concludes with a brief, but elegant ſummary of the Archbiſhop's character.

CHUBB (THOMAS), p. 532.

It has been ſuggeſted to us, by our valuable correſpondent, that Whiſton's Memoirs ought to have been quoted. We have referred to them for a particular fact; but it might have been added, that they contain Mr. Whiſton's view of Chubb's character and writings.

CHURCHILL (JOHN), DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, p. 565.

Page 554. Battle of Malplaquet. It has been objected to the Duke of Marlborough, that he might have attacked the French ſooner, before they had entrenched themſelves ſo ſtrongly, by which he would have rendered the victory leſs bloody. But this objection will vaniſh, when it is known that ſuch was his Grace's intention and propoſal, but that he waved it in deference to Prince Eugene, who inſiſted on their waiting for the troops that had been employed in the ſiege of Tournay. The event, however, did credit to the Duke's judgment; for though thoſe troops were near enough to have joined them, yet they actually did not, as they were not wanted till after the victory was gained. Of this Mr. Duncombe was aſſured, by Colonel King, who was preſent.

Page 565. When Sarah, Ducheſs of Marlborough, deſired two poets, Mallet and Glover, to write the Duke's Hiſtory, ſhe added a ſarcaſtic, but needleſs proviſo, that none of it ſhould be in verſe. One trait of her character was her reprinting and diſperſing, among the Electors of St. Alban's, a large edition of a fooliſh comedy, entitled, "Love in a Hollow Tree," of which the noble author (Lord Grimſton) had called in all the copies (a).

In

In the "Sylva, or the Wood," a recent and agreeable publication, are printed, as curioſities, without alteration of grammar, orthography, or punctuation, two letters of the Ducheſs, from her own hand writing. "She was of a ſtrong underſtanding and uncommon "ſagacity," ſays the author, "which I premiſe to juſtify my wonder at the ſtrange "neglect of education among the females; for her woman would have written as well, "and perhaps better." According to the ſame author, the Ducheſs, though oppreſſed with the infirmities of age, and almoſt bed-rid, would continue ſpeaking to Mr. Hooke the Hiſtorian, for ſix hours together. "She delivered to him, without any notes, her "account in the moſt lively as well as the moſt connected manner: and, though the "correction of the language was left to Hooke, yet the whole is plainly animated with "her ſpirit; and, as ſome philoſophers have ſaid of ſoul with regard to body, ſhe was "tota in toto, et tota in qualibet parte (b)."

CIBBER (COLLEY), p. 592.

Page 584. The Nonjuror. "It has juſtly been obſerved," ſays Mr. Duncombe, "and ſhould have been repeated, that the character of a Nonjuror is here ſtrangely "miſtaken, and is as far from being a juſt object of ridicule as hypocriſy is from "conſcience."

To the poetical ſquibs that were thrown at Colley may be added the following lines:

"In merry old England it once was a rule,
"The King had his Poet, as well as his Fool.
"But now we're ſo frugal, I'd have you to know it,
"That Colley can ſerve both for Fool and for Poet."

But Colley was no more a Fool than he was a Poet (a).

In Davies's Life of Garrick, and eſpecially in his "Dramatic Miſcellanies," a great deal is ſaid concerning Colley Cibber. The concluding chapter of the laſt mentioned work is wholly devoted to this ſubject (b).

CLARKE (SAMUEL), p. 610.

Our ingenious and worthy friend, the Rev. Mr. Hall, has favoured us with a number of original letters, written to Dr. Clarke, by ſeveral learned men of his time. The ſhorteſt of them, and the only one which is in Latin, we ſhall tranſcribe. It contains a very zealous approbation of the Doctor's ſcriptural doctrine of the Trinity.

"Domine doctiſſime!
"Scripturalem tuam Doctrinam de Trinitate perlegi, nec in re quapiam aut S. Scrip-"turæ aut rectæ rationi inveni diſſonam, ſed utrique maxime conſentaneam: Firmiſſimé "credo veritatem te depinxiſſe unicam, ideoq; reddo tibi gratias immortales pro præs "tantiſſimo illo libro, et ut tota eccleſia Anglicana eandem agnoſcat et profiteatur fidem, "ſemper fuerit votum et preces, Datæ ſunt 2^do^ die, Februarii, A. D. 1719^no^.

"Devinctiſſimi et humillimi tui ſervi,
"ROBERTI BLAKEWAY."

CLEIVELAND (JOHN), p. 633.

In note H, p. 630, there is a conſiderable miſtake in the extract from the Critical Review. The author confounds David Leſley, a Gentleman of noble birth, and who could write better than moſt of his contemporaries, with Alexander Leſley, an illiterate ſoldier of fortune, although a much abler man than the other (a).

(a) From the communications of our correſpondent.

CLIFFORD (GEORGE), EARL OF CUMBERLAND, p. 642.

In Skipton Caſtle, there are a variety of pictures, on the borders of which are deſcriptions of the perſons painted. Theſe pictures include the principal perſons and connections of the Clifford family, and the deſcriptions throw a good deal of light on the hiſtory of that family. In ſome of the portraits, books are repreſented ſtanding or lying. From the titles of theſe books, and from the catalogue of thoſe contained in Lady Anne Clifford's library, (a copy of which we have been favoured with by Sir William Muſgrave) may be collected what was the kind of reading that prevailed among people of rank at that time.

The

The larger number of the works mentioned are devotional, moral, and poetical. Hiſtorical books and romances occupy but a ſmall part of the catalogue.

A large and elegant encomium on Anne, Counteſs of Dorſet, Pembroke and Montgomery, is given, by Mr. Gilpin, in his "Obſervations chiefly relative to pictureſque beauty, made in the year 1772, in ſeveral parts of England, particularly the mountains and lakes of Cumberland and Weſtmoreland."

CLIVE (ROBERT), LORD CLIVE, p. 663.

Several anonymous ſtrictures, we underſtand, have been made upon this article. All we ſhall ſay is, that it is not our cuſtom ſpecifically to relate facts without expreſs and poſitive authority. If any Gentleman of character can give us farther information concerning Robert Lord Clive, and will authenticate it with his name, he will find that we are not afraid of recording truth.

COKE (SIR EDWARD), p. 702.

In the late edition of Coke upon Littleton, by Mr. Hargrave and Mr. Butler, will be found a compleat delineation of our great Lawyer's abilities and character as a legal writer.

WHO HAVE FLOURISHED IN

GREAT-BRITAIN, and IRELAND,

FROM THE EARLIEST AGES, TO THE PRESENT TIMES.

COLE (Henry), a perſon of conſiderable learning in the XVIth century, was born at Godſhill in the Iſle of Wight, and educated in Wykeham's School near Wincheſter (a). From thence he was choſen into New-College, Oxon, of which he became perpetual Fellow in 1523, and there ſtudying the Civil Law, took the degree of Bachelor in that faculty, March 3, 1529-30 (b). Then he travelled into Italy, and improved himſelf in his ſtudies at Padua, being a zealous Roman Catholic. Notwithſtanding this, upon his return to England, he acknowledged King Henry VIII. to be the ſupreme head of the Church of England (c). In 1540, he took the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law (d); and the ſame year reſigned his Fellowſhip, being then ſettled in London, an Advocate in the Court of Arches, Prebendary of Yatminſter Secunda in the church of Sarum, and about the ſame time made Archdeacon of Ely (e). On the 11th of September, 1540, he was admitted to the Rectory of Chelmsford in Eſſex; and October the 5th following, collated to the Prebend of Holborn, which he reſigned April 19, 1541; and was the ſame day collated to that of Sneating, which he voiding by ceſſion on or before March 22d next enſuing, was on that very day collated to the Prebend of Wenlakeſbarne (f). In 1542, October the 4th, he was elected Warden of New-College; and in 1545, made Rector of Newton Longville in Buckinghamſhire (g). Soon after, when King Edward VI. came to the crown, Dr. Cole outwardly embraced, and preached up the Reformation, frequented the Proteſtants ſervice, and communicated with them. However, altering his mind, or being diſguſted at ſome of the proceedings then taken, he reſigned his Rectory of Chelmsford in 1547; and in 1551, his Wardenſhip of New-College; and the year following, his Rectory of Newton Longville (h). After Queen Mary's acceſſion to the crown, he became again a zealous Roman Catholic; and in 1554, was made Provoſt of Eton College, of which he had been Fellow (i). The ſame year, June 20, he had the degree of Doctor in Divinity conferred on him (k); and was one of the Divines that diſputed publicly at Oxford with Archbiſhop Cranmer, and Biſhop Ridley (l). He alſo preached the funeral ſermon before Archbiſhop Cranmer's execution (m). Moreover, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners to viſit the Univerſity of Cambridge; was elected Dean of St. Paul's the 11th of December, 1556; made (Auguſt 8, 1557) Vicar-General of the Spiritualties under Cardinal Pole, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the 1st of October following, Official of the Arches, and Dean of the Peculiars; and in November ensuing, Judge of the Court of Audience. In 1558, he was appointed one of the Overseers of that Cardinal's Will (n). In the first year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, he was one of the eight Catholic Divines who disputed publicly at Westminster with so many Protestants [A], when that Queen was about to settle a reformation in the Church of England (o). He distinguished himself then, and afterwards, by his writings in favour of Popery [B]. But that disputation, wherein Dr. Cole was spokesman, coming to nothing, he was deprived of his Deanery (p), fined five hundred marks, and imprisoned (q). He died in, or near, Wood-street Compter in London, in December 1579 (r). The famous Leland hath eternized his memory among other learned men of our nation (s). He is elsewhere called, 'A person more earnest than wise (t).' But R. Ascham highly commends him (u) for his learning and humanity [C].

The Protestant Divines, were, John Scory, late Bishop of Chichester, David Whitehead, John Jewell, John Aylmer, Richard Cox, Edmund Grindal, Robert Horne, and Edmund Guest (1). The points then disputed upon, were, 1. Prayers in an unknown Tongue. 2. The Church's Authority to appoint, change, and take away Ceremonies. 3. (5) Epistol. R. Aschami, lib. iii. Epistola D. Colo.

COLES (Elisha), author of the Dictionary, was born in Northamptonshire about the year 1640 (a). Towards the end of the year 1658, he was entered into Magdalen-College in Oxford, but left it without taking a degree; and retiring to London, taught Latin there to youths, and English to foreigners, about 1663. Afterwards he continued that employment with good success in Russel-street, near Covent-Garden; and at length became one of the Ushers of Merchant-Taylors School. But being there guilty of a very great fault (b), he was forced to withdraw into Ireland, from whence he never returned. He was a curious and critical person in the English and Latin tongues, did much good in his profession, and wrote several useful and necessary books for the instruction of beginners. The titles of them are as follows: I. 'The Compleat English Schoolmaster: 'or, the most natural and easy Method of spelling and reading English according to the 'present proper Pronunciation of the Language in Oxford and London, &c.' Lond. 1674, 8*vo.* II. 'The newest, plainest, and shortest Short-hand, containing, first, A brief Account of the Short-hand already extant, with their Alphabets and fundamental Rules. 'Secondly, A plain and easy Method for Beginners, less burdensome to the Memory 'than any other. Thirdly, A new Invention for contracting Words, with special Rules 'for contracting Sentences, and other ingenious Fancies, &c.' Lond. 1674, 8*vo.* III. "Nolens Volens: or, you shall make Latin whether you will or no, containing the 'plainest Directions that have been yet given upon that Subject.' Lond. 1675, 8*vo.* With it is printed, IV. 'The Youth's visible Bible, being an Alphabetical Collection (from the 'whole Bible) of such general Heads as were judged most capable of Hieroglyphics; illustrated with twenty-four Copper-Plates, &c.' V. 'An English Dictionary, explaining the difficult Terms that are used in Divinity, Husbandry, Physic, Philosophy, Law, 'Navigation, Mathematics, and other Arts and Sciences. VI. 'A Dictionary, English-Latin, and 'Latin-English [A]; containing all Things necessary for the translating of either Language into abridgments of Ainſworth have appeared, by Mr. Thomas and other perſons. The men, however, who have been benefactors to the cauſe of learning, ought to be remembered with gratitude, though their writings may happen to be ſuperſeded by more perfect productions. It is no ſmall point of honour to be the means of paving the way for ſuperior works.

(b) What it was, is not expressly mentioned any where.

There was an Eliſha Cole, or Coles, contemporary with the compiler of the Dictionary, who was a Nonconformiſt Divine, and wrote a treatiſe on God's Sovereignty. I do not introduce him becauſe I think either the author or the book worthy of particular notice, but to mention a circumſtance relating to myſelf. The work, which is compoſed in the higheſt ſtrain of Calviniſm, upon what is called the ſuperlapſarian ſcheme, was put into my hands, when thirteen or fourteen years of age, by ſome zealous friends, to inſtruct and confirm me in the doctrines it contained. The reading of it, however, produced a contrary effect. The author ſtated the objections to his opinions concerning abſolute election, reprobation, and other points, and endeavoured to remove them; but to me his objections appeared ſtronger than his anſwers; ſo that I owe to Cole on God's Sovereignty my firſt renunciation of Calviniſm. The book is yet in ſome vogue, amongſt readers of a certain claſs.] K.

COLET (JOHN), a very learned Divine, and founder of St. Paul's School, London, was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Henry Colet, Knt. [A], twice Lord-Mayor of London, by Chriſtian his wife, a gentlewoman of good birth, probably of the family of Knevet (a). He was born in the pariſh of St. Anthonine's, now better known by the name of St. Antholin's, within the city of London, in the year 1466 (b). It is taken for granted, that he had his firſt education at St. Anthony's School, then the moſt eminent in London, but now utterly decayed (c). In 1483, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, and in all probability to Magdalen-College, where there were, at that time, one or more of his ſurname (d). After having ſpent ſeven years in the ſtudy of Logic and Philoſophy, he took his degrees in Arts, being then thoroughly acquainted with M. T. Cicero's works, which he had moſt carefully peruſed; and alſo no ſtranger to Plato and Plotinus, which he not only read, but compared, making the one ſerve as a commentary to the other [B]. He was moreover ſkilled in every branch of the Mathematics (e). Having thus laid a good foundation of learning at home, he went and travelled abroad, for his farther improvement; firſt to France, and then to Italy: and ſeems to have continued in thoſe two countries from the year 1493 to 1497 (f). But before his departure, and indeed when he was but of two years ſtanding at the Univerſity, being nineteen years of age, and only in the order of an Acolythe, namely, on the 6th of Auguſt, 1485, he was inſtituted to the Rectory of Denington in Suffolk [C], to which he was preſented by Sir William Knevit, Knt. and his Lady, and kept it to his dying day (g). He was alſo preſented, by his own father, on September 30, to the Rectory of Thyrning in Huntingdonſhire, to which he had inſtitution, October 2, 1490 (h); but he reſigned it before the latter end of the year 1493 (i), probably before he ſet out on his travels. Being come to Paris, he improved himſelf there by the converſation of learned men; particularly of Robert Gaguin, the

[A] Was the ſon of Sir Henry Colet, Knt.] Sir Henry Colet was a younger ſon of Robert Colet, of Wendover, in Buckinghamſhire, Eſq; and born in that county at the manor of Hale. He was bred a Mercer in London, where he got very conſiderable riches (1). In the year 1477, he was the elder of the two Sheriffs of London; and in part of the years 1486, and 1487, Lord-Mayor of that city: as he was again, a ſecond time, in part of the years 1495, and 1496 (2). By his wife Chriſtian, he had two and twenty children, eleven ſons, and eleven daughters (3). He died in 1510, and was buried at Stepney: but his widow lived to bury her only ſon the Dean, being then above ninety years of age (4). Sir Henry was a great benefactor to his pariſh church of St. Anthonine's; and, in Mr. Stow's time, the pictures of him, and his wife, ten ſons, and ten daughters, were in the glaſs window on the north ſide of that church (5). John, who is the ſubject of this article, was the firſt-born; and within a few years became the only ſurviving comfort to his parents (6).

But if Mr. Colet did enter upon a cure of ſouls before he could ſufficiently conſider the weighty charge belonging to it, he atoned for it, by his extraordinary care, when he came to a more mature age (8). The order of an Acolythe is one of the ſeven orders in the Church of Rome, as may be ſeen in all the rituals.

Hiſtorian,

Hiſtorian, who raiſed in him an earneſt deſire of being acquainted with Eraſmus, the honour of his age. He became alſo acquainted with the celebrated Budæus, and Mr. Deloine, who procured him what he wiſhed, by recommending him to Eraſmus (k). In Italy, he contracted a friendſhip with ſeveral eminent perſons; eſpecially with his own countrymen, William Grocin, Thomas Linacre, William Lilly, and William Latymer, who were learning the Greek tongue (then but little known in England) under thoſe great maſters, Demetrius, Ang. Politianus, Hermolaus Barbarus, and Pomponius Sabinus (l). As he knew himſelf very little of it when he left Oxford (m), he undoubtedly embraced the opportunity of perfecting himſelf in that language [D]. And, having devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, he read, whilſt abroad, the beſt of the ancient Fathers, particularly Dionyſius, Origen, Cyprian, Ambroſe, and Jerome (n). But he very much deſpiſed St. Auguſtin, which ſhowed his good ſenſe and judgment (o). In the courſe of his ſtudies, both at home and abroad, he ſometimes looked into D. Scotus, and T. Aquinas, and other ſchool Divines. He alſo ſtudied both the Civil and Canon Law. Moreover, there was not one book relating to the Hiſtory and Conſtitution of Church and State, which he did not carefully peruſe. And, in order to poliſh and improve his ſtyle, and qualify himſelf for an elegant Preacher, he frequently read ſuch Engliſh Poets as were then extant (p). During his travels, he was preſented to the Prebend of Botevant, in the cathedral church of York, into which he was inſtalled by proxy, March 5, 1493-4 (q). He was alſo made Canon of St. Martin's Le-Grand, London, and Prebendary of Good-Eaſter, in the ſame church (r). Upon his return to England in 1496, or 1497, he was ordained Deacon December 17, and Prieſt the 26th of July following (s). He had, indeed, before he entered into orders, great temptations, both from his natural diſpoſition, and otherwiſe, to lay his ſtudies aſide, and give himſelf up to all the gaieties of the Court [E]: but he curbed theſe idle inclinations (t); and, after having ſtaid a few months with his father and mother at London and Stepney (u), he retired to Oxford (w). Here he did not ſpend his time in idleneſs, but undertook to read public lectures, without any ſtipend or reward, on St. Paul's Epiſtles [F], which were crowded with hearers, and much admired (x). And in this place he had the pleaſure of contracting an acquaintance with the immortal Eraſmus, (who came to Oxford about the end of the year 1497) which ended in the ſtricteſt intimacy imaginable, and continued to the end of their lives (y). The time when Mr. Colet expounded St. Paul's Epiſtles, was in the years 1497, 1498, [D] As he knew very little Greek when he left Oxford, he undoubtedly embraced the opportunity of perfecting himſelf in that language.] For at ſchool he had no opportunity of learning the Greek tongue, nor ſcarcely in the Univerſity, at his firſt coming thither. Such was the infelicity of thoſe times of ignorance, that the Greek language was not taught in any of our grammar-ſchools; nor was there imagined to be any great need of it in the two Univerſities, by the generality of ſcholars. Even to love or encourage the ſtudy of it, was looked upon as hereſy. Hence the proverb (9), Cave à Græcis, ne fias Hæreticus. Fuge literas Hebræas, ne fias Judæorum ſimilis, i. e. 'Take 'care of Greek, leſt you become a heretic. Avoid 'Hebrew, that you may not become like the Jews.' And for this reaſon thoſe very few that underſtood Greek were afraid to teach it, leſt they ſhould be thought to propagate hereſy (10). As for Oxford, nothing was known there but Latin, and that in the moſt depraved ſtyle of the ſchoolmen. Cornelius Vitellius, an Italian, was the firſt who taught Greek in that Univerſity; and from him the famous Grocin learned the firſt elements thereof. In Cambridge, Eraſmus was the firſt who taught the Greek grammar. And ſo very low was the ſtate of learning in that Univerſity, that in 1485, nothing was taught there but Alexander's Parva Logicalia, the old axioms of Ariſtotle, and the queſtions of Scotus, all in Latin; till in proceſs of time, the Mathematics were brought in, and Ariſtotle in Greek, with ſeveral authors, whoſe names had not been heard of before (11). Linacre and Grocin were the only two Engliſhmen then able to teach Greek. Soon after, Bernard André, a native of Tholouſe, opened a ſchool for that language in London. But the firſt Engliſhman who, in any public ſchool, taught Greek as well as Latin, was William Lilly, in St. Paul's School; the founder whereof, Dean Colet, ſeeing the neceſſity of having a tolerable knowledge of the Greek tongue, in order to proceed the better in his theological ſtudies, did ſhun no pains, nor thought himſelf too old to learn it, or at leaſt to improve himſelf therein (12).

[E] He had——great temptations——to lay his ſtudies aſide, and give himſelf up to all the gaieties of the Court.] And, indeed, he was endued with ſome natural propenſities, that ſeemed fitter for a public life at large, than for the confinement of a college, or a gown. For he had naturally a ſpirit exceeding high, and impatient of the leaſt injury and affront. He was too much addicted to love, and luxury, and ſleep, and mightily diſpoſed to an air of freedom and jocoſeneſs, and had a tincture of avarice in him. But he conquered himſelf, and brought his high ſpirit to be ſubject to reaſon; ſo that he could bear a reproof even from his own ſervant. His diſpoſition to love, ſleep, and luxury, he reſtrained by a continual abſtinence from ſuppers, a ſtrict ſobriety, a cloſe application to his ſtudies, and by a ſerious and religious converſation. So that by his philoſophy, his ſacred ſtudies, his watchings, and faſtings, and devotions, he preſerved himſelf every ſtep of his whole life from the pollutions of the world. And yet whenever opportunities offered themſelves, either of jeſting with facetious perſons, or talking familiarly with the female ſex, or of appearing at feaſts and entertainments, there nature would break forth. For which reaſon, he very much forbore acquaintance with laymen, and eſpecially all public entertainments: where, if neceſſity brought him, he picked out ſome learned friend, and talked Latin with him, to avoid the prophane diſcourſe of the table. And in the mean time he would eat but of one diſh, and take but one or two draughts of beer, refraining commonly from wine: which yet he reliſhed, if very good. There never was a more flowing wit; and, for that reaſon, he delighted in the like ſociety: but even then, he choſe rather to divert to ſuch diſcourſes as ſavoured moſt of religion. He was a great lover of little children, admiring their pretty innocence and ſimplicity (13).

(13) Eraſmi Epiſtola Jodoco Jonæ.

[F] He undertook to read public lectures, without any ſtipend or reward, on St. Paul's Epiſtles.] And though he had neither taken nor deſired any degree in Divinity, there was not a Doctor in Divinity, or Law, no Abbot, nor any other dignitary, but came gladly to hear him, and took notes of his lectures (14). For, at this time, it was a new thing to have any readings upon the Scriptures (15).

1499, &c. (z). In the year 1501, he was admitted to proceed in Divinity, or to the reading of the ſentences (a). In 1502, he became Prebendary of Durnesford, in the church of Sarum: and on the 20th of January, 1503-4, he reſigned his Prebend of Good-Eaſter (b). In 1504, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (c); and May 5, 1505, was inſtituted to the Prebend of Mora, in the cathedral church of St. Paul (d). The ſame year and month, he was made Dean of that church (e), without the leaſt application of his own (f); at which time he reſigned the Vicarage of Stepney, the date of his admiſſion to which doth not appear (g). Being raiſed to this ſtation, he reformed the decayed diſcipline of his cathedral church, and brought in a new practice there, the preaching himſelf upon Sundays, and all ſolemn feſtivals. In this courſe of preaching, he did not take a deſultory text out of the Goſpel or Epiſtle for the day, but choſe a larger ſubject; as St. Matthew's Goſpel, the Creed, or the like, and made ſucceſſive ſermons upon them, till he had gone through the whole. That his church might be conſtantly ſupplied, he called in to his aſſiſtance other learned and able perſons, particularly William Grocin, and John Sowle, who read Divinity-Lectures. At laſt he procured a ſettlement for ever, for ſuch a lecture to be conſtantly read in St. Paul's cathedral, three days in every week, by the Chancellor of the church, or his ſufficient deputy (h). Theſe Divinity-Lectures raiſed in the nation an enquiry after the Holy Scriptures, which were, in a manner, laid aſide for the School-Divinity, and ſo prepared a way for the Reformation. And what helped to promote it, was the contempt which Dean Colet expreſſed for the religious houſes, the abuſes he ſhewed were in them, and the danger of impoſing celibacy on the Clergy (i). This way of thinking, and the Dean's free manner of communicating his thoughts, which were then looked upon as heretical and impious, expoſed him to the hatred of the Clergy, and to a perſecution from Dr. Fitz-James [G], Biſhop of London (k). For, preaching frequently at St. Paul's, and before the King, and in other populous aſſemblies, he would not refrain from ſpeaking, with ſome freedom and boldneſs, againſt the vulgar ſuperſtitions and prevailing corruptions in the church; whereby he incurred the indignation of the Biſhop, who was a rigid and ſuperſtitious man, and had for a long while looked upon him with an evil eye (l). But the Dean's troubles and perſecutions ſeemed only to have rendered him more devout and charitable, and weaned him from the world. Having therefore a plentiful eſtate, without any very near relations, and having already diſpenſed the yearly produce of it in the occaſional demands of piety and charity, he reſolved, in the midſt of his life and health, to conſecrate the whole property of it to ſome ſtanding and perpetual benefaction (m). And this he performed, by founding St. Paul's School in London [H], which hath produced ſeveral learned and ingenious men (n). For [G] The Dean's free manner of communicating his thoughts——expoſed him to——a perſecution from Dr. Fitz-James.] His Lectures and Sermons being chiefly employed in opening the ſenſe of the Scriptures, then called the New Learning, he came to be counted a perverſe Heretic, at leaſt to be ſuſpected of the crime of heretical pravity. The Biſhop, upon this ſcore, accuſed him to Archbiſhop Warham, as a dangerous man; and calling in the aſſiſtance of two other Biſhops, of equal bigotry, and no leſs virulence, he began to create Dean Colet a great deal of trouble and vexation, uſing no other weapon but that of the charge of hereſy, then reckoned the moſt fatal engine for the deſtruction of an enemy. So the Biſhop drew up the following Articles againſt him. I. That the ſaid Dr. Colet had taught, that images were not to be worſhipped. II. That he had preached againſt the temporal poſſeſſions of the Biſhops, by denying that the repeated exhortation of Chriſt to Peter, to feed his ſheep, could be at all meant of hoſpitality, but of an exemplary life, and good doctrine; becauſe the Apoſtles were then poor, and not able to be hoſpitable. III. That he had preached againſt ſome men's reading their ſermons in a cold unaffected manner, whereby he muſt needs mean to reflect upon the Biſhop himſelf, who, by reaſon of his old age, had taken up that way of preaching. But Archbiſhop Warham, who knew the integrity and worth of Dr. Colet, diſmiſſed him, without giving him the trouble of putting in any formal anſwer. However, the Biſhop not ſatisfied with that fruitleſs attempt, endeavoured afterwards to ſtir up the King, and the whole Court, againſt Dean Colet (16). Nay, we are told, that he was not only in trouble, but ſhould have been burnt, if God had not turned the King's heart to the contrary (17); and that, ſome years after his deceaſe, his body had like to be taken up, and burnt (18).

[H] And this he performed, by founding St. Paul's School in London.] This ſchool was founded between the years 1508 and 1512, ſome years being taken up in purchaſing the ſite, removing the incumbrances, erecting the new pile of buildings, providing ſuitable maſters, and ſettling the endowment in truſt for ever (19). This is the reaſon why our Hiſtorians vary ſo much about the exact year of its foundation: for ſome (20) place it under the year 1508; others in 1509 (21); others in 1510 (22); and, finally, others in 1512 (23). The worthy founder dedicated it to the honour of Chriſt Jeſus in his childhood: and ordained, that there ſhould be in it, an High-maſter, a Surmaſter, and a Chaplain, who ſhould teach gratis one hundred and fifty-three children, divided into eight claſſes. He endowed it with one meſſuage, and two ſhops, in Soper's-lane; ſix tenements in St. George's pariſh in Pudding-lane; two meſſuages in Bridge-ſtreet, in the pariſh of St. Magnus; four ſhops; ſome tenements without Aldgate, and all their appurtenances; manors, lands, and tenements in Buckinghamſhire; the manor of Vach in Barton, and that of Berwicke; lands in Colcheſter; ſeveral fields and tenements, the places where they lie not expreſſed, only the occupiers names; a barn; four acres of land, the backſide of White-hart-ſtreet; eight acres in London-field; nine acres, and gardens near it, with ſeveral tenements, amounting then in all to 122*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* ½ a year, but now much improved. The Company of Mercers were appointed Truſtees (24). The High-maſters of this School, from the firſt to this time, have been theſe:—1. William Lilly, appointed by the founder in 1512.—2. John Rightwyſe, choſen in 1522.—3. Richard Jones, in 1532.—4. Thomas Freeman, in 1549.—5. John Cook, M. A. in 1559.—6. William Malin, or Malim, in 1573.—7. John Harriſon, M. A. in 1581.—8. For the uſe of this ſchool, he drew up ſome rudiments of grammar, with an abridgment of the Principles of Religion, of which we ſhall give an account below among the reſt of his works (o). Beſides his dignities and preferments already mentioned, he was Rector of the Fraternity or Gild of Jeſus in St. Paul's Church (p), for which he procured new Statutes; and alſo Chaplain, and Preacher in Ordinary to King Henry VIII. and (if Eraſmus is not miſtaken) one of his Privy-Council (q). When he came to about the fiftieth year of age, he grew ſo weary of the world, that he fully purpoſed to throw himſelf into ſome monaſtery, and there end his days in quiet and ſolitude (r). In purſuance of this reſolution, he built a convenient and handſome houſe within the precinct of the Charter-Houſe, near Richmond Palace in Surrey, where he intended to retire in his old age, when broken with infirmities, and unable to diſcharge the duties of his function (s). But death prevented him: for having been ſeized by the ſweating ſickneſs at two ſeveral times before, and relapſing into it a third time, he fell into a conſumption that carried him off on the 16th of September, 1519, in the fifty-third year of his age (t). He was buried on the ſouth ſide of the choir of St. Paul's, with an humble monument prepared by him ſeveral years before, and having no other inſcription but his bare name (u). But afterwards a handſomer monument was ſet up for him by the company of Mercers [I] (w). He wrote ſeveral things, of which there is an account in the note [K]. As to his perſon

This is very ſcarce, being hardly to be met with, excepting in the Bodleian Library, Oxon, among Archbiſhop Laud's MSS. Is is reprinted by Dr. S. And IX. Epiſtola Abbati Winchincombenſi, printed by Dr. Knight, at the end of the Dean's Life. The Commentaries upon the Epiſtles to the Corinthians, are alſo in manuſcript, in Emanuel-College Library, given thereto by Dr. Anthony Tuckney; and in that of Benet-College, the gift of Archbiſhop Parker. At the end of this laſt, there is the Beginning of a Commentary on Geneſis, no where elſe to be met with. X. One of the Dean's own manuſcripts, being an Analytical Commentary on the Apoſtolical Epiſtles; and a ſummary of his larger Comments was in the poſſeſſion of Roger Gale, Eſq. It is the faireſt, and indeed the only one manuſcript of Dr. Colet's, of that kind, extant (33). Bale and Pits mention alſo theſe books of his. 1. Commentaria in Proverbia Salomonis. 2. In Evangelium S. Matthæi. 3. In Precationem Dominicam; tranſlated, as Mr. Wood tells us (34), into Engliſh. 4. In Symbolum fidei. 5. Breviloquium dictorum Chriſti. 6. Reſponſio ad argumenta Eraſmiana de tædio & pavore Chriſti (35); called by Bale and Pits, Ad argumenta Eraſmi; and, De reformidatione Chriſti; and made two different books. 7. Conciones ordinariæ, & extraordinariæ. Among which were two ſermons on war, preached before King Henry VIII. 8. Vita hominis Chriſtiani. 9. Excerptiones doctorum. 10. Epiſtolæ ad Taylerum. 11. Ortolanus. 12. De moribus componendis. 13. De puerili inſtitutione. Theſe two laſt ſeem to be the ſame as his Rudimenta Grammatices (36). As the Dean had an inaccuracy and uncorrectneſs in his way of writing (37), that was like to expoſe him to the cenſures of the Critics; and, beſides, was no perfect maſter of the Greek tongue, without which he thought a man was nothing, that is, no ſcholar (38): it is therefore probable he had no intention of publiſhing any thing. The pieces mentioned above were found, after his death, in a very private corner of his ſtudy, as if he had deſigned they ſhould lie buried in oblivion (39). Beſides, they were written in ſuch a manner, as if he intended nobody ſhould underſtand them but himſelf (40). With regard to ſermons, he wrote but few, for he generally preached without notes (41).  [Colet's practice, when young, of reading the Engliſh Poets which were then extant, in order to poliſh and improve his ſtyle, and to qualify himſelf for an elegant Preacher, is worthy of obſervation. The method he took was well adapted to his purpoſe. Nothing perſon and character, they are thus deſcribed. He was tall, comely, and very graceful: there was ſomething in his mien and carriage extremely becoming; as was every thing he ſaid

Nothing tends more to give a copiouſneſs, freedom, and gracefulneſs of language, than an acquaintance with the Poets; and few writers have attained to elegance of compoſition, who had not a taſte for poetry. Colet's advantages in this reſpect were very ſmall, compared with thoſe of the preſent age; but it was wiſe in him to make uſe of the aid which the times afforded. The diſlike he had againſt attending to the exact rules of grammar is not to be commended. Such an attention ought not to be diſpenſed with in any genuine ſcholar; and, under proper direction, it will be ſo far from obſtructing, that it will add to the beauty and dignity of ſtyle.

The life of Dean Colet, as written by our learned predeceſſor, Mr. Morant, is accurate, and he is exact and copious in his references to his authorities. But, with theſe excellencies, there is a drineſs of manner in his narration, which prevents us from having that full exhibition of the Dean's conduct and character which might have been attained, and which appears in Dr. Knight's account. As ſome things likewiſe are omitted, which may be thought to merit a place in the Biographia, we ſhall endeavour in part to ſupply the defect.

The beginning of Colet's acquaintance with Eraſmus, which was a principal æra in the Dean's life, deſerves to be related. He had heard a great character of Eraſmus at Paris, and from that time was very deſirous of an intimacy with him. No opportunity, however, offered of commencing it till that eminent man came to England; and then the foundation of their friendſhip was laid, not by a perſonal introduction to each other, but by letter. Eraſmus, in the beginning of the year 1498, was at Oxford, whither he had been recommended by the Prior and Canons of St. Genoveſe at Paris, to Father Richard Charnock, Prior of the Regulars of the Order of St. Auſtin, in the College of St. Mary the Virgin. Here he was received, and accommodated with diet and lodging, in the moſt courteous and hoſpitable manner. Father Charnock, after a ſhort trial of the parts and good qualities of his new gueſt, deſcribed him to Colet, as, in his opinion, a very excellent perſon, and of ſingular worth and goodneſs. With this character Colet was ſo much pleaſed, that he had not patience to wait for ſeeing the learned ſtranger; but, though he was himſelf then reſident at Oxford, choſe to make his firſt addreſs with his pen, and ſent to him, from his own chamber, an agreeable and elegant epiſtle, drawn up in ſuch an obliging turn of ſentiment and expreſſion, as ſhewed the writer to be a ſcholar, a traveller, and a gentleman. He tells Eraſmus, that his friend Brome had heartily recommended him by letter; but that he ſtood before highly commended to him by the fame of his reputation abroad, and by his works: that, whilſt he was at Paris, he found the name of Eraſmus not a little celebrated by learned men; and that he had read there an epiſtle of his to Gaguinus, which ſeemed to him the ſpecimen of a perfect writer, both for literature and the knowledge of the world. But ſtill the beſt recommendation of him was, that the venerable Prior with whom he reſided, had the day before told Colet, that his new gueſt was a moſt excellent perſon, and endued with ſingular virtues. "For this reaſon, ſays Colet, my Eraſmus, as far as learning and an acquaintance with things, and a ſincere goodneſs can make an impreſſion upon a man who rather wiſhes for theſe talents, than pretends to the poſſeſſion of them, ſo far, by virtue of ſuch accompliſhments, you muſt always be moſt acceptable to me. When I ſhall ſee you, I ſhall do that for myſelf, in my own perſon, which others have done for you in your abſence. They have improperly recommended you to me; whereas I ſhall commend myſelf to you, to be inſtructed by your wiſdom: for the leſs ought to be commended to the greater, and the ignorant to the more learned. But if there be any thing in a perſon ſo inconſiderable as I am, wherein I can either be acceptable or uſeful to you, I am entirely devoted to your ſervice. I rejoice at your arrival in England, and wiſh that this iſland may be as pleaſant to you, as I am perſuaded you will be ſerviceable to it, by your great learning. I owe, and ſhall always owe, every thing to one whom I regard, not only as the moſt learned, but likewiſe as the beſt of men. Farewell (42)."

To this letter Eraſmus immediately returned a very ſuitable anſwer, in which he ſaid, that, could he find any thing commendable in himſelf, he ſhould be proud of being commended by ſuch a worthy perſon, to whoſe judgment he allowed ſo great a weight, that his ſilent eſteem alone was preferable to all the applauſes of a Theatre at Rome. The commendations, however, he added, that were given him by ſuch a man, were ſo far from exalting him in his own opinion, that he was rather humbled by them; ſince they only ſerved to put him in mind not of what he was, but of what he ought to be. For his part, he beſt knew his own deficiencies; and, therefore, he would take the liberty to give a character of himſelf. "You have in me, ſays he, a man of little or no fortune, a ſtranger to ambition, a warm devotee to friendſhip, and an ardent admirer of learning, though but ſlenderly acquainted with it; one who with the profoundeſt veneration for excellence in others, is conſcious of the want of it in himſelf; who can eaſily yield to any perſon in literature, but to none in integrity; who is ſincere, open, free, averſe to falſehood and diſſimulation; whoſe mind, though ſomewhat timid, is upright; and in whom nothing is to be expected beſides an honeſt heart. If, my dear Colet, you can love ſuch a man, you may count me as entirely your own as the very money you poſſeſs. Your country of England is moſt agreeable to me on many accounts, but eſpecially on this; that it abounds with what above all things is delightful to me, men of admirable learning, among whom no one will be diſpleaſed that I reckon you as the chief. Indeed, ſuch is your literature, that were it not accompanied with probity of manners, you would be deſerving of univerſal admiration; and ſuch is the ſanctity of your life, that, were you devoid of acquired knowledge, you would juſtly be loved, reſpected, and venerated by every man." Eraſmus then goes on highly to commend Colet's ſtyle, after which he thus concludes: "You ſpeak whatever you mean, and mean all that you ſpeak. Words ariſe from your heart, not from your lips; they ariſe from your ſentiments, without giving them any aſſiſtance. In ſhort, you have ſo happy a facility, that you can deliver without pains what another could ſcarcely expreſs with the greateſt labour. But to yourſelf I refrain from your praiſes, that I may not offend againſt decency; knowing how unwilling thoſe are to be praiſed who are the moſt entitled to applauſe (43)."

The foundation of friendſhip, which was thus laid between Colet and Eraſmus, ended in the ſtricteſt poſſible intimacy, and continued to the end of their lives. Being now happy in each other's acquaintance, they were ſolicitous to improve it to their mutual benefit. At a public dinner at the Univerſity, after a Latin ſermon, where the diſcourſe was ſcholaſtical and theological, Colet ſat as moderator. Among other diſcourſe Colet ſaid, that Cain's greateſt offence, and what was moſt odious in the ſight of God, was his diſtruſting the bounty of the great Creator, and placing too much confidence in his own art and induſtry, which induced him to till the ground; whilſt his brother Abel, content with the natural productions of the earth, employed himſelf only in feeding ſheep. Upon this queſtion, which at preſent would be regarded as a very inſignificant one, the company engaged; the Divine arguing by ſtrict ſyllogiſms, whilſt Eraſmus oppoſed in a more looſe and rhetorical manner. But in truth, ſays Eraſmus, this one Divine (Colet) was more than a match for us all.

said or did (x). His learning and piety were above the pitch of the times he lived in: but what made him most renowned, was his public spirit (y). In his writings, his style was all. He seemed to be inspired from above, and to have in him somewhat more than human: he spoke not only with his voice, but with his eyes, his countenance, and his whole demeanour. When the disputation grew rather too long and severe for a chearful entertainment, Erasmus broke it off, by telling a story of Cain, from pretended ancient writers, which was entirely an invention of his own, for the diversion of the company (44).

(44) Ibid. p. 44.

The fidelity of Colet's friendship for Erasmus appeared in his rebuking him for some fault or omission of which he had been guilty. Nor was this liberty disliked by Erasmus. It had a good effect upon him, and he thought that such admonitions were rather an establishment than a breach of friendship (45).

(45) Ibid. p. 47.

The strong sense of Colet led him wholly to despise the schoolmen. The Scotists he abhorred, because they pretended to be Divines, without so much as reading the Scriptures; nor had he a better opinion of the celebrated Aquinas. Erasmus relates, that he himself once took occasion to commend Thomas Aquinas as not contemptible among the later schoolmen, because he seemed to have studied the Scriptures, and to have consulted the primitive writers. Upon this occasion Colet maintained a profound silence. At another time, Erasmus having enlarged still more strongly upon the praises of Aquinas, Colet looked earnestly upon him, and asked him whether he spoke seriously, or was only in jest. Finding that he was in earnest, he broke out with great ardour, and said, why do you talk to me of that schoolman, who, if he had not been possessed of the greatest arrogance, could never have reduced all things into such positive and dogmatical definitions; and who, if he had not been endued with a worldly spirit, could not have so totally corrupted the pure doctrine of Christ by his profane philosophy. Erasmus, being struck with the enthusiasm of Colet, betook himself to a more diligent perusal of Aquinas's writings; the consequence of which was, that his admiration of that eminent schoolman was very much abated (46).

(46) Ibid. p. 52—56.

The aversion which the Monks had at that time to Grecian literature, is manifest from the following story. A Divine, preaching at Court, took upon him to rail at Greek learning, and at new interpretations of Scripture. Pace, who was present, cast his eye upon the King, to observe how his Majesty was affected with the discourse. Henry smiled upon Pace by way of contempt; and, when the sermon was ended, sent for the Preacher, and appointed a debate to be held in his own presence, concerning the use of the Greek tongue. When the time came, Mr. (afterwards Sir Thomas) More delivered an eloquent vindication of that ancient language. The Divine, instead of making a suitable answer, fell upon his knees, and begged pardon for the offence he had given in the pulpit; alledging in excuse, that what he had done was by the impulse of the spirit. Not the spirit of Christ, says the King, but the spirit of infatuation. His Majesty then asked him, if he had read any thing of Erasmus, to which he replied, that he had not. Why then, returned Henry, you are a very foolish fellow, to censure what you have never read. I have read, says the Preacher, something they call Moria. Yes, answered Pace, such a subject is fit for such a reader. At last, the Divine, to soften the resentment against him, declared that he was now better reconciled to the Greek tongue, because it was derived from the Hebrew. The King, being astonished at the ignorance of the man, dismissed him, upon this condition, that he should never again presume to preach at Court (47). We may observe by the way, that the poor Divine was not so much mistaken in his notion of the origin of the Greek tongue as the disputers with him imagined. There was some truth in his assertion, though he spoke with an entire ignorance of the subject. It is a fact, that many Greek words are derived from the Hebrew, or at least from the Oriental languages, of which the Hebrew is a part; but this was a matter which had not at that time been investigated by the learned.

(47) Ibid. p. 58, 59.

Dean Colet's clemency to Heretics, shews how much he rose above the spirit of the times. In that age, if any man, from a principle of humanity and goodness, was a favourer or reliever of those who rejected the doctrines of Popery, it was sufficient, in the eye of the Church, to render him a partaker of their crimes. Colet, in consequence of his tenderness and compassion for the honest people called Lollards, could not escape this imputation. One of them, who had been censured and condemned in the Spiritual Court, was committed to a prison of his Majesty's, and given up to the civil magistrate as an obstinate offender. But the Dean had the courage to interpose for him with the King himself, and by his own single interest obtained the poor man's life and liberty (48).

(48) Ibid. p. 94, 95.

So low was the state of literature in England when St. Paul's School was founded, that there was no little difficulty in procuring a second master, under William Lilly. Erasmus, being then at Cambridge, was requested by Dean Colet to look out for a proper person. He enquired among the Masters of Arts in that University, but could meet with none among the few who might be thought fit for the employment, that would choose to accept it. They did not relish so laborious an undertaking, however honourable the terms might be; and one of the seniors said, in a sneering way, "Who would lead a slavish life "among boys, in a school, if he could find any other "mode of living?" Erasmus defended the office of instructing youth in learning and good manners, as highly honourable and useful; and what he advanced upon the subject was extremely just, and indeed unanswerable. He spoke, however, to no purpose; for the Monks were incapable of attending to the voice of reason and argument (49).

(49) Ibid. p. 167—169.

Dean Colet's enemies sought frequent occasions of ruining him in the opinion of the King. Henry having resolved upon hostilities with France, it was suggested to his Majesty, that the Dean, at this juncture, advanced the false doctrine, "that the most "dishonourable peace was preferable to the justest "war." The accusers were two Franciscan Friars, Standish and Bricot. The King, however, gave a signal instance of prudence and moderation. Sending for Colet, he advised him to proceed in reforming a corrupt and dissolute age, and in letting his light shine in the midst of so much prevailing darkness. Henry offered, at the same time, by humbling Colet's adversaries, to let all the world see that those who struck at him should not go unpunished. But the good Dean entreated that his enemies might by no means suffer on his account; saying, that he would rather give up his Deanery, and live altogether in privacy and retirement (50).

(50) Ibid. p. 201, 202.

At another time, Colet, being appointed to preach before the King on a Good-Friday, treated of Christ's victory over death and the grave, and exhorted his hearers to fight manfully under this captain of their salvation, and to come off more than conquerors. In the prosecution of his discourse, he spoke somewhat concerning reconciling the differences between Christian States and Princes, and endeavoured to persuade his auditors to conquer those lusts, whence come wars and fightings among men. Those worldly wicked persons, he said, who fought with each other from hatred and ambition, and who were hurried on to mutual slaughter and destruction, did not fight under the banners of Christ, but under the ensigns and tokens of the devil. He shewed how hard it was to die a christian death in a day of battle; how few undertake a war but from the most unwarrantable passions; and how inconsistent the imbruing the hands in blood, was with that fraternal charity without which no man shall see the Lord. In conclusion, he exhorted those who were finishing their warfare under the banner of their Saviour, not to imitate the Alexanders, the Cæsars, and other victorious Princes, but was plain and unaffected, but it had always ſomething weighty and pungent. And this, which ſome might call careleſſneſs, did not proceed from a want of what goes under the name their own humble Lord and maſter Jeſus. With this doctrine the King was not a little diſturbed. He was afraid that ſuch a powerful diſſuaſive from war might cool the minds of his ſubjects, and even intimidate the ſoldiers, at the very juncture of his commencing hoſtilities with France. He ſent, therefore, for the Preacher, immediately after ſermon, and upon his appearing, Henry ordered all his attendants to withdraw. Colet's enemies were now not a little elated, and had no other expectation but that he would inſtantly be ſent from the Court to the Tower. But the King, on the contrary, ſpoke to him in the following friendly manner: "Mr. Dean, that you may "fear no harm, I did not ſend for you to interrupt "your holy labours in preaching, which I would "rather encourage and promote; but to diſburthen "my own conſcience of ſome ſcruples, and by your "ſpiritual advice to direct myſelf in the preſent "poſture of my affairs." His Majeſty then informed Colet, that he was now engaged in a war with the French King; not at his own deſire, but by force and urgent neceſſity, for the defence of his dominions. Therefore, though the Doctor, in his truly chriſtian ſermon, had ſpoken admirably well of brotherly love and charity, and of laying aſide the thoughts of revenge, and had almoſt reconciled him to his greateſt enemies the French; yet ſince the hoſtilities he had commenced were not the reſult of choice, but of neceſſity, and undertaken to repel force with force, he muſt deſire him, in another diſcourſe, to vindicate the lawfulneſs of ſuch a war as was defenſive, and ſhould be entered upon for the honour and ſafety of our country. Dean Colet, with all dutiful readineſs, obeyed the King's command, and, at the next opportunity, ſpoke, in the ſame grave and eloquent way, of the grounds of a lawful war among Chriſtian Princes and States, with ſuch ſtrength of reaſon and ſcripture, that he not only confirmed Henry and his Nobles in their intended enterprize, but even raiſed the ſpirits of the common people, who were before cool and indifferent in the matter. When the ſermon was ended, the King thanked the Dean publicly before all the aſſembly, and ſaid to his nobility, who ſtood around him; "Well, let every one chooſe his own Doctor; but "this ſhall be my Doctor, before all others whomſo-"ever." His Majeſty, then taking a glaſs of wine, drank very graciouſly to Colet, and diſmiſſed him with the higheſt marks of affection (51).

(51) Ibid. p. 203—208.

A ſtory, which diſplays the natural warmth of the Dean's temper, and the command he obtained over it, is related by Eraſmus. Archbiſhop Warham's houſe and table were always open to men of learning, as well foreigners as natives of his own country, and none were more encouraged to accept of the civilities there beſtowed than Eraſmus and Colet, who often went to Lambeth, and returned together. Now the Dean had an old uncle, ſo froward and perverſe in his diſpoſition, that he could never agree with him; beſides which, there was a ſuit, or quarrel, depending between them, for a ſum of money which would have been conſiderable enough to have created a war between a father and a ſon. Colet going one day to dine with Warham, and taking Eraſmus in the boat with him, he read, as he ſat there, that part of his friend's Enchiridion which preſcribed a remedy againſt anger and paſſion; not intimating why he was ſo intent upon the ſubject. It happened, at the Archbiſhop's table, that the Dean was ſeated oppoſite to his uncle, and was ſo troubled in his own mind, that he could not either talk or eat. The Archbiſhop had an admirable art of making all his company eaſy and chearful, by framing his diſcourſe in ſuch a manner as was ſuitable to their humours and inclinations. At this time he began to talk of ages; who were old, and who were young. The topic ſuited ſeveral who were preſent, and who had not ſpoken before; ſo that they began to be very free and familiar. Colet's uncle, in particular, like a true old man, boaſted what he could do at his years. After dinner, Warham converſed in private with the uncle and nephew, and brought them to terms of agreement. As Colet and Eraſmus were returning in the boat, the former ſaid to the latter, "Well, you are "a very happy man, and have done me a great deal "of ſervice." Eraſmus being ſurprized at this language, the Dean informed him, that he had been extremely incenſed againſt his uncle, and had almoſt reſolved to put off the kinſman, and even the Chriſtian, and wage open war with him; but that, under this commotion of mind, he had taken the Enchiridion with him, and read over the advice for reſtraint of anger; which had done him ſo much good that he had commanded himſelf at table, and returned to ſuch a temper with his old relation, that, preſently after dinner, by the Archbiſhop's interpoſition, the whole affair had been made up. Eraſmus uſed to relate this ſtory to people who had differences, and were not eaſy to be reconciled (52).

(52) Ibid. p. 245—248.

Notwithſtanding Dean Colet's excellent underſtanding, he had ſome peculiarities of ſentiment, that were contrary to ſound ſenſe, but which may be accounted for, from conſidering the ſuperſtition of the age wherein he lived. In his comment on the ſixth chapter of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, he ſcarcely permits the going to law; and in treating upon the ſeventh chapter of the ſame Epiſtle, he does not allow marriage to be lawful, but only regards it as a remedy contra incontinentiam; ut ubi non ſentitur illa infirmitas, ibi illa ad nuptias licentia non eſt uſurpanda. Neither did he think it neceſſary that Chriſtians ſhould marry for the ſake of begetting children; "for that, ſaith he, might be left to the Gen-"tiles—But what if the Gentiles ſhould be wholly "converted? Then, he adds, the kingdom of God "would come: then would the world be ſanctus & "animo & corpore: then would the end take place, "and God be all in all (53)." It is poſſible, that theſe were not ſo much ſettled opinions, as notions haſtily thrown out: it is certain, that they were not well digeſted. At another time, Colet entertained a juſter idea of marriage. He uſed to ſay, that he never found better or purer manners than among the married men, whoſe natural affection to their wives, care of their children, and government of their families, kept them within the bounds of moderation and chaſtity (54).

(54) Ibid. p. 73.

According to the general temper of the age, Colet and his ſchoolmaſters carried ſeverity to their ſcholars to an undue length. It was the Dean's opinion, that there was a neceſſity for harſh diſcipline to humble the ſpirit of boys, to enure them to hardſhips, and to prepare them for the mortifications, ſufferings, and afflictions they would meet with in the world. Eraſmus, on the other hand, pleaded ſtrongly for a gentle treatment of children. The ſame great author relates a ſtory, underſtood to refer to the Dean, which places him in a very diſagreeable light. We ſhall inſert it in the original Latin; for if any tender mother were to read it, Colet would never be forgiven by her. Dr. Jortin hath recited this ſtory, as well as Dr. Knight. They both of them, likewiſe, take notice of the improper conduct of Mr. Collier, with regard to Dean Colet. That bigoted writer, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, leaves out all the Dean's preaching againſt image worſhip, and other corruptions of the Church of Rome, and only gives an account of his Lent Sermons, concerning war. With reſpect to theſe laſt, he deſcribes them as if they had been delivered in the reign of King Henry the Seventh; whereas it is evident, from the occaſion of them, that they could not be preached before the preparations which Henry the Eighth was making for hoſtilities with France, in the year 1512. What is more extraordinary ſtill, Collier hath not ſo much as mentioned Dean Colet's name in his Hiſtorical Dictionary (56).

Dr. Birch, ſpeaking of the Dean's Convocation Sermon, obſerves, that it is not contemptible either for ſtyle or argument (57). As the tranſlation of it is underſtood to have been made from the Latin original, by Colet himſelf, we ſhall inſert a ſpecimen of it, which may ſerve to diſplay ſomething of the manners of the times, and to ſhew his turn of ſentiment and compoſition.

" To exhorte you reuerent fathers to the endevour of reformation of the churches eſtate: becauſe that nothynge hath ſo disfigured the face of the churche, as hath the facion of ſecular and worldly lyuynge in clerkes and priſtes: I knowe nat where more conueniently to take begynnyng of my tale, than of the apoſtle Paule, in whoſe temple ye are gathered to gether. For he writynge unto the Romanes, and vnder their name vnto you ſaith: Be you not conformed to this worlde: but be you reformed in the newnes of youre underſtandynge, that ye may prove what is the good wyll of god well pleaſing and perfecte. This dyd the apoſtle wryte to all chriſten men, but moſt chiefly unto priſtes and byſſhops. Priſtes and biſſhops are the lyghte of the worlde. For vnto them ſayde our ſauiour: you are the lyghte of the worlde. And he ſayde alſo: If the lyghte that is in the be darkenes, howe darke ſhall the darkenes be? That is to ſay, if priſtes and byſſhops, that ſhulde be as lyghtes ronne in the darke way of the worlde, howe darke than ſhall the ſecular people be? Wherfore ſaynt Paul ſayde chiefly unto priſtes and biſſhops: Be you nat conformable to this worlde, but be ye reformed. In the whiche wordes the apoſtle dothe two thinges. Fyrſt he doth forbyd that we be nat conformable to the worlde and be made carnall. Farthermore he doth command that we be reformed in the ſpyryte of god, where by we are ſpirituall. I entendynge to followe this order, I wyl ſpeke fyrſt of conformation, than after of reformation. Be you nat (ſayth he) conformable to this worlde. The apoſtle calleth the worlde, the wayes and maner of ſecular lyuyng: the whiche chiefly doth reſte in foure euylles of this worlde: that is to ſay in diuilyſſhe pride, in carnall concupiſcence, in worldly couetouſnes, in ſecular buſynes: Theſe are in the worlde, as ſaynt John the apoſtle witneſſeth in his piſtell canonicall. For he ſaythe: All thynge that is in the worlde, is either the concupiſcence of the fleſhe, or the concupiſcence of the eies, or pryde of lyfe. The ſame are nowe and reygne in the churche, and in men of the churche, that we may ſeme truely to ſay, all thyng that is in the churche, is either concupiſcence of fleſhe, or eies, or pryde of lyfe. And fyrſte for to ſpeake of pryde of lyfe, howe moche gredynes and appetite of honour and dignitie is nowe a dayes in men of the churche? Howe ronne they, ye almoſt out of brethe from one benefice to an other: from the leſſe to the more, from the lower to the hygher? who ſeethe nat this? who ſeynge this ſorowethe nat? More over theſe that are in the ſame dignities the mooſt parte of them doth go with ſo ſtately a countenance and with ſo hyghe lokes, that they ſeme nat to be put in the humble byſſhoprike of Chriſt, but rather in the high lordſhip, & power of the worlde, nat knowynge, nor aduertiſinge, what Chriſte, the mayſter of all mekenes, ſayd unto his diſciples, whome he called to be byſſhoppes and priſtes: The princis of people (ſayth he) haue lordſhipp of them: and thoſe that be in auctorite haue power: but do ye nat ſo: but he that is greatter amonge you, let him be miniſter. He that is higheſt in dignitie, be he the ſeruant of al men. The ſonne of man came nat to be mynyſtred vnto, but to mynyſtre. By whiche wordes our ſauiour dothe playnly teache, that the maiſtry in the churche, is none other thynge than a miniſtration: And the hygh dignitie in a man of the churche to be none other thing than a meke ſeruice.

" The ſeconde ſecular euyll is carnal concupiſcence. Hath nat this vice ſo growen and waxen in the churche as a fludde of theyr luſte? ſo that there is nothynge loked for more diligently, in this mooſt beſy time, of the moſt parte of priſtes, than that that dothe delite & pleaſe the ſenſes? They gyve them ſelfe to feaſtes and bankettynge: They ſpend them ſelfe in vaine bablyng: They gyue them ſelfe to ſportes & plays: They applye them ſelfe to huntynge and haukynge. They drowne them ſelfe in the delytes of the worlde. Procurers and fynders of luſtes they ſet by. Againſt the whiche kynd of men, Judas the apoſtle crieth out in his piſtle, ſayeng: wo unto them, whiche haue gone the way of Cain. They are foule & beſtly feſting in their meates without feare feadyng them ſelfe: fluddes of the wylde ſee, fomynge out their confuſions: unto whom the ſtorme of darknes is reſerued for euerlaſtyng.

" Couetouſnes is the thyrde ſecular euyll: the whiche ſaynt John the apoſtle callethe concupiſcence of the eies: Saynt Paule calleth hit idolatry. This abominable peſtilence hath ſo entred in the mynde, almooſt of all priſtes, and ſo hath blynded the eies of the minde, that we are blynde to all thynges, but onely unto thoſe, which ſeme to brynge vnto us ſome gaynes. For what other thynge ſeke we nowe a dayes in the churche, than fatte benefices and hygh promotions? ye & in the ſame promotions, of what other thyng do we paſſe upon, than of our tithes and rentes? That we care nat howe many, howe chargeful, howe great benefices we take, ſo that they be of greatte valure. O couetouſnes: ſaint Paule iuſtly called the the roote of all euyll. Of the cometh this heaping of benefices upon benefices: Of the ſo great penſions aſſigned of many benefyces reſygned: Of the, all the ſuynge for tithes, for offrynge, for mortuaries, for delapidations, by the ryght and title of the churche: For the whiche thing we ſtryue no leſſe than for our owne life: O couetouſnes: of the cometh theſe chargeful viſitations of byſhops: Of the cometh the corruptnes of courtes and theſe daily newe inuentions: where with the ſely people are ſo ſore vexed. Of the cometh the beſyte and wantonnes of officials. O couetouſnes mother of all iniquitie. Of the cometh this feruent ſtudy of ordinaries to dilate theyr iuriſdictions: Of the cometh this woode and ragenge contention in ordinaries, of the inſinuation of teſtaments: of the cometh the vndewe ſequeſtration of frutes: Of the cometh the ſuperſtitious obſeruyng of all thoſe lawes, that ſounde to any lucre, ſettynge a ſyde and diſpiſynge thoſe that concerne the amendment of maners. What ſhuld I reherſe the reſte? To be ſhorte, and to conclude at one worde: All corruptnes, all the decaye of the churche, all the offences of the worlde, come of the couetouſnes of priſtes. Accordyng to that of ſaynt Paule, that here I repete agayne, and beate in to your eares: Couetouſnes is the roote of all euyll.

of grammar: which, he often ſaid, did rather obſtruct the purity of the language, not to be obtained but by reading the beſt and pureſt authors. This contempt of grammar-rules made him ſometimes fall under the cenſure of the Critics (a). He was, however, a great maſter of ſtyle and language; ſo that, though his preaching was popular, and adapted to vulgar capacities, yet withal it was agreeable to the better judgment of men of wit and

" The fourthe ſecular euyll, that ſpotteth and maketh euyll fauored the face of the churche, is the continuall ſecular occupation: wherein priſtes and byſſhops nowe a days doth beſy them ſelfe, the ſeruantes rather of men than of god: the warriours rather of this worlde than of Chriſte. For the apoſtle Paule wryteth vnto Timothe: No man beinge goddes ſouldiour, turmoyle hym ſelfe with ſeculare buſynes. The warrynge of them is nat carnall but ſpirituall. For oure warrynge is to pray, to rede and ſtudy ſcriptures, to preache the worde of god, to myniſtre the ſacraments of helth, to do ſacrifice for the people, and to offre hoſtis for their ſinnes. For we are mediatours and means vnto god for men: The whiche ſaynt Paule wytneſſethe, writinge to the Hebrewes: Euery byſſhoppe (ſayth he) taken of men, is ordeyned for men in thoſe thynges that be unto god, that he may offer gyftes and ſacrifices for ſynnes. Wherefore thoſe apoſtels, that were the fyrſt priſtes and biſſhops, dydde ſo moche abhorre from all maner of medlyng of ſecular thinges, that they wolde nat myniſter the meate, that was neceſſarye to poore people, all though that was a great worke of vertue: but they ſayd: it is nat mete, that we ſhulde leaue the worde of god, and ſerue tables: we wyll be continually in prayer, and preachynge the worde of god. And ſaynt Paul cryeth vnto the Corinthes. If you haue any ſecular beſynes, ordeyne them to be iuges, that be mooſte in contempt in the churche.——

" Theſe be the foure euyls that I haue ſpoken of, O fathers, O priſtes, by the whiche we are conformable to this worlde, by the whiche the face of the churche is made euyll fauoured, by the whiche the ſtate of it is deſtroyed, truly moche more than it was in the begynnyng by the perſecution of tyrants: or afterwarde by the inuaſion that folowed of heretykes. For in the perſecution of tyrantes, the churche beynge vexed was made ſtronger and bryghter: In the inuaſion of heretykes the churche beynge ſhaken, was made wyſer and more cunnyng in holy wrytte. But ſens this ſecularitie was broughte in, after that the ſecular maner of lyuynge crepte in, in the men of the churche: the roote of all ſpiritual lyfe, that is to ſay, charite was extincte: The whiche taken awaye, there can nother wyſe nor ſtronge churche be in god (58)."

Mr. Granger hath mentioned nine engraved prints of Dean Colet (60).

In note [H], a liſt is given of eighteen high Maſters of St. Paul's School, ending with Mr. Charles, who was elected in 1736-7. The gentlemen who have ſince been appointed to this important office, have maintained the character of the ſchool with great ability; and under the government of the preſent learned maſter, Dr. Roberts, it continues to be in a very flouriſhing condition.

Dr. Knight, who, in his Appendix to the Life of Dean Colet, has given a ſhort hiſtory of the high Maſters of St. Paul's School down to Mr. Morland, has, likewiſe, added a brief account of the diſtinguiſhed ſcholars that have been educated in this ſeminary. The catalogue is principally confined to thoſe perſons who either were writers, or who roſe to conſiderable eminence in Church or State. It will appear, from the following names, that the School hath produced ſeveral illuſtrious men. Thomas Nightingale. He was educated under Lilly, and was admired at Oxford for his wit. He wrote a Latin Poem on the deceaſe of Colet, and Elegies, in the ſame language, on the death of Lilly. Thomas Lupſet, another diſciple of the ſame maſter, became famous at Oxford for teaching the Greek tongue. He died in 1531. Sir Anthony Denny, a great Mecenas to learned men, and Privy Counſellor to King Henry the Eighth. Sir William Paget, a favourite with the ſame Monarch, and raiſed by him to many dignities; created Baron of Beaudeſert in Edward the Sixth's reign, and Privy Counſellor to four ſucceſſive Princes. Sir Edward North, afterwards Edward Lord North, Baron of Kirtling in Cambridgeſhire. John Leland. Dr. William Whitaker, King's Profeſſor of Divinity at Cambridge, and a great champion of the Proteſtant cauſe. William Camden. William Burton, a learned Divine and Antiquary. Edward Lane, M. A. author of ſeveral theological works. John Milton. Sir Peter Pett, an eminent Civilian. Sir Charles Scarborough, a celebrated Anatomiſt and Phyſician. Samuel Pepys, Eſq; Author of the Memoirs relative to the State of the Navy, and bequeather of the Pepyſian Library, to Magdalen-College, Cambridge. Samuel Johnſon, noted for his political writings and ſufferings. Dr. Benjamin Calamy. Dr. Richard Meggot, Dean of Wincheſter, and Canon of Windſor. Dr. Edward Reynolds, Archdeacon of Norwich, and Prebendary of Worceſter. William Corker, M. A. ſenior Fellow of Trinity-College, Cambridge, the friend of Barrow, and a benefactor to the library of St. Paul's School. Thomas Smith, M. A. Public Librarian at Cambridge. Thomas Gipps, Fellow of Trinity-College, in the ſame Univerſity. Dr. William Nicholls, author of a " Conference with a Theiſt," and other theological works. Richard Blondel, an able Surgeon. Sir Thomas Davies, Sheriff and Lord-Mayor of London, and diſtinguiſhed for his ſkill in the European languages. Dr. Humphrey Gower, Maſter of St. John's-College, Cambridge, and Margaret Profeſſor of Divinity. Robert Nelſon, Eſq. Dr. Richard Cumberland, Biſhop of Peterborough. George Doddington, Eſq; uncle to the late Lord Melcombe, Dr. Thomas Tooke, an eminent Scoool-maſter at Biſhop Stortford. Samuel Roſewell, M. A. a diſſenting Miniſter in London, and ſon of the Mr. Thomas Roſewell, whoſe trial by Lord Chief Juſtice Jefferies ranks among the moſt infamous proceedings of that execrable Judge. Roger Cotes, Plumian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy at Cambridge. Sir John Trevor, Maſter of the Rolls, and Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. Archibald, Earl of Forfar. Charles, the firſt Duke of Manchеſter. John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough. Sir Edward Northey, Attorney-General. Dr. George Hooper, Biſhop of Bath and Wells. Dr. Samuel Bradford, Biſhop of Rocheſter. Dr. John Leng, Biſhop of Norwich. Spencer Compton, Eſq; Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, and afterwards Earl of Wilmington. Spencer Cowper, Eſq; Chief Juſtice of Cheſter. To theſe names we muſt not omit adding, Dr. Samuel Knight, Prebendary of Ely, from whom we have derived almoſt the whoſe of our information with regard to Dean Colet (62); and Dr. Arthur Aſhley Sykes, the author of a great number of valuable publications, and one of the moſt eminent and learned Divines in the preſent century.] K.

learning, and was much admired by the great Sir Thomas More (b). He was, likewiſe, a great lover and encourager of the Greek tongue. With regard to ſome of his notions, he was a very eminent forerunner of the Reformation; and he and Eraſmus jointly promoted it; not only by pulling down thoſe ſtrong holds of ignorance and corruption, the Scholaſtical Divinity, and routing entirely both the Scotiſts and Thomiſts, who had divided the Chriſtian world between them (c), but alſo by diſcovering the ſhameful abuſes of Monaſteries, and the dangers of impoſing celibacy on the Clergy: to which places, Colet gave little or nothing while he lived, and left not a farthing when he died; not ſo much out of hatred to their ſeveral orders, as becauſe he found that few or none of them lived up to their vows and profeſſions (d). He thought ſimple fornication in a Prieſt more excuſable than pride and avarice; and was with no ſort of men more angry, than with thoſe Biſhops, who, inſtead of ſhepherds, acted the part of ſo many wolves: he thought none more execrable than they, becauſe, under the pretence of devotions, ceremonies, benedictions, and indulgences, they recommended themſelves to the veneration of the people, while, in their own hearts, they were ſlaves to the world; that is, to glory and gain (e). He condemned auricular confeſſion; and was content to ſay maſs only upon Sundays and great feſtivals, or at leaſt upon a very few days beſides. He had gathered up ſeveral authorities from the ancient Fathers againſt the current tenets and cuſtoms of the Church; and though he did not care to fly in the face of the governors, yet he could not but favour thoſe who diſliked the way of worſhipping images (f). As to his other qualifications, he was a man of exemplary temperance, and all other virtues. The Dean's table, which, under the name of hoſpitality, had before ſerved to luxury, he contracted to a more frugal way of entertaining: and it having been his cuſtom, for many years, to eat but one meal, that of dinner, he had always the evening to himſelf. As he dined late, he had but few gueſts; and the fewer, becauſe his proviſion was frugal, though neat. The ſittings were ſhort, and the diſcourſes ſuch as pleaſed only the learned and the good. As ſoon as grace before meat was ſaid, a boy read, with a loud voice, and diſtinctly, a chapter out of one of St. Paul's Epiſtles, or the Proverbs of Solomon. When it was finiſhed, the Dean raiſed, from ſome particular part of it, a ſubject matter of diſcourſe. He was ſo impatient of whatſoever was foul or indecent, that he could not bear with an improper way of ſpeaking. He loved to be neat and clean in his goods, furniture, entertainments, apparel, and books, and whatever belonged to him; but he deſpiſed all ſtate and magnificence (g), there being in his demeanour the moſt unaffected ſimplicity imaginable (h).

COLLIER (JEREMY), ſon of Jeremy Collier, was born at Stow Qui, or Quire, in Cambridgeſhire, September 23, 1650. His father was a Divine, and conſiderable Linguiſt, and ſome time Maſter of the Free-ſchool at Ipſwich, in the county of Suffolk. His grandfather likewiſe was a Clergyman, ſettled at Bradford in Yorkſhire, where he lived in eſteem for his function. He was born at Yeadon, near Bradford, and deſcended from a gentleman's family of that name, ſeated at Thruſk, in the ſame county, in the reign of Henry VIII. His mother was Elizabeth Smith, of Qui, in Cambridgeſhire, where her family were poſſeſſed of a conſiderable intereſt, and related to the Sternes of that town, being by her mother deſcended from the Keys, or Cays, of Yorkſhire and Lincolnſhire. He was educated under his father at Ipſwich, whence he was ſent to Cambridge, and admitted a poor Scholar of Caius-College, under the tuition of Mr. John Ellys. His admiſſion bears date April 10, 1669, in the eighteenth year of his age. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the year 1672-3, and that of Maſter of Arts in 1676, being ordained Deacon on the twenty-fourth of September the ſame year, by Dr. Peter Gunning, Biſhop of Ely, and Prieſt February 24, 1677, by Dr. Henry Compton, Biſhop of London. Having entered into Prieſt's orders, he officiated ſome time at the Counteſs Dowager of Dorſet's, at Knowle, in Kent, whence he removed to a ſmall Rectory at Ampton, near St. Edmundſbury, in Suffolk, to which he was preſented by James Calthorpe, Eſq; and inſtituted by Dr. Anthony Sparrow, Biſhop of Norwich, Sept. 25, 1679. After he had held this benefice ſix years, he reſigned it, and came to reſide in London in 1685, and was, ſome little time after, made Lecturer at Gray's-Inn. But the Revolution coming on, the public exerciſe of his function became impracticable (a). He did not, however, think it compatible with his principles, at that critical conjuncture, to ſit down contentedly, and ſay nothing; but finding, in that confuſion which aroſe upon King James's going to France, that the Convention was, in a great meaſure, influenced by the papers written by a Clergyman who came over with the Prince of Orange, he thought the ſame liberty might be taken by a Clergyman who conceived differently from him, and accordingly broke the ice, and publiſhed the firſt pamphlet that appeared in defence of the cauſe which he eſpouſed (b), and a very ſharp piece it was [A]. When the government was

(a) Thus far this article was (except ſome dates) drawn up by Mr. Collier himſelf.

(b) From the information of a gentleman, who was intimately acquainted with Mr. Collier.

[A] And a very ſharp piece it was.] As this article cannot be rendered perſpicuous, indeed hardly intelligible, without explaining the political and literary controverſies in which this writer was engaged, we ſhall endeavour to give as clear and conciſe an account of them as poſſible. In the month of December, 1688, the famous Dr. Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Biſhop of Saliſbury, ſent abroad a very ſuccinct, and well-written was ſettled, by placing King William and Queen Mary upon the throne, Mr. Collier remained firm to the principles he had embraced, and continued not only to abſtain from taking the oaths which the new legiſlature had impoſed, but laboured all that in him lay to prevent others, more eſpecially ſuch members of the Church of England, from owning, or ſo much as complying with them. It was to this end that he wrote ſeveral warm and bitter pieces, which in thoſe days had their effect, and conſequently procured their author, in the opinion at leaſt of thoſe who were of his own party, the character both of a ſolid and ſhining writer [B]. There is no doubt but this conduct of his occaſioned an eye to be kept over his proceedings, nor could it be ſuppoſed that any government would forbear the opportunity that occurred of giving ſome check, to ſo active, ſo induſtrious, and ſo dangerous a man. It was not long before ſuch an occaſion offered itſelf. Information was given to the Earl of Nottingham, at that time Secretary of State, that Mr. Collier, with one Mr. Newton, another Nonjuring Clergyman, was gone down to Romney-Marſh; which was enough to fix a ſuſpicion, that they were either endeavouring to ſend intelligence to, or were labouring to receive it from, the other ſide of the water. Upon this, about the latter end of the year 1692, Meſſengers were ſent down into Kent to apprehend them; which they accordingly did, and brought them to London, where, after a ſhort examination before the Earl of Nottingham, who charged them with being in a deſign againſt the government, they were committed to the Gate-Houſe (c). But, as no evidence of their being in any ſuch deſign could be found, they were admitted to bail. So ſtrict, however, were Mr. Collier's principles, that he had not long been at liberty, before he began to queſtion the conſiſtency of his own conduct in giving bail; upon which he went before the Lord Chief Juſtice Holt, ſurrendered in their diſcharge, and was committed to the King's Bench priſon; but upon the application of ſome of his friends to that moſt upright and impartial Judge, he was diſcharged in a week or ten days (d). Yet even this pamphlet, under the title of An Enquiry into the preſent State of Affairs, and in particular whether we owe Allegiance to the King in theſe Circumſtances, and whether we are bound to treat with him, and call him back again, or not? Publiſhed by Authority (1). In this piece, the Doctor gives his ſentiments very freely, as to the behaviour of King James, and the conduct that was to be obſerved towards him, as the reader will ſee from the following ſhort quotation. 'In all 'that I have ſaid concerning his deſertion, I limit 'my reflections to his firſt leaving of Whitehall; for 'the accident at Feverſham, and what followed after 'that, cannot be called a return to his people; and 'ſince the ſeals never appeared, and the King never 'ſpake of a Parliament, nor altered his meaſures 'in any thing, but ſtill proſecuted his firſt deſign by 'his ſecond eſcape, his deſerting is ſtill to be dated 'from his firſt going from Whitehall; and he having given that juſt advantage againſt himſelf, which 'came after all that ſeries of injuſtice and violence, 'that had gone before it, no man can think, that it 'was not very fitting to carry it as far as it would 'go, and not to treat with him any more upon the 'foot of acknowledging him King (2).' It was in anſwer to this treatiſe, and particularly to the argument inſiſted upon in this paſſage, that Mr. Collier wrote the piece mentioned in the text, and which was intituled,

I. The Deſertion diſcuſſed, in a Letter to a Country Gentleman. Lond. 1688, 4*to*. He labours in this ſhort pamphlet to ſhew, that the King, before his withdrawing, had ſufficient grounds to be apprehenſive of danger; that his leaving any repreſentative behind him was impracticable at that juncture; and that there were no grounds, either from the laws of the realm, or of nature, to pronounce the throne void from ſuch a retreat. To this pamphlet of Mr. Collier's, an anſwer was written by Edmund Bohun, Eſq; in which he gives them the following character (3). 'The author of it is my acquaintance, and a perſon 'for whom I have a great eſteem, both on the account of his profeſſion, and of his perſonal worth, 'learning, and ſobriety; ſo that I cannot believe he 'had any ill deſign, either in the writing, or the 'publiſhing of it; his zeal for the Church of England's loyalty, and the difficulty, and the unuſualneſs of the preſent caſe, having been the occaſions, 'if not the cauſes, of his miſtake; and therefore I 'will endeavour to ſhew him, and the world, his error, with as much candour and ſweetneſs, as he 'himſelf can wiſh; becauſe I have the ſame deſign 'for the main that he had, viz. the honour of the 'Church of England, and the ſafety of government, 'and eſpecially our monarchy.' But this was not the only anſwer Mr. Collier received; for his performance gave ſuch offence, that after the government was ſettled, he was ſeized and committed to Newgate, where he continued a cloſe priſoner for ſome months; but was at length diſcharged, without being brought to a trial. He afterwards wrote the following pieces, viz.

[B] The character both of a ſolid and ſhining writer.] As Mr. Collier was now embarked in an avowed oppoſition to the government, he laboured as much as in him lay to enlarge the ſtrength of the party which he had joined; and with this view he continued to write, as the reader will ſee in the following catalogue of his works, during the ſpace of leſs than two years.

V. A Caution againſt Inconſiſtency, or the Connection between praying and ſwearing, in relation to the civil Powers, 1690, 4*to*. This diſcourſe is a diſſuaſive from joining in public aſſemblies.

VI. A Dialogue concerning the Times, between Philobelgus and Sempronius, 1690, 4*to*. There was another dialogue, with much the ſame title, printed in 1692, and called a ſecond part, but it was not Mr. Collier's, being a narrative of the Revolution, whereas Mr. Collier's relates chiefly to the authority of the Convention.

VII. To the Right honourable the Lords and to the Gentlemen convened at Weſtminſter, October 1690, half ſheet; it is a petition for an enquiry into the birth of the Prince of Wales.

VIII. Dr. Sherlock's Caſe of Allegiance conſidered, with ſome remarks upon his Vindication, Lond. 1691, 4*to*.

IX. A Brief Eſſay concerning the Independency of Church Power, 1692, 4*to*. The deſign of this eſſay is to prove the public aſſemblies guilty of ſchiſm, upon account of their being held under ſuch Biſhops, as had aſſumed, or owned ſuch, as had aſſumed the ſees of thoſe, that were deprived for not complying with the government, &c.

did not content him, as appears by ſeveral pieces of his written upon this ſubject [C]. In the ſpace of ſome years following, there happened nothing that ſo far engaged this gentleman's attention, as to induce him to write againſt the tranſactions of the State, which were, generally ſpeaking, the ſubjects that employed his pen. But upon the breaking out of that which was called the Aſſaſſination Plot, and the conviction of Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins, an incident happened which made a very great noiſe, and deeply affected Mr. Collier his whole life after. The fact was this: Mr. Collier, with Mr. Cook and Mr. Snatt, both Clergymen of his own opinion, attended thoſe unhappy perſons at the place of execution, where Mr. Collier ſolemnly abſolved the former, as Mr. Cook did the latter, and all three joined in the impoſition of hands upon them both (e). This, as might be very well expected, made a very great noiſe, and was looked upon as a very high inſult on the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical government; for which reaſon they fell under a ſevere proſecution on one ſide, in conſequence of which Mr. Cook and Mr. Snatt were ſent to Newgate, but afterwards were releaſed without being brought to a trial; and Mr. Collier having ſtill his old ſcruple about putting in bail, abſconded, and was outlawed, under which incapacity he remained as long as he lived (f). On the other hand, both the Archbiſhops, and ten of their ſuffragans, viz. the Biſhops of London, Durham, Wincheſter, Coventry and Litchfield, Rocheſter, Hereford, Norwich, Peterborough, Glouceſter, Chicheſter, and St. Aſaph, publiſhed a very ſtrong Declaration of their ſenſe of this ſcandalous and irregular proceeding (g). To this our author wrote an anſwer with his uſual vigour, and after that ſeveral other pieces, in ſupport of his own and his brethren's conduct in this affair [D]. After this ſtorm was a little over, Mr. Collier employed himſelf in reviewing and (g) This Declaration is to be found at large in the Appendix to the third Vol. of the State Tracts in the time of King William.

[C] As appears by ſeveral pieces of his written upon this ſubject.] It ſeems that Mr. Collier had occaſionally read Law, and this it was that induced him to make a ſcruple of remaining upon bail, becauſe he apprehended that the very recognizance, by which bail was taken, carried in it an acknowledgment of the juriſdiction of the court, in which the bail was taken, and by conſequence of the power whence the authority of that court was derived. In ſupport of theſe principles, and in juſtification of his own conduct, he wrote the following pieces, of which it is ſaid, there were only five copies printed.

X. The caſe of giving bail to a pretended authority examined, dated from the King's Bench, November 23, 1692, with a preface dated December 1629, and a letter to Sir John Holt, dated November 30, 1692. And alſo a reply to ſome remarks upon the caſe of giving bail, &c. dated April 1693. He wrote, ſoon after this,

XI. A Perſwaſive to Conſideration, tendered to the Royaliſts, particularly thoſe of the Church of England. Lond. 1693, 4*to*. It was afterwards reprinted in 8*vo*. together with his vindication of it, againſt a piece entituled, The Layman's Apology, &c. written in confutation of that part of the Perſwaſive, which relates to the controverſy about the frequenting the public aſſemblies.

XII. Remarks upon the London Gazette, relating to the Straits Fleet, and the battle of Landen in Flanders, 1693, 4*to*.

[D] In ſupport of his own and his brethren's conduct in this affair.] In order to form ſome notion of this tranſaction, it will be requiſite to ſee that part of the Prelate's Declaration which relates to the conduct of theſe Clergymen, and in which they ſhew, that their proceeding was not to be juſtified by the doctrines or practice of the Church of England. Their words are theſe (4):

(4) State Tracts in the Reign of King William, vol. iii. in the Appendix.

'For thoſe Clergymen that took upon them to abſolve theſe criminals at the place of execution, by laying all three together their hands upon their heads, and publicly pronouncing a form of abſolution; as their manner of doing this was extremely inſolent, and without precedent either in our Church, or any other that we know of; ſo the thing itſelf was altogether irregular.—The rubrick in our Office of the Viſitation of the Sick, from whence they took the words they then uſed, and upon which, if upon any thing in our Liturgy, they muſt ground this their proceeding, gave them no authority nor pretence for the abſolving theſe perſons; nay, as they managed the affair, they acted, in this abſolution, far otherwiſe than is there directed. That rubrick is concerning ſick perſons; and it is there required, Firſt, That the ſick perſon ſhall be moved to make a ſpecial confeſſion of his ſins, if he feel his conſcience troubled with any weighty matter; and then, after ſuch confeſſion, the Prieſt ſhall abſolve him, if he humbly and heartily deſire it. But here they abſolved, and that publicly, perſons condemned by law for execrable crimes, without ſo much as once moving them, at that time, to make a ſpecial confeſſion of their ſins, at leaſt of thoſe ſins for which they were condemned. And on the other ſide, here were perſons abſolved that did not humbly deſire abſolution, as feeling any ſuch weighty matter to trouble their conſcience; but, on the contrary, in Sir John Friend's paper it is declared, that he had a great deal of ſatisfaction in ſuffering for that cauſe, which he firmly believed to be the cauſe of God and true religion. If theſe Miniſters knew not the ſtate of theſe men's ſouls before they gave them abſolution, as it is manifeſt two of them, Mr. Snatt and Mr. Cook, did not as to Sir William Perkins, (they having ſince declared that they had not ſpoke with Sir William, till they were at the place of execution) how could they, without manifeſt tranſgreſſion of the Church's order, as well as the profane abuſe of the power Chriſt hath left with his Miniſters, abſolve them from all their ſins? If they were acquainted with theſe men's ſentiments declared in their papers, then they muſt look upon them either as hardened impenitents or as martyrs. We are ſo charitable to believe, that they would not abſolve them under the former notion, for that had been in effect ſealing them to damnation; but if they held theſe men to be martyrs, then their abſolving them in that manner was a juſtification of thoſe grievous crimes for which theſe men ſuffered, and an open affront to the laws both of Church and State. Upon the conſideration of theſe things, and for the doing of right to our Church, which may otherwiſe ſuffer amongſt ſuch as are ſtrangers to our conſtitution, by the evil principles and practices, both of the aforeſaid criminals, and the three Clergymen that aſſiſted them, who all pretended to be members of the Church of England, we do declare, that we diſown and deteſt all ſuch principles and practices, looking upon them as highly ſchiſmatical and ſeditious, dangerous both to the Church and State, and contrary to the true doctrine and ſpirit of the Chriſtian religion. And we alſo take this occaſion to warn and exhort all the people committed to our charge, to beware of ſuch ſeducers, and to avoid them, leſt, as the Apoſtle St. Peter ſpeaks, They be led away with the error of the wicked, and fall from their ſtedfaſt adherence to the principles of the true Church of England, as it was eſtabliſhed at the bleſſed Reformation of religion, and as, by God's eſpecial Providence, it continues to this day.' What was farther done in this matter, and retouching ſeveral miſcellaneous pieces of his, to which he added ſome others, and publiſhed them in a volume; and theſe were ſo well received, that about ſeven years afterwards he publiſhed another, and ſeveral years after that a third. Theſe pieces of his were written upon religious, moral, and entertaining ſubjects, with ſuch a mixture of learning and wit, and in a ſtyle ſo eaſy and flowing, that notwithſtanding the prejudice of party which could not but be ſtrong againſt him, they were generally well received, and have run through many editions ſince. One muſt indeed allow, that very few books had fairer for univerſal approbation, in an age, which, if not ſtrictly virtuous, was at leaſt highly decent; and when every body affected a concern for promoting whatever had a tendency to make men wiſer, better, or more polite, all which ends were proſecuted with great effect in this collection of Eſſays (b) [E]. The very next year after the publication of the firſt volume of theſe Miſcellaneous Diſcourſes, Mr. Collier made an attempt to reform the Stage, which involved him in a very briſk controverſy with ſeveral of the greateſt wits, and ableſt writers of the age; in which he acquitted himſelf with ſo much force and vivacity, that the moſt conſiderable of his antagoniſts were obliged, not only to quit the field of battle, but to confeſs that they were vanquiſhed; and though ſome of them did not do this with the beſt grace, yet as their failing in point of manners ought to be attributed to the ſmart of their wounds, it is very far from reflecting upon the merit of our author, whoſe animadverſions actually produced both repentance and amendment (i), and were the original cauſe will beſt appear from Biſhop Kennet's account, which runs thus (5): 'On April the 27th, the Lord Chief 'Juſtice (Holt) of the King's Bench, did likewiſe re'preſent to the Grand Jury, the ſhameful and perni'cious practice of thoſe three abſolving Prieſts. 'Whereupon the Jury made a preſentment to the 'Court, that Collier, Cook, and Snatt, Clerks, did 'take upon them to pronounce and give abſolution to 'Sir William Perkins, and Sir John Friend, at the 'time of their execution at Tyburn, immediately be'fore they had ſeverally delivered a paper to the 'Sheriff of Middleſex, wherein they had ſeverally 'endeavoured to juſtify the treaſons for which they 'were juſtly condemned and executed. And that 'they, the ſaid Collier, Cook, and Snatt, had there'by countenanced the ſame treaſons, to the great 'encouragement of other perſons to commit the like 'treaſons, and to the ſcandal of the Church of Eng'land eſtabliſhed by Law, and to the diſturbance of 'the peace of this kingdom. Upon which the court 'ordered an indictment to be preferred againſt them, 'and on May the 8th, Mr. Cook and Mr. Snatt were 'committed to Newgate, for ſuſpicion of high-trea'ſon and treaſonable practices. But ſuch was the 'lenity of the government, that no manner of pu'niſhment was inflicted on them; and Mr. Collier, 'with great aſſurance, publiſhed ſeveral papers to 'juſtify his practice.' The writings to which this Prelate referred were theſe:

[E] All which ends were proſecuted with great effect, in this collection of Eſſays.] We have in the text, ſpoken in general of the ſeveral volumes of this collection, as if it had been compoſed in the ſame manner with other books of that kind; whereas, inſtead of being made up of detached diſcourſes, it is rather compoſed of a variety of ſmall pieces on different topics, which fell from the author's pen at a great diſtance of time; and after wandering moſt of them ſingly through the world, were at laſt drawn thus into a body to prevent their being loſt. The title given them in their laſt edition is,

XIV. ESSAYS upon ſeveral Moral Subjects, by Jeremy Collier, M. A. in three volumes, 8*vo.* In order to give the reader a clear account of the contents of theſe volumes, which are not commonly underſtood to comprehend ſo large a part of their author's works as they really do, it is neceſſary to enter a little into particulars. The firſt volume is divided into two parts, which were publiſhed ſeparately. The firſt part conſiſts of ſix Eſſays, viz. upon Pride, Clothes, Duelling, General Kindneſs, the Office of a Chaplain, and the Weakneſs of Human Reaſon. The four firſt are written in the way of dialogue, and with great ſpirit and vivacity; the two laſt are continued diſcourſes. That on the Office of a Chaplain is particularly laboured, and has been looked upon as the author's maſter-piece, the reaſoning being more cloſe, the language more exact, and the thread of the argument better preſerved, than in many of the reſt. His Eſſay on the Weakneſs of Human Underſtanding is in ſome meaſure a declamation, but it ends with a moral reflection of great importance, and which perhaps this gentleman did not keep always in his mind (6). 'We may plainly perceive, ſays he, that the preju'dices of education have a great ſtroke in many of 'our reaſonings, and that the ſentiments of men diſ'cover the colour of their original tinctures. And 'as there are ſome inbred principles impregnable 'againſt cuſtom, ſo there are ſome cuſtoms which 'nature finds very difficult to deal with.'

(6) Collier's Miſcellanies, vol. i. p. 240.

The ſecond part contains ſeventeen diſcourſes upon Fame, Muſic, the Value of Life, The Spleen, Eagerneſs of Deſire, Friendſhip, Popularity, The Immateriality of the Soul, The Entertainment of Books, Confidence, Envy, The Aſpects of Men, Deſpair, Covetouſneſs, Liberty, Old Age, and Pleaſure. Several of theſe are written in dialogue, but moſt of them are ſet diſcourſes; and they are all of them calculated to inform the underſtanding, reform the manners, and to give a right turn to the thoughts of the reader.

The ſecond volume contains the third part, in which, the author diſcourſes of Pain, Revenge, Authors, Infancy and Youth, Riches and Poverty, Debauchery, Drunkenneſs, Uſury, The Character of an Apoſtle, and of Solitude. Then follows a Tranſlation of St. Gregory's Oration, in commendation of the Maccabees, Of the Unreaſonableneſs of ill-timed Diverſions, St. Cyprian's Diſcourſe upon the Plague, His Deſcription of the manners of the Age in which he lived, and his Diſcourſe on Patience: it is cloſed by the author's Eſſay upon Diſcontent, written in dialogue. There is uſually annext to this volume, (though it was printed ſeparately) An Eſſay upon Gaming, in a dialogue, which is at once an uſeful, entertaining, and moſt inſtructive performance. The third volume, and the fourth part, conſiſts moſtly of religious ſubjects, and was written after he had publiſhed the firſt volume of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. In this he treats of Goodneſs, Honeſty, Religious Temper, Lying, Fortitude, Flattery, Theft, Peace, and the Reſurrection. All theſe topics are treated with very great plainneſs and freedom; and many of the thoughts are new and ſingular. Such as are written in dialogue, are well ſuſtained; and if we abate the flowerineſs of the language, which was the faſhion, I will not ſay the fault of that time, it will be difficult to find any eſſays more capable of affording a rational pleaſure, than thoſe of our author.

of that decorum, which has been, for the moſt part, obſerved by the modern writers of dramatic poetry. The titles of his pieces upon this occaſion will be found in the notes [F]. His abilities and induſtry were next exerciſed in a much larger work than any he had hitherto undertaken, which was that of making Moreri's performance uſeful to the Engliſh nation; in which he laboured for many years with great ſucceſs, taking all the precautions poſſible to be well informed as to the new articles he publiſhed; and ſo well were his endeavours in this kind received by the public, notwithſtanding ſome exceptions that were taken to them, that few books have met with a better fate, or [F] Will be found in the notes.] It was certainly a very bold thing in Mr. Collier, to attack at once the Wits and the Witlings of thoſe times: among the firſt, were Mr. Dryden, Mr. Congreve, and Mr. Vanbrugh; amongſt the latter, were Tom Durfey and many more; but he is certainly to be commended for forming ſo good a deſign, as that of reducing the ſtage to order, and thereby preventing the morals of mankind from being corrupted, where they ought to be amended: the firſt he publiſhed with this deſign, had the following title.

XV. A ſhort view of the immorality and profaneneſs of the Engliſh Stage, together with the ſenſe of Antiquity upon this argument, Lond. 1698, 8*vo*. It is a very methodical and learned work: he begins with ſhewing the immodeſty and indecency of the ſtage, and the ill conſequences that attend it; he proves next, that the Roman and Greek theatres were much more inoffenſive than the Engliſh, and then produces the authorities of Ben Jonſon, Beaumont and Fletcher, and the French Poet Corneile, againſt the modern Stage. He proceeds to open the indictment by a charge of profaneneſs, which he ſupports by inſtances from ſeveral pieces of Mr. Dryden, Mr. Otway, Mr. Congreve, and Vanbrugh. His ſecond charge is the abuſe of the Clergy; his third relates to immorality encouraged by the Stage: he then deſcends to ſome remarks upon Amphitryon, expoſes the horrid profaneneſs of the comical Hiſtory of Don Quixote; then criticizes the Relapſe, or Virtue in Danger; he concludes with producing the opinions of the Heathen Philoſophers, Orators, and Hiſtorians, the reſtraints impoſed upon the Stage by the laws in ſeveral countries, and the ſentiments of the Fathers of the Church.

In anſwer to this, Mr. Congreve publiſhed a little piece, intitled, Amendments of Mr. Collier's falſe and imperfect citations from the old Batchelor, the Double Dealer, &c. It muſt be allowed, that in this piece, the ingenious author is very hard put to it, and ſtruggles with infinite difficulty to give a fair gloſs to paſſages, that, in the natural ſenſe of the words, convey a very different meaning; and beſides this, there is an air of anger and reſentment runs through the whole piece, which plainly ſhews how much the author felt the weight of that cenſure he endeavours to ridicule, and would be thought to deſpiſe. Mr. Vanbrugh, afterwards Sir John Vanbrugh, likewiſe publiſhed a ſmall piece in ſupport of his own performances, under the title of, A ſhort Vindication of the Relapſe, and the Provok'd Wife; but this was very far from dejecting, or ſilencing our author. He thought he had a good cauſe, and that he was able to manage it with as much ſenſe and ſpirit as any of his adverſaries; and he found by experience too, that he was as well heard as they by the public; all which encouraged him to return to the charge, and to defend what he had written, not only againſt theſe, but againſt ſeveral other authors, who thought fit to enter the liſts on the ſide of the Poets, againſt the Prieſt. Theſe pieces of his were,

XVI. A Defence of the Short View, &c. being a Reply to Mr. Congreve's Amendments, &c. And to the Vindication of the author of the Relapſe, Lond. 1699, 8*vo*.

XVII. A Second Defence of the Short View, &c. Being a Reply to a Book intitled, The Ancient and Modern Stages ſurveyed, &c. Lond. 1700, 8*vo*. The Book here replied to, was written by Dr. Drake.

XVIII. Mr. Collier's Diſſuaſive from the Play-Houſe; in a letter to a Perſon of Quality, occaſioned by the late calamity of the Tempeſt, Lond. 1703, 8*vo*.

XIX. A farther Vindication of the Short View, &c. in which the Objections of a late Book, intitled, A Defence of Plays, are conſidered, Lond. 1708, 8*vo*.

The Defence of Plays, has Dr. Filmer for its author.

We have ſhewn in the text, what the event was of this long diſpute, in ſupport of which, I ſhall produce what Mr. Dryden ſays upon this ſubject (7). ' I ſhall ' ſay the leſs of Mr. Collier, becauſe in many things ' he has taxed me juſtly, and I have pleaded guilty ' to all thoughts and expreſſions of mine, which can ' be truly arraigned of obſcenity, profaneneſs, or immorality, and retract them. If he be my enemy, ' let him triumph; if he be my friend, as I have given ' him no perſonal occaſion to be otherwiſe, he will be ' glad of my repentance. It becomes me not to ' draw my pen in the defence of a bad cauſe, when I ' have ſo often drawn it for a good one: yet it were ' not difficult to prove, that in many places he has ' perverted my meaning by his gloſſes, and interpreted my words into blaſphemy and bawdry, of ' which they were not guilty; beſides that, he is too ' much given to horſe-play in his raillery, and comes ' to battle like a Dictator from the plough: I will ' not ſay the zeal of God's houſe has eaten him up; ' but I am ſure, it has devoured ſome part of his good ' manners and civility. It might alſo be doubted, ' whether it were altogether zeal, which prompted ' him to this rough manner of proceeding; perhaps it ' became not one of his function, to rake into the ' rubbiſh of ancient and modern plays: a Divine ' might have employed his pains to better purpoſe, ' than in the naſtineſs of Plautus and Ariſtophanes, ' whoſe examples, as they excuſe not me, ſo it might ' poſſibly be ſuppoſed, that he read them not without ' ſome pleaſure. They, who have written commentaries on thoſe poets, or on Horace, Juvenal, and ' Martial, have explained ſome vices, which, without ' their interpretation, had been unknown to modern ' times; neither has he judged impartially between ' the former age and us. There is more bawdry in ' one Play of Fletcher's, called, The Cuſtom of the ' Country, than in all ours together, yet this has been ' often acted on the ſtage in my remembrance. Are ' the times ſo much more reformed now, than they ' were five and twenty years ago? if they are, I congratulate the amendment of our morals; but I am ' not to prejudice the cauſe of my Fellow-Poets, ' though I abandon my own defence. They have ' ſome of them anſwered for themſelves, and neither ' they nor I can think Mr. Collier ſo formidable an ' enemy, that we would ſhun him. He has loſt ' ground at the latter end of the day, by purſuing his ' point too far, like the Prince of Condé at the battle ' of Seneff. From immoral plays to no plays; ab ' abuſu ad uſum non valet conſequentia. But being a ' party I am not to erect myſelf into a Judge.'

(7) Preface to his Fables.

The firſt part of Mr. Dryden's apology is ſo very decent, and withal ſo very juſt, that one cannot help being ſorry he did not reſt it there; but as to what follows, it is little to the purpoſe: he has owned, that Mr. Collier has ſhewn him his faults, and yet he is out of humour that they were ſhewn. Was it in his power to prove his charge againſt the ſtage any other way than he has done? did not the quibbling and prevarications of his antagoniſts, compel him to explain things ſo broadly? and might not any criminal at the bar charge the Attorney-General, with being a traitor in his heart, for ſetting forth, and inſiſting upon his own treaſons with the ſame force of argument, that is uſed in retorting upon Mr. Collier? The truth is, that men offend with gaiety of heart, but repent with bitterneſs of ſoul; which is the reaſon, that though they cannot help owning the phyſic has done them good, yet they cannot avoid bearing ill-will to the doctor.

longer maintained their credit [G]. After the acceſſion of Queen Anne to the throne, great endeavours were uſed to recover Mr. Collier to the Church, by inducing him to comply with the terms preſcribed by the State. All efforts of this kind, though ſupported not only with general promiſes of preferment, but with more particular aſſurances, were ineffectual; and Mr. Collier remained among the Nonjuring Clergy, as ſeeing no reaſon to alter his ſentiments from any change that had happened, and being incapable of diſſembling an alteration for the ſake of temporal views (k). About the ſame time that he publiſhed the firſt volume of his Dictionary, he likewiſe obliged the world with a very elegant tranſlation from the Greek, of that famous book of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, which has done more credit to his memory than even his excellent adminiſtration of public affairs during a reign which does honour to the Roman Hiſtory (l). This tranſlation was univerſally well received on its firſt appearance, and continues to be read with all the applauſe, that ſo well written, and ſo uſeful a treatiſe of Moral Philoſophy deſerves [H]. The ſituation of thoſe times, and the many worthy and generous patrons of whatever regarded the honour of this kingdom who then flouriſhed, encouraged Mr. Collier to hope, that an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great-Britain, which, in the extent he intended it, had never been attempted by any Proteſtant writer before, might meet with general acceptation. Accordingly, propoſals were publiſhed for ſending abroad ſuch a work, and the offer very well received; and ſuch encouragements given, as induced him to proſecute with diligence the great deſign he had formed, and at length finiſhed, of a copious Hiſtory of Church Affairs, from the firſt enterance of Chriſtianity into this Iſland, to the cloſe of the reign of Henry VII. This all parties allowed to be a work of great labour and learning, methodically and elegantly written; but in other reſpects they differed, as might well be ſuppoſed, in their judgments concerning its merit [I]. After the pains this book had coſt him, [G] Or longer maintained their credit.] We ſhall in this note give an account of the different times, in which the ſeveral parts of this Dictionary were publiſhed, and of other circumſtances relating to them, that may be worth the reader's knowing.

XX. The Great Hiſterical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary, &c. four volumes, fol.

The two firſt volumes were printed in the year 1701, and the author gave notice in his preface, that ſuch of the articles as were of a later date than the year 1688, were compoſed by another hand. The third volume was publiſhed, under the title of A Supplement, &c. in 1705, and was reprinted in 1727. It is in the preface to this, that he anſwers the objections made to his conduct; and to prevent thoſe articles being taken for his, which in this volume alſo, were written by another hand, they are placed under another alphabet. The fourth and laſt volume, which in the title page is called An Appendix, as in reality it is to the other three, was printed in 1721. The whole is certainly a great treaſure of Hiſtorical, Geographical, and Poetical Learning; and is not only very uſeful and entertaining to young ſcholars, who may by the help of it acquire much knowledge, and enter thoroughly into the meaning of the books they read in any of theſe kinds of learning; but even to perſons of the greateſt abilities, and moſt comprehenſive ſcience, who have but ſmall libraries, and live at a diſtance from London, and the two Univerſities. Yet this work is certainly capable of great improvements, and theſe might be made without enlarging the bulk, for it might be reduced under one alphabet; whereas at preſent there are four or five; and as by this means a multitude of repetitions, alterations, and corrections, might be thrown out, ſo this would make room for new articles, which might be eaſily found in the laſt edition of Moreri's Dictionary, now enlarged to ſeven volumes. The learned reader will eaſily diſcern, that this is no reflection either upon Mr. Collier's memory or his performance, ſince he did all that was poſſible to be done at the time he wrote; and the inconveniencies before mentioned were unavoidable from his manner of publication, as that too, with reſpect to him, was a matter not of choice but of neceſſity.

[H] That ſo well written, and ſo uſeful a treatiſe of Moral Philoſophy deſerves.] This work of Mr. Collier's has ſince borne three impreſſions, all of them under the following title:

XXI. The Emperor Marcus Antoninus his converſation with himſelf. Together with the preliminary Diſcourſe of the learned Gataker, &c. to which is added, the Mythological Picture of Cebes the Theban, &c. Tranſlated into Engliſh from the reſpective originals, Lond. 1701, 8*vo*.

This is one of the beſt collections we have in the Engliſh tongue of the Morals of the Antients; and, in conjunction with the works of Plutarch, Epictetus, and Seneca, will make an admirable library of that kind. The pieces of which it is compoſed are very well choſen, and illuſtrate each other perfectly, ſo as to render all the paſſages in them clear and intelligible; and yet it is of a very moderate ſize, and has nothing in it redundant, or foreign to the purpoſe.

[I] Concerning its merit.] As this great work was publiſhed in two volumes at different times, it is requiſite to ſpeak of them ſeparately. The firſt bore the following title:

XXII. An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great-Britain, chiefly of England, from the firſt planting of Chriſtianity, to the end of the Reign of King Charles II. With a brief Account of the Affairs of Religion in Ireland. Collected from the beſt antient Hiſtorians, Councils, and Records, fol. 1702, Vol. I. which comes down to the Reign of Henry VII.

As the ſcheme of this work was in itſelf of large extent, it required a great knowledge in Divinity, Hiſtory, and Antiquity, and a very aſſiduous application to the peruſal of Records and manuſcripts, as well as a vaſt variety of antient and modern authors; and the performance itſelf demonſtrates very great care to have been taken in all theſe reſpects. The method in which this Hiſtory is written is very clear and exact, his authorities are conſtantly cited by the author, his remarks are ſhort and pertinent, and, with reſpect to the diſſertations that are occaſionally inſerted, they are ſuch as tend to illuſtrate and explain thoſe perplexed points of which they treat, and contribute thereby to the clearer underſtanding of the narration. The ſtyle is very uniform and grave, which is the more remarkable, becauſe the author, in other writings, has ſhewn as lively a fancy, and as much quickneſs of wit, as any writer of his own time; but he knew this would be improper here, and therefore it is with great judgment avoided. He ſpeaks modeſtly and reſpectfully of moſt of the Hiſtorians who went before him, and if he is any where ſevere, he takes care that his reaſon ſhall go along with his cenſure. His own peculiar ſentiments with reſpect to religion and government may be in ſome places diſcerned; but taking the whole together, it will be found as judicious and impartial a work, as the world, in doing juſtice to his talents, could have expected it: yet, as we have hinted in the text, it was far enough from eſcaping the cenſure of the Critics, but was ſtill much him, our author thought a ſeaſon of repoſe neceſſary, or, as he himſelf expreſſes it, judged it convenient to breathe a little after a folio (m); yet without dropping, or ſo much as diſcontinuing his former deſign. But knowing that it required not only aſſiduity and vigilance, but the utmoſt prudence and circumſpection likewiſe, he choſe to act cautiouſly, and rather to apologize to the public for his delay, than to precipitate matters in order to hurry his work through the preſs. In the year 1713 he was conſecrated a Biſhop by Dr. George Hickes, who was himſelf conſecrated Suffragan of Thetford by the deprived Biſhops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough (n), Feb. 23, 1694. In the ſucceeding year came abroad the ſecond volume of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which met with a different reception from perſons of different ſentiments, being applauded by ſome and cenſured by others. Of the latter there were thoſe who made a conſiderable figure in the learned world, againſt whoſe objections the author thought it incumbent upon him to write [K]. As he grew in years, that great ſhare of health which he had enjoyed was interrupted by frequent attacks of the ſtone, to which there is no doubt that his ſedentary life might much contribute; ſo that from this time we hear of nothing that he publiſhed farther, excepting a collection of Sermons, of which, together with ſome ſmaller pieces prefixed to other men's works, an account will be given at the bottom of the page [L]. He lived, however, ſeveral years in an indiffe-much happier in that reſpect than the ſecond volume, in ſpeaking of which we ſhall ſhew who theſe Critics were, as well as the titles of the pieces written by our author in his own defence, and in juſtification of his Hiſtory.

[K] Thought it incumbent upon him to write.] As the ſecond volume of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory took in the entire account of the Reformation, and the ſtruggles with the Puritans from their firſt appearance, to the overturning of our conſtitution in Church and State; ſo it muſt be naturally ſuppoſed, that a man of Mr. Collier's principles could never treat theſe delicate ſubjects, without affording ſome room, for ſuch as were deſirous of criticizing him, to take offence. Dr. Nicholſon, Biſhop of Derry, has treated him with great ſeverity, not to ſay more, in the character he has given of his works. Biſhop Burnet and Biſhop Kennet, who were infinitely better judges as well as writers, have corrected him with great decency. Mr. Collier defended himſelf againſt them all, in the pieces of which we ſhall preſently ſpeak: but before we come to them, it may not be amiſs to remark a ſingle, and a ſhining, inſtance of his impartiality, and that is, in diſculpating the Preſbyterians from the falſe and ſcandalous imputations that had been thrown upon them, as if they conſented to, or at leaſt temporized in, the murder of King Charles I. from which he has vindicated them with equal perſpicuity and juſtice; and has fully ſhewn, that as they only had it in their power to oppoſe, ſo to the utmoſt extent of that power they did oppoſe, and proteſt againſt that bloody fact, both before and after it was committed (8). The pieces written by him in defence of his Hiſtory are theſe:

XXV. Several Diſcourſes upon Practical Subjects, Lond. 1725, 8vo. The laſt diſcourſe of this collection had been printed ſeparately, in 1723, with the following title. The compariſon between giving and receiving, with the reaſons for preference; ſtated in a Sermon preached at Whitehall, April 19th, 1687, 4to.

XXVI. God not the Origin of Evil, being an additional Sermon to a collection of Mr. Collier's Diſcourſes, &c. Lond. 1726, 8vo.

He publiſhed alſo An Advertiſement againſt Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of his own Time, which was printed on a ſlip of paper, and diſperſed in all the Coffee-houſes in 1724, and is to be ſeen in the Evening Poſt, No. 2254. Beſides this, he wrote ſeveral Prefaces, &c. As (1.) An Advertiſement concerning the Author, and the tranſlation of Maxims and Reflections upon Plays, in anſwer to a Diſcourſe of the lawfulneſs and unlawfulneſs of Plays, printed before a late Play intitled, Beauty in Diſtreſs, written in French, by the Biſhop of Meaux, Lond. 1669. (3.) A Recommendatory Preface to human Souls naturally immortal, tranſlated from a Latin MS. by S. E. Lond. 1707. Of this Preface Mr. Norris makes honourable mention in his letter to Mr. Dodwell, concerning the immortality of the Soul of Man, and ſays that Mr. Collier's ſingle remark againſt Mr. Locke, is, in his opinion, worth all the book beſides (9). It is alſo upon good grounds believed, that he was concerned, amongſt others, in collecting the paſſages referred to by Dr. Henry Sacheverell, in his anſwer to the articles of his impeachment. C.

 [Though out of regard to our ingenious predeceſſor, Dr. Campbell, we have retained his article of Collier without alteration, and have done the ſame with relation to his other articles, we cannot avoid, nevertheleſs, expreſſing our diſapprobation of ſeveral things which are here advanced. Reſpect is undoubtedly due to men of ability, character, and learning, of every party; but yet a diſtinction ought to be made between thoſe who appear in the cauſe of abſurdity, bigotry, and ſlavery, and thoſe who diſtinguiſh themſelves on the ſide of reaſon, moderation, and liberty. The former, however worthy they might be in private life, and however upright in their intentions, cannot be entitled to the eſteem and applauſe which belong to the latter. They ought not to be ſpoken of in the ſame terms of approbation, or treated as if their writings were equally juſt and meritorious. It might be imagined, from the general tenor of Dr. Campbell's article, that Collier deſerved to be ranked among the principal ornaments of this country. And yet whoever attends to the incidents of his life, and conſiders the liſt of his works, will perceive that he was engaged in defending the moſt flagrant abſurdities, and in exerciſing the moſt determined hoſtilities againſt the civil and religious intereſts of theſe kingdoms. The very mention of ſeveral of the ſubjects he wrote upon, would be ſufficient, in the preſent age, to expoſe the extreme narrowneſs of his mind. His treatment of the moſt reſpectable characters can never be juſtified. In a pamphlet of his, entitled, "Remarks upon ſome late Sermons," he reflected upon the excellent Archbiſhop Tillotſon with uncommon bitterneſs and indecency; and when properly animadverted upon by Dr. John Williams, perſiſted in defending his conduct (10).

(10) Birch's Life of Tillotſon, p. 344.

Collier's Eſſays may be reckoned among the moſt valuable of his writings; but yet they do not by any means deſerve the praiſes which Dr. Campbell has beſtowed indifferent ſtate of health, ſometimes tolerably free, and at others grievouſly afflicted by his old diſtemper, which brought him to his grave April 26, 1726; and, three days after, his beſtowed upon them. Though not deſtitute of ingenuity, they are compoſed in a bad taſte. The author is fond of point and antitheſis, and his language is quaint and affected. This part of his works was, indeed, much admired and extolled for a time, but could not ſtand the teſt of juſt criticiſm. The impropriettes of compoſition with which the eſſays abound, were well and amply expoſed in a book now little known, though of conſiderable merit, written by a Mr. Conſtable, and the title of which is, "Reflections on the Accuracy of Stile." The reputation of Collier, as a polite author, quickly ſubſided. Dr. Campbell, therefore, was peculiarly unfortunate in ſaying of his Eſſays, that very few books had fairer for univerſal approbation.

The work of Mr. Collier that has been the moſt celebrated, and which produced the greateſt effect, was his view of the immorality and profaneneſs of the Engliſh ſtage. Dr. Johnſon's account of the attention it excited, and of the controverſy occaſioned by it, is too intereſting to be omitted. "About this "time, ſays the Doctor, began the long-continued "controverſy between Collier and the poets. In the "reign of Charles the firſt, the Puritans had raiſed a "violent clamour againſt the drama, which they conſidered as an entertainment not lawful to Chriſtians, "an opinion held by them in common with the "Church of Rome; and Prynne publiſhed Hiſtrio-maſtix, a huge volume, in which ſtage-plays were "cenſured. The outrages and crimes of the Puritans brought afterwards their whole ſyſtem of "doctrine into diſrepute, and from the reſtoration "the poets and the players were left at quiet; for to "have moleſted them would have had the appearance of tendency to the puritanical malignity.

"This danger, however, was worn away by time; "and Collier, a fierce and implacable non-juror, "knew that an attack upon the theatre would never "make him ſuſpected for a Puritan: he therefore "(1698) publiſhed A ſhort View of the Immorality and Profaneneſs of the Engliſh Stage, I believe with no "other motive than religious zeal and honeſt indignation. He was formed for a Controvertiſt; with "ſufficient learning; with diction vehement and "pointed, though often vulgar and incorrect; with "unconquerable pertinacity; with wit in the higheſt "degree keen and ſarcaſtic; and with all thoſe "powers exalted and invigorated by juſt confidence "in his cauſe.

"Thus qualified, and thus incited, he walked out "to battle, and aſſailed at once moſt of the living "writers, from Dryden to Durfey. His outſet was "violent: thoſe paſſages which while they ſtood "ſingle had paſſed with little notice, when they were "accumulated and expoſed together, excited horror: "the wiſe and the pious caught the alarm, and the "nation wondered why it had ſo long ſuffered irreligion and licentiouſneſs to be openly taught at the "public charge.

"Nothing now remained for the Poets but to re"ſiſt or fly. Dryden's conſcience, or his prudence, "angry as he was, withheld him from the conflict; "Congreve and Vanbrugh attempted anſwers. Con"greve, a very young man, elated with ſucceſs, and "impatient of cenſure, aſſumed an air of confidence "and ſecurity. His chief artifice of controverſy is "to retort upon his adverſary his own words: he is "very angry, and hoping to conquer Collier with his "own weapons, allows himſelf in the uſe of every "term of contumely and contempt: but he has the "ſword without the arm of Scanderbeg; he has his "antagoniſt's coarſeneſs, but not his ſtrength. Col"lier replied; for conteſt was his delight: he was "not to be frighted from his purpoſe, or his prey.

"The cauſe of Congreve was not tenable: what"ever gloſſes he might uſe for the defence or palliation of ſingle paſſages, the general tenour and "tendency of his plays muſt always be condemned. "It is acknowledged, with univerſal conviction, that "the peruſal of his works will make no man better; "and that their ultimate effect is to repreſent plea"ſure in alliance with vice, and to relax thoſe obli"gations by which life ought to be regulated.

"The ſtage found other advocates, and the diſ"pute was protracted through ten years: but at laſt "comedy grew more modeſt, and Collier lived to ſee "the reward of his labour, in the reformation of the "theatre.

"Of the powers by which this important victory "was atchieved, a quotation from Love for Love, "and the remark upon it, may afford a ſpecimen.

"Sir Sampſon. Sampſon's a very good name; for "your Sampſons were ſtrong dogs from the beginning.

"Angelica. Have a care—If you remember, the "ſtrongeſt Sampſon of your name pulled an old houſe over "his head at laſt.

"Here you have the ſacred hiſtory burleſqued, "and Sampſon once more brought into the houſe of "Dagon, to make ſport for the Philiſtines (11)!"

(11) Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, vol. iii. p. 49—53. Octavo edition, of 1783.

The author of the Supplement to Mr. Dodſley's Preface to his ſelect Collection of old Plays, has likewiſe given a ſhort account of this controverſy, which deſerves to be inſerted, as it contains two or three curious facts, not hitherto noticed. "While the "rival theatres were contending againſt each other "with inveterate malice, an enemy to the very tole"ration of dramatic entertainments appeared, who, "with conſiderable ability, and with all the rigid "puritanical maxims of a ſevere ſect, attacked the "ſtage on account of its profaneneſs and immorality. "This was the celebrated Jeremy Collier, who in "1697 (1698) publiſhed a book, containing a ſevere "invective againſt the acting of plays, the profligacy "of the performers, and the licentiouſneſs of the "poets; and having ſome truth and juſtice on his "ſide, the advocates for the theatre found themſelves "hard preſſed to anſwer the charges brought againſt "their favourite diverſion. It cannot be denied but "that many authors, and ſome in great favour with "the public, had written in a manner which war"ranted the cenſure of every perſon who profeſſed "the leaſt regard to propriety or decency. Mr. "Collier was oppoſed by Congreve, Vanbrugh, "Dryden, Dennis, and others, with wit and humour, "but without confuting the objections which had "been ſtarted either againſt themſelves individually, "or againſt the ſtage in general. The public opi"nion ran ſo much againſt the defenders of the thea"tre, and in favour of their enemy, that King Wil"liam conſidered Mr. Collier's book as a work which "entitled the author of it to ſome lenity in a proſe"cution then carrying on in conſequence of errors in "his political conduct. This controverſy produced "as much as could be wiſhed for from it. Mr. "Cibber obſerves, the calling our dramatic writers "to this ſtrict account had a very wholeſome effect "upon thoſe who wrote after this time. They were "now a great deal more upon their guard; inde"cencies were no longer wit; and by degrees the "fair ſex came again to fill the boxes on the firſt day "of a new comedy, without fear or cenſure.

"To forward the ſtage's reformation, proſecutions "were commenced againſt ſome of the performers, "for repeating profane and indecent words. Several "were found guilty, and Betterton and Mrs. Brace"girdle were actually fined. Theſe ſeverities were "not entirely thrown away. From this period may "be dated the introduction of that more refined "taſte which hath done ſo much credit to the Britiſh "theatre (12)."

(12) Select Collection of Old Plays, vol. i. Second edition. Preface, p. xcviii—c.

An author, who ſeems to inherit Mr. Collier's principles concerning paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, as well as his averſion to theatrical entertainments in general, hath lately given the following high character of his attack upon the ſtage. "I queſtion, "ſays the writer we refer to, whether any man can "read Swift's Tale of a Tub, or Don Quevedo's "Viſions, without finding himſelf the worſe for it. "In regard to all ſuch indiſcreet applications of wit, "every young ſtudent may guard his mind, and rec-his body was interred in the church-yard of St. Pancras. He was in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age, and preſerved the free uſe of his ſenſes to the very laſt. As to his character, we have already given it in the impartial hiſtory of his works, and ſhall therefore only add, that his morals were unexceptionable; and that, as his conduct had in it all the regularity becoming a Clergyman, ſo his behaviour had nothing ſtiff or pedantic, but all that life, ſpirit, and innocent freedom, which conſtitute the good breeding of a gentleman. His reputation as a man of letters extended beyond the bounds of his own country; for the learned and ingenious Father Courbeville, who tranſlated into French the Hero of Balthazar Gracian, in the Preface of that work, ſpeaks in the higheſt terms of praiſe of our author's Miſcellaneous Works, which he ſays ſet him on a level with Montaigne, St. Evremond, La Bruyere, &c. The ſame reverend and learned perſon tranſlated into French Mr. Collier's Short View of the Engliſh Stage, and thence takes occaſion to ſpeak of him again, with all the marks of admiration and eſteem poſſible.

" tify his judgment, by reading Mr. Collier's view " of the profaneneſs and immorality of the Engliſh " ſtage; a book which brought Dryden himſelf to " repentance, and does indeed beggar every work " upon the ſame argument. It is the triumph of wit " over ſcurrility; of piety over profaneneſs; of learn- " ing over ignorance; and of Chriſtianity over athe- " iſm (13)." This encomium is carried too far, and eſpecially the aſſertion that Collier's book beggars every work upon the ſame argument. It is not to be compared with Roſſeau's famous Treatiſe, in Anſwer to D'Alembert, concerning the queſtion whether there ought to be a theatre at Geneva. Roſſeau, in his reaſonings againſt dramatic entertainments, particularly in ſmall cities, is profound, philoſophical, and diſcriminating; whereas Collier is harſh and violent, and doth not make the proper diſtinction between the uſe and abuſe of plays.

(13) Letters from a Tutor to his Pupils, p. 32.

Some of Mr. Collier's other writings have their merit and utility. He was a diligent and laborious compiler; but his Hiſtorical Dictionary does not ſeem at preſent to be in much uſe and eſtimation. It is very little ſervice that we have hitherto been able to derive from it in the proſecution of the Biographia.

Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory is not deſtitute of ability and learning; but it is written upon ſuch narrow principles as muſt ever detract from its reputation. Biſhop Burnet's character of it we apprehend to be too juſt to be reaſonably called in queſtion. " I ſhall " ſay no more of that work, obſerves the Biſhop, but " that there appeared to me quite through the ſecond " volume, ſuch a conſtant inclination to favour the " popiſh doctrine, and to cenſure the reformers, that " I ſhould have had a better opinion of the author's " integrity, if he had profeſſed himſelf not to be of " our communion, nor of the communion of any " other Proteſtant Church (14)."

In Mr. Gutch's Miſcellanea Curioſa, are preſerved, " Obſervations upon the Remarks of Mr. Collier, " in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, on ſeveral paſſages in " Biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation," by the learned Mr. John Lewis of Margate. It is apparent, from theſe obſervations, that Collier's diſlike of that excellent prelate, rendered him guilty of groſsly miſrepreſenting him, in a variety of inſtances.] K.

 [COLLINS (JOHN), a mathematician of conſiderable eminence in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Wood Eaton, in Oxfordſhire, on the 5th of March, 1624 (a). He was the ſon of a Nonconformiſt divine [A]; and is ſaid to have received ſuch an education, " as diſpoſed his mind to the full purſuit of truth, and formed and directed his " thoughts to diſtinguiſh rightly, and to reaſon juſtly (b)." When he had attained the age of ſixteen, he was put apprentice to a bookſeller at Oxford; but the war between the king and the parliament breaking out ſoon after, he quitted that trade, and was employed in clerkſhip under Mr. John Marr, one of the clerks of the kitchen to the Prince of Wales, who was eminent for his ſkill in the mathematics, and for ſome excellent dials, with which the gardens of King Charles I. were adorned (c). From Mr. Marr he derived ſome inſtruction in mathematics; but was obliged to quit his employment under him, in conſequence of the confuſions that were occaſioned by the civil war. He then went to ſea for ſeven years, and ſpent the greateſt part of that time on board an Engliſh merchant-man, which became a man of war in the ſervice of the Venetians againſt the Turks. In this ſituation, having much leiſure, he applied part of his time to the ſtudy of the mathematics, and merchants accounts; and, upon his return to England, taught them together with writing (d).

Dr. Calamy mentions a Nonconformiſt miniſter, whoſe name was John Collins, and who might poſſibly be the father of our author; but whether he was, or not, we are unable to aſcertain. Of this Mr. Collins, the following is Dr. Calamy's account. 'He was not an incumbent any where when the uni- 'formity act took place; but was Chaplain to Gene- 'ral Monk, when he came out of Scotland. He af- 'terwards ſucceeded Mr. Mallory as paſtor of a con- 'ſiderable Independent Church in this city. He was 'alſo one of the Lecturers at Pinners-Hall. He was 'a man mighty in the Scriptures, and one of a ſweet 'temper, and very charitable to all good men, with- 'out confining himſelf to a party. He died anno. '1687 (2).' Dr. Calamy alſo ſays, 'He had a ſon 'that was educated for the miniſtry at Utrecht, and 'was fellow-labourer with Mr. Bragg in this city, 'and one of the Lecturers at Pinners-Hall, who died 'a few years ſince (3).'

If the John Collins, mentioned by Dr. Calamy, was father to the mathematician, he muſt have ſurvived his ſon. But, upon the whole, it is probable that he was not, as it is not likely that Dr. Calamy would have been entirely unacquainted with it, if he had been father to a man ſo well known in the learned world.

After the Reſtoration, Mr. Collins was appointed Accountant to the Exciſe-Office, then kept in Bartholomew-lane, near the Royal Exchange. On the 10th of October, 1667, he had the honour of being propoſed as a candidate for election into the Royal Society by Dr. Seth Ward, Biſhop of Saliſbury; and he was choſen a Fellow on the 17th of that month (f). The ſame year he communicated a paper to the Society, which was publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 30, for December, 1667, in which he fully explained, and demonſtrated, the rule given by the learned Jeſuit De Billy for 'finding the number of the Julian period for any year aſſigned, the cycles of the ſun and moon with the Roman indiction for the year being given.' To this he added ſome very neatly contrived rules for the ready finding on what day of the week any day of the month falls for ever; and other the moſt uſeful and neceſſary kalendar rules (g).

In 1668, he had the offer of an employment in Ireland, but did not accept it, as he was not inclined to quit his own country (h). In the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 46, for April, 1669, was publiſhed a curious Diſſertation, by Mr. Collins, "concerning the Reſolutions of Equations in Numbers;" wherein are ſeveral hints towards ſome of the moſt conſiderable advances which have been ſince made in the refined parts of the mathematics, particularly with reſpect to the doctrine of differences (i).

When Anthony, the firſt Earl of Shafteſbury, was Lord High Chancellor, Mr. Collins was nominated by that nobleman, in divers references concerning ſuits depending in Chancery, to aſſiſt in ſtating intricate accounts: and this ſervice was ſo ably performed by him, that his reputation in that reſpect occaſioned him to be much employed in other places, and by other perſons (k). He was alſo appointed Accountant to the Royal Fiſhery Company (l). In 1671, a paper by Mr. Collins was publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 69, containing an elegant conſtruction of that chronographical problem: 'The diſtances of three objects in the ſame plane, and the angles made at a fourth place in that plane, by obſerving each object, being given; to find the diſtances of thoſe objects from the place of obſervation (m).'

Mr. Collins did not confine his attention wholly to mathematical ſtudies, but engaged alſo in other inquiries, and ſuch as were of a public-ſpirited nature. In 1680, he publiſhed, at London, a ſmall treatiſe, in 4to. intituled, 'A Plea for the bringing in of Iriſh Cattle, and keeping out the Fiſh caught by Foreigners; together with an Addreſs to the Members of Parliament of the Counties of Cornwall and Devon, about the advancement of Tin, Fiſhery, and divers Manufactures.' In 1682, he publiſhed, in 4to. a 'Diſcourſe of Salt and Fiſhery,' under the following heads: I. The ſeveral ways of making ſalts in England and foreign parts. II. The characters and qualities of good and bad of theſe ſeveral ſorts of ſalts; Engliſh refined being aſſerted to be much better than any foreign. III. The catching and curing or ſalting of the moſt eminent or ſtaple ſorts of fiſh for long or ſhort keeping. IV. The ſalting of fleſh. V. The cookery of fiſh and fleſh. VI. Extraordinary experiments for preſerving butter, fleſh, fiſh, fowl, fruits and roots, freſh and ſweet for long keeping. VII. The caſe and ſufferings of the ſalt-workers. VIII. Propoſals for their relief, and for the advancement of the fiſhery, woollen, tin, and divers other manufactures (n).

(n) Ibid.

Mr. Collins did not long ſurvive the publication of this piece. After the act at Oxford, July 10, 1682, riding from thence to Malmeſbury in Wiltſhire, in order to view the ground to be cut for a river between the Iſis and Avon, and drinking cyder while he was hot, he contracted an aſthma and conſumption, which at length put a period to his life. He died at his lodging on Garlick-hill, London, on the 10th of November, 1683; and his body was interred, three days after, in the pariſh-church of St. James, Garlick-hill, in the ſouth-iſle juſt behind the pulpit (o). In the Philoſophical Tranſactions, N° 159, for May, 1684, a letter was publiſhed, written by Mr. Collins to the learned Dr. John Wallis, containing his thoughts about ſome defects in Algebra; and wherein he propoſes the genuine method of deſcribing the Loci of Equations, and of determining the limits and number of their roots, with various other matters (p). His 'Arithmetic in whole Numbers and Fractions, both Vulgar and Decimal, with Tables for the forbearance and rebate of Money,' &c. did not appear till ſome years after his death, being publiſhed in London, in 1688, in 12*mo.* by Mr. Thomas Plant, Accountant (q).

Beſides his own productions, Mr. Collins was alſo a great promoter of many other valuable publications of the age in which he lived. It is aſſerted to be owing to him that the world is indebted, for the publication of Dr. Barrow's Optical and Geometrical Lectures, his edition of the works of Archimedes, and of Apollonius's Conics; Mr. Branker's Tranſlation of Rhonius's Algebra, with Dr. Pell's additions; Mr. Kerſey's Algebra; Dr. Wallis's Hiſtory of Algebra; and many other excellent works, which are ſaid to have been procured by his unwearied ſolicitations (r). About five and twenty years after Mr. Collins's (r) Gen. Dict. art. Collins, note [C].

Collins's death, all his papers, and moſt of his books came into the hands of Mr. William Jones, F. R. S. amongſt which were found manuſcripts upon mathematical ſubjects of Mr. Briggs, Mr. Oughtred, Dr. Pell, Dr. Scarborough, Dr. Barrow, and Mr. Iſaac Newton, with a multitude of letters received from, and copies of letters ſent to, many learned perſons, particularly Dr. Pell, Dr. Wallis, Dr. Barrow, Mr. Newton, Mr. James Gregory, Mr. Flamſteed, Mr. Thomas Baker, Mr. Brancker, Dr. Edward Bernard, Monſ. Sluſius, Monſ. Leibnitz, Monſ. Tſchirnaus, Father Bertet, and others (s). It appeared from theſe papers, that Mr. Collins was ſo ſolicitous in his ſearch after uſeful truths, ſo indefatigably induſtrious in proſecuting theſe inquiries, and of a diſpoſition ſo communicative, that he held a conſtant correſpondence, for many years, with all the eminent mathematicians of his time; and ſpared neither pains, nor expence, to procure what was requiſite to promote real ſcience; ſo that the world was obliged to him for a great part of the late important diſcoveries (t). He was conſidered as a kind of regiſter of all new improvements in the mathematics; and was conſtantly ſtimulating others to uſeful inquiries, and pointing out the defects in different branches of ſcience, and the methods by which thoſe defects might be ſupplied; ſo that he was ſometimes ſtyled the Engliſh Merſennus (u). He was certainly a man of great merit; but appears not to have met with the encouragement that he deſerved, from thoſe who had it in their power to have rewarded him [C]. It was chiefly from the papers of Mr. Collins, that the claim of Sir Iſaac Newton to the invention of fluxions was clearly eſtabliſhed, as may be ſeen in the Commercium Epiſtolicum D. Johannis Collins & aliorum de Analyſi promotâ, juſſu Regiæ Societatis lucem editum, Lond. 1712, 4*to* (w).] T.

[C] Appears not to have met with the encouragement that he deſerved, &c.] Dr. Birch ſays, that 'upon 'the loſs of his place in the Exciſe-office, and that 'under the Commiſſioners of Accounts, he was re-'commended by Sir Philip Warwick, in a letter dated 'May, 1670, to Sir John Trevor, one of the Princi-'pal Secretaries of State, as long known to, and re-'ſpected by him, for his great and uſeful parts, and 'greater modeſty; and that, beſides his knowledge 'of mathematics and accounts, he was a great maſter 'of trade. "I conceive," added Sir Philip, "he "takes better meaſures of it, and knows the hinges "it turns on better than any diſcourſes I have met "with, and can rectify the methods of ſeveral ac-"counts relating to the navy and ſuch affairs, if he "be leiſurely dealt with, for he neither makes noiſe "nor ſhew. I find (for he is neither covetous nor "greedy) he could reckon 200*l. per annum* for a "reaſonable ſubſiſtence: which, if his Majeſty and "my Lords Commiſſioners think fit to buy him at, "ſure he may be ſet on work immediately upon ſuch "ſubjects, as he will ſoon earn his wages, though it "be an extraordinary allowance: and the next Com-"miſſioners of Appeals place, which falls in the Ex-"ciſe (which is now rather a bounty than a ſalary) "may take off that extraordinary charge." Sir Philip 'Warwick wrote another letter in his favour, Aug. '6, 1677, to Mr. Brent, incloſing a paper recom-'mending Mr. Collins to the Lord-Treaſurer, the 'Earl of Danby; in which letter he ſtyled him a man 'of good arts, and yet greater ſimplicity; able, but no 'ways forward; and obſerved, that he had deſerved, 'when he was in employment, the ſmall penſion aſ-'ſigned him when he quitted that employment. Sir 'Philip wrote a third letter of recommendation, Oct. '31, 1678, to Charles Bertie, Eſq; Secretary to the 'Lord-Treaſurer, mentioning, that in the ſmall 'office, which Mr. Collins had in the Exciſe while 'the Earl of Southampton was Treaſurer, he was 'very truſty to his charge, and very careful in the 'true ſtating of the accounts at Brook-houſe; and 'that he could have very ample teſtimonies of his 'ſervices in attending the Commiſſioners, and more 'lately in his Office of Accountant to the Royal 'Fiſhery Company. "But as a man," conti-'nues Sir Philip, "that hath attended more his "buſineſs than himſelf, he fell ſhort of receiving "thoſe ſalaries, which were promiſed him: but I "contract myſelf and my ſuit to you, and pray you "to repreſent it, if it would do any good, in my "name to my Lord-Treaſurer, that he having, upon "diſſolving the then commiſſion for Exciſe, but a "a poor penſion of fifty pounds per ann. ſettled on "him by Privy Seal, and of which he is now five or "ſix years in arrear, you would be inſtrumental to "get him ſuch a portion, as might be comfortable "for him, and whereof, I aſſure you, he ſtands in "great need for his family as well as for himſelf, his "preſent ſubſiſtence being only ſometimes taking "ſome intricate accounts of merchants, which are "litigant, and others, who call him thereunto upon "ſuch occaſions. I extend my requeſt ſomewhat "farther, that if my Lord-Treaſurer have need of "ſuch a man's ſervice, as he may probably upon the "balance of trade or of a ſteady account of another "nature, you would remember him, and gain him "ſome employment; for thus he will recommend "himſelf (5)."]

COLLINS (ANTHONY), an eminent Writer of the preſent Century, was ſon of Henry Collins, Eſq; a gentleman of a conſiderable eſtate; and was born at Heſton near Hounſlow in Middleſex, June 21, 1676 (a). He was educated in grammar learning at Eton-College near Windſor, and from thence was removed to King's College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr. Francis Hare (b). Upon his leaving college, he was entered a Student in the Temple: but diſreliſhing the ſtudy of the Law, he ſoon abandoned it. In 1698, he married Martha, the daughter of Sir Francis Child, Alderman of London (c), and by her had two ſons, Henry and Anthony [A], and two daughters, Elizabeth and Martha (d). In 1700, our author publiſhed a tract, intituled, Several of the London Caſes conſidered (e). In 1703, and 1704, he held an epiſtolary correſpondence with the great Mr. Locke, who expreſſed an high regard and friendſhip for our author [B]. In 1707,

[B] Mr. Locke expreſſed an high regard and friendſhip for our author.] This appears from Mr. Locke's letters to Mr. Collins (2). In that dated from Oates in Eſſex, October 29, 1703, he writes as follows. 'If 'I were now ſetting out in the world, I ſhould think 'it

1707, he publiſhed his Eſſay concerning the Uſe of Reaſon (f) [C]. The ſame year, our author engaged in the controverſy, then on foot between Mr. Dodwell and Dr. Samuel Clarke, concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul [D]. In December 1709, came out a pamphlet (g), intituled, Prieſtcraft in Perfection [E]; and, in February the year following, another intituled, Reflexions on a late Pamphlet, intituled, Prieſtcraft in Perfection; both written by our author. The ſame year, he publiſhed his Vindication of the Divine Attributes, in ſome Remarks on the Archbiſhop of Dublin's Sermon (h). In March 1711, Mr. Collins went over to Holland, where he became acquainted with Mr. Le Clerc, and other learned men, and returned to London in November following. In 1713, he publiſhed his Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking [F]; and ſoon after made a ſecond trip to Holland, (f) A ſecond edition of it was publiſhed in 1709.

(h) Intituled, Divine Predeſtination and Foreknowledge conſiſting with the Freedom of Man's Will, Lond. 1710.

'it my great happineſs to have ſuch a companion as 'you, who had a true reliſh of truth, would in earneſt 'ſeek it with me, from whom I might receive it un-'diſguiſed, and to whom I might communicate what 'I thought true, freely. Believe it, my good friend, 'to love truth for truth's ſake, is the principal part 'of human perfection in this world, and the ſeed-plot 'of all other virtues; and, if I miſtake not, you have 'as much of it, as ever I met with in any body. 'What then is there wanting to make you equal to 'the beſt, a friend for any one to be proud of?' In another, dated from Oates, September 11th, 1704, he writes thus: He that has any thing to do with you, muſt own that friendſhip is the natural product of your conſtitution; and your ſoul, a noble ſoil, is enriched with the two moſt valuable qualities of human nature, truth and friendſhip. What a treaſure have I then in ſuch a friend, with whom I can converſe, and be enlightened about the higheſt ſpeculations? Theſe extracts evince, that, at that time, Mr. Collins appeared to Mr. Locke in the light of an impartial, diſintereſted, enquirer after truth. How far that great man, who was undoubtedly a friend to Revelation, would, probably, have altered his opinion of our author, had he lived (3) to ſee his works (of which he had publiſhed none but his London Caſes conſidered) the readers of Mr. Collins's works will judge.

(3) Mr. Locke died the 28th of October, 1704.

[C] His Eſſay concerning the uſe of Reaſon.] The title at length is: An Eſſay concerning the uſe of Reaſon in Propoſitions, the evidence whereof depends upon human teſtimony. Dr. Francis Gaſtrell, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter, being animadverted upon in this eſſay, with relation to ſome paſſages in his Conſiderations concerning the Trinity, and the way of managing that controverſy, printed at London in 1702, he ſubjoined to the third edition of it, in 1707, a Vindication of it in anſwer to Mr. Collins's Eſſay.

[D] He engaged in the Controverſy—concerning the natural Immortality of the Soul.] Upon this ſubject Mr. Collins publiſhed the following pieces. I. A Letter to Mr. Dodwell, containing ſome remarks on a (pretended) Demonſtration of the immateriality and natural immortality of the Soul, in Mr. Clarke's Anſwer to a late Epiſtolary Diſcourſe. London, 1707, and 1709, in 8*vo*. II. A Defence of the Argument made uſe of in a Letter to Mr. Dodwell. London, 1707, in 8*vo*. III. A Reply to Mr. Clarke's Defence of his letter to Mr. Dodwell: with a poſtſcript to Mr. Milles's Anſwer to Mr. Dodwell's Epiſtolary Diſcourſe. London, 1707, in 8*vo*. A ſecond edition of this piece, corrected, was publiſhed in 1709, in 8*vo*. IV. Reflections on Mr. Clarke's ſecond Defence of his Letter to Mr. Dodwell, London, 1707, in 8*vo*. There was a ſecond edition in 1711, in 8*vo*. V. An anſwer to Mr. Clarke's third Defence of his Letter to Mr. Dodwell. London, 1708, in 8*vo*. There was a ſecond edition, corrected, London, 1711, in 8*vo*.

[E] A pamphlet intituled Prieſtcraft in Perfection.] The title at length is: Prieſtcraft in perfection, or, a Detection of the fraud of inſerting, and continuing that clauſe [The Church hath power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controverſies of Faith] in the twentieth article of the Articles of the Church of England. The authority of this clauſe had been called in queſtion, in a book intituled, The Peril of being zealouſly affected, but not well; or Reflections on Dr. Sacheverell's Sermon preached at St. Paul's, Nov. 5, 1709 (4). And it being now again profeſſedly attacked by Mr. Collins, ſeveral Pamphlets, Sermons, and Books were publiſhed upon the ſubject. Among which, the moſt remarkable were the two following. I. A Vindication of the Church of England from the aſperſions of a late libel intituled, Prieſtcraft in Perfection: wherein the controverted clauſe of the Church's power in the 20th Article is ſhewn to be of equal authority with all the reſt of the Articles, and the fraud and forgery, charged upon the Clergy, upon the account of that clauſe, is retorted upon the accuſers. With a Preface containing ſome Remarks upon the Reflections on that Pamphlet. By a Prieſt of the Church of England, London, 1710, in 8*vo*. II. An Eſſay on the XXXIX Articles of Religion, agreed on in 1562, and reviſed in 1571, &c. By Thomas Bennet, D. D. In anſwer to theſe two Books, Mr. Collins publiſhed his Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the XXXIX Articles, &c (5). The ſecond and third editions of his Prieſtcraft in Perfection were printed, with corrections, at London, in 1710, in 8*vo*; and at the end of the third is ſubjoined the following advertiſement. 'Whereas 'in the two former impreſſions of Prieſtcraft, &c. A 'letter from Oxford is cited, giving an account of an 'Engliſh edition of the Articles being cut out from a 'volume of Miſcellanies in the Bodleian Library; I 'have omitted that paſſage in this edition, upon the 'ſight of a letter from Oxford, which aſſures the gentleman, to whom it was written, that my friend was 'miſtaken. I do not know at preſent in what part of 'England he is, and therefore I cannot as yet give 'the reader or myſelf that ſatisfaction in the matter, 'which I hope to do when I hear of his return to 'Oxford.'

(5) See the remark [K].

[F] His Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking.] The title at length is: A Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, occaſioned by the riſe and growth of a Sect called Free-Thinkers. It was re-printed at the Hague, with ſome additions and corrections, in 1713, in 12*mo*; though, in the title-page, it is ſaid to be printed at London. In this edition, the tranſlations in ſeveral places are corrected from Dr. Bentley's Remarks, and ſome references are made to thoſe Remarks, and to Dr. Hare's Clergyman's Thanks. And whereas, in the former edition, the Diſcourſe ended with theſe words; 'For I think it 'virtue enough to endeavour to do good, only within 'the bounds of doing yourſelf no harm;' in the Hague edition, after the words virtue enough, is inſerted this parentheſis; in a country ſo ignorant, ſtupid, ſuperſtitious, and deſtitute of all private and public virtue, as ours. The Diſcourſe was attacked in ſeveral pieces, particularly the following, I. Reflections on an Anonymous Pamphlet, intituled, A Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. By William Whiſton, A. M. Lond. 1713. There have been three editions of this pamphlet. Mr. Whiſton obſerves (6), that 'though the Diſcourſe 'is commonly ſo worded, as to ſeem rather meant 'againſt the Heathen Idolatry, Popiſh Superſtition, 'Real Prieſtcraft, and Tyranny over conſcience, than 'againſt Chriſtianity itſelf, with its ſacred books,' yet that the author's real deſign muſt appear from 'the ill characters given of the Clergy or Chriſtian 'Prieſthood in general; the oblique reproaches caſt 'upon Revealed Religion; the viſible ſlight put upon 'the whole Jewiſh nation and the Moſaic law; the 'plain diſregard of the great foundation of religion, 'the immortality of the ſoul; and the many inſinuations viſibly tending to render the ſacred books, both 'Jewiſh and Chriſtian, contemptible and uncertain.' II. An anonymous pamphlet, intituled, Free Thoughts upon the Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, London, 1713, in 8*vo*. III. Queries recommended to the authors of the late Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. By Mr. Benjamin Hoadly,

Holland [G], and from thence to Flanders, where he received great civilities from the Prieſts, Jeſuits, and others. He intended to have viſited Paris; but the death of a near relation (i) obliged him to return to London, where he arrived the 18th of October, 1713. In 1715, he retired into the county of Eſſex, and acted as a Juſtice of the Peace, and Deputy Lieutenant of that county, as he had done before in the county of Middleſex, and liberty of Weſtminſter. The ſame year he publiſhed, at London, A Philoſophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty (k) [H]. In 1718, he was choſen Treaſurer for the county of Eſſex [I]. In 1724, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Walter Wrotteſley, Bart. (l) by whom he had no children. Hoadly, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter (7). This ingenious writer declares (8), 'that, though ſome 'of the particulars, mentioned in his Queries, as 'deſigned plainly againſt the belief of Chriſtianity, 'are produced in the Treatiſe of Free-Thinking under 'the ſpecious pretence of their being good reaſons 'and occaſions for a free and impartial examination, 'and not expreſsly declared to be intended againſt 'the Goſpel, in the ſame paſſages, in which the au-'thors of that treatiſe produce them; yet he verily 'believes, that theſe authors themſelves would in-'wardly laugh at any, who ſhould ſuppoſe them to 'have had any other view in that performance.' And having placed ſeveral particulars from the Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking in one view, he concludes with theſe words (9): After this let any one doubt, if he can, what ſort of Free-Thinking all that is produced in the firſt part of this treatiſe is deſigned to promote; or ſuppoſe it poſſible, that the chief view of theſe authors could be any other than the promoting that Free-Thinking, which they themſelves contend to be Atheiſm and Infidelity. IV. Remarks upon a late Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking; in a Letter to F. H. D. D. By Phileleutherus Lipſienſis. Lond. 1713, in 8*vo*. The author of this ingenious performance was the truly learned Dr. Richard Bentley; and the perſon to whom it is addreſſed, Dr. Francis Hare, afterwards Biſhop of Chicheſter. It expoſes the weakneſs and fallacy of the Diſcourſe, with great ſtrength of argument and ſprightlineſs of wit. A Second part, and a ſheet or two of a Third, were printed the ſame year at Cambridge: but the learned author proceeded no farther. The firſt part of theſe Remarks gave birth to a pamphlet, ſaid to be written by Dr. Hare, intituled, The Clergyman's Thanks to Phileleutherus, for his Remarks on the late Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. In a Letter to Dr. Bentley. Lond. 1713, in 8*vo*. The author concludes this piece with remarking, that 'if we have gained by Dr. Bentley's 'Remarks in one reſpect, we are, on the other hand, 'in danger of loſing no leſs than an edition of all 'Tully, and, what is of more conſequence, a New 'Goſpel; with both which, for the advancement of 'learning and religion (their learning and their reli-'gion) The Free-thinking Club were preparing to 'oblige the world. And the laſt of theſe (ſays he) 'was, I am told, quite finiſhed, and ready to be pub-'liſhed, when your Remarks unluckily came out to 'ſhew, that they are neither Chriſtians nor Scholars. 'And this has ſuppreſſed at leaſt for ſome time, if not 'totally ſunk, both theſe undertakings.'

[G] He made a ſecond trip to Holland.] This was aſcribed to the general alarm cauſed by the Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, and the author's being diſcovered by his Printer Mr. John Darby. Whereupon Dr. Hare, having obſerved, that the leaſt appearance of danger is able in a moment to damp all the zeal of the Free-Thinkers, tells us (10), 'that a bare enquiry after the 'Printer of their wicked book has frightened them, 'and obliged the reputed author to take a ſecond trip 'to Holland; ſo great is his courage to defend, upon 'the leaſt appearance of an oppoſition. And are not 'theſe (adds the Doctor) rare champions for Free-'Thinking? And is not their book a demonſtration, 'that we are in poſſeſſion of the liberty they pretend 'to plead for, which otherwiſe they durſt never have 'writ? and that they would have been as mute as 'fiſhes, had they not thought they could have open-'ed with impunity?'

(10) Clergyman's Thanks, p. 18.

[H] His Philoſophical Enquiry concerning Human Liberty.] Dr. Samuel Clarke wrote Remarks upon this Enquiry (11). But Mr. Collins did not publiſh any Reply to Dr. Clarke upon this ſubject; becauſe, we are told (12), though he did not think the Doctor had the advantage over him in the diſpute, yet, as he had repreſented Mr. Collins's opinions as dangerous in their conſequences, and improper to be inſiſted upon, our author, after ſuch an inſinuation, found he could not proceed in the diſpute upon equal terms. The Enquiry was tranſlated into French by the Reverend Mr. D*, and printed in the firſt volume of Recueil de diverſes Pieces ſur la Philoſophie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Hiſtoire, les Mathematiques, &c. par Meſſieurs Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, & autres auteurs celebres; publiſhed by M. Des Maizeaux at Amſterdam, 1720, in two volumes, 12*mo*.

[I] He was choſen Treaſurer for the county of Eſſex.] In the diſcharge of this office Mr. Collins highly merited the thanks of ſeveral tradeſmen and others, who had large ſums of money due to them from the ſaid county, but could not get it paid them, it having been ſpent and embezzled by their former Treaſurer. The pooreſt of them, we are informed, he ſupported with his own private caſh, and others he promiſed intereſt for their money till it could be raiſed to pay them. In 1722, the debts were all diſcharged, and by his care and management the county's debts were, from that time, diſcharged every three months, and with little more than half the money, which had been annually raiſed for upwards of twenty years before.

[K] His Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay upon the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England.] The title at length is: An Hiſtorical and Critical Eſſay on the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England: wherein it is demonſtrated, that this clauſe, The Church has power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controverſies of Faith, inſerted in the Twentieth Article, is not a part of the Articles, as they were eſtabliſhed by Act of Parliament in the 13th of Eliz. or agreed on by the Convocations of 1562 and 1571. This, we have already ſaid (13), was deſigned as an Anſwer to the Vindication of the Church of England, &c. and Dr. Bennet's Eſſay on the XXXIX Articles, both publiſhed againſt his Prieſtcraft in Perfection. In the Preface he tells us, 'he was engaged in writing this work by a worthy Miniſter of the Goſpel, who knew that he had made ſome enquiries into the modern Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England; and that he was preparing An Hiſtory of the Variations of the Church of England, and its Clergy, from the Reformation down to this Time, with an Anſwer to the Cavils of the Papiſts made on Occaſion of the ſaid Variations. But nothing of this kind, from our author's hand, was ever printed. As to the Eſſay in queſtion, he concludes it with drawing up in brief the Demonſtration, promiſed in the title page, and given in the book; and which is as follows: The Articles of the Church of England are ſuppoſed to have their Convocational Authority from the Convocation of 1562, which firſt agreed on them; and from the Convocation of 1571, which, after having reviſed, and made alterations in, and additions to, them, agreed on them again. The way of paſſing Acts of Convocation is by the ſubſcription of the majority of the Members of each Houſe by themſelves. The MS. Articles, which paſſed the Convocation in 1562, and were ſubſcribed by the majority of both Houſes, are extant; as are the MS. Articles of 1571, with the ſubſcriptions of the Upper Houſe. Wherefore it follows, that the clauſe has neither the authority of the Convocation nor Parliament. The reader may ſee the whole ſtate of this controverſy, and a full vindication of the Church of England from the charge of forgery, in reſpect to the above-mentioned clauſe, in Mr. Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (14), where particular notice is taken of our author.

[L] His Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion.] The title at length is: A Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſtian Religion, in two Parts: The firſt containing ſome Conſiderations on the Quotations made from the Old in the New Teſtament, and particularly on the Prophecies, cited from the former, and ſaid to be fulfilled in the latter: The ſecond containing an Examination of the Scheme advanced by Mr. Whiſton, in his Eſſay towards reſtoring the true Text of the Old Teſtament, and for vindicating the Citations thence made in the New Teſtament. To which is prefixed, An Apology for free Debate and Liberty of Writing. The drift of this diſcourſe is to ſhew, that Chriſtianity is founded on Judaiſm, or the New Teſtament on the Old: that the Apoſtles prove Chriſtianity from the Old Teſtament: that if the proofs fetched from thence are valid, Chriſtianity is firmly eſtabliſhed on its true foundation; but if invalid, Chriſtianity is falſe: and that thoſe proofs are typical or allegorical.

[M] It was attacked by a great number of writers.] I ſhall mention only the moſt remarkable. I. A Liſt of Suppoſitions or Aſſertions in the late Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c.' which are not therein ſupported by any real or authentic Evidence; for which ſome ſuch Evidence is expected to be produced. By William Whiſton, A. M. 8*vo.* 1724. This piece is ſubjoined to the author's Propoſals for printing by ſubſcription, Authentic Records concerning the Jewiſh and Chriſtian Religion, dated Jan. 17, 1724, and given away to all the Members of Parliament. In this piece, Mr. Whiſton treats Mr. Collins, together with Mr. Toland, in very ſevere terms, as guilty of impious frauds and lay-craft. II. The literal Accompliſhment of Scripture Prophecies, being a full Anſwer to a late Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. By William Whiſton, A. M. 8*vo.* 1724. III. A Defence of Chriſtianity, from the Prophecies of the Old Teſtament, wherein are conſidered all the Objections againſt this Kind of Proof, advanced in a late Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. By the Right Reverend Father in God Edward (Chandler), Lord Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry (15), 8*vo.* 1725. This is a very learned and elaborate performance, and has paſſed through ſeveral editions. IV. A Diſcourſe of the Connection of the Prophecies in the Old Teſtament, and Application of them to Chriſt. By Samuel Clarke, D. D. Rector of St. James's, Weſtminſter, 8*vo.* 1725. This was not intended for a direct anſwer to Mr. Collins's book, but as a ſupplement (occaſioned thereby) to a propoſition in Dr. Clarke's Demonſtration of the Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion; with which it has ſince been conſtantly printed. V. The Reaſoning of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, in their Defence of Chriſtianity, conſidered, in ſeven Sermons, preached at Hackney in Middleſex, 1724. To which is prefixed, a Preface, taking notice of the falſe Repreſentations of Chriſtianity, and of the Apoſtles Reaſonings in Defence of it, in a Book, intituled, The Grounds, &c. By Thomas Bullock, A. M. Publiſhed at the Requeſt of the Gentlemen of Hackney, 8*vo.* 1725. VI. An Eſſay upon the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, wherein its real Foundation upon the Old Teſtament is ſhewn, occaſioned by the Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. By Arthur Aſhley Sykes, A. M. Rector of Rayleigh in Eſſex, 8*vo.* 1725. Mr. Collins gave it as his opinion, that, 'of all the writers 'againſt the Grounds, &c, Mr. Sykes alone has ad- 'vanced a conſiſtent ſcheme of things, which he has 'propoſed with great clearneſs, politeneſs, and mo- 'deration (16).' VII. The Uſe and Intent of Prophecy, in the ſeveral Ages of the Church. In ſix Diſcourſes delivered at the Temple Church, 1724, publiſhed at the Deſire of the Maſters of the Bench of the two honourable Societies. By Thomas Sherlock, D. D. Dean of Chicheſter, and Maſter of the Temple (17), 8*vo.* 1725. This was not deſigned as an anſwer to the Grounds, &c. but only to throw in light upon the argument from Prophecy, attacked by our author. VIII. A Vindication of the Chriſtian Religion, in two Parts. The firſt, A Diſcourſe of the Nature and Uſe of Miracles. The ſecond, An Anſwer to a late Book, intituled, A Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. By Samuel Chandler, 8*vo.* 1725. IX. A Supplement to the Literal Accompliſhment of Scripture Prophecies, containing Obſervations on Dr. Clarke's, and Biſhop Chandler's, late Diſcourſes of the Prophecies of the Old Teſtament. By William Whiſton, A. M. 8*vo.* 1725. X. Letters to the Author of the Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. ſhewing that Chriſtianity is ſupported by Facts well atteſted; that the Words of Iſaiah, chap. vii. 14. Behold a Virgin ſhall conceive, and bear a Son, in their literal and only Senſe, are a Prophecy of the Conception and Birth of the Meſſias, fulfilled in Jeſus; and that the Goſpel Application of ſeveral other Paſſages in the Old Teſtament is juſt. By John Greene, 8*vo.* 1726. XI. A brief Defence of the Chriſtian Religion: or, The Teſtimony of God to the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion. By Theophilus Lobb, M. D. 8*vo.* 1726. The reader will find an entire catalogue of all the pieces, written againſt the Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. amounting in number to thirty-five, among which are Sermons, London Journals, Woolſton's Moderator, &c. at the end of the Preface to the Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered.

[N] His Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered.] The title at length is, The Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered, in a View of the Controverſy occaſioned by a late Book, intituled, A Diſcourſe of the Grounds, &c. It was printed at the Hague by Thomas Johnſon, in 1726, in two volumes 12*mo.* and reprinted at London, with corrections, in 1727, in 8*vo.* It is dated at London, November 13, 1725, and addreſſed to the Right Honourable . In this piece (18) Mr. Collins mentions a Diſſertation he had written, but never publiſhed, againſt Mr. Whiſton's Vindication of the Sibylline Oracles; in which he endeavours to ſhew, that thoſe oracles were forged by the Primitive Chriſtians, who were thence called Sibylliſts by the Pagans. He alſo mentions a manuſcript Diſcourſe of his upon the Miracles recorded in the Old and New Teſtament.

(18) Ch. ii. p. 61. edit. 1726.

[O] It had ſeveral Anſwerers.] The principal are: I. The Neceſſity of Divine Revelation, and the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion aſſerted, in eight Sermons; to which is prefixed a Preface, with ſome Remarks on a late Book, intituled, The Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered, &c. By John Rogers, D. D. London, 1727, 8*vo.* in anſwer to which, Mr. Collins wrote A Letter to the Reverend Dr. Rogers, on Occaſion of his eight Sermons concerning the Neceſſity of Divine Revelation, and the Preface prefixed to them. To which is added, A letter printed in the London Journal, April 1, 1727, with an anſwer to the ſame. London, 1727, 8*vo.* II. A Letter to the Author of the London Journal, Saturday, April 1, 1727. It was written by Dr. Sykes, Dean of Burien, and is that anſwered by Mr. Collins, at the end of his Letter to Dr. Rogers. Dr. Sykes wrote a ſecond letter in defence of his former, dated June 24, 1727, and printed in a pamphlet, intituled, The true Grounds of the Expectation of the Meſſiah, in two Letters. The one printed in the London Journal, April 1, 1727. The other in Vindication of it; being a Reply to the Anſwer publiſhed at the End of A Letter to Dr. Rogers. By Philalethes, London, 1727, Collins, that his pieces were all anonymous. His health declined ſome years before his death, which fell out December 13, 1729, occaſioned by a violent fit of the ſtone. He was interred in Oxford-Chapel, where is a monument, with a Latin inſcription on it [P], erected to his memory by his widow. We ſhall ſay ſomething of this remarkable gentleman's character below [Q].

1727, 8*vo*. III. A Vindication of the Antiquity and Authority of Daniel's Prophecies, and their Application to Jeſus Chriſt, in Anſwer to the Objections of the Author of the Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered. By Samuel Chandler, London, 1727, 8*vo*. IV. A Vindication of the Defence of Chriſtianity, from the Prophecies of the Old Teſtament, in Anſwer to the Scheme of Literal Prophecy conſidered. By the Right Reverend Father in God, Edward, Lord Biſhop of Coventry and Litchfield: *in two Volumes. [Q] Something of his character.] We are told (19), that 'the corruption among Chriſtians, and the perſecuting ſpirit of the Clergy, had given him a prejudice againſt the Chriſtian religion, and at laſt induced him to think, that upon it's preſent footing it is pernicious to mankind: and that, as he had a great fund of humanity, ſweetneſs of temper, and moderation, he ſaw with grief, that theſe virtues were baniſhed from ſociety, and that religion was made uſe of as a cloak to authorize all kinds of violence and injuſtice.' Mr. Whiſton, in his Liſt of Suppoſitions and Aſſertions, &c (20), treating our author, together with Mr. Toland, as guilty of impious frauds and Lay-craft, expreſſes himſelf, with regard to the former, in theſe terms: 'A ſecond inſtance muſt be Mr. Anthony Collins, a gentleman, who has many years taken ſuperabundant care not to be ſuſpected of believing ſo much as the Apoſtles Creed, or the books of the Old or New Teſtament, or indeed any Divine Providence at all. Yet does he claim a right to be admitted to take an oath upon the Bible, and to receive the Holy Communion itſelf; and he is at this day admitted to do both, and in virtue thereof is in the commiſſion of the peace, as a good Church-man: i. e. notwithſtanding his open and profeſſed infidelity, he ventures, in the moſt public and ſolemn manner, to declare his unfeigned acknowledgment of the Divine Providence, of the truth of the Chriſtian religion, and of the books of the Holy Scripture, that is poſſible to be done among men. It is with great regret I add this example of an old friend, and one whom I ſtill love better than he loves himſelf; but it is too flagrant to be omitted. This I call groſs immorality, impious fraud, and Lay-craft.' Mr. Armand de la Chapelle, having tranſlated this paſſage into French (21), obſerves, that the expreſſions are a little too choleric, and that Mr. Collins would have reaſon to triumph upon this inſtance of paſſion in his antagoniſt. This occaſioned the ſending a letter to Mr. de la Chapelle (22), in which the writer obſerves, that 'Mr. Whiſton having accuſed Mr. Collins of irreligion, but being ſenſible that this accuſation, being deſtitute of proof, was ridiculous, he has artfully pretended, that the latter had been his friend, inſinuating thereby that Mr. Collins had diſcloſed to him his moſt ſecret ſentiments. And yet (adds the writer) I have been aſſured by perſons who are very well informed, that Mr. Collins never had any intercourſe of friendſhip with him; that he never ſpoke to him above eight or ten times in his life, in a coffee-houſe or elſewhere, and always in other company; and that he has not ſeen him for above five years. Is this ſufficient for Mr. Whiſton to claim the character of a friend?' Mr. Whiſton, in another place (23), ſpeaks thus of Mr. Collins. The reputed author of Freethinking is, for all I have ever heard, a ſober man; thanks to his natural averſion to intemperance; and that is more than can be ſaid of ſome others of the club: but as for any other virtue, he has told us (*) it is ſuch as he intends ſhall never hurt him. And it can't be thought uncharitable, if I ſay it riſes from no higher origin than fear; for he has himſelf diſclaimed all nobler principles. But, of all writers, the author of the Guardian (24) has treated our author's character with the greateſt ſeverity in the following paſſages: 'He that ſhould burn a houſe, and juſtify the action by aſſerting he is a free agent, would be far more excuſable than this author in uttering what he has from the right of a Free-Thinker.' Again; This gentleman may be aſſured he has not a taſte for what he pretends to decry, and the poor man is certainly more a blockhead than an Atheiſt. Again; 'When ſuch writers as this, who have no ſpirit but that of malice, pretend to inform the age, Mohocks and Cut-throats may well ſet up for wits and men of pleaſure.' Laſtly; If ever any man deſerved to be denied the common benefits of air and water, it is the author of a Diſcourſe of Free-thinking. But, notwithſtanding the reproaches caſt upon Mr. Collins as an enemy to ALL religion, impartially obliges us to remark, what is ſaid, and generally believed to be true, that, upon his death-bed, he declared, 'That, as he had always endeavoured, to the beſt of his abilities,

'abilities, to ſerve his God, his King, and his coun'try, ſo he was perſuaded he was going to that 'place, which God has deſigned for them that love
'him.' To which he added, The Catholic religion is to love God and to love man; and he adviſed ſuch as were about him, to have a conſtant regard to theſe principles. His library, which was a very large and curious one, was open to all men of letters, to whom he readily communicated all the lights and aſſiſtance in his power, and (we are told) even furniſhed his antagoniſts with books to confute himſelf, and directed them how to give their arguments all the force of which they were capable. We ſhall only add, that he carefully avoided all the indecencies of converſation, and diſcouraged every the leaſt tendency towards obſcenity of diſcourſe. B.

 [Whatever may be thought of Mr. Anthony Collins's writings, that he was a moſt reſpectable man in private life ſeems to be founded upon evidence which cannot be contradicted. A few days after his deceaſe, the following character of him was publiſhed in the newſpapers.

"On Saturday laſt, died at his houſe in Harley"ſquare, Anthony Collins, Eſq. He was remarkably
"the active, upright, impartial magiſtrate: the "tender huſband, the kind parent, the good maſter,
"and the true friend.

"He was a great promoter of literature in all its "branches; and an immoveable aſſertor of univerſal
"liberty in all civil and religious matters.

"Whatever his ſentiments were in certain points,
"this is what he declared at the time of his death,
"viz. that as he had always endeavoured, to the beſt
"of his ability, to ſerve God, his King, and his "country, ſo he was perſuaded he was going to that "place which God hath prepared for them that love
"him; and preſently afterwards he ſaid, the Catho"lic religion is to love God and to love man.

"He was an eminent example of temperance "and ſobriety, and one that had the true art of "living. His worſt enemies could never charge
(25) Memoirs of Thomas Hollis, Eſq; vol. ii. Appendix, p. 718, 719. "him with any vice or immorality (25)."

Mr. Thomas Hollis, writing to a correſpondent at Rome, concluded his epiſtle as follows: "I ſhall
"now cloſe a long letter, with a quotation from Mr.
"Locke's laſt letter to the excellent Mr. Collins,
"and ſhall bid you heartily farewell. There is no
"happineſs equal to the conſciouſneſs of doing well."
Upon this paſſage the able and ſpirited writer of Mr. Hollis's life has made a few remarks, relative to Collin's character, which cannot be omitted. "There "are, we ſuppoſe, one or more claſſes of men who "will think the term excellent improperly annexed
"to the name of Anthony Collins. It ſhould cut "off ſome part of the diſguſt, that he was the con"fidential friend of Mr. Locke. If he had any ill-"will to revelation, a matter far from being out of "doubt, ſuffice it to ſay, that he did not ſucceed
"in his efforts to diſparage it. What we ſuppoſe
"might contribute to Mr. Hollis's eſteem of him,
"was his avowed enmity to eccleſiaſtical uſurpations,
"in the expoſing of which he was not unſucceſsful.
"For the reſt, Mr. Collins was an excellent magi"ſtrate; amiable, prudent, virtuous, and humane in "all domeſtic duties and relations; and of a benevo"lence towards all men, worthy of the character of
(26) Ibid. vol. i. p. 176. "the citizen of the world (26)."

The preceding aſſertion, that Mr. Collins's ill-will to Revelation is far from being out of doubt, may receive a ſlight confirmation from what we have related in the life of Lord Barrington. It is there ſaid, that one of his lordſhip's publications ſtaggered Mr. Collins's infidelity (27). However, if his infidelity was ſtaggered, there doth not appear to be any good reaſon to ſuppoſe that it was ever entirely ſubdued. The beſt which can be thought concerning him is, that he might ſometimes be only ſceptical with regard to the truth of Chriſtianity; and his writings furniſh too much cauſe for conſidering him as, upon the whole, a poſitive unbeliever in our holy religion. At the ſame time, he was not ſo malignant an infidel as he hath often been repreſented. It has not been uncommon to connect his name with authors of atheiſtical principles; but this is doing a manifeſt injuſtice to his character. A worthy and reſpectable clergyman put a paper into our hands, containing two anecdotes which repreſent Mr. Collins as an Atheiſt, and as having introduced a young gentleman to a club of ſuch perſons in London. The paper, by ſome accident, has been miſlaid; and we the leſs regret the loſs of it, as we could not have inſerted relations of things which muſt have been the reſult of miſtake at leaſt, if not of great prejudice, on the part of thoſe by whom they were recited to our communicator.
(27) Biog. Brit. vol. i. p. 626. Second edition.

To the liſt of thoſe who wrote againſt the diſcourſe on Free-Thinking, Dr. Swift is to be added. Our authority for this aſſertion is the Supplement to the Dean's Works, publiſhed by Mr. Nichols. We find there a tract, intituled, "Mr. Collins's Diſcourſe of "Free-Thinking; put into Engliſh, by Way of "Abſtract, for the Uſe of the Poor: by a Friend of "the Author." This piece, which firſt appeared in 1713, is of an ironical nature. It is written in the aſſumed character of a whig and a Free-Thinker, and, amidſt ſome good ſtrokes of ſatire, contains no ſmall portion of toryiſm, and of high-church bigotry (28). Of all the publications againſt the diſcourſe on Free-Thinking, Dr. Bentley's was undoubtedly the beſt. It is replete with argument, learning, and wit; the objection againſt the New Teſtament, drawn from its various readings, is unanſwerably refuted; and Mr. Collins's miſconceptions, miſrepreſentations, and wrong tranſlations of the authors he quotes, are admirably expoſed.
(28) Supplement to Swift's Works, vol. i. p. 251—306.

There were ſeveral other anſwers to the "Diſ-
"courſe on the Grounds and Reaſons of the Chriſ-
"tian Religion," and to the "Scheme of Literal
"Prophecy conſidered," beſides thoſe which are mentioned by our learned predeceſſor. We remember to have read three treatiſes upon the ſubject, which appeared to us to have very conſiderable merit. One was by Mr. Moſes Lowman, the author of various works which are well known in the theological world; but the book we refer to is now almoſt wholly forgotten. The other two were written by a Mr. Thomas Jeffreys, a diſſenting miniſter in Eſſex, who, if he had not died young, would probably have ranked among the moſt able advocates of revelation. The writings he lived to publiſh, and which were in anſwer to Mr. Collins, are much eſteemed by thoſe judicious readers who are acquainted with them; and they were highly approved of by Dr. Kennicott, who was an excellent judge of whatever relates to the queſtion concerning the predictions of the Old Teſtament. Mr. Jeffreys's firſt publication was, "A Re"view of the Controverſy between the Author of "the Diſcourſe of the Grounds and Reaſons of the "Chriſtian Religion and his Adverſaries," 8*vo.* 1726; and the ſecond was intituled, "Chriſtianity
"the Perfection of all Religion, natural and revealed,
"wherein ſome of the principal Prophecies relating "to the Meſſiah in the Old Teſtament, are ſhewn to "belong to him in the Literal Senſe, in oppoſition
"to the Attempts of the Literal Scheme." 8*vo.* 1728.

Dr. Leland, in his "View of the Deiſtical Writers," has devoted one letter to the conſideration of Collins, and has expoſed his falſe aſſumptions, and his fallacious and ſophiſtical mode of reaſoning (29). The letter contains many judicious and ſenſible remarks, though we do not think that it is written in the Doctor's beſt manner, the ſubject being capable of a ſtill more maſterly diſcuſſion.
(29) View of the Deiſtical Writers, vol. i. p. 98—125.

Mr. Collins's attack on our holy religion has, in fact, turned out highly to its advantage; as it hath cauſed the ſubject of prophecy to be more deeply inveſtigated, and has produced ſeveral admirable treatiſes, which have thrown great light on the queſtion, and have proved, beyond all reaſonable doubt, that many important predictions of the Old Teſtament related to Jeſus Chriſt alone, and in him only were fulfilled. One particular benefit ariſing from it is, that it has occaſioned ſome of our moſt learned and judicious divines to reject the double ſenſe of prophecies. Among theſe Divines may be reckoned the Doctors Sykes, Benſon, Gregory Sharpe, and Kennicott. Indeed, it is upon the principle adopted by theſe gentlemen, that we think Chriſtianity will moſt rationally and unanſwerably be defended, as, in one or two future articles, we ſhall have more ample reaſon to obſerve.

Though

Though the ſubject of the Old Teſtament predictions has received a very able diſcuſſion, we are by no means of opinion that it is entirely exhauſted. There is ſtill room for a farther elucidation of it, by ſome Divine, who ſhall unite real learning and critical ſagacity with a rational and liberal mode of thinking.

We muſt not conclude this note without remarking, that though Mr. Collins was an amiable and worthy man in private life, he was, at the ſame time, a moſt unfair writer. He ſeemed to have very little conſcience in his quotations,—adapting them, without ſcruple, to his own purpoſes, however contrary they might be to the genuine meaning of the authors cited, or to the connection in which the paſſages referred to ſtood. So many facts of this kind were undeniably proved againſt him by his adverſaries, that he muſt ever be recorded as a flagrant inſtance of literary diſingenuity.] K.

 [COLLINS (WILLIAM), a very ingenious Poet, was born at Chicheſter, in the county of Suſſex, on the 25th of December, either in 1720, or 1721; but in which of the two years cannot now preciſely be aſcertained (a). His father was a Hatter, of good reputation in that city. The earlieſt part of his education was probably in his native place; but in 1733 he was admitted a ſcholar of Wincheſter-College, where he continued ſeven years, under the care of Dr. Burton. Here it was obſerved, that his Engliſh exerciſes were better than his Latin. The firſt effort of his poetical genius that is now known, was a copy of verſes to a "Lady weeping," publiſhed in "The Gentleman's Magazine;" a repoſitory in which ſeveral eminent men have begun their literary career [A]. In 1740, Mr. Collins ſtood at the head of the liſt of ſcholars, to be received in ſucceſſion at New-College, Oxford; but unhappily there was no vacancy. This appears to have been the original misfortune of his life (b). In the hope that a vacancy might ſoon happen, he was, in the mean time, admitted a Commoner of Queen's-College, in the ſame Univerſity, and probably with a ſcanty maintenance. During his reſidence at Queen's, he was at once diſtinguiſhed for genius and indolence; his exerciſes, when he could be prevailed upon to write, bearing the viſible characteriſtics of both. No opportunity occurring of his being elected into New-College, he was recommended by his tutor to the Society of Magdalen, where he was choſen a Demy, in July 1741. The uncommon abilities and learning which he diſplayed on this occaſion, principally contributed to his election. At Magdalen-College he continued till he had taken his Bachelor's degree; and, poetry being his chief purſuit, there it was that he wrote his Epiſtle to Sir Thomas Hanmer, and his Oriental Eclogues. The latter, under the title of Perſian Eclogues, were publiſhed in 1742 (c). Notwithſtanding their merit, they were not attended with any great ſucceſs; a misfortune which ſometimes happens to the moſt promiſing geniuſes, eſpecially when they print without a name, and have no perſon of conſequence to introduce them to the notice of the world. It hath been objected to theſe Eclogues, that though the ſcenery and ſubjects of them are Oriental, the ſtyle and colouring are purely European. Of the force of this objection, Mr. Collins himſelf became ſenſible in the latter part of his life. He ſpoke to Dr. Warton and Mr. Thomas Warton with diſapprobation of his Eclogues, as not ſufficiently expreſſive of Aſiatic manners, and called them his Iriſh Eclogues (d). Notwithſtanding this circumſtance, their poetical merit is very great; and Dr. Langhorne hath not ſcrupled to aſſert, "that in ſimplicity "of deſcription and expreſſion, in delicacy and ſoftneſs of numbers, and in natural and "unaffected tenderneſs, they are not to be equalled by any thing of the paſtoral kind in "the Engliſh language (e)." There are Critics who do not think the Eclogues to be deficient in the delineation of Oriental manners [B].

[A] A repoſitory in which ſeveral eminent men have begun their literary career.] Mr. Collins's firſt production was as follows:

To Miſs AURELIA C———R,

On her weeping at her Siſter's Wedding.

Ceaſe, fair Aurelia, ceaſe to mourn;
Lament not Hannah's happy ſtate;
You may be happy in your turn,
And ſeize the treaſure you regret.

With love united Hymen ſtands,
And ſoftly whiſpers to your charms;
"Meet but your lover in my bands,
"You'll find your ſiſter in his arms (1)."

[B] Who do not think the eclogues to be deficient in the delineation of Oriental manners.] In proof of our aſſertion, and of the beauty of the eclogues, we ſhall lay before our readers the account which was given of them in the Monthly Review, when they were republiſhed, in 1757.

"Although theſe Eclogues are evidently of Britiſh original, they contain many of thoſe bold figures with which the poetry of the Eaſt abounds. The thoughts are appropriated, the images wild and local, the language correct, and the verſification harmonious. They are four in number. The firſt is called Selim, or the Shepherd's Moral; the ſcene lies in a valley near Bagdat; the time, morning. This Eclogue is not more remarkable for the morality of its ſentiments, than for the perſonifications it gives us of Modeſty, Chaſtity, Meekneſs, Pity, and Love. The ſecond Eclogue is intituled, Haſſan, or the Camel-Driver. The Poet here artfully lays the ſcene in the Deſart, and makes mid-day the time. With what ſtrength of colouring is the beginning of this piece wrought up!

In ſilent horror o'er the boundleſs waſte
The driver HASSAN with his camels paſt.
One cruiſe of water on his back he bore,
And his light ſcrip contain'd a ſcanty ſtore;
A fan of painted feathers in his hand,
To guard his ſhaded face from ſcorching ſand.
The ſultry ſun had gain'd the middle ſky,
And not a tree, and not an herb was nigh;
The beaſts, with pain, their duſty way purſue,
Shrill roar'd the winds, and dreary was the view!
With deſp'rate ſorrow wild, th' affrighted man
Thrice ſigh'd, thrice ſtrook his breaſt, and thus began:
"Sad was the hour, and luckleſs was the day,
"When firſt from Schiraz' walls I bent my way!"—&c.

In 1744, Mr. Collins quitted Oxford, and came to London a literary adventurer, with many projects in his head, and very little money in his pocket. He designed a variety of works; but his great fault was irresolution; besides which, the frequent calls of necessity might break his schemes, and not suffer him to pursue any settled purpose. "A "man doubtful of his dinner, says Dr. Johnson, or trembling at a creditor, is not much "disposed to abstracted meditation, or remote enquiries. He published proposals for a "History of the Revival of Learning; and I have heard him speak with great kindness "of Leo the Tenth, and with keen resentment of his tasteless successor. But probably "not a page of the history was ever written. He planned several Tragedies, but he "only planned them (f)." At times, however, his poetical genius triumphed over his indolence; in consequence of which he published, in 1746, his "Odes descriptive and allegorical." The success of this publication was inferior to that of the Oriental Eclogues. Mr. Millar, the Bookseller, gave the author a handsome price, as things were then estimated, for the copy of the Odes; but the sale of them was not sufficient to pay the expence of printing. Mr. Collins, justly offended at the bad taste of the public, as soon as it was in his power, returned Mr. Millar the copy-money, indemnified him for the loss he had sustained, and consigned the unsold part of the impression to the flames (g). Highly as Mr. Collins's Odes deserved a superior fate [C], it is not surprizing that they were

The other parts of the poem are not less finished. In particular, what Reader does not shudder, with Hassan, at the following description?

At that dead hour the silent asp shall creep,
If ought of rest I find, upon my sleep:
Or some swoln serpent twist his scales around,
And wake to anguish with a burning wound.
Thrice happy they, the wise contented poor,
From lust of wealth, and dread of death secure!
They tempt no deserts, and no griefs they find.——

And who is not melted with the account he gives of his parting from his mistress?

O hapless youth! for she thy love hath won,
The tender Zara, will be most undone!
Big swell'd my heart, and own'd the pow'rful maid,
When fast she dropt her tears, as thus she said:
"Farewel the youth whom sighs could not detain,
"Whom Zara's breaking heart implor'd in vain!
"Yet as thou go'st, may ev'ry blast arise,
"Weak and unfelt as these rejected sighs!
"Safe o'er the wild, no perils mayst thou see,
"No griefs endure, nor weep, false youth, like me."
O let me safely to the fair return,
Say with a kiss, she must not, shall not mourn;
O! let me teach my heart to lose its fears,
Recall'd by Wisdom's voice, and Zara's tears.

He said, and call'd on Heav'n to bless the day,
When back to Schiraz's walls he bent his way.

The third Eclogue is not the least beautiful of the four; it is named Abra, or the Georgian Sultana. The scene is placed in the forest; the time evening.

In Georgia's land, where Tefflis's tow'rs are seen,
In distant view along the level green,
While ev'ning dews enrich the glitt'ring glade,
And the tall forests cast a longer shade,
What time 'tis sweet o'er fields of rice to stray,
Or scent the breathing maze at setting day;
Amidst the maids of Zagen's peaceful grove,
Emyra sung the pleasing cares of love.

To do, however, justice to this, we should be obliged to transcribe the whole, which abounds with an elegant rural simplicity. If this Eclogue presents us with a pleasing picture of pastoral felicity, the fourth and last terrifies us with a lively one of Eastern desolation. The Poet introduces two Circassian shepherds, flying at midnight from their country, which the savage Tartars are supposed to have successfully invaded. Sicander being wearied with the length of his flight, thus addresses his friend on the steep side of a mountain.

O stay thee, Agib, for my feet deny,
No longer friendly to my life, to fly.
Friend of my heart, O turn thee and survey,
Trace our sad flight thro' all its length of way!
And first review that long-extended plain,
And yon wide groves, already past with pain!
Yon ragged cliff, whose dang'rous path we try'd!
And last this lofty mountain's weary side (2)!"

Dr. Langhorne hath likewise, distinctly illustrated the beauties of the Eclogues (3).

[C] Highly as Mr. Collins's Odes deserved a far superior fate.] The subjects of the Odes descriptive and allegorical were as follows: Ode to Pity. Ode to Fear. Ode to Simplicity. Ode on the Poetical Character. Ode, written in the Year 1746. Ode to Mercy. Ode to Liberty. Ode to a Lady, on the Death of Colonel Charles Ross in the Action at Fontenoy; written in May, 1745. Ode to Evening. Ode to Peace. The Manners, an Ode. The Passions, an Ode for Music. The Criticism upon these Odes, in the Monthly Review, is so much to their honour, and is in itself so just and masterly, that we shall not scruple to insert it.

"If a luxuriance of imagination, a wild sublimity of fancy, and a felicity of expression so extraordinary, that it might be supposed to be suggested by some superior power, rather than to be the effect of human judgment, or capacity—if these are allowed to constitute the excellence of lyric poetry, the author of the Odes descriptive and allegorical, will indisputably bear away the palm from all his Competitors in that province of the Muse.

Twelve of Mr. Collins's Odes are printed in this Collection of his works, the first of which is an Ode to Pity.

The measure of this Ode is happily chosen, for the repetition of melody is calculated to express that tenderness and pathos which must be inseparable from an Ode to Pity:

By Pella's Bard, a magic name,
By all the griefs his thought could frame,
Receive my humble rite:
Long, Pity, let the nations view
Thy sky-worn robes of tenderest blue,
And eyes of dewy light.

An ordinary Painter would have been contented to represent the eyes of Pity as languishing and mild—the dewy light was a stroke which the happiest imagination alone could execute.

In writing an Ode on a subject of tenderness, the Poet could not possibly omit to mention his countryman Otway, who was indeed the Priest of Pity, like Collins ingenious, and like him unhappy:

But wherefore need I wander wide
To old Ilissus' distant side,
Deserted stream, and mute?
Wild Arun too has heard thy strains,
And Echo 'midst my native plains,
Been sooth'd by Pity's lute:

were not popular, at their firſt appearance. Allegorical and abſtracted poetry was above the taſte of the times, and will ever be above the taſte of the bulk of readers. Dr. Langhorne

There firſt the wren thy myrtles ſhed
On gentleſt Otway's infant-head,
To him thy cell was ſhewn;
And while he ſung the female heart,
With youth's ſoft notes unſpoil'd by art,
Thy turtles mix'd their own.

The Ode to Fear is ſo nervous, ſo expreſſive, and ſo pictureſque throughout, that we have ſeen no lyric performance ſuperior to it in the Engliſh language. Thus it begins:

Thou, to whom the world unknown
With all its ſhadowy ſhapes is ſhewn;
Who ſeeſt appall'd th' unreal ſcene,
While Fancy lifts the veil between:
Ah Fear! ah frantic Fear!
I ſee, I ſee thee near.
I know thy hurried ſtep, thy haggard eye!
Like thee I ſtart, like thee diſordered fly,
For, lo! what monſters in thy train appear!

The abbreviation of the meaſure in the fifth and ſixth verſes is moſt nervouſly expreſſive, and moſt happily adapted to the ſuddenneſs of the motion excited. Danger, which is properly introduced as a perſonage in the train of Fear, is ſo characteriſtically deſcribed, that there is no looking upon the picture without horror:

Danger, whoſe limbs of giant-mold,
What mortal eye can fix'd behold?
Who ſtalks his round, an hideous form,
Howling amidſt the midnight ſtorm,
Or throws him on the ridgy ſteep
Of ſome looſe hanging rock to ſleep.

Certainly it is not in the power of human invention to produce an image of greater force and propriety than that which is exhibited in the two laſt quoted verſes, where danger is repreſented as ſleeping on the looſely-hanging rock of a precipice. The dreadful Beings that attend him are deſcribed with equal ſtrength of imagination:

And with him thouſand phantoms join'd,
Who prompt to deeds accurs'd the mind:
And thoſe, the fiends, who near allied,
O'er Nature's wounds and wrecks preſide:
While Vengeance in the lurid air,
Lifts her red arm, expos'd and bare;
On whom that ravening brood of Fate,
Who lap the blood of Sorrow, wait;
Who, Fear, this ghaſtly train can ſee,
And look not madly wild, like thee?

The eſſential part which Fear bears in the drama, could not be overlooked by an Imagination like that of Mr. Collins, and he very properly refers to its effects on the Grecian theatre:

In earlieſt Greece to thee, with partial choice,
The grief-full Muſe addreſs'd her infant tongue:
The maids and matrons, on her awful voice,
Silent and pale in wild amazement hung.
O Fear, I know thee by my throbbing heart,
Thy withering power inſpir'd each mournful line;
Tho' gentle Pity claim'd her mingled part,
Yet all the thunders of the ſcene are thine.

In the Antiſtrophe, which concludes this inimitable Ode, Fear is thus addreſſed:

Say, wilt thou ſhroud in haunted cell,
Where gloomy Rape and Murder dwell?
Or in ſome hallow'd ſeat,
'Gainſt which the big waves beat,
Hear drowning ſeamen's cries in tempeſts brought.

After this he alludes to a ſcenery and a ſuperſtition common in ſome parts of England, which has great poetical propriety in an Ode to Fear: we mean the ſuperſtition of St. Mark's eve:

Ne'er be I found, by thee o'eraw'd,
On that thrice hallow'd eve abroad,
When ghoſts, as cottage-maids believe,
Their pebbled beds, permitted, leave,
And goblins haunt, from fire or fen,
Or mine, or flood, the works of men!

The alluſions to ſcenes of ancient Enthuſiaſm and Poetry, in the Ode to Simplicity, are happily deſigned, and delightfully expreſſed:

By all the honey'd ſtore
On Hybla's thymy ſhore;
By all her blooms, and mingled murmurs dear,
By her whoſe love-lorn woe,
In evening muſings ſlow,
Sooth'd ſweetly-ſad Electra's Poet's ear:

By old Cephiſus deep,
Who ſpread his wavy ſweep,
In warbled wanderings round thy green retreat,
On whoſe enamel'd ſide,
When holy Freedom died,
No equal haunt allur'd thy future feet.

O ſiſter meek of Truth,
To my admiring youth,
Thy ſober aid, and native charms infuſe!
The flowers that ſweeteſt breathe,
Tho' Beauty cull'd the wreath,
Still aſk thy hand to range their order'd hues.

Simplicity is eſſentially neceſſary to the perfection of every poetical work; and Mr. Collins has borne witneſs, by all his performances, but particularly by his Oriental Eclogues, to the truth of the following ſtanza:

Tho' Taſte, tho' Genius bleſs,
To ſome divine exceſs,
Faint's the cold work, 'till thou inſpire the whole;
What each, what all ſupply,
May court, may charm the eye,
Thou, only thou canſt raiſe the meeting ſoul.

After this, how much in character is the next ſtanza, with which the Ode concludes?

Of theſe let others aſk,
To aid ſome mighty taſk,
I only ſeek to find thy temperate vale:
Where oft my reed might ſound
To maids, and ſhepherds round,
And all thy ſons, O Nature, learn my tale.

The Ode on the poetical Character is ſo extremely wild and extravagant, that it ſeems to have been written wholly during the tyranny of imagination. Some, however, there are, whoſe congenial ſpirits may keep pace with the Poet in his moſt excentric flights, and from ſome of his caſual ſtrokes may catch thoſe ſublime ideas which, like him, they have experienced, but have never been able to expreſs—Some, to whom Fancy

The ceſt of ampleſt power has given:
To whom the godlike gift aſſigns,
To gaze her viſions wild, and feel unmix'd her flame.

But poetry ſo entirely abſtracted, can only be entertaining to the few. The little Ode which follows this, and which is ſaid to have been written in the beginning of the year 1746, will be more generally pleaſing, as it is equally beautiful and ſimple:

How ſleep the brave, who ſink to reſt,
With all their country's wiſhes bleſt!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallow'd mold,
She there ſhall dreſs a ſweeter ſod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

Langhorne juſtly obſerves, that "it is in the lower walks, the plain and practical paths of "the Muſes only, that the generality of men can be entertained. The higher efforts of "imagination are above their capacity (b)."

(b) Memoirs of Mr. Collins, ubi ſupra, p. xi, xii.

Whilſt

By fairy-hands their knell is rung,
By forms unſeen their dirge is ſung;
There Honour comes, a Pilgrim grey,
To bleſs the turf that wraps their clay.
And Freedom ſhall a while repair,
To dwell a weeping Hermit there.

The Strophe in the Ode to Mercy affords the fineſt ſubject for a picture that imagination can form:

O thou, who ſit'ſt a ſmiling bride,
By Valour's arm'd and awful ſide,
Gentleſt of ſky-born forms, and beſt ador'd:
Who oft with ſongs, divine to hear,
Win'ſt from his fatal graſp the ſpear,
And hid'ſt in wreaths of flowers his bloodleſs ſword!

There is ſomething perfectly claſſical in Mr. Collins's manner, both with reſpect to his imagery and his compoſition; and Horace's rule of ut Pictura Poeſis, was never better obſerved than in the above-quoted verſes.

The ſame ſtyle of painting, though ſomewhat bolder, characteriſes the Ode to Liberty:

Who ſhall awake the Spartan fife,
And call in ſolemn ſounds to life,
The youths whoſe locks divinely ſpreading,
Like vernal hyacinths in ſullen hue,
At once the breath of fear and virtue ſhedding,
Applauding Freedom lov'd of old to view?

The Poet, after theſe lines, refers to that beautiful fragment of Alcoeus:

εν μυρϑε κλαδι, &c.

which, together with a tranſlation, the Reader will find in the firſt article of our review for October, 1762.

The ruin of the Liberties and of the State of Rome are deſcribed in a moſt picturesque and pathetic manner:

No, Freedom, no: I will not tell,
How Rome, before thy weeping face,
With heavieſt ſound, a giant ſtatue fell.
Puſh'd by a wild, and artleſs race,
From off its wide, ambitious baſe,
When time his northern ſons of ſpoil awoke,
And all the blended work of ſtrength and grace,
With many a rude, repeated ſtroke,
And many a barbarous yell to thouſand fragments broke.

The ancient tradition that there was formerly a temple of Liberty in Britain, awakes, at once, the enthuſiaſm, and the patriotiſm of our liberal Bard. Hear with what rapture he dwells upon the thought:

Then too, 'tis ſaid, an hoary pile,
'Midſt the green navel of our iſle,
Thy ſhrine in ſome religious wood,
O ſoul-enforcing Goddeſs, ſtood!
There, oft the painted natives feet
Were wont thy form celeſtial meet:
Tho' now with hopeleſs toil we trace
Time's backward rolls, to find its place;
Whether the fiery-treſſed Dane,
Or Roman's ſelf o'erturn'd the Fane,
Or in what heaven-left age it fell,
'Twere hard for modern ſong to tell.
Yet ſtill, if Truth thoſe beams infuſe,
Which guide at once, and charm the Muſe,
Beyond yon braided clouds that lie
Paving the light-embroider'd ſky:
Amidſt the bright pavilion'd plains
The beauteous model ſtill remains.
There happier than in iſlands bleſt,
Or bowers by Spring or Hebe dreſt,
The Chiefs who fill our Albion's ſtory,
With warlike deeds, retir'd in glory,
Hear their conſorted Druids ſing
Their triumphs to th' immortal ſtring.

In the Paſſions, an Ode for Muſic, (which, if we are not miſtaken, was ſometime ago ſet by Dr. Hayes) the emotions of the ſoul are deſcribed, and the movements of the verſe adapted to them with equal happineſs:

But thou, O Hope, with eyes ſo fair,
What was thy delighted meaſure?
Still it whiſper'd promis'd pleaſure,
And bad the lovely ſcenes at diſtance hail!
Still would her touch the ſtrain prolong,
And from the rocks, the woods, the vale,
She call'd on Echo ſtill thro' all her ſong;
And where her ſweeteſt theme ſhe choſe,
A ſoft reſponſive voice was heard at every cloſe,
And Hope enchanted ſmil'd and waved her golden hair.

The force of the following ſtanza muſt be univerſally felt:

First Fear his hand, its ſkill to try,
Amid the chords, bewilder'd, laid,
And back recoil'd he knew not why,
Even at the ſound himſelf had made.

It is with peculiar pleaſure that we do this juſtice to a Poet who was too great to be popular, and whoſe genius was neglected, becauſe it was above the common taſte (4)."

(4) Monthly Review, vol. xxx. p. 21—26.

We cannot deny ourſelves the pleaſure of inſerting the Ode upon the Paſſions at full length.

When Muſic, heavenly maid, was young,
While yet in early Greece ſhe ſung,
The Paſſions oft, to hear her ſhell,
Throng'd around her magic cell,
Exulting, trembling, raging, fainting,
Poſſeſt beyond the Muſe's painting;
By turns they felt the glowing mind
Diſturb'd, delighted, rais'd, refin'd.
Till once, 'tis ſaid, when all were fir'd,
Fill'd with fury, rapt, inſpir'd,
From the ſupporting myrtles round
They ſnatch'd her inſtruments of ſound,
And as they oft had heard apart
Sweet leſſons of her forceful art,
Each, for madneſs rul'd the hour,
Would prove his own expreſſive power.

First Fear his hand, its ſkill to try,
Amid the chords bewilder'd laid,
And back recoil'd, he knew not why,
Even at the ſound himſelf had made.

Next Anger ruſh'd, his eyes on fire,
In lightnings own'd his ſecret ſtings,
In one rude claſh he ſtruck the lyre,
And ſwept with hurried hand the ſtrings.

With woeful meaſures wan Deſpair——
Low ſullen ſounds his grief beguil'd,
A ſolemn, ſtrange, and mingled air,
'Twas ſad by fits, by ſtarts 'twas wild.

But thou, O Hope, with eyes ſo fair,
What was thy delighted meaſure?
Still it whiſper'd promis'd pleaſure,
And bad the lovely ſcenes at diſtance hail!
Still would her touch the ſtrain prolong,
And from the rocks, the woods, the vale,
She call'd on Echo ſtill thro' all the ſong;
And where her ſweeteſt theme ſhe choſe,
A ſoft reſponſive voice was heard at every cloſe,
And Hope enchanted ſmil'd, and wav'd her golden hair.
And longer had ſhe ſung,—but, with a frown,
Revenge impatient roſe,

He

Whilſt Mr. Collins reſided in London, Dr. Johnſon fell into his company. "His appearance, ſays the Doctor, was decent and manly; his knowledge conſiderable, his "views extenſive, his converſation elegant. By degrees I gained his confidence; and "one day was admitted to him when he was immured by a Bailiff, that was prowling in "the ſtreet. On this occaſion recourſe was had to the Bookſellers; who, on the credit "of a tranſlation of Ariſtotle's Poeticks, which he engaged to write, with a large com-"mentary, advanced as much money as enabled him to eſcape into the country. He "ſhewed me the guineas ſafe in his hand (i)." Not long after this event, Mr. Collins found ſome conſolation in changing the ſcene, and viſiting his uncle, Lieutenant-Colonel Martin, who was then with the Britiſh army in Flanders. In a little time the Colonel died, and left his nephew about two thouſand pounds; a ſum which our Poet could ſcarcely think exhauſtible, and which he did not live to exhauſt. One of the firſt things he did after his uncle's deceaſe, was to repay the money he had obtained from the Bookſellers, on the credit of tranſlating Ariſtotle's Poeticks; for he no longer thought of performing that engagement. Mr. Collins's acceſſion of fortune came too late to be of any eſſential ſervice to him. His faculties had been ſo long harraſſed by anxiety, diſſipation, and diſtreſs, that he fell into a nervous diſorder, which brought with it an unconquerable depreſſion of ſpirits, and at length reduced the fineſt underſtanding to the moſt deplorable childiſhneſs. His diſorder was not alienation of mind, but general laxity and feebleneſs, a deficiency rather of vital than intellectual powers. What he ſpoke wanted neither judgment nor ſpirit: but a few minutes exhauſted him, ſo that he was forced to reſt upon the couch, till a ſhort ceſſation reſtored his powers, and he was again able to talk with his former vigour. When he felt the approaches of this dreadful malady, with the uſual

(i) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 311.

He threw his blood-ſtain'd ſword in thunder down,
And, with a withering look,
The war-denouncing trumpet took,
And blew a blaſt ſo loud and dread,
Were ne'er prophetic ſounds ſo full of woe.
And ever and anon he beat
The doubling drum with furious heat;
And tho' ſometimes, each dreary pauſe between,
Dejected Pity at his ſide,
Her ſoul-ſubduing voice applied,
Yet ſtill he kept his wild unalter'd mien,
While each ſtrain'd ball of ſight ſeem'd burſting from his head.
Thy numbers, Jealouſy, to nought were fix'd,
Sad proof of thy diſtreſsful ſtate,
Of differing themes the veering ſong was mix'd,
And now it courted Love, now raving call'd on Hate.

With eyes uprais'd, as one inſpir'd,
Pale Melancholy ſat retir'd,
And from her wild ſequeſter'd ſeat,
In notes by diſtance made more ſweet,
Pour'd thro' the mellow Horn her penſive ſoul:
And daſhing ſoft from rocks around,
Bubbling runnels join'd the ſound;
Thro' glades and glooms the mingled meaſure ſtole,
Or o'er ſome haunted ſtreams with fond delay,
Round an holy calm diffuſing,
Love of peace, and lonely muſing,
In hollow murmurs died away.
But O, how alter'd was its ſprightlier tone!
When Chearfulneſs, a nymph of healthieſt hue,
Her bow acroſs her ſhoulder flung,
Her buſkins gemm'd with morning dew,
Blew an inſpiring air, that dale and thicket rung,
The hunter's call to Faun and Dryad known;
The oak-crown'd Siſters, and their chaſte-eyed queen,
Satyrs and ſylvan boys were ſeen,
Peeping from forth their alleys green;
Brown Exerciſe rejoic'd to hear,
And Sport leapt up, and ſeiz'd his beechen ſpear.
Laſt came Joy's ecſtatic trial,
He with viny crown advancing,
Firſt to the lively pipe his hand addreſt,
But ſoon he ſaw the briſk awakening viol,
Whoſe ſweet entrancing voice he lov'd the beſt.
They would have thought, who heard the ſtrain,
They ſaw in Tempe's vale her native maids,
Amidſt the feſtal ſounding ſhades,
To ſome unwearied minſtrel dancing,
While, as his flying fingers kiſs'd the ſtrings,
Love fram'd with Mirth, a gay fantaſtic round,
Looſe were her treſſes ſeen, her zone unbound,
And he, amidſt his frolic play,
As if he would the charming air repay,
Shook thouſand odours from his dewy wings.

O Muſic, ſphere-deſcended maid,
Friend of pleaſure, wiſdom's aid,
Why, Goddeſs, why to us denied?
Lay'ſt thou thy ancient lyre aſide?
As in that lov'd Athenian bower,
You learn'd an all-commanding power,
Thy mimic ſoul, O nymph endear'd,
Can well recall what then it heard.
Where is thy native ſimple heart,
Devote to virtue, fancy, art?
Ariſe, as in that elder time,
Warm, energic, chaſte, ſublime!
Thy wonders, in that god-like age,
Fill thy recording Siſter's page—
'Tis ſaid, and I believe the tale,
Thy humbleſt Reed could more prevail,
Had more of ſtrength, diviner rage,
Than all which charms this laggard age,
Even all at once together found
Cæcilia's mingled world of ſound —
O bid our vain endeavours ceaſe,
Revive the juſt deſigns of Greece,
Return in all thy ſimple ſtate!
Confirm the tales her ſons relate (5)!"

"If the muſic, ſays Dr. Langhorne, which was "compoſed for this Ode, had equal merit with the "Ode itſelf, it muſt have been the moſt excellent "performance of the kind, in which poetry and "muſic have, in modern times, united. Other "pieces of the ſame nature have derived their great-"eſt reputation from the perfection of the muſic that "accompanied them, having in themſelves little "more merit than that of an ordinary ballad: but "in this we have the whole ſoul and power of poetry "——Expreſſion that, even without the aid of muſic, "ſtrikes to the heart; and imagery of power enough "to tranſport the attention, without the forceful al-"liance of correſponding ſounds. What, then, muſt "have been the effect of theſe united!" The Doctor, after illuſtrating ſome of the peculiar beauties of the Poem, concludes with obſerving, that, "upon the "whole, there may be very little hazard in aſſerting, "that this is the fineſt Ode in the Engliſh lan-"guage (6)." In the collection of Collins's works, there are two poems we have not yet mentioned. Theſe are, a Dirge in Cymbeline, and an Ode on the death of Mr. Thomſon, both of which are very beautiful. The Epiſtle to Sir Thomas Hanmer is the leaſt intereſting of our author's productions. We ſcarcely need to inform our readers, that his various excellencies as a Poet are particularly marked out by Dr. Langhorne.

weakneſs of men ſo diſeaſed, he eagerly ſnatched that temporary relief with which the table and the bottle flatter and ſeduce. But his health continually declined, and he grew more and more burthenſome to himſelf. Having continued, with ſhort intervals, in this pitiable ſtate, till the year 1756, he died in the arms of his ſiſter. In his laſt illneſs, he ſhewed to Dr. Joſeph and Mr. Thomas Warton, an Ode, inſcribed to Mr. John Hume, on the Superſtition of the Highlands; which they thought ſuperior to his other works, but which no ſearch has yet found (k).

Not long after our Poet's deceaſe, the following character of him was drawn up by Dr. Johnſon: "Mr. Collins was a man of extenſive literature, and of vigorous faculties. "He was acquainted not only with the learned tongues, but with the Italian, French, "and Spaniſh languages. He had employed his mind chiefly upon works of fiction, and "ſubjects of fancy; and, by indulging ſome peculiar habits of thought, was eminently "delighted with thoſe flights of imagination which paſs the bounds of nature, and to "which the mind is reconciled only by a paſſive acquieſcence in popular traditions. He "loved Fairies, Genii, Giants, and Monſters; he delighted to rove through the meanders "of inchantment, to gaze on the magnificence of golden palaces, to repoſe by the wa-"terfalls of Elyſian gardens. This was, however, the character rather of his inclination "than his genius. The grandeur of wildneſs, and the novelty of extravagance, were al-"ways deſired by him, but were not always attained. Yet as diligence is never wholly "loſt, if his efforts ſometimes cauſed harſhneſs and obſcurity, they likewiſe produced, in "happier moments, ſublimity and ſplendour. This idea, which he had formed of excel-"lence, led him to Oriental fictions, and allegorical imagery; and, perhaps, while he "was intent upon deſcription, he did not ſufficiently cultivate ſentiment. His poems are "the productions of a mind not deficient in fire, nor unfurniſhed with knowledge either "of books or life, but ſomewhat obſtructed in its progreſs by deviation in queſt of miſ-"taken beauties.

"His morals were pure, and his opinions pious. In a long continuance of poverty, and "long habits of diſſipation, it cannot be expected that any character ſhould be exactly "uniform. There is a degree of want by which the freedom of agency is almoſt de-"ſtroyed; and long aſſociation with fortuitous companions will at laſt relax the ſtrictneſs "of truth, and abate the fervour of ſincerity. That this man, wiſe and virtuous as he "was, paſſed always unentangled through the ſnares of life, it would be prejudice and "temerity to affirm. But it may be ſaid, that at leaſt he preſerved the ſource of action "unpolluted, that his principles were never ſhaken, that his diſtinctions of right and "wrong were never confounded; and that his faults had nothing of malignity or deſign, "but proceeded from ſome unexpected preſſure, or caſual temptation.

"The latter part of his life cannot be remembered but with pity and ſadneſs. He lan-"guiſhed ſome years under that depreſſion of mind which enchains the faculties without "deſtroying them, and leaves reaſon the knowledge of right, without the power of pur-"ſuing it. Theſe clouds, which he found gathering on his intellects, he endeavoured to "diſperſe by travel, and paſſed into France, but found himſelf conſtrained to yield to his "malady, and returned. He was for ſome time confined in a houſe of lunatics, and "afterwards retired to the care of his ſiſter in Chicheſter, where death, in 1756, came "to his relief.

"After his return from France, the writer of this character paid him a viſit at Iſlington, "where he was waiting for his ſiſter, whom he had directed to meet him: there was "then nothing of diſorder diſcernible in his mind by any but himſelf; but he had with-"drawn from ſtudy, and travelled with no other book than an Engliſh Teſtament, ſuch as "children carry to the ſchool: when his friend took it into his hand, out of curioſity to "ſee what companion a man of letters had choſen, 'I have but one book,' ſays Collins, "but that is the beſt (l)."

To this character Dr. Johnſon hath ſince added, that Mr. Collins's diction was often harſh, unſkilfully laboured, and injudiciouſly ſelected. "He affected, ſays the Doctor, "the obſolete, when it was not worthy of revival; and he puts his words out of the "common order, ſeeming to think, with ſome later candidates for fame, that not to "write proſe is certainly to write poetry. His lines commonly are of ſlow motion, clogged "and impeded with cluſters of conſonants. As men are often eſteemed who cannot be "loved, ſo the poetry of Collins may ſometimes extort praiſe when it gives little "pleaſure (m)."

(m) Ibid. p. 315, 316.

That Dr. Johnſon's eſtimate of the genius and writings of Mr. Collins is too ſevere, will be allowed by moſt readers. A very different opinion of his poetical excellence is maintained in the notes [B] and [C]; and other teſtimonies may be produced to the ſame purpoſe, from Critics of undoubted reputation. Mr. Thomas Warton, ſpeaking of Collins, calls him his lamented friend, "whoſe Odes will be remembered while any taſte for "true poetry remains (n)." "The genius of Collins, ſays Mr. Knox, ſeems in ſome "meaſure to have reſembled that of Tickell. Dignity, ſolemnity, and pathos, are the "ſtriking features of his compoſitions. None but a true Poet could have written the "Song over Fidele in Shakſpeare's Cymbeline (o)." Mr. Potter, treating of the Ode, aſſerts, (n) Hiſtory of Poetry, vol. ii. p. 361. note.

(o) Knox's Eſſays, moral and literary, vol. ii. p. 379. Edition of 1782.

aſſerts, that Collins was the firſt of our Poets who reached its excellence. "His mind "was impreſſed with a tender melancholy, but without any mixture of that ſullen gloom "which deadens its powers: it led him to the ſofteſt ſympathy, that moſt refined feeling "of the human heart. His faculties were vigorous, and his genius truly ſublime: his "ſtyle is cloſe and ſtrong, and his numbers in general harmonious. He was well ac-"quainted with Æſchylus and Euripides, and drew deep from their fountains. His "thoughts had a romantic caſt, and his imagination a certain wild grandeur, which ſome-"times perhaps approaches to the borders of extravagance; but this led him to deſcrip-"tions and allegories wonderfully poetical: ſuch, for inſtance, is the antiſtrophe in his "Ode to Liberty, and the firſt part of his Ode to Fear: Æſchylus himſelf has not a "bolder conception, and the grandeur of thought is as greatly expreſſed. Dr. Johnſon "ſpeaks of this ſublime Poet with a tenderneſs which reflects honour on himſelf: he al-"lows him ſometimes to have ſublimity and ſplendour; but in the coldneſs of criticiſm "expreſſes ſome diſapprobation of his allegorical imagery, and is unjuſt to his harmony (p)."

(p) Potter's Inquiry into ſome Paſſages in Dr. Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, p. 15.

Though we agree with theſe ingenious Critics, in giving a much higher rank to Collins as a Poet than Dr. Johnſon ſeems willing to allow him, and though we condemn the exceſs to which the Doctor's ſtrictures are carried, it muſt be acknowledged, that they are not in every reſpect deſtitute of foundation. Mr. Collins is occaſionally, though not frequently, harſh in his numbers: his perſonifications appear, in a few inſtances, to be multiplied beyond juſt cauſe; and he is ſometimes blameably obſcure. Of the laſt fault, his Ode on the Poetical Character is a ſtriking example. But when every poſſible deduction is made from his merit, he will ſtill ſtand entitled to a very large proportion of praiſe; and his Ode on the Paſſions muſt ever be joined with Dryden's St. Cecilia, and Gray's Bard, as among the boldeſt and brighteſt efforts of the Lyric Muſe.

We ſhall conclude this article with a Sonnet from Dr. Langhorne's "Viſions of Fancy;" and we inſert it with the greater pleaſure, as it hints at the moral which is deducible from the life of our unfortunate Poet.

 [COLLINSON (PETER), * an excellent Citizen, a diſtinguiſhed Naturaliſt and Antiquary, and a zealous promoter of uſeful knowledge, was born on the 14th of January, 1693-4 (a). The family from which he deſcended had long been ſeated in the North of England; and his great-grandfather, who was of the ſame chriſtian name with himſelf, lived on his paternal eſtate, called Hugal-Hall, or Height of Hugal, near Windermere-Lake, in the pariſh of Stavely, about ten miles from Kendal in Weſtmoreland. What was his father's profeſſion, or where he inhabited, cannot be fully aſcertained; and we are equally incapable of determining at what place young Collinſon received the firſt rudiments of his education. Being intended for trade, he does not appear to have had any great degree of inſtruction in the learned languages. The buſineſs in which he was brought up, was that of a wholeſale dealer, in what is called man's mercery; and he had a brother, James, who ſeems to have been bred to the ſame buſineſs. It is ſuppoſed, that man's mercery was the employment of their father. At a proper age, the two brothers engaged in trade as partners, and this was a happy circumſtance for both of them; becauſe, as they lived in entire harmony, and their occupation did not require their preſence together, each of them had leiſure to attend to his particular ſtudies and purſuits, whether of pleaſure or improvement (b). Mr. Peter Collinſon had diſcovered, from his youth, a ſtrong attachment to Natural Hiſtory. The examination of inſects, and their ſeveral metamorphoſes, employed many of thoſe hours which, at his time of life, are too frequently devoted to leſs innocent and leſs improving objects. Plants alſo engaged his attention, and he began very early to make dried ſpecimens. So diligent was his curioſity with reſpect to matters of this kind, that, whilſt he was yet a young man, he obtained the notice and eſteem of the moſt eminent Naturaliſts of the age. Derham, Woodward, Dale, Lloyd, and Sir Hans Sloane, honoured him with their acquaintance and their friendſhip. He had a particular intimacy with Sir Charles Wager, which which he converted to the purpoſes of ſcience. At the inſtigation of Mr. Collinſon, Sir Charles made it his buſineſs, in the courſe of his numerous voyages, to pick up a variety of curioſities, which did not a little contribute to enrich Sir Hans Sloane's collection. With the ſame kind and liberal view, Sir Charles Wager encouraged the commanders under him, who were ſtationed in different parts of the globe, to procure whatever was rare and valuable in the ſeveral branches of Natural Hiſtory. Among the vaſt number of articles in Sir Hans Sloane's immenſe treaſury of nature, there were very few with which Mr. Collinſon was not well acquainted; his familiarity with Sir Hans being ſuch, that he viſited him at all times, and continued to do ſo till his death (c). To the other friends which Mr. Collinſon's ſcientific attainments procured him, though at a later period, muſt be added John, Earl of Bute; a nobleman who has now been long known in the world for his ſkill in botany, his diſtinguiſhed encouragement of that part of philoſophy, and his patronage of the liberal arts in general (d).

(d) From the information of Michael Collinſon, Eſq.

It was not to Natural Hiſtory only that the knowledge of the gentleman who is the ſubject of the preſent article was confined. His acquaintance with the antiquities of his own country was very conſiderable. He was, therefore, well qualified to become a member of both the great literary inſtitutions with which London is adorned. Accordingly, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, in December 1728, being then nearly thirty-five years of age. To the Society of Antiquaries he had the honour of belonging from its firſt inſtitution (e). How diligent and uſeful a member he was of the Royal Society, is apparent from many parts of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, to which we refer ſuch of our readers as are deſirous of obtaining a more particular view of his zeal in extending the boundaries of ſcience. Beſides his perſonal communications, which were curious and valuable, he promoted and preſerved a moſt extenſive correſpondence with the learned and ingenious of all countries. We ſhall only here take notice, that, in the fifty-firſt volume of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, Mr. Collinſon, in a letter to the Honourable J. Th. Klein, Secretary to the City of Dantzick, has maintained the opinion of the migration of ſwallows, in oppoſition to that gentleman, who inſiſted that they are not birds of paſſage, but that, at the time of their going away, they retire under the water, and live therein all the winter. This hypotheſis Mr. Collinſon regards as incongruous to nature and reaſon, and urges the authority of Sir Charles Wager, one Captain Wright, and Mr. Adanſon, as eye-witneſſes of the travels of ſwallows (f). We have the rather been led to the mention of the controverſy, as our author's ſentiments have been ingeniouſly and ably oppoſed by Mr. Daines Barrington, firſt, in the ſixty-ſecond volume of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, and ſince, with conſiderable additions, in the late publication of his Miſcellanies (g).

Mr. Collinſon was not a little zealous, as a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, to promote the ends of the inſtitution. One diſtinguiſhed teſtimony of his attention in this reſpect, is his paper relating to the round tower at Ardmore in Ireland. There are ſeveral of theſe towers in that kingdom, and different opinions have been formed concerning the deſign for which they were conſtructed. Mr. Charles Smith, upon the authority of ſome ancient Iriſh manuſcripts, maintains that they were uſed for impriſoning penitents, and with him Mr. Collinſon agrees. According to the manuſcripts, theſe penitents were placed in the uppermoſt ſtory of the tower, where having made probation, or done penance for a limited time, according to the heinouſneſs of their crimes, they then were permitted to deſcend to the next floor; and thus they proceeded by degrees, until they came to the door, which always faced the entrance of the church, where they ſtood to receive abſolution from the Clergy, and the bleſſings of the people (h). Plauſible as this account may appear, it has been ably controverted by Owen Saluſbury Brereton, Eſq; who thinks that the towers in queſtion were ancient Iriſh ſtructures, and that, from their ſituation near churches, and having a floor and windows only at the top, the principal uſe of them was to receive a perſon to call the people to worſhip, with ſome wind-inſtrument (i). Mr. Collinſon's extenſive correſpondence enabled him to procure, for the Society of Antiquaries, a relation of ſome very curious Tartarian antiquities (k). Wherever he was, or however ſeemingly engaged, nothing that deſerved notice at any time eſcaped him; and he minuted down every ſtriking hint that occurred to him either in reading or in company. With ſuch hints he was perhaps ſtill more furniſhed by converſation than from books; for there was ſcarcely a man of learning and ingenuity in England, of any profeſſion, with whom he was not acquainted. As to the foreigners who came into this country either for improvement or pleaſure, thoſe of them who were eminent for their knowledge in Natural Hiſtory, or for their proficiency in any art or ſcience, were conſtantly recommended to his friendly attentions. Among theſe was the celebrated Linnæus, with whom, during his reſidence in England, Mr. Collinſon contracted a peculiar intimacy, foſtered by congeniality of purſuits, and cemented and increaſed by a variety of reciprocal good offices. Their friendſhip continued unbroken, till it was interrupted by death. The numerous recommendations of foreigners to Mr. Collinſon were the natural reſult of his extenſive correſpondence, and did not a little contribute to enlarge it. In his obligations of this kind, he maintained the ſtricteſt punctuality. He acquainted the learned and ingenious in in distant quarters of the globe, with the discoveries and improvements that were here made in different branches of knowledge; and there is scarcely any part of the world from which he did not receive informations of a similar kind in return. From this various intelligence he had it in his power to promote, in several important respects, the honour and advantage of his native country (l).

In the year 1730, a subscription Library was begun at Philadelphia, in North-America, to which Mr. Collinson made a number of valuable presents, and procured others from his friends. As the Library Company had a considerable sum arising annually to be laid out in books, and needed a judicious friend in London to transact the business for them, he voluntarily and chearfully undertook that service, and executed it for more than thirty years successively. He not only assisted in the choice of books, but took upon himself the whole care of collecting and shipping them, without ever charging or accepting any consideration for his trouble. The success of this library, which was not a little owing to his kind countenance and good advice, encouraged the erection of others, in different places, on the same plan; so that, after some time, there were upwards of thirty subsisting in the several Colonies, which contributed greatly to the spreading of useful knowledge in that part of the world. The books recommended by him were all of the most valuable kind, and the catalogue of the first library was much respected and followed by those libraries that succeeded *. To the Directors of the Library at Philadelphia, among whom was Mr. Benjamin, now the famous Dr. Franklin, Mr. Collinson transmitted the earliest information of every European improvement in agriculture and the arts, and of every philosophical discovery. He sent over, in 1745, an account of some new experiments in electricity, that had lately been made in Germany, together with a glass tube, and proper directions with regard to the manner in which the experiments should be repeated. This was the first notice which Dr. Franklin had received on that curious subject; a subject which, being encouraged by the friendly reception Mr. Collinson gave to his letters concerning it, he has since prosecuted with a success that has rendered him eminent in all the countries of Europe (m), and, indeed, in every civilized part of the globe. Whatever different opinions may be formed of his political conduct, the Franklinian system of electricity will hand down his name, with great philosophical reputation, to the latest posterity.

Among other instances of Mr. Collinson's active zeal to promote the advantage of his country, we must not omit to mention the account which he procured, and published, of the management of sheep in Spain, with respect to their migration from the mountains to the plains, and back from the plains to the mountains [A]. Perhaps this account, in some

[A] The account which he procured, and published, of the management of sheep in Spain, &c.] Though this account hath already appeared in the Annual Register for 1764, and in the Gentleman's Magazine for the same year, it is so curious and entertaining, and may hereafter be of such great utility, that we rather expect the thanks, than the censure of our readers, for giving it a place in the present article.

"Account of the Sheep and Sheep-walks of Spain, in a Letter from a Gentleman in Spain, to Mr. Peter Collinson, F. R. S.

"SIR,

"There are two kinds of sheep in Spain. The coarse-wooled sheep, who remain all their lives in their native country, and who are housed every night in winter; and the fine-wooled sheep, who are all their lives in the open air, who travel every summer from the cool mountains of the northern parts of Spain, to feed all the winter on the southern warm plains of Andalousia, Manca, and Extremadura. From computations made with the utmost accuracy it has appeared, that there are five millions of fine-wooled sheep in Spain, and that the wool and flesh of a flock of ten thousand sheep produced yearly about twenty-four reals a head, which we will suppose to be nearly the value of twelve English sixpences; of these but one goes clear a head to the owner yearly, three sixpences a head go yearly to the king, and the other eight go to the expences of pasture, tithes, shepherds, dogs, salt, shearing, &c.

"Thus the annual product of the five millions of sheep amounts to thirty-seven millions and a half of sixpences, a little more or less, of which there are about three millions and a half for the owners; above fifteen millions enter into the treasury, and seven millions and a half go to the benefit of the public. Hence it is that the Kings of Spain call these flocks in their ordinances, the precious jewel of the crown.

"Formerly this jewel was really set in the crown. A succession of many kings were lords of all the flocks: hence that great number of ordinances, penal laws, privileges, and immunities which issued forth in different reigns for the preservation and special government of the sheep: hence a royal council was formed under the title of the council of the grand royal flock, which exists to this day, though the king has not a single sheep. Various exigencies of state, in different reigns, alienated by degrees the whole grand flock from the crown, together with all its privileges, which were collected and published in the year 1731, under the title of laws of the royal flock; a volume in large folio of above five hundred pages.

"The wars and wants of Philip the first's reign forced that king to sell forty thousand sheep to the marquis of Iturbieta, which was the last flock of the crown.

"Ten thousand sheep compose a flock, which is divided into ten tribes. One man has the conduct of all. He must be the owner of four or five hundred sheep, strong, active, vigilant, intelligent in pasture, in the weather, and in the diseases of sheep. He has absolute dominion over fifty shepherds and fifty dogs, five of each to a tribe. He chuses them, he chastises them, or discharges them at will; he is the prepositus or chief shepherd of the whole flock. You may judge of his importance by his salary: he has forty pounds a year and a horse, whereas the first shepherd of a tribe has but forty shillings a year, the second thirty-four, the third twenty-five, the fourth fifteen, and a boy ten shillings a year. All their allowance is two pounds of bread a day each. They may keep a few goats and sheep in the flock, but the wool is for the master; they have only the lambs and the flesh. The chief shepherd gives them three shillings in April, and three in October, by way of regale for the road; and these are all the ſweets theſe miſerable wretches enjoy; expoſed every day in the year to all weathers, and every night to lie in a hut. Thus fare, and thus live, generally to old age, 25,000 men, who clothe Kings in ſcarlet, and Biſhops in purple; for that is the number computed to keep the fine-wooled ſheep of Spain, with the ſame number of dogs of the large maſtiff kind, who are allowed two pounds of bread a piece a day. I often ſaw theſe flocks in the ſummer ſheep-walks of the hills and vales of Leo, Old Caſtile, Cuenca, and Arragon. I ſaw them in their winter plains of Manca, Extremadura, and Andalouſia. I often met them in their peregrination from the one to the other. I ſaw and I ſaw again. One eye is worth an hundred ears. I enquired, I obſerved, and even made experiments. All this was done when I happily got acquainted with a good plain old Friar, who had a conſummate knowledge of all the mechanical, low, minute circumſtances and œconomy of a flock. He told me that he was the ſon of a ſhepherd, that he had followed fifteen long years the tribe of ſheep his father led; that at twenty-five years of age he begged an old primmer, that at thirty he could read, that at thirty-ſix he had learned Latin enough to read maſs and the breviary; that he was ordained by Don Juan Navarra, Lord Biſhop of Albarazzin, who, as it is known, even to a proverb in Spain, has ordained thouſands, declaring theſe forty years, in a loud voice, That a Prieſt is the moſt precious boon which a Biſhop can beſtow, in the name of God, to mankind, even though he was as unlearned as an apoſtle: that thus ordained he entered into the order of St. Francis; that he had never meddled in their affairs theſe twenty-four years paſt, but only ſaid maſs, confeſſed, inſtructed, and gave an eye to about five hundred wethers who grazed in the neighbouring downs for the uſe of the convent; that he had read the Bible, the Lives of the Saints, and the Lives of the Popes, with no other view in the world but to find out all that was ſaid about ſhepherds; that good Abel was the firſt ſhepherd, that all the patriarchs were ſhepherds, that the meek ſhepherd Moſes was choſen to deliver the people of God out of bondage; that Saul, in ſeeking his father's flocks, found a kingdom; that David went out from his flock to ſlay the Philiſtine giant; that 14,000 ſheep was the chief reward Job received for his invincible patience; that Iſidro, the protecting ſaint of Madrid, was not, as is vulgarly believed, an huſbandman, like wicked Cain, but that he was really a keeper of ſheep; that the great Pope Sixtus Quintus was verily and truly a ſhepherd, and not a ſwine-herd; that, for his part, he had forſaken his ſheep to become a ſhepherd of men. He had all theſe things by heart, juſt as he had all the minute circumſtances of the ſheep he had followed; and this latter would have been imperfect, had I not met him.

"The five millions of ſheep paſs the ſummer in the cool mountains and hills above-named. Before we begin their itineraries to their winter walks, let us ſee how a few flocks live in a couple of cantons, which I will chuſe to ſerve as examples for all the reſt: one is the Montana, the other is Molina Arragon. I ſelect theſe two for theſe reaſons; becauſe I paſſed two ſummers in one, and a ſummer in the other: one is the moſt northern part of Spain, and at the greateſt diſtance from the winter walks; the other is towards the eaſt, and the ſhorteſt journey the ſheep have to make: one is the higheſt, and the other the loweſt, ſummer walk in Spain; and becauſe one is full of aromatic plants, and the other has none.

"At the extremity of Old Caſtile there is a territory called the Montana: it is divided into two parts. The low mountains is that chain of mountains which bounds the Cantabrian ſea. The city of Santander is its chief port, from whence you aſcend ſoutherly, twelve long leagues, a ſucceſſion of high craggy mountains, to the town of Reynoſa in the Upper Montana, which aſcent reaches three leagues more, and then you always deſcend about fourteen leagues to the city of Burgos, the capital of Old Caſtile. Reynoſa is in the center of an open plain, ſurrounded by a ridge of high mountains, at whoſe feet are low hills of paſture land. The ſource of the great river Ebro is an hour's walk to the weſt of Reynoſa. All the ſpring rain, and ſnow waters of the mountains to the north of Reynoſa, run into the bay of Biſcay. The waters of the ſouthern chain are collected in the river Piſuerga, which running into the river Duero, are carried to the Atlantic ocean at Oporto, and all the water that falls into the plains of Reynoſa, runs with the Ebro into the Mediterranean, ſeven leagues below the city of Tortoſa. Hence we ſee that the adjacent parts of Reynoſa divide the waters of three ſeas, which lie north, eaſt, and weſt. Eight leagues ſquare of this Upper Montana is the higheſt land of Spain: the mountains riſe in the atmoſphere to the line of congelation. I ſee ſnow from my window this fourth of Auguſt that I am writing this. Some years ago, there uſed to fall ſo much ſnow, that the people were forced to dig lanes through the ſnow to go to church in winter; but there has fallen little ſnow ſince the Liſbon earthquake, and ſome years none at all. It certainly changed the climates of many parts of Spain. No man living ſaw, nor heard his father ſay he ſaw, ſnow fall in or about Seville, till the year 1756, which extraordinary appearance ſtruck a dread into ſome convents: they rung the bells to prayers, and made proceſſions to appeaſe the wrath of heaven, as if the falling flakes foreboded the laſt day. I found many plants only beginning to flower here, which I ſaw in ſeed below at Santander. I remember to have ſeen in Switzerland all the plants but two, which grow in the mountains, hills, and plains of Reynoſa, a ſmall yellow-flowered geniſtella, with an herbaceous, triangular-jointed ſtem, and wild gooſeberry buſhes. The high mountains abound with oak, birch, holly, and hazel.

"The hills and plains are fine paſture: I never ſaw a meadow in any other part of Spain, nor cows and horſes feed on hay. Theſe mountains are formed of ſand-ſtone, lime-ſtone, plaiſter-ſtone, [talc] and emery-ſtone. The ſand-ſtone is at the ſummit of the mountains and hills in ſome, and the lime-ſtone forms the body. You ſee the contrary in others, but the ſand-ſtone abounds, and the plaiſter is always the loweſt. As for example, the high mountain of Arandilla, which is about a ſmall league north of the town, is all ſand-ſtone at the ſummit; its body is a maſs of aſh-coloured lime-ſtone, in which you find impriſoned petrified cornua ammonis and ſcollop-ſhells, and beds of plaiſter-ſtone at his foot towards the plain, which join to ſtrata of black marble veined with white and yellow; which is no more than a purer lime-ſtone like all other marble, and you find great blocks of emery-ſtone in the plain and on the hill to the eaſt of Reynoſa, of which I will ſay a word, becauſe I think its nature is not truly known, at leaſt that of emery, which the looking-glaſs grinders of the king's fabric at St. Ildefonſo ſay is the moſt biting emery they ever uſed, and I never ſaw any other in its native matrix. That iron has been, and is now, in a fluid ſtate, percolating through the earth, and that it ſubſides, cryſtaliſes, or is precipitated to form different bodies, is demonſtrated by the black and red bloodſtone (hematites) by ſome beautiful ſtalactites, which are almoſt pure iron; by the eagle-ſtone; by figured pyrites; by native vitriol, and by native crocus. When this fluid iron penetrates a rock of ſand-ſtone, and only ſtains the ſurface of each grain of a browniſh, reddiſh, or yellow colour, it is only ſand and crocus. But when this fluid iron, joined with the cryſtaline matter, is in a fluid ſtate, in the very act of the cryſtaliſation of each grain of ſand, it incorporates with it, increaſes its weight and hardneſs, it is emery. The earths of the mountains and hills are of the nature of the rock below. If it be lime-ſtone, the ſoil caſt into any acid liquor will boil up with a violent efferveſcence, and the acid will diſſolve it. If the rock below be ſand-ſtone, plaiſter-ſtone, or emery, the earths of the hill or mountain will remain quiet in the acid; there is no efferveſcene nor diſſolution. I often obſerved that when the rocks below are mixed, (calcary and non-calcary) the ſoil of the ſurface is of a mixed nature too; and I always found the action of the acid to be weak or ſtrong upon theſe earths, in proportion to the ſtone that abounds. The farmers have found out by experience the genus of theſe two ſimple, and even the mixt ſoils; they know that corn grows beſt in the ſod that covers the lime-ſtone, that the mixed requires much manure, and that the deep, fat, clayey ſoil, which covers the ſand-ſtone, muſt have more ploughing and other labour than the farmer can afford; and corn-land and calcareous or lime-ſtone land, are ſynonymous terms in this country. Theſe rocks and earths would be improperly mentioned in a letter upon wool, were it not that the ſheep find out the nature of theſe three ſoils as ſurely as farmers and acids.

"The firſt thing the ſhepherd does when the flock returns from the ſouth to their ſummer downs, is to give them as much ſalt as they will eat. Every owner allows his flock of a thouſand ſheep one hundred aroves or twenty-five quintals of ſalt, which the flock eats in about five months: they eat none in their journey, nor in their winter walk. This has ever been the cuſtom, and it is the true reaſon why the kings of Spain cannot raiſe the price of ſalt to the height it is in France; for it would tempt the ſhepherds to ſtint the ſheep, which, it is believed, would weaken their conſtitutions and degrade the wool. The ſhepherd places fifty or ſixty flat ſtones at about five ſteps diſtance from each other, he ſtrews ſalt upon each ſtone, he leads the flock ſlowly through the ſtones, and every ſheep eats to his liking. But then they never eat a grain of ſalt when they are feeding in lime-ſtone land, whether it be on the graſs of the downs, or on the little plants of the corn-fields after harveſt-home. The ſhepherd muſt not ſuffer them to ſtay too long without ſalt: he leads them into a ſpot of [argilaceous] clayey ſoil, and in a quarter of an hour's feeding, they march to the ſtones and devour the ſalt. If they meet a ſpot of the mixed ſoil, which often happens, they eat ſalt in proportion. Aſk the ſhepherd why the ſheep eat no ſalt in lime-ſtone ſoil, and but little in the mixt? Becauſe, Sir, it is corn-land. I know, and indeed who does not know, that lime abounds in ſaline matter; but then the ſalt which chymiſts extract from it may not be the genuine ſalt of the lime-ſtone before calcination, for the fire may form new combinations. It may be ſea-ſalt, or at leaſt the muriatic acid which riſes in the vegetation of graſs, and ſatisfies the ſheeps taſte for ſalt. The latter end of July the rams are turned into the tribe of ewes, regulated at ſix or ſeven rams for every hundred. When the ſhepherd judges they are ſerved, he collects the rams into a ſeparate tribe to feed apart; but then there is another tribe of rams that feed apart too, and never ſerve the ewes, but which are merely for wool, and for the butchery: for though the wool and fleſh of wethers are finer and more delicate than thoſe of rams, yet the fleece of a ram weighs more than the fleece of a wether, who is likewiſe ſhorter-lived than the ram, which compenſation is the reaſon there are ſo few tribes of wethers in the royal flock of Spain. The fleeces of three rams generally weigh twenty-five pounds: there muſt be the wool of four wethers and that of five ewes to weigh twenty-five pounds. There is the ſame diſproportion in their lives, which depend upon their teeth; for when they fail they cannot bite the graſs, and they are condemned to the knife. The ewes teeth, from their tender conſtitutions, and the fatigue of breeding, begin to fail after five years of age, the wethers after ſix, and the robuſt ram not till towards eight. It is forbidden to expoſe rams fleſh to ſale, but the law is eluded; they cut the old rams, and as ſoon as the inciſion is healed, they are ſold to the butchers at a lower price than coarſe-wooled wethers. That is the reaſon ſuch bad mutton is generally eaten in Madrid, and that is the reaſon there are more rams and fewer lamb-ſtones ſold and eaten every day in the year in Madrid, than in the reſt of Europe.

"At the latter end of September they put on the redding or ochre: it is a ponderous irony earth, common in Spain: the ſhepherd diſſolves it in water, and dawbs the ſheeps backs with it from the neck to the rump. It is an old cuſtom. Some ſay it mixes with the greaſe of the wool, and ſo becomes a varniſh impenetrable to the rain and cold; others, that its weight keeps the wool down, and ſo hinders it from growing long and coarſe; and others, that it acts as an abſorbent earth, receives part of the tranſpiration, which would foul the wool, and make it aſperous.

"The latter end of September the ſheep begin their march towards the low plains. Their itinerary is marked out by immemorial cuſtom, and by ordinances, and is as well regulated as the march of troops. They feed freely in all the wilds and commons as they paſs through; but as they muſt neceſſarily paſs through many cultivated ſpots, the proprietors of them are obliged by law to leave a paſſage open for the ſheep, through vineyards, olive-yards, corn-fields, and paſture land common to towns; and theſe paſſages muſt be at leaſt ninety yards wide, that they may not be too crowded in a narrow lane. Theſe paſſages are often ſo long that the poor creatures march ſix or ſeven leagues a-day to get into the open wilds, where the ſhepherd walks ſlow to let them feed at eaſe and reſt, but they never ſtop: they have no day of repoſe: they march at leaſt two leagues a day, ever following the ſhepherd, always feeding or ſeeking with their heads towards the ground till they get to their journey's end, which, from the Montana to Extremadura, is about one hundred and fifty leagues, which they march in leſs than forty days. The chief ſhepherd's firſt care is to ſee that each tribe is conducted to the ſame diſtrict it fed in the year before, and where the ſheep were yeaned, which they think prevents a variation in the wool: though indeed this requires but little care; for it is a notorious truth, that the ſheep would go to that very ſpot of their own accord. His next care was to fix the toils where the ſheep paſs the night, leſt they ſhould ſtray, and fall into the jaws of wolves. Laſtly, the ſhepherds make up their poor huts with ſtakes, branches, and brambles; for which end, and for firing, they are allowed by the law to cut off one branch from every tree. I believe this to be the reaſon, that all the foreſt-trees near the ſheep-walks in Spain are as hollow as willow-pollards. The roots of trees and the quantity of ſap, increaſe yearly with the branches: if you lop off theſe, all the ſap that ſhould go to the annual production, and to the nouriſhment of buds, ſtems, leaves, flowers, fruit, and growth of the branches, remains in the trunk; from hence ſtagnation, fermentation, and rottenneſs. Next comes the time when the ewes begin to drop their lambs, which is the moſt toilſome and moſt ſolicitous part of the paſtoral life. The ſhepherds firſt cull out the barren from the pregnant ewes, which are conducted to the beſt ſhelter, and the others to the bleakeſt part of the diſtrict. As the lambs fall, they are led apart with their dams to another comfortable ſpot. A third diviſion is made of the laſt yeaned lambs, for whom was allotted from the beginning the moſt fertile part, the beſt ſoil, and ſweeteſt graſs of the down, that they may grow as vigorous as the firſt yeaned, for they muſt all march the ſame day towards their ſummer-quarters: the ſhepherds perform four operations upon all the lambs about the ſame time in the month of March, but firſt they pay the twentieth lamb; the other half tithe is paid in the winter walk: they cut off their tails five inches below the rump for cleanlineſs: they mark them on the noſe with a hot iron: they ſaw off part of their horns, that the rams may neither hurt one another nor the ewes: they render impotent the lambs doomed for docile bell-wethers, to walk at the head of the tribe; they make no inciſion; the ſhepherd turns the teſticles with his finger twenty may poſſibly cover the plains of Carolina, Georgia, Eaſt and Weſt-Florida, in the winter months, and retreat to the mountains as the ſummer heats increaſe and dry up the herbage. In times about in the ſcrotum, till he twiſts the ſpermatic veſſels as a rope, and they wither away without any danger. As ſoon as the month of April comes about, which is the time of their departure, the ſheep expreſs, by various uneaſy motions, a remarkable reſtleſſneſs, and ſtrong deſire to go off. The ſhepherds muſt exert all their vigilance leſt they ſhould eſcape; and it has often happened, that a tribe has ſtolen a forced march of three or four leagues upon a ſleepy ſhepherd: but he is ſure to find them, for they return exactly the ſame way they came; and there are many examples, of three or four ſtrayed ſheep walking an hundred leagues to the very place they fed in the year before. Thus they all go off towards their ſummer mountains in the ſame order they came, only with this difference, the flocks that go to Leon and Caſtile are ſhorn in the road, where we will ſtay a little to ſee the apparatus of this operation, whilſt the other flocks march on to Molina Arragon. They begin to ſheer the firſt of May, provided the weather be fair; for if the wool were not quite dry, the fleeces which are cloſe piled upon one another would ferment and rot: it is for this reaſon that the ſheering houſes are ſo ſpacious. I ſaw ſome which can contain in bad weather twenty thouſand ſheep, and coſt above 5000l. ſterling: beſides, the ewes are creatures of ſuch conſtitutions, that if they were expoſed immediately after ſheering to the air of a bleak night, they would all periſh.

"There are one hundred and twenty-five ſheermen employed to ſheer a flock of ten thouſand ſheep: a man ſheers twelve ewes a day and but eight rams: the reaſon of this difference is, not only becauſe the rams have larger bodies, ſtronger and more wool, but the ſheermen dare not tie their feet as they do thoſe of the unreſiſting ewes. Experience taught, that the bold rebellious ram would ſtruggle even to ſuffocation in captivity under the ſheers: they gently lay him down, they ſtroke his belly, they beguile him out of his fleece: a certain number of ſheep are led into the great ſhelter-houſe, which is a parallelogram of four or five hundred feet long, and one hundred wide, where they remain all day: as many as they judge can be diſpatched by the ſheermen next day, are driven from the ſhelter-hall into a long, narrow, low gut, which is called the ſweating-place, where they remain all night, crowded as cloſe together as the ſhepherd can keep them, that they may ſweat plentifully, which, as they ſay, is to ſoften the wool for the ſheers, and oil their edges. They are led by degrees in the morning into the ſpacious ſheering-hall, which joins the ſweating-room. The ſhepherd carries them off as faſt as they are ſheered, to be marked with tar; and as this operation is neceſſarily performed upon one at a time, it gives a fair opportunity to the ſhepherds to cull out for the butchery all the ſheep of the flock who have out-lived their teeth. The ſheered ſheep go to the fields to feed a little if it be fine weather; and they return in the evening to paſs the night in the yard before the houſe, within the ſhelter of the walls; but if it be cold and cloudy they go into the houſe. They are thus brought by degrees to bear the open air; and their firſt days journies from the ſheering-houſe to the mountains are ſhort, where we will leave them to conclude their annual peregrination, and go ſee how fare the flocks of Molina Arragon, which have by this time got thither; but while the mule is ſaddling, a word of the ſhorn wool.

"The ſheep and ſheerers diſpatched, the firſt thing done is to weigh the whole pile of wool; the next is to divide each fleece into three ſorts of wool: the back and belly give the ſuperfine; the neck and ſides give the fine; the breaſt, ſhoulders, and thighs, the coarſe wool. A different price is fixed upon theſe three claſſes, though the general cuſtom is to ſell the whole pile together at a mean price. It is ſold after it is waſhed, when it is to go out of the kingdom, or to any conſiderable diſtance in it; for as it never loſes leſs than half its weight in waſhing, and often more when the ſweating is violent, half the carriage is ſaved.

"Here I ſee that I have changed the order I propoſed in ſetting out; for I have followed the ſheep from the mountains to the plains, and back again; but it is not worth mending.

"Thirty-one leagues S. E. of Madrid, and five leagues S. of the ſource of the river Tagus, is the town of Molina Arragon, capital of a lordſhip of the crown, which is twelve leagues wide, as many long, and almoſt in the center of Spain. The high lands of this little territory are covered with pine-trees; the low lands feed about 150,000 ſheep. Here I learnt ſome truths, which prove that the three following opinions ſhould be ranked amongſt vulgar errors.

"1. That ſheep eat and love aromatic plants, and that the fleſh of thoſe that feed on hills where the ſweet herbs abound has a fine taſte.

"2. That ſalt ſprings are not found in the high primitive mountains, but in the low hills and plains only.

"3. That metallic vapours deſtroy vegetation; that no rocks nor mountains pregnant with rich veins of ore are covered with rich vegetable ſoil.

"The town of Molina is almoſt in the middle of the ſheep-walks. The ſolid part of the country is formed of red and grey ſand-ſtone, lime-ſtone, white and grey granite, and plaiſter-ſtone, white, grey, yellow, blueiſh, greeniſh, and blood-red; in ſome places theſe are all beautifully mixed in one ſtratum. Time and moiſture uncompound theſe ſtones: for they have mouldered, and are daily mouldering into the ſoil of the country, which is always of the ſame nature as that of the rock. The red fuller's earth, with which the manufacturers of Molina clean their cloth, is evidently the very grains of ſand of the red rock degraded into earth. The rocks about the town contain either ſalt or ſaltpetre: you ſee the hewn ſtones of the houſes covered with ſaline efflorescences which are drawn out by the ſun after rain. The whole territory of Molina is full of ſalt ſprings; but there is a copious ſalt ſpring riſing out of a land yet higher than the ſource of the Tagus, and not far from it, which is one of the higheſt lands in all the inward parts of Spain, for it divides the waters of the ocean and Mediterranean. The Tagus runs one hundred and fifty leagues to Liſbon, and the two rivers Gaudalvair and Sucar, which riſe near it, run to Valencia. This ſpring furniſhes ſalt to the juriſdiction and biſhopric of Albarrazin. There is another ſalt ſpring, in a high land too, which ſupplies the eighty-two towns and villages of Molina Arragon with ſalt. Now I will mention the ſalt ſpring that iſſues out of a ſpot in the Montana, which is higher than the ſource of the Ebro, and about a quarter of a mile from it.

"There are many iron, copper, lead, and pure pyritous ores in theſe ſheep-walks, where grow the ſame plants and the ſame ſweet graſs as in the other parts. I will give one example: about two hours walk N. W. of Molina there is a little hill called the Platilla: it is about half a league over from valley to valley; its body is ſolid, rocky, of white granite, through which run in different directions, and without any order, an infinite number of blue, green, and yellow veins of rich copper ores, which hold a little ſilver, mineralized by a great quantity of arſenic and ſulphur. The very ſurface of the rock is in many places ſtained blueiſh and green, and the veins of ore are not above a foot deep in the fiſſures and in the ſolid rock, which contain lead ore ſometimes up to the ſurface.

"The following plants grow out of the ſoil which covers theſe arſenical ſulphureous veins, and which is not above a foot deep. True oak, ilex, whoſe leaves fall, white-thorn, juniper; theſe are poor ſhrubs, becauſe they are browzed by the goats. Cyſtus, wild roſe, uva-urſi, phlomis ſalviæ, fol. fl. luteo, verbaſcum of the highways, ſtœchas, ſage, thymum legitimum, clus, ſerpyllum, greater and leſſer; roſemary, helianthemum, pimpinella, chamædris, filipendula, ſtachys lychnoides, incana anguſtifolia flo. aureo.

In conſequence of the late American revolution, ſuch an improvement would not now be productive of that benefit to this kingdom, which Mr. Collinſon expected from it: but it is worthy of conſideration, whether the œconomy of Spain might not be introduced with advantage even in England; with this difference, that the hills ſhould be choſen for the reſidence of the ſheep in winter, and the wetter low-lands reſerved for their paſture in ſummer (n).

reo. var. The great aſphodel, coronilla of the meadows, gallium luteum, yarrow, campanula radice eſculenta à jacobea, which I ſaw grow in the ſand of the ſea-ſide, and is all quite white. A gladiolus, and a little glaucium, which grow in corn-fields in Spain; leucanthemum of the meadows, orchis, ornithogalum, muſcaria, polygala, and about twenty kinds more, which are found likewiſe in meadows, corn-fields, highways, hedges, and ſea-ſhores; yet the non-calcary earth of this mineral hill is covered with the ſame ſweet ſmall graſs as the reſt of the country, even the lime-ſtone land. I made the ſame obſervations at the three greateſt mines in Europe; St. Mary of the mines in Alſatia; Clauſtahl in the Hartz-mountains of Hanover; and Freyberg in Saxony. The mines of St. Mary are at the head of a valley in the Voge-mountains; its hills are ſome of them covered with oak and pines, others with apple, pear, plum, and cherry-trees: others are fine green downs for ſheep and cows, with a great variety of plants; others are fields of wheat, which in the year 1759 (as I find it in my notes) gave a product of eight for one. All theſe things grow in a foot or two deep of ſoil, which covers a rock full of the moſt arſenical, ſulphureous ſilver, or copper, lead, and cobalt ore in Europe, and moſt of their veins near the ſurface.

"The mines of Clauſtahl are in a plain which is, in truth, the ſummit of a mountain. The Dorothy and Caroline veins of ſilver, lead, and copper ore ſtretched away eight miles to the Wildman mountain. The fineſt meadows and ſweeteſt graſs, are upon theſe veins, and all their branches near the city; they feed nine hundred cows, and two hundred horſes. They are mowed in June; a ſecond graſs ſprings up, which is mowed in Auguſt. A multitude of plants grow in theſe meadows over the mines, as valerian, gallium fl. albo, coronilla, chryſanthemum ſegetum, leucanthemum, viola tricolor. biſtort. bonus henricus, St. John's wort, agrimony, ladies mantle, tuſſilago, &c.

"The mines of Freyberg are in the lower hills near the city: I ſaw them all covered with barley in the month of July. A ſtranger would not imagine that men were reaping corn over hundreds of miners heads, who were blowing up veins of ore, arſenic, and brimſtone.

"It is true, I alſo ſaw mines in the barren naked mountains and hills; but it is certain that their barrenneſs is not the effect of mineral vapours. The air, moiſture, heat, and cold, have more power over the ſurfaces of ſome rocks than others, to moulder the ſtone into earth: ſuch is the high mountain Ramelſberg, at whoſe foot is the imperial city of Goſlar, whoſe inhabitants live, and have lived theſe nine hundred years, by the mine of this ſteep barren mountain. I crept up to its ſummit, and found it was ſplit and cracked into millions of fiſſures, from a foot wide to a hair's breadth; that in other places the rock was ſhivered into ſmall rotten ſtones, which, in ſome ſpots, were perfectly uncompounded and fallen into earth, from whence ſprang a little graſs, moſs, and a few plants. In ſhort, I ſaw that the time of its decay into vegetable mould was not yet come, and that the mountain Ramelſberg will be one day as green as Clauſtahl; which ſhews, I think, that the world is not ſo old as ſome men fancy. I will make no apology to Mr. Peter Collinſon for this digreſſion: I heard Fame declare him twenty years ago an enemy to error; he muſt love truth, though he finds it placed out of order.

"As my duty obliged me to paſs hundreds of days at the Platilla mine of Molina, I ſaw thouſands of ſheep feed around it. I obſerved, that when the ſhepherd made a pauſe, and let them feed at their will, they ſought only for the fine graſs, and never touched any aromatic plant; that when the creeping ſerpillum was interwoven with the graſs, the ſheep induſtriouſly noſed it aſide to bite a blade, which trouble made them ſoon ſeek out a pure gramineous ſpot. I obſerved too, when the ſhepherd perceived a threatening cloud, and gave a ſignal to the dogs to collect the tribe, and then go behind it, walking apace himſelf to lead the ſheep to ſhelter; that as they had no time to ſtoop they would take a ſnap of ſtœchas, roſemary, or any other ſhrub in their way; for ſheep will eat any thing when they are hungry, or when they walk faſt. I ſaw them greedily devour henbane, hemlock, glaucium, and other nauſeous weeds, upon their iſſue out of the ſheering-houſe. If ſheep loved aromatic plants, it would be one of the greateſt misfortunes that could befal the farmers of Spain. The number of bee-hives is incredible: I am almoſt aſhamed to give under my hand, that I knew a pariſh prieſt who had five thouſand hives. The bees ſuck all their honey, and gather all their wax from the aromatic flowers, which enamel and perfume two-thirds of the ſheep-walks. This prieſt cautiouſly ſeizes the queens in a ſmall crape fly-catch; he clips off their wings; their majeſties ſtay at home. He aſſured me that he never loſt a ſwarm from the day of this diſcovery to the day he ſaw me, which I think was five years.

"The ſhepherd's chief care is not to ſuffer the ſheep to go out of their toils till the morning ſun has exhaled the dew of a white froſt: and never let them approach a rivulet or pond after a ſhower of hail, for if they ſhould eat the dewy graſs, or drink hail-water, the whole tribe would become melancholy, faſt, pine away, and die, as often happened. Hail-water is ſo pernicious to men in this climate, that the people of Molina will not drink the river water after a violent ſhower of hail: experience taught the danger: but let it be never ſo muddy, and riſe never ſo high after rain, they drink it without fear. Perhaps this may be the unheeded cauſe of many endemical epidemics of other cities. The ſheep of Andalouſia, who never travel, have coarſe, long, hairy wool. I ſaw a flock in Extremadura whoſe wool trailed on the ground. The itinerant ſheep have ſhort, ſilky, white wool. I do believe, from a few experiments and long obſervation, that if the fine-wooled ſheep ſtayed at home in the winter, their wool would become coarſe in a few generations. If the coarſe-wooled ſheep travelled from climate to climate, and lived in the free air, their wool would become fine, ſhort, and ſilky in a few generations.

"The fineneſs of the wool is due to the animal's paſſing its life in an open air of equal temperature. It is not colder in Andalouſia and Extramadura in the winter, than it is in the Montana or Molina in ſummer. There is little froſt in Andalouſia; ſometimes it ſnows in June in Molina. I felt a cold day upon the leaſt cloud in ſummer. Conſtant heat or conſtant cold, with houſing, are the cauſes of coarſe, black, and ſpeckled wool. All the animals I know, who live in the open air, conſtantly keep up to the colour of their ſires. There are the moſt beautiful brindled ſheep in the world among the coarſe-wooled ſheep of Spain. I never ſaw one amongſt the fine-wooled flocks; the free but leſs abundant perſpiration in the open air is ſwept away as faſt as it flows; whereas it is greatly increaſed by the exceſſive heat of numbers of ſheep houſed all night in a narrow place. It fouls the wool, makes it hairy, and changes its colour. The ſwine in Spain, who paſs their lives in the woods, are all of one colour, as the wild boars. They have fine, ſilky, curled briſtles. Never did a Spaniſh hog's briſtle piece a ſhoe. What a quantity of dander is daily ſecerned from the glans of a ſtabled horſe! the curry-comb and hair-cloth ever in hand. How clean is the ſkin of an horſe that lives in the open air.

I am, Sir, &c.

So early as the year 1740, Mr. Collinſon had riſen to conſiderable reputation among thoſe who were beſt acquainted with Botany and Natural Hiſtory in Great-Britain. His collection was very large, and his ſpecimens well choſen. He had a botanical garden at Mill-Hill, near Endfield, which contained many curious plants, not at that time to be found in any other, the number of which was continually increaſing till his death. The collection and garden which he had formed, procured him the acquaintance of a variety of perſons of rank and diſtinction in the kingdom, who were diſtinguiſhed by their taſte in planting and horticulture, or deſirous to make rural improvements. With ſome of theſe he frequently ſpent a few days at their ſeats, commending and cenſuring what he approved and diſapproved in the deſigns they were carrying on, with an integrity and taſte which did equal honour to the ſimplicity of his manners, and the rectitude of his judgment. The experience of a long life had furniſhed him with an extenſive knowledge of the various methods of cultivation, and of the particular ſoil and aſpect which were beſt adapted to different plants and trees. By his ſuperior ſkill in the fitteſt method of improving beauties, and hiding incurable defects, he often prevented young planters from committing capital miſtakes, and rectified others, into which they had been miſled by the ignorant or the deſigning. He prevailed upon many of his friends to adopt, and to perſevere in the rational amuſements of planting and horticulture; and this they did to the mutual advantage of themſelves and their country (o). "Planting, he uſed to ſay, and "gardening, ſupply a fund of entertainment, the moſt laſting and reaſonable of any occupation in this life; pleaſures not to be purchaſed. The trees which we ourſelves "have planted, the fruits we have raiſed, the plants we have cultivated, ſeem to be like "our children, a kind of new creation. Their ſhade, their taſte, their fragrance, and "their beauties, affect us with a richer repaſt than any others. What a pleaſing ſcene, "would he obſerve, lies open to a young man of fortune, devoted to ſuch amuſements! "Each ſucceeding year produces new ſhades, other fruits, freſh beauties, and brings beſides moſt certain profit. To behold the riſing groves, barrenneſs made fertile, our "country improved, ourſelves made uſeful and happy, and poſterity enriched! When on "this favourite ſubject, a very natural reflection often eſcaped him, that he ſeldom knew "a man poſſeſſed of a taſte for ſuch pleaſures, who was not at the ſame time temperate "and virtuous. And indeed he had a right to make the obſervation; for he had the ſatisfaction of reckoning among his moſt intimate friends, men of the moſt amiable and "unblemiſhed characters, in all ſtations, parties, and diſtinctions (p)." Nor was Mr. Collinſon only employed in promoting this taſte among his friends, in enlarging their views, and in correcting and refining their judgments, but alſo in furniſhing them with the means of increaſing their plantations. It is but doing juſtice to his memory, to mention that he was the firſt who introduced the great variety of ſeeds and ſhrubs, which are now the principal ornaments of every garden; and that it was owing to his indefatigable induſtry, that ſuch a number of perſons of the firſt diſtinction are enabled to behold groves tranſplanted from the weſtern continent, flouriſhing as luxuriantly in their ſeveral domains, as if they were already become indigenous to Britain (q).

Mr. Collinſon's buſineſs in the mercantile way was chiefly to North-America and the Weſt-Indies, and particularly to the former. He had peruſed every performance that had been written reſpecting the Natural Hiſtory and produce of our own ſettlements, and indeed of all the European Colonies in the New World. This enabled him to make enquiries into whatever was curious and uſeful, and brought him acquainted with the moſt intelligent people who came from America. One reſult of his various enquiries was, that a taſte for Natural Hiſtory, and botanical reſearches, was excited in that part of the globe. It perhaps may ſafely be aſſerted, that every thing of this kind which has appeared in the American Colonies, was principally owing to his encouragement. That eminent Naturaliſt, John Bartram, may almoſt be ſaid to have been created ſuch by Mr. Collinſon's aſſiſtance. He it was who firſt recommended to him the collecting of ſeeds, and afterwards aided him in diſpoſing of them in this country. Animated by his friend, Mr. Bartram perſevered in inveſtigating the plants of America with indefatigable labour, and with a ſucceſs which has rendered his name not a little illuſtrious. The quantities of new ſeeds which Mr. Collinſon received from the weſtern world, not only ſupplied his own garden with every thing that was curious, but furniſhed him with the means of procuring others in exchange, from the moſt diſtant parts of the globe. This mutual exchange was carried on from America through Europe and Aſia, even ſo far as to Pekin. In managing ſuch an extenſive correſpondence, Mr. Collinſon's punctuality, care, and generoſity, were eminently diſtinguiſhed (r).

(r) Ibid. p. 51.

In conſequence of Mr. Collinſon's connection with the Americans, he frequently urged to them the benefit, nay the neceſſity of cultivating flax, hemp, wine, ſilk, and other products. In moſt of the northern and ſouthern Colonies, there are a variety of native grapes growing wild in the woods, and thriving among the trees and buſhes by which they are ſupported. As theſe yield fruit in plenty of different kinds, and many of them are capable of producing a rich and good wine, it would be eaſy in autumn to collect a ſufficient quantity for the purpoſe of making a trial. A few perſons have done it with ſucceſs, and nothing is wanting but a general application to the proper modes of conducting the buſineſs (s).

Mr. Collinſon was fond of fruit to an extreme, and of flowers he was a perpetual admirer. He was ſeldom without them in his houſe, from the early ſnowdrop to the autumn cyclamen. He would often relate, with pleaſure, the aſtoniſhing advancement that had been made during his time in horticulture. He uſed to mention inſtances of various plants which, at their firſt introduction, would not bear our winters without ſhelter, but which now endured almoſt our hardeſt froſts; ſo that foreigners ſtood amazed at the power of vegetation in this country, and the happy temperature we enjoy, notwithſtanding the unmerited murmurs of the unthinking and the injudicious, againſt a climate eminently favourable to the real happineſs of mankind (t). Why Mr. Collinſon was not elected a Curator of the Britiſh Muſeum, may continue a matter of ſurprize, ſo long as the Muſeum itſelf exiſts. He was one of the founder's moſt intimate and ancient friends, was well acquainted with every ſubject it contained, and had done perhaps more to promote the knowledge of Natural Hiſtory, than any individual in that truſt. But never did the leaſt hint upon the ſubject eſcape from him, or any ſymptom of diſguſt, from ſuch an apparent neglect, ſhew itſelf in his behaviour. He had no higher an ambition than to render his knowledge ſubſervient to the common good, whether in or out of the direction of that vaſt and ineſtimable treaſure (u).

(t) Ibid. p. 51.

(u) Obſervations communicated by Michael Collinſon, Eſq.

Excepting ſome attacks of the gout, Mr. Collinſon generally enjoyed perfect health, and great equality of ſpirits. Thoſe trials which are incident to man he bore with reſignation and fortitude. In ſuch a courſe of life he arrived to his ſeventy-fifth year; when, being on a viſit to Lord Petre, in Eſſex, for whom he had a ſingular regard, he was ſeized with a total ſuppreſſion of urine, which baffled every attempt to relieve it, and, on the 11th of Auguſt, 1768, deprived his family, his friends, and his country, of a man devoted to their intereſt and advantage (w). In 1724, he had married Mary, the daughter of Michael Ruſſell, Eſq; of Mill-Hill, in the pariſh of Hendon, Middleſex, a lady of exemplary character, with whom he lived in the greateſt conjugal felicity, and whom he had the great misfortune to loſe, in the year 1753. By this lady he left iſſue, a ſon and a daughter (x), Michael Collinſon, Eſq; and Mary, married to John Cator, Eſq; of Beckenham, in Kent, and ſome time Member of Parliament for Wallingford, Berks. Mr. Peter Collinſon had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing both his children take the ſame bias with himſelf, and of being aided by them in his purſuits. He left behind him a vaſt treaſure of dried ſpecimens of plants. His garden was repeatedly expoſed to cruel depredations, by which he loſt a multitude of the valuable productions of his botanical ſkill and labour. Many others were deſtroyed by the villains in the very act of plunder. Nevertheleſs, there ſtill remains a ſmall treaſure of rare plants, in greater perfection than can be ſeen perhaps in any other ſpot (y).

(x) From the information of Michael Collinſon, Eſq.

Mr. Collinſon's ſtature was below the middle ſize, and the habit of his body ſomewhat corpulent. In his dreſs he was plain, and probably the more ſo from having been bred a Quaker. His aſpect was pleaſing and ſocial, and his temper open and communicative; for to lock up knowledge from others he conſidered as treaſon to mankind. Though he was an œconomiſt, his œconomy was not of that ſevere kind, which prevented him from having a heart that ſympathized with diſtreſs, and a hand that was open to relieve it (z). He roſe very early, and, whilſt in the country, his time was almoſt conſtantly employed in his garden, obſerving and aſſiſting the operations of nature, or in the ſtudy of other parts of phyſical knowledge, which contributed to his health and pleaſure. Incloſed in Mr. Collinſon's will, was found a paper, importing, that he hoped he ſhould leave behind him a good name, which he valued more than riches; that he had endeavoured not to live uſeleſsly; and that all his days he conſtantly aimed to be a friend to mankind (a). As it was thus the wiſh of this excellent Citizen to quit the world with an honourable reputation, ſo it affords the trueſt ſatisfaction to thoſe who were the moſt nearly connected with him in friendſhip and in blood, even in the tendereſt moments of reflection, that his deſire has been fully gratified. No man has gone down to the grave with a fairer character, or more generally been lamented, at his deceaſe, by his friends and acquaintance. Indeed, it could not be otherwiſe: for his life was a continued exertion of laudable induſtry, and all his ſtudies and purſuits had the honour and happineſs of mankind for their object. It was for this end that he promoted great and uſeful undertakings, communicated to the public curious and intereſting accounts of improvements in Huſbandry and Natural Hiſtory, and endeavoured to reſcue from oblivion the memories of thoſe perſons who had deſerved well of their fellow-creatures (b). Such were the views, and ſuch the conduct of Mr. Peter Collinſon. Without pretenſions to what uſually goes under the appellation of literature, he was diſtinguiſhed by his extenſive and various knowledge; and without public ſtation, he was the means of producing national advantages. He obtained, during life, an influence which wealth cannot give; and his name will be had in honourable remembrance, when external dignities and ſplendid titles are forgotten.] K.

COLSTON (EDWARD), a perſon ever memorable for his great and extenſive charities, in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth century, was the eldeſt ſon of William Colſton, Eſq; [A], by Sarah his wife, and born in Temple pariſh, in the city of Briſtol, November 2, 1636 (a). He was brought up to trade, probably under his father, (who was a moſt eminent Spaniſh Merchant) and reſided ſome time in Spain; as did alſo his brothers, two of whom were inhumanly murdered there by aſſaſſins [B]. Through a very laudable induſtry, and in the courſe of a long and happy life, he acquired very great riches [C]; of which he expended a conſiderable part in works of beneficence and charity. In the year 1691, he built upon his own ground, at his own charge, St. Michael's-Hill Alms-houſe, in Briſtol [D]. The ſame year, he gave houſes and lands, without Temple-gate, in that city, to the Society of Merchants for ever, towards the maintenance of ſix poor old decayed ſailors, to the yearly value of twenty-four pounds. In 1696, he purchaſed a piece of ground in Temple-ſtreet, in the ſame city; and built, at his own charge, a ſchool and dwelling-houſe for a maſter, to inſtruct forty boys in writing, arithmetic, and the Church-catechiſm [E]. In 1702, he gave five hundred pounds towards rebuilding Queen Elizabeth's Hoſpital, on the College Green, in Briſtol; and for the maintenance, cloathing, and education of ſix boys there, and putting them out apprentices, he appropriated an eſtate, out of which is paid to the maſter the yearly ſum of ſixty pounds, excluſively of all taxes and charges, beſides ten pounds for placing out the boys apprentices. In the year 1708, he ſettled his great benefaction of the Hoſpital in St. Auguſtine's Back, in the city aforeſaid, conſiſting of a maſter, two uſhers, and one hundred boys [F]. He alſo give ſix pounds per annum to the Miniſter of All-Saints in Briſtol, for reading prayers every Monday and Tueſday morning throughout the year; and one pound a year to the Clerk and Sexton. Likewiſe ſix pounds yearly, for ever, for a monthly ſermon and prayers to the priſoners in Newgate there; and twenty pounds to be paid yearly, for ever, to the Clergy beneficed in that city, for preaching fourteen ſer-

[A] Was the eldeſt ſon of William Colſton, Eſq;] Who was a very eminent Spaniſh Merchant, as is ſaid above. He was uſually ſtiled Deputy Colſton, becauſe generally deputed by the corporation of the city to officiate for the Mayor-Elect, when he went to London to take the oaths; which the Mayors of Briſtol always did before the new charter granted to that city by Queen Anne. This circumſtance is a ſtrong proof, both of his ſtation in life, and of his character for integrity and virtue. Sarah, his wife, was a Counſellor's daughter (1). Their ſon, Mr. Edward Colſton, erected a monument to their memory, in the church of All-Saints in Briſtol; the inſcription on which is as follows: 'To the dear memory of his father William 'Colſton, Eſq; and of his Mother Sarah Colſton, in-'terred near this place in the ſepulchre of his anceſ-'tors; as alſo their four ſons, William, Thomas, 'Robert, and William, and their two daughters, 'Martha and Martha, who were all natives and inha-'bitants of this city. William his father died 21ſt 'Nov. 1681, aged 73 years; and Sarah his mother 'the 23d Dec. 1701, aged 93 years.

'Edward Colſton, their eldeſt ſon, born likewiſe in 'this city, but inhabitant of London, hath dedicated 'this monument.'

(1) From the ſame account as above.

[B] Two of whom were inhumanly murdered by aſſaſſins.] There is a tradition, that when Mr. Colſton and his two brothers were in Spain, in their diſputes with the Papiſts it was often objected to them, 'That 'the Reformed religion produced no examples of great 'and charitable benefactions;' to which they were wont to reply, That if it pleaſed God to bring them ſafe home, they would wipe off that aſperſion. Upon which, two of them were poiſoned, to prevent their return: but their elder brother, Mr. Edward Colſton, eſcaped. Such is the tradition: but it is more certain, that one or both of them, were aſſaſſinated by banditti's or bravoes; very common in Spain and Portugal.

[C] He acquired very great riches.] The viſible means whereby he acquired his riches, were as follows: 1. Being the eldeſt ſon, he received a handſome fortune from his parents. 2. Surviving all, if not moſt of, his brothers and ſiſters, he received theirs likewiſe: and the brothers had made very great additions to theirs by trade. 3. The Colſton family had at that time the two moſt valuable branches of trade, in that part of the kingdom, almoſt entirely to themſelves, viz. the fruit, and the oil, trade; Mr. Colſton having two ſhips always employed in that buſineſs: and oil was much more in uſe formerly than at preſent. Mr. Colſton not only ſupplied all, but purchaſed it abroad at a very great advantage, by advancing money to thoſe neceſſitous people, the Spaniards and Portugueſe, before their vintage, and being allowed a diſcount. 4. He never inſured a ſhip, ſaving that expence, and yet he never loſt one (2).

(2) From the account as above.

[D] In the year 1691, he built upon his own ground, at his own charge, St. Michael's-hill alms-houſe in Briſtol.] The front and two ſides are faced with free-ſtone. It contains a chapel neatly adorned; twenty-four apartments; and other conveniencies, for twelve men and twelve women. The elder brother receives ſix ſhillings; and each of the others three ſhillings, weekly; beſides an allowance for coal, &c. To a Clergyman is paid the ſum of ten pounds yearly. He is to read the Common-Prayer, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, twice every day, except when prayers are read in St. Michael's church; at which every member of this alms-houſe is to attend. The endowment, or eſtate given for this charity, ariſes chiefly from fee-farm rents, and amounts yearly to two hundred and eighty-two pounds, three ſhillings, and four-pence. The overplus of this eſtate is paid towards the maintenance of the ſix Sailors in the merchants alms-houſe in King's-ſtreet. The charge of building and finiſhing this houſe amounted to about two thouſand five hundred pounds.

[E] To inſtruct forty boys, in writing, arithmetic, and the Church-catechiſm.] The boys are likewiſe to be cloathed. The eſtate given for this charity is an annuity of fourſcore pounds yearly, clear of all charges.

[F] In—1708, he ſettled his great benefaction, of the hoſpital in St. Auguſtine's Back, in the city aforeſaid, &c.] For the maintenance, cloathing, and education of theſe boys, and for placing them apprentices, he gave an eſtate, moſtly ariſing by fee-farm rents, to the yearly value of thirteen hundred and eighteen pounds, fifteen ſhillings, and ſix-pence farthing. And the charge of firſt fitting up the hoſpital, and making it convenient for the purpoſe, amounted to about eleven thouſand pounds. Out of that eſtate is to be paid yearly, ten pounds to a clergyman of the Church of England, for explaining and inſtructing the children in the Church-Catechiſm: and in caſe the eſtate given for this charity, be not ſufficient to anſwer the charges upon it, the executors are impowered to ſupply any deficiencies which have been, and to prevent them for the future.

mons in the time of Lent [G]; beſides many occaſional charities and benefactions to ſeveral Churches and Charity-ſchools in the ſame city of Briſtol [H].—Moreover, he built an Alms-houſe for ſix poor people at Shene, in Surrey. He gave ſix thouſand pounds for the augmentation of ſixty ſmall livings [I]. To St. Bartholomew's Hoſpital, London, he gave two thouſand pounds, wherewith was purchaſed an eſtate of one hundred pounds a year, which is ſettled on that Hoſpital; and he left to the ſame, by will, five hundred pounds more. To Chriſt's Hoſpital, at ſeveral times, he gave a thouſand pounds; and bequeathed thereto the like ſum afterwards. As alſo to St. Thomas's Hoſpital, and to Bethlehem, five hundred pounds a piece. To the Work-houſe without Biſhopſgate, two hundred pounds. To the Society for propagating the Goſpel in foreign Parts, three hundred pounds. He left, moreover, very handſome legacies to Mortlake, in Surrey, where he died [K]. And gave the ſum of one hundred pounds per annum to be continued for twelve years after his death, and to be diſtributed, by the direction of his executors, either to place out every year ten boys apprentices, or to be given towards the ſetting up ten young tradeſmen, to each ten pounds: in the whole, twelve hundred pounds. He gave likewiſe to eighteen Charity-ſchools, in ſeveral parts of England, and to be continued to them for twelve years after his deceaſe, to each ſchool yearly five pounds; or in all, each year, ninety pounds [L]. Finally, he gave towards building a Church at Manchester, in Lancaſhire, twenty pounds; and towards the building of a Church at Tiverton, in Devonſhire, fifty pounds. Beſides theſe known and public benefactions, he gave away every year large ſums in private charities, which was his practice for the courſe of many years; and there is reaſon to believe, that theſe were not much ſhort of his public charities (b). His uſual method was, never to give any thing to common beggars; but he always ordered, that poor houſekeepers, ſick, and decayed perſons, ſhould be ſought out as the fitteſt objects for his charity. In building his Hoſpitals and Alms-houſes, he ſhowed that his judgment could not be impoſed upon by the workmen, as to the goodneſs of the materials, or the value of their work: for, as he underſtood thoſe things very well, he drove what they would call a hard bargain; and paid all the workmen himſelf, if preſent, or elſe ordered them to be paid, every Saturday night. If they worked longer than their cuſtomary hours, he paid them proportionably; if otherwiſe, he deducted; but never allowed any thing for drink. It is obſervable, that all the Colſton family were animated with a ſpirit of charity and piety. Several of Mr. Edward Colſton's public benefactions were deſigned, and ſome actually begun, by his brothers; which he afterwards

In 1702, he gave to the Mint work-houſe, for employing the poor, two hundred pounds. And for placing out poor boys and girls apprentices, two hundred pounds more. He gave yearly ſixty pounds, to the charity-ſchools in the pariſhes of St. Philip and St. Jacob, St. Thomas and Redcliff, St. James's, and to ſeveral erected in other places. And left by will, to the charity-ſchools erected in the pariſhes of St. Philip and Jacob, ten pounds; of St. Thomas and Redcliffe, ten pounds; of St. Auguſtine and St. Michael, ten pounds; of St. James, ten pounds. And to each of theſe ten pounds yearly, to be continued for twelve years after his death. All this in Briſtol.

[I] He gave ſix thouſand pounds, for the augmentation of ſixty ſmall livings.] This gift at firſt was four thouſand pounds, to which he afterwards added the other two thouſand pounds. No more than a hundred pounds was to be given to one living. The diſtribution was to be after this manner: any living that was entitled to Queen Anne's bounty might have this too, on condition, that every pariſh, which did receive this, ſhould be obliged to raiſe one hundred pounds, to be added to the hundred pounds allowed by Mr. Colſton. Many livings have had the grant of this bounty from Mr. Colſton (3).

Moreover, he gave eighty-five pounds (as many as he was years old) to be diſtributed to eighty-five poor men and women there, to each twenty ſhillings, at the time of his deceaſe.

confirmed and enlarged (c). Some years before his deceaſe he retired from buſineſs, and came and lived at London, and at Mortlake, where he had a country-ſeat. At this laſt place he died, October 11, 1721, aged eighty-four years, eleven months, and nine days; and was buried the 29th of the ſame month, in the church of All-Saints, in Briſtol, where there is a monument erected to his memory [M]. His charity was his moſt ſhining virtue [N], as is abundantly manifeſt from thoſe many inſtances of it mentioned above. As for the reſt of his character, he was a conſtant communicant with the Church of England, a moſt zealous advocate for her doctrines, worſhip, and diſcipline, in oppoſition to Popery as well as Fanaticiſm, and a moſt lively and exemplary ſon of it (d). He was, likewiſe, a perſon of great temperance, meekneſs, evenneſs of temper, patience, and mortification. He always looked chearful and pleaſant, ſcarcely ever in the leaſt diſcompoſed; and was naturally of a very peaceable and quiet diſpoſition. He was remarkably circumſpect in all his actions; always obſerved the ſame regularity in keeping his accounts, as when he began the world, and was a very good maſter of book-keeping (e). His ſtrength continued vigorous, his underſtanding clear, his apprehenſion quick, and his judgment ſound, long beyond the age of man, even to reach almoſt to the end of his eighty-fifth year, without decay in his underſtanding, without labour or ſorrow (f).

It is a great pleaſure to find that beneficent inſtitutions maintain their original purity and ſpirit, and continue to anſwer the valuable purpoſes they were intended to promote. This pleaſure the editor of the preſent work lately experienced, with regard to Mr. Colſton's grand benefaction at Briſtol, the hoſpital in St. Auguſtine's Back, for the maintenance, cloathing, education, and apprenticing of a hundred boys. In going to ſee the hoſpital, in company with ſome friends, on account of Chatterton's having been brought up there, I was much ſtruck with the neatneſs, cleanlineſs, and good order which were apparent in every part of the building. It is to be obſerved, that the viſit, being entirely accidental, could not poſſibly be known by any of the people concerned in the care of the Houſe. I believe that the truſtees of the ſchool, who are ſome of the firſt citizens of Briſtol, are very exact in enforcing the regulations, and promoting the intentions of the worthy founder; and I was informed, that many perſons have been educated in the hoſpital, who have become very reſpectable and uſeful members of ſociety.] K.

COMBER, or CUMBER (THOMAS), a conſiderable Divine in the XVIIth century [A], was born in Weſtram in Kent, in the year 1645 (a), being the ſon of James Cumber, of that pariſh, [by Mary his wife, daughter of Bryan Burton, of Weſterham; which James was fourth ſon of John Comber, of Allington, in Suſſex, Eſq; deſcended from an ancient family long reſident in that county.] He was educated in grammar-learning in his native place, by Thomas Walter, and William Holland, Vicars of Weſtram. At fourteen years of age, on the 18th of April, 1659, he was admitted into Sidney-Suſſex-College, in Cambridge, under the tuition of Edmund Matthews, B. D. The 16th of January, 1662-3, he was elected Scholar of that houſe; and the next day had his grace in college for the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b): which he accordingly took, and compleated in the Univerſity (c). On the 26th of May, 1666, he had likewiſe his grace for the degree of Maſter of Arts (d). It moreover appears, that he was created Doctor in Divinity between the years 1676 and 1679; but as his name doth not occur in any of our univerſity regiſters, it is therefore probable, that he had that degree conferred upon him at Lambeth. On the 5th of July, 1677, he was collated by Archbiſhop Sterne to the Prebend of Holme, in the cathedral church of York (e); which he quitted the 19th of July, 1681, for the Prebend of Fenton, in the ſame church (f). The 19th of January, 1683-4, he was alſo collated to the Præcentorſhip (g). Upon the deprivation of Dr. Dennis Granville, he was nominated, April 23, 1691, to ſucceed him in the Deanery of Durham; whereupon he reſigned his Præcentorſhip of York (h). He was Chaplain to Anne, Princeſs of Denmark, and to King William and Queen Mary. He died November 25, 1699, in the fifty-fifth year of his age (i); and was buried at Stonegrave, in Yorkſhire, of which it ſeems he was Rector. There is a tomb-ſtone on his grave, with an inſcription [B]. He was author of ſeveral works, chiefly on the Common Prayer; in which he ſhows great piety, and very extenſive learning, having been well read in ſacred and prophane authors, both ancient and modern. Thoſe works of his, are, I. [C] With the occaſional Prayers and Thankſgivings.] Printed in two volumes 8*vo*, 1679. His general method in this work, is to give, firſt, an analyſis of each part: ſecondly, an explanation of it: thirdly, a paraphraſe; and, laſtly, a meditation upon it.

[D] A Companion to the Altar, &c.] It is dedicated by the author to his patron Richard Archbiſhop of York——To whom, as he obſerves, he was obliged to make this tender by his condition and his duty, by gratitude and affection;——having firſt received the Holy Order of Prieſthood, and the power of diſpenſing the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper from his Grace's hands. — He obſerves, in the ſame place, that 'There is nothing more uſeful to the friends of 'this Church, nor more convincing to the diſſenters 'from it, than to preſent her pure and primitive order 'of worſhip in its natural and lovely ſplendor.'—— The Imprimatur bears dates January 21, 1673-4. It was ſo well received, that a fourth edition came out in 1685, within the ſpace of eleven years. The whole is divided into four parts, containing learned obſervations, and then paraphraſes, and meditations upon each branch of the Communion-Office.

[E] A Diſcourſe upon the Offices of Baptiſm, Catechiſm, and Confirmation.] The author dedicates it to Dr. Tillotſon, then Dean of Canterbury: and ſays, 'it will contribute to the reputation of theſe tracts, to 'be uſhered in with ſo worthy a name, and add to 'their author's character, to be reckoned among the 'number of your friends.'

[F] A Diſcourſe on the occaſional Offices, &c.] Firſt printed in 1676, 8*vo*. Theſe four laſt pieces, were re-printed together in one volume, fol. 1701, divided into four parts. They are dedicated to King William.

[G] Short Diſcourſes upon the whole Common-Prayer, &c.] He tells us in his Dedication, that the importunity of his friends had engaged him to write theſe ſhorter Diſcourſes, for the uſe of thoſe who wanted time to conſider the larger work, i. e. his Companion to the Temple and Altar. As for the method and deſign of it, Firſt, the Original and Antiquity of every part of Common-Prayer is therein declared. Secondly, the method of each ſeveral piece is cleared. Thirdly, the ſenſe of all is opened by divers plain and natural obſervations on the matter of theſe offices, to help all to perform them with a devotion ſuitable to their great worth. And it is deſigned, 1. To inſtruct thoſe who did not underſtand, or rather not obſerve, theſe excellencies to be in the Common Prayer. 2. To furniſh the devout ſons of the Church with profitable meditations, to enlarge upon in their minds in the uſe of theſe prayers, and to put them into a right frame for ſaying them affectionately, and with a holy importunity. 3. It is deſigned to convince the miſtaken Diſſenters if they will hear reaſon; if not, to diſcover to others the injuſtice and malice of their clamours againſt it (4).

'the Forgeries and Errors in the Annals of Baronius [H].' Lond. 1689, 4*to*. He is said, in his epitaph, to have been a perſon eminent for piety, learning, ingenuity, judgment, [H] Roman forgeries in the Councils, &c.] In the introduction he obſerves, that in the allowed Romiſh editions of the Councils (thoſe of Binius, Colon. 1618, and of Labbé and Coſſart, Paris, 1671) 'there is 'ſuch adding and expunging, ſuch altering and diſ-'guiſing things in the body of the Councils, and ſuch 'excuſing, falſifying, and ſhuffling in the notes, that 'a judicious reader will ſoon perceive, thoſe venerable 'records truly ſet down and explained, do not favour 'them. But theſe corruptions are carried on with 'ſuch confidence and cunning, that an unexperienced 'and unwary ſtudent, may be impoſed on by this 'ſpecious ſhew of venerable antiquity: for their ſakes 'therefore he thought it neceſſary to take a ſhort view 'of that fraud and policy which is ſo commonly made 'uſe of in thoſe editions of the Councils which paſs 'through the Roman mint.' —— Then he ſays he hopes 'this undertaking will be many ways uſeful: 'Firſt, It will tend to the eaſe of thoſe who intend to 'read over the tomes of the Councils, or the Annals 'of Baronius, and ſave them much time and pains by 'preſenting the principal errors of thoſe great vo-'lumes at one view, which they would ſpend a long 'time in ſearching after, if they were to gather them 'up as they lie diſperſed. Secondly, It may be very 'uſeful to thoſe who deſire to be rightly informed in 'the controverſies between us and the Roman Church, 'becauſe it will give them a clear proſpect of what 'Councils and other antiquities are authentic, and 'may be allowed for evidence in this diſpute; wherein 'our adverſaries have ſo little regard to their own 'honour, that generally one half of their evidence is 'ſuch as they have either forged or corrupted. 'Thirdly, It will be neceſſary (by way of antidote) 'to prepare thoſe, who by reading books ſo full 'of infection, may by theſe plauſible falſifications 'be in danger to be ſeduced into a great eſteem of the 'opinions and practices of the Roman Church; when 'they find ſo many ſeemingly ancient tracts and Coun-'cils brought in to juſtify her in all things, and ſee '(by this falſe light) all Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory and 'Records ſo modelled, as to perſuade their readers, 'that in the pureſt Chriſtian times, all things were 'believed and done in the Catholic Church juſt as 'they are now at Rome. But when it ſhall appear, 'that all this is a continued ſeries and train of im-'poſtures, it will render their notions and practices, 'not only ſuſpected, but odious, as needing ſuch vile 'and baſe artifices, to make them ſeem agreeable to 'true Antiquity.' Dr. Comber correſponded with Tillotſon, Sharp, Burnet, Hicks, Cave, Lake, and other eminent Divines of the laſt century. In conſequence of this correſpondence, a noble collection of letters came into the poſſeſſion of the family, and belonged to the late Dr. Thomas Comber, of Buckworth, in the county of Huntingdon. Mr. Blackburne has formerly ſeen and peruſed moſt of theſe letters, and hath often regretted that ſo many curious particulars, relative to the times in which they were written, ſhould be loſt to the public. They are yet preſerved, but perhaps greatly injured by damp and other accidents, in the uninhabited and ruinous Manſion-Houſe, appertaining to the family, at Eaſt-Newton in Yorkſhire. Dean Comber wrote, alſo, his life, with his own hand; which, likewiſe, is locked up in the library of the ſame manſion. It unfortunately happens, on account of the heir of the Combers being a minor, that no acceſs can be had at preſent to theſe valuable materials; the truſtees of the young gentleman not thinking themſelves ſufficiently authorized to communicate them during his minority (5). We muſt wait, therefore, for a future opportunity of making more important additions to the preſent article.

(5) From the information of the Rev. Mr. Archdeacon Blackburne, of Richmond, Yorkſhire.

We ſhall here ſubjoin an account of the Comber family, with which we have been favoured by John-Charles Brooke, Eſq; Somerſet Herald, and Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, London.

Dr. Thomas Comber, Dean of Durham, married Alice, eldeſt daughter and coheir of William Thornton of Eaſt-Newton, in the pariſh of Stonegrave, in the North-Riding of the county of York, Eſq; by Alice his wife, daughter of Sir Chriſtopher Wandesford of Kirklington, in the ſaid county, Knight, ſometime Lord Deputy of Ireland; by which Lady, he ultimately came in for the manor of Eaſt-Newton, and a conſiderable eſtate in Yorkſhire; and by her had iſſue, beſides three ſons who died young, Thomas his heir, and two daughters, Alice and Mary.

Thomas Comber of Eaſt-Newton, Eſq; his ſon, was a Juſtice of Peace and of the Quorum for Yorkſhire. He married Anne, daughter of Andrew Wilſon of Eaſingwold, relict of the Rev. Elias Micklethwaite, Vicar of Gilling, and died 12th May, 1765, and was buried at Stonegrave, having had iſſue Thomas his heir; William, Vicar of Kirkby-Moorſide, and Rector of Kirkby-Overcarr in Yorkſhire, and Juſtice of Peace, who married Dorothy, daughter and heir of James Arbuthnot, of Ampleford in the ſaid county, Eſq; by whom he has no iſſue (1783); and Andrew, who died a minor.

Thomas Comber, of Eaſt-Newton, his eldeſt ſon, was of Jeſus-college, Cambridge, L.L.D. and Rector of Morborne and Buckworth, in the county of Huntingdon. He was a man of conſiderable parts and learning, and author of ſome works. He married his couſin Mary, eldeſt daughter of William Brooke, of Dodworth, Eſq; hereafter mentioned; by whom he had five children, Anne, Thomas, Duncombe, William-Turner, and Andrew, all (1783) under age. He died at Buckworth, on the 9th of April, 1778, and was buried at Stonegrave.

Alice, Dean Comber's eldeſt daughter, married, firſt Francis Blackburne, of St. Nicholas, near Richmond, in the county of York, by whom ſhe had iſſue Francis Blackburne, Thomas, who died young at Cambridge, and Jane, who was the firſt wife of Sir Oneſiphorus Paul, of Woodcheſter, in the county of Glouceſter, Bart. The ſaid Alice married, ſecondly William Kirkby, of Kirkby and Aſhlack, in Lancaſhire, Eſq; by whom ſhe had iſſue William-Comber Kirkby, of Aſhlack, Eſq; James and Sarah, all living in 1783. She died in Nov. 1740, and is buried at Kirkby.

Francis Blackburne, M. A. [Archdeacon of Cleveland, Yorkſhire, Vicar of Richmond in the ſame county, well known in the republic of letters, by his able and learned publications, married Mrs. Elſworth, a widow lady, by whom he had five children, who arrived to years of maturity, three ſons and two daughters. Francis, the eldeſt ſon, is Vicar of Brignall, Yorkſhire. Thomas, the ſecond ſon, was bred at Peterhouſe-College, Cambridge, and was likewiſe intended for the Church; but declining to make the uſual ſubſcriptions, he relinquiſhed his proſpects, which were very conſiderable, and retired to Edinburgh, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic, and became M. D. He ſettled as a Phyſician at Durham, in which city he died young, having obtained a great reputation. Some time before his deceaſe he was choſen a Fellow of the Royal Society. William, the youngeſt ſon, M. D. has ſucceeded his brother at Durham. Jane, Archdeacon Blackburn's eldeſt daughter, is married to the Rev. Dr. Diſney; and Sarah, the youngeſt, to the Rev. Mr. Hall. *]

* Addition, by the Editor.

Mary, Dean Comber's younger daughter, married Thomas Brooke, of Dodworth, in the Weſt-Riding of ment, and other excellent qualities, and a ſtrenuous defender of the doctrine, worſhip, and diſcipline of the Church of England.

of Yorkſhire, A. M. Rector of Richmond, who was eldeſt ſon and heir of William Brooke, of the ſame place, Eſq; by whom ſhe had iſſue William, and Anne, married to Richard Fenton, of Banktop, Eſq; Clerk of the Peace for the Weſt-Riding of Yorkſhire (by whom an only daughter, Mary, now the wife of Sir William Wake, of Courtenhall, in Northamptonſhire, Bart.) She died July 20, 1768, and was buried at Silkſton.

William Brooke, of Dodworth, Eſq; A. M. of St. John's-college, Cambridge; married Alice, eldeſt daughter and coheir of William Mawhood, of Doncaſter, and died Auguſt 24, 1755, and was buried at Silkſton, leaving iſſue William; John-Charles Brooke, of Pond, in Yorkſhire, Somerſet-Herald, and F.S.A. Mary, married to her couſin Dr. Thomas Comber before-mentioned; Margaret, and Jane married to Richard-Horton Briſco, of Briſco, in Cumberland, Eſq;

William Brooke, of Dodworth, Eſq; married Elizabeth Morris, by whom he hath Thomas, William, Jane, and Margaret, all infants (1783.)] K.

COMPTON (WILLIAM), anceſtor of the preſent noble Earls of Northampton and Wilmington, was the ſon of Edmund de Compton [A], and born in the year 1481 (a). The firſt foundation of his ſucceeding honours and riches, was, his being made, in the eleventh year of his age (b), one of the Pages to Henry Duke of York, afterwards King by the title of Henry VIII. who, as ſoon as he came to the crown, made him Groom of his Bedchamber (c); and, before the expiration of that year, chief Gentleman of his Bedchamber (d). He grew ſo much in favour with that King, that he was appointed by him, in the ſecond year of his reign, 1510, Groom of the Stole (e); and, ſoon after, Conſtable of Sudley-Caſtle, in Glouceſterſhire (f); as he was alſo of Glouceſter-Caſtle, in 1511 (g). In conſideration of his good and faithful ſervices, he obtained, in 1512, November the 7th, a ſpecial grant, to himſelf and his heirs, of an honourable augmentation to his arms (h), out of the King's own royal enſigns and devices [B]; and, on the 4th of February next enſuing, the King conferred on him the office of Uſher of the Black Rod, with an allowance of twelve-pence a day for that ſervice (i). He had likewiſe, the ſame year, by his Majeſty's favour, a large grant, to himſelf, and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten (k), of ſeveral lands and manors [C]. In 1513, being a Knight, he had a commiſſion to retain men in any of thoſe lordſhips belonging to the monaſteries whereof he was then ſteward, for the ſervice of the King in his wars (l); and, in the expedition to Terouenne and Tournay, the ſame year, led the rere guard of the King's army (m). Shortly after, he was made one of the Knights for the King's body (n); as alſo Chancellor of Ireland, with liberty to execute that office by a ſufficient deputy (o). But he did not hold it long; for, two years after, namely, in 1515, it was given to the Archbiſhop of Dublin (p). In 1514, and 1517, he had a grant to himſelf and his wife, and to the heirs of their two bodies lawfully begotten (q), of ſeveral manors and eſtates [D]. The ſame year, namely, 1517, he was appointed Conſtable of Hanley-Caſtle, in Worceſterſhire (r); and in 1518, was ordered to provide fifty archers for the King's ſervice in his wars (s). In 1519, he obtained licence to make a park at his manor of Compton Vineyatys, or Vineyard, in Warwickſhire; and, for an addition to the ſame, to incloſe two thouſand acres more thereto adjoining (t). Upon the attainder of Edward Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, in 1521, he obtained a grant of the manor, caſtle, and park of Max-

[A] Was the ſon of Edmund de Compton.] This noble family derive their deſcent from Turchill the ſon of Alwin; who, in the time of Edward the Confeſſor, reſided at Warwick, of which county he was Earl. At the time of the Norman conqueſt, not joining with Harold, he continued in the poſſeſſion of his own lands, among which was the Lordſhip of Compton, and forty-ſeven manors in divers counties. By Leverunia his ſecond wife he had Oſbert, who wrote himſelf of Compton, and was anceſtor of the preſent noble family. His ſecond ſon was Philip; to whom ſucceeded his ſon and heir Thomas, that lived in the reign of Henry the third; and whoſe eldeſt ſon was Philip, father of Robert de Compton, who was knighted before the 13th of Edward the ſecond; and was ſucceeded by Robert, father of Thomas de Compton. He was one of the Coroners for Warwickſhire, in the 23d of Edward the third, an office of great account in thoſe days. It was enjoyed after him by his ſon and heir Edmund, who died in the reign of Henry IV. He had iſſue ſix ſons, whereof William the eldeſt, dying about the year 1431, left iſſue Robert his ſon and heir, who died in 1480. His ſon, and ſucceſſor was Edmund, who dying in 1492, left iſſue by Joan his wife, daughter and heir of Walter Aylworth, Eſq; William, who is the ſubject of this article (1).

ſtoke, in Warwickſhire; as alſo of the manors of Scotton and Brereton, in Yorkſhire, in reverſion, after the death or ſurrender of Simon Coniers (u). In 1523, he was employed, with the Earl of Surrey, and the Marquis of Dorſet, &c. to make incurſions into Scotland. This ungrateful office was put upon him by the contrivance of Cardinal Wolſey; who, obſerving how much Sir William was in the King's favour, and fearing he ſhould diminiſh his authority, procured him to be thus ſent into the wars againſt the Scots. For Sir William could not bear the Cardinal's preſumption, in taking ſo much upon him to the derogation of the King's prerogative; therefore the Cardinal thought, in his abſence, to have worked him out of favour. But he could not; for the King recalled him ſoon after to court (w); and, in 1525, conſtituted him Keeper of his money and jewels (x), which is the ſame we now call the Privy Purſe (y). Sir William built a very noble houſe at his manor of Compton [E]; and, in the chapel, erected a beautiful window towards the eaſt, in the painted glaſs of which, moſt curiouſly done, was repreſented the Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt; and in the lower part, Sir William himſelf and his Lady, kneeling, in their ſurcoats of arms (z). He died of the ſweating ſickneſs, in the year 1528, May 31, aged forty-ſeven (a), being at that time of the Privy Chamber to the King, who was then alſo in great danger (b). His body was buried at Compton, as he had deſired in his will, bearing date March 8, 1522; in which he alſo deſired, that his Lady ſhould be interred in the ſame place; and, that a tomb of alabaſter ſhould be made, by the direction of his executors, for his father, and ſet over his grave, with his arms cut thereon. Likewiſe, that his mother's body ſhould be taken up from the place where ſhe lay buried, and depoſited by his father. Moreover, he appointed that his executors ſhould found in his name two chantries at Compton, and that every Prieſt therein ſhould have a yearly ſalary of ten marks (c) [F]. He married Werburge, daughter and heir of Sir John Brereton, Knt. and widow of Sir Francis Cheney, Knt. by whom he had iſſue,

PETER, who being under age at the time of his father's deceaſe, was put under the wardſhip of Cardinal Wolſey (d). He married Anne, daughter of George, Earl of Shrewſbury; but dying before he came of age, on the 30th of January, 1543, he left only one ſon, forty-nine weeks and five days old (e), named

HENRY, who was knighted February 10, 1566, by the Earl of Leiceſter; and, on the 8th of May, 1572, ſummoned by writ to the Houſe of Lords, by the title of Baron Compton, of Compton. In 1586, he was one of the Peers for the trial of Mary Queen of Scots (f). He is ſuppoſed to have died in the year 1589 (g). By his firſt Lady, Frances, daughter to Francis Haſtings, Earl of Huntingdon, he had, among other children [G],

WILLIAM, his eldeſt ſon and heir, who was ſummoned to Parliament in the thirty-fifth of Queen Elizabeth, and was one of the Privy-Council to that Queen. On the 5th of January, 1604, he was made Knight of the Bath at the creation of Charles, Duke of York, afterwards King by the title of Charles I. (h); and was conſtituted, ſome years after, Preſident of the Council for the Marches of Wales (i), and Lord-Lieutenant of the counties of Worceſter, Hereford, Salop, and Warwick (k). On the 2d of Auguſt, 1618, he was advanced to the title of Earl of Northampton (l); and on the 21ſt of April, 1629, inſtalled a Knight of the Garter. He died June 24, 1630, leaving iſſue, by Elizabeth his Lady, ſole daughter and heir of Sir John Spencer, Alderman of London; Spencer, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next article.

COMPTON (SPENCER), only ſon of the former [A], and ſecond Earl of Northampton, deſerves to be particularly remembered. He was made Knight of the Bath, on the 3d of November, 1616, at the time when Charles, Duke of York, (afterwards King Charles I.) was created Prince of Wales, with whom he became a great favourite. In 1622, he accompanied him into Spain, waiting on him in quality of Maſter of his Robes and Wardrobe, and had the honour to deliver all his preſents, amounting, as was computed, to ſixty-four thouſand pounds. At the Coronation of that Prince, he attended as Maſter of the Robes; and, in 1639, waited on his Majeſty in his expedition againſt the Scots. He was likewiſe among thoſe Noblemen, who, on the 4th of May 1641, took the Proteſtation to defend the true Proteſtant Religion expreſſed in the doctrine of the Church of England, and his Majeſty's Royal perſon, honour, and eſtate; as alſo the power and privilege of Parliaments, and the lawful rights and liberties of the ſubject (a). In 1642, he waited upon his Majeſty at York; and was one of the Lords who ſubſcribed, the 15th of June the ſame year, a Declaration at that place, wherein they profeſſed before God, and teſtified to all the world, that they were fully perſuaded, that his Majeſty had no intention to make war upon his Parliament: but that all his endeavours tended to the firm and conſtant ſettlement of the true Proteſtant Religion; the juſt privileges of Parliament, the liberty of the ſubject, and the law, peace, and proſperity of the kingdom (b). Having, after that, often endeavoured to compoſe the unhappy jealouſies in the nation; but finding his endeavours ineffectual, and that the Parliament were raiſing forces to diſtreſs ſuch as came not into its meaſures, he thought it more for his Majeſty's ſervice to retire to his native country: where he ſoon got together ſuch a number of Gentlemen and Soldiers, as awed the country into the King's allegiance, drove the Lord Brook out of Warwickſhire, who endeavoured to ſecure that county for the Parliament; and in twelve ſkirmiſhes put a ſtop to the Earl of Eſſex's rendezvous at Northampton (c). After King Charles I. had ſet up his ſtandard at Nottingham, he raiſed, one of the firſt, at his own charge, a troop of horſe, and a regiment of foot (d): and, at the battle between Keinton and Edge-hill, brought two thouſand of the beſt diſciplined men in the whole army. When that battle (which happened on the 23d of October 1642) was over, the King's army having taken Banbury, a garriſon was placed therein under the command of the Earl of Northampton (e): who, by his vigilance and conduct, performed many ſucceſsful ſervices, and was the life of his Majeſty's cauſe in thoſe parts. He ſecured moſt of the arms, ammunition, and garriſons in Warwickſhire, Staffordſhire, and Northamptonſhire, and ſettling an aſſociation, made the country, from garriſon to garriſon, one line of communication (f). Afterwards, with a ſtrong party of horſe and dragoons, from his garriſon at Banbury, he relieved the town of Stafford, that was beſieged by Sir John Gell; and putting himſelf into that town, beat up a quarter of the enemies, in which he took and killed above an hundred of their horſe. But Sir John Gell having joined Sir William Brereton, and they being nearly three thouſand foot and horſe, with a good train of artillery, moved back towards Stafford, imagining the Earl of Northampton would meet them without the walls. And it happened according to their expectation: for, on Sunday the 19th of March, 1642-3, as ſoon as he heard they were advancing towards the town, he marched out with his party, conſiſting in all of nearly one thouſand horſe, dragoons, and foot, to encounter them. He found the enemy in very good order, expecting him on a plain called Cranock-green, Salt-heath, or Hopton-heath (g), about two or three miles from Stafford. Though their number was more than double that of his Lordſhip's [B], yet the heath ſeeming very fair, the breadth of it being more than muſquet-ſhot from the encloſure on each ſide, and the number of his horſe at leaſt equal to theirs, he reſolved to charge them; and accordingly did, with ſo good ſucceſs, that he totally routed one part of their horſe. Rallying again his men, he charged the other part of their horſe, which ſtood more in ſhelter of their foot, and ſo totally diſperſed them, that the enemy had ſcarcely a horſe left upon the field. He took likewiſe from them eight pieces of cannon [C]. In this ſecond charge, his Lordſhip being engaged in the execution, very near, or among, their foot, had his horſe killed under him [D]: ſo that his own body of horſe, purſuing the [B] Though their number was more than double that of his Lordſhip's.] We are aſſured, that the number of their men, was 'near three thouſand foot and horſe, 'with a good train of artillery (2).' Some of the Parliament-Hiſtorians (3) affirm indeed, that Sir John Gell's army conſiſted but of about fifteen hundred, horſe and foot: and the Earl's of about twelve hundred: though they mention afterwards the coming of Sir William Brereton to Gell's aſſiſtance, before the fight was ended. But they do not expreſs the number of the forces he brought; in which point, their ſilence ſeems to be culpable, as being deſigned to miſlead the reader. Such inſtances are very frequent in Vicars's Chronicle; which indeed is only a heap of falſehood and miſrepreſentations, as well as of moſt ſhocking hypocriſy, and canting nonſenſe. Honeſt Mr. Whitelock tells us plainly, and without diſguiſe (4), that Sir John Gell and Sir William Brereton came with three thouſand horſe and foot.

[C] And ſo totally diſperſed them, that the enemy had ſcarcely a horſe left upon the field, &c.] This is the Lord Clarendon's account. And Dr. Ryves more particularly informs us (*) that in this fight above three hundred of the rebels were taken and killed; at the leaſt, two hundred more wounded; above three hundred of their horſe taken, with four pieces of cannon, and a caſe of Drakes. And on the King's ſide, ſome few ſlain. On the other hand Vicars affirms (5), that the Parliament-forces repulſed the Earl's horſe,——and at leaſt an hundred and forty Cavaliers were ſlain with him; with the loſs of eight or ten only of the Parliamentarians. And 'by the 'timely coming in of Sir William Brereton, before 'the fight was ended, Sir John Gell obtained a glo-'rious victory, and drove his enemies quite out of 'the field.' Such are the frequent contradictions between Hiſtorians of different parties. But, on which ſide the victory inclined, we may judge by the conſequence. And that it was in the King, is evident by the Earl of Northampton's forces recovering Litchfield ſoon after; which the others would never have permitted them to do, had they been victorious.

chaſe with too much fury, he was left encompaſſed by the enemy. After he was on his feet, he killed, with his own hand, the Colonel of foot, who firſt came near him; and, after his head-piece was ſtruck off with the but-end of a muſquet, they offered him quarter; which he refuſed, anſwering, 'That he ſcorned to take quarter from ſuch baſe rogues 'and rebels, as they were.' Upon this, he was ſlain by a blow with a halbert on the hinder part of his head, receiving, at the ſame time, another deep wound in his face (b). He was then in the forty-ſecond year of his age (i). The enemy refuſed to deliver the body to the young Earl of Northampton, and would not even permit his Chirurgeons to come and embalm it, unleſs he would deliver, in exchange for it, all the ammunition, priſoners, and cannon he had taken in the late battle (k). However, it was delivered up at laſt, and buried in Allhallows Church in Derby, in the ſame vault with his relation the old Counteſs of Shrewſbury (l). As to this noble Lord's character, we are informed, that he was a perſon of great courage, honour, and fidelity, and not well known till his evening; having, in the eaſe, plenty, and luxury, antecedent to our unhappy diſſenſions, indulged himſelf in that licence which was then thought neceſſary to great fortunes. But, from the beginning of the civil wars, as if he had been awakened out of a lethargy, he never proceeded with a lukewarm temper. From the time he ſubmitted himſelf to the profeſſion of a ſoldier, no man was more punctual upon command, no man more active and vigilant in duty. All diſtreſſes he bore like a common man, and all wants and hardſhips, as if he had never known plenty or eaſe; moſt prodigal of his perſon to danger; and would often ſay, That if he outlived theſe wars, he was certain never to have ſo noble a death (m). His Lordſhip married Mary, daughter of Sir Francis Beaumont, Knt. by whom he had two daughters, and ſix ſons. The daughters were, Anne, married to Sir Hugh Cholmondeley, of Whitby, in Yorkſhire, Bart. and Penelope, to Sir John Nicholas, Knight of the Bath, eldeſt ſon of Sir Edward Nicholas, one of the Secretaries of State to King Charles I. and King Charles II. (n). Of the ſons, who were all highly eſteemed for their eminent abilities, and all inherited their father's courage, loyalty, and virtue, five of them received the honour of Knighthood; namely, James, the eldeſt ſon, and heir; Sir Charles; Sir William [E]; Sir Spencer; and Sir Francis; and Henry, the ſixth, and youngeſt, Biſhop of London, was no leſs conſpicuous. At the battle of Hopton-heath, the three eldeſt, who were officers under their father, charged that day in the field, when Sir James, the eldeſt, received a ſhot in one of his legs (o). At the battle of Edge hill he was abſent; but Sir Charles and Sir William, though neither of them were twenty, charged in the troop with their father; and Sir Spencer, though not able to graſp a piſtol, yet in indignation wept, That he was not expoſed to the ſame hazard as his brothers (p).

[E] Sir William.] This brave gentleman had the command of a regiment, wherewith he performed conſiderable ſervice at the taking of Banbury, leading his men on to three attacks, and had two horſes ſhot under him. Upon the ſurrender of the town and caſtle, he was made Lieutenant-Governor under his father; and on the 19th of July, 1644, when the Parliament's forces came before the town he returned anſwer to their ſummons; 'That he kept the caſtle 'for his Majeſty, and as long as one man was left 'alive in it, willed them not to expect to have it deli-'vered:' alſo on the 16th of September, they ſending him another ſummons, he made anſwer, 'That 'he had formerly anſwered them, and wondered they 'ſhould ſend again.' He was ſo vigilant in his ſtation, that he countermined the enemy eleven times, and during the ſiege, which held thirteen weeks, never went into bed, but by his example ſo animated the garriſon, that though they had but two horſes left uneaten, they would never ſuffer a ſummons to be ſent to them, after the anſwer before-mentioned was delivered. At length, his brother the Earl of Northampton raiſed the ſiege on the 26th of October, the very day of the month, on which both town and caſtle had been ſurrendered to the King two years before. Sir William continued Governor of Banbury, and performed many ſignal ſervices for the King, till his Majeſty left Oxford, and the whole kingdom was ſubmitting to the Parliament; and then on the 8th of May, 1646, ſurrendered upon honourable terms. In 1648, he was Major-General of the King's forces at Colcheſter, where he was ſo much taken notice of for his admirable behaviour, that Oliver Cromwell called him the ſober young man, and the godly Cavalier. At the reſtoration of King Charles II. he was made one of the Privy-Council, and Maſter-General of the Ordnance; and died October 19, 1663, in the 39th year of his age, having married Elizabeth, widow of Lord Allington of Horſheath in Cambridgeſhire, with whom he lived twelve years, but left no iſſue (7). There is an epitaph erected to his memory in the church of Compton-Winyate (8). M.

COMPTON (JAMES), the eldeſt of the ſix ſons laſt mentioned, and third Earl of Northampton, taking arms with his father for King Charles I. was diſtinguiſhed for his bravery and conduct, and performed many gallant acts in thoſe times of confuſion. He was at the battle of Edge-hill, the taking of Banbury, &c. (a); and waiting upon the King at Oxford, had the degree of Doctor of Laws conferred on him by that Univerſity, November 1, 1642 (b). The 19th of March following, he was in the engagement at Hopton-heath, where receiving a ſhot in one of his legs, he was obliged to quit the field (c). However, he was in a ſhort time ſo well recovered of that wound, that on the 8th of April, 1643, he was with Prince Rupert at the taking of Litchfield, and the ſurrender of the Cloſe there, the 21ſt of the ſame month. Alſo May 6, the ſame year, he routed a party of the enemies of horſe and foot (d), at Middleton-cheney, in Northamptonſhire, which thought themſelves ſtrong enough to attempt the taking of Banbury; and he defeated their horſe, killed above two hundred of their foot, and took as many more priſoners.

ers (e). He afterwards commanded the horſe at the firſt battle of Newbury, September 20, 1643, and charged and put to flight the enemy's horſe under Sir William Waller. On the 29th of June, 1644, he was one of the commanders at Cropredry-bridge fight, wherein Sir William Waller was routed again (f). Soon after he marched with the King into Cornwall; and at his return raiſed the ſiege of Banbury, October 26, 1644, routing the Parliament forces, though their horſe were much ſuperior in number (g). Then joining the King, he relieved Donnington-Caſtle; whereupon battle was offered to the enemy, who declined it, though they had juſt before obtained advantages in the ſecond fight at Newbury, the Earl being abſent in raiſing the ſiege of Banbury (h). On the 18th of March, 1644-5, he and his three brothers routed a great body of the Parliamentarians horſe, of Northampton, near Althorp, killed about thirty, and hurt many more, taking twenty-ſix priſoners (i). But in April, 1645, he was defeated by Lieutenant-General Cromwell, near Oxford, and ſeveral of his men were taken priſoners (k). After this, finding that his Majeſty was overpowered by the Parliament, he reſolved to go beyond ſea, and obtained a paſs from the Houſe of Commons for that purpoſe (l). But, however, he ſeems to have compounded for his eſtates, and to have ſtaid in the kingdom (m). Afterwards, the powers in being growing jealous of him, he was impriſoned; but diſcharged again, the 2d of November 1659, upon ſecurity given to live peaceably (n). On the 29th of May 1660, at the Reſtoration of King Charles II. he led a troop of two hundred Gentlemen, clothed in grey and blue: and, in the reign of that King, was of the Privy-Council, Conſtable of the Tower of London, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Warwick, and city of Coventry, Recorder of the ſame, and alſo of the towns of Northampton and Tamworth. He died at his ſeat of Caſtle-Aſhby in Northamptonſhire, December 15, 1681, and was interred among his anceſtors at Compton in the county of Warwick; which church being demoliſhed in the civil wars, was rebuilt at his Lordſhip's ſole expence, in 1665. [B] GEORGE, who ſucceeded him in his honours.] His Lordſhip was of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, where he was created Maſter of Arts, February 18, 1681-2 (2). On Queen Anne's acceſſion, he was ſworn of her Privy-Council; and in 1712, appointed Conſtable of the Tower of London. His Lordſhip died April 15, 1727, and was buried at Compton with his anceſtors. By his firſt Lady, Jane, youngeſt daughter of Sir Stephen Fox, Knt. whom he married in 1686 (3), he had iſſue four ſons; JAMES, Earl of Northampton; George, Member in Parliament for Northampton, and one of the Lords of the Treaſury: Stephen, who died young; and Charles, who on the 10th of May, 1727, was appointed Conſul at Liſbon, and Conſul-General in the dominions of Portugal.  [For a farther account of this noble family in general, we refer to the peerages; but as Spencer Compton, the youngeſt ſon of James the third Earl of Northampton, raiſed himſelf, by his abilities, to eminent ſtations, and to high rank, we ſhall add a few particulars concerning him. This gentleman was introduced into Parliament in 1689, and continued in the Houſe of Commons, without interruption, till the year 1727. In 1714, he was choſen Speaker of that Houſe, and ſuſtained this important and honourable ſituation during three ſucceſſive Parliaments. King George the firſt, towards the latter end of his reign, conferred upon him the dignity of Knight of the Bath. Beſides being created Baron, and afterwards Earl of Wilmington, he was a Privy-Counſellor, Knight of the Garter, and ſome time preſident of the council. When Sir Robert Walpole was diſplaced in 1742, the Earl of Wilmington ſucceeded him as Firſt Commiſſioner of the Treaſury. This office he held till his death, which happened on the ſecond of July, in 1743 (5). Dying unmarried, he bequeathed his eſtate to the Earl of Northampton (6). The Earl of Wilmington appears to have been a friend to the Church, and an encourager of genius and learning. For a proof of the former, we may mention, that he gave, in 1716, two hundred pounds, for the augmentation of the Vicarage of Wilmington, in Suſſex (7). It is no ſmall teſtimony of the latter, that he was one of the earlieſt patrons of Thomſon the Poet, who inſcribed to him his "Winter," which was the firſt of his publications. From this circumſtance his Lordſhip has obtained an eulogium that reflects a greater luſtre upon him than all his titles, and which will tranſmit his name with honour to poſterity, when his external diſtinctions are no longer regarded. The following lines, from the beginning of the later editions of the "Winter," will be an ample demonſtration of the truth of our aſſertion.

COMPTON (HENRY), Biſhop of London in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth Century, and one of the moſt eminent Prelates that ever ſat in that See, was the ſixth [A] and youngeſt ſon of Spencer, the ſecond Earl of Northampton, mentioned in the foregoing article. He was born at Compton (a) in the year 1632 (b). His father being unhappily ſlain in 1642-3, when this his youngeſt ſon was but ten years old, he was thereby deprived of that paternal care which is ſo neceſſary in that tender age. However, (notwithſtanding that misfortune) he received an education ſuitable to his quality. When he had gone through the Grammar-ſchools, he was entered a Nobleman of Queen's-College, in Oxford, in the year 1649; and having continued there till about 1652, went and lived with his mother at Gryndon, in Northamptonſhire. Afterwards he travelled beyond ſea (c), where he remained a conſiderable time, and examined the civil and eccleſiaſtical polities abroad; but the more he obſerved them, the more he liked the Engliſh conſtitution. He ſaw their manners, and was too wiſe to imitate them. However, what he thought valuable amongſt them he brought home, and in particular retained their languages perfectly (d) [B]. After the Reſtoration of King Charles II. he returned to England; and a regiment of horſe being raiſed about that time for the King's guard, of which the command was given to Aubrey Earl of Oxford, Mr. Compton accepted of a Cornet's commiſſion therein, either by his own choice, or the perſuaſion of friends. But, ſoon after, diſcovering a greater inclination to his ſtudies than to a military life, he quitted that poſt, and dedicated himſelf to the ſervice of the Church (e). Accordingly he went to Cambridge, where he was created Maſter of Arts (f). Afterwards entering into Orders [C], and obtaining a grant of the next vacant Canonry of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, he was admitted Canon-Commoner of that college, in the beginning of the year 1666, by the advice of Dr. John Fell, then Dean of the ſame (g). The 7th of April next enſuing, he was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, as he ſtood at Cambridge (h): about which time, he was poſſeſſed of the Rectory of Cottenham in Cambridgeſhire, worth above five hundred pounds a year. Before that, he had a ſmaller benefice. In both he ſhowed his great concern for the ſouls of men. He was conſtituted in 1667, Maſter of St. Croſſe's Hoſpital near Wincheſter, upon the death of Dr. William Lewis [D]. On the 24th of May 1669, he was inſtalled Canon of Chriſt-Church [E], in the room of Dr. Richard Heylin deceaſed (i). Two days after (k), he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (l); and that of Doctor, the 28th of June following (m). Advancing daily in the King's favour and eſteem, and in the opinion of all good men, he was, upon the tranſlation of Dr. Nathaniel Crew from the Biſhopric of Oxford to that of Durham, nominated to ſucceeed him in the See of Oxford; to which he was elected November 10, confirmed December 2, and conſecrated at Lambeth December 6, 1674 (n). About July, 1675, he was made Dean of the Royal Chapel, on the death of Dr. Blandford, Biſhop of Worceſter; and being the ſame year tranſlated to the See of London [F], in the

We are told that he was 'in the field at Edgehill in his cradle; by which 'is underſtood, that he was carried to the camp for 'ſecurity when very young (2).' But certainly he could not be there in his cradle: for he was then ten years old.

He obſerved and 'examined the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Polities abroad; 'he made them his ſtudy, but not his rule. The 'more he ſtaid in France and Italy, &c. the more 'Engliſhman he was; he came home the better 'Stateſman and the better Churchman; he was proof 'againſt all their arts, to debauch either his princi'ples or his practices.' Whilſt he was abroad, he is ſaid to have trailed a pike in Flanders, under the Duke of York (4).

[D] He was conſtituted in 1667, Maſter of St. Croſſe's Hoſpital, &c.] A fit preferment, as Dr. Gooch rightly obſerves (6), for him, whoſe houſe was always a conſtant hoſpital! By this his income was conſiderably increaſed, (it being above 500 a year) and he had greater opportunities of doing good; the only motive to him to wiſh for its increaſe; this was his greateſt pleaſure; and here he lived, and enjoyed it: here he would gladly have reſted; but Providence had deſigned him for greater things.

[F] Being the ſame year, tranſlated to the See of London.] Anth. Woods tells us (8), that, 'This 'tranſlation was much promoted by ſome of the po'litic Clergy, becauſe they knew him to be a bold 'man, an enemy to the Paptiſts, and one that would 'act, and ſpeak what they would put him upon, 'which they themſelves would not be ſeen in, as many 'prime Papiſts uſed to ſay.' We are alſo informed (9), that this tranſlation was effected through the Earl of Danby's intereſt; to whom the Biſhop was a property, and was turned by him as he pleaſed. The Duke of York hated him; but Lord Danby perſuaded both the King and him, that, as his heat did no great hurt to any perſon, ſo the giving way to it helped the room of Dr. Henchman, deceaſed, was confirmed therein the 18th of December (o). On the 22d of January, 1675-6, King Charles, who entertained a juſt opinion of his capacity and fidelity, cauſed him to be ſworn one of his Privy-Council; which ſtation his Majeſty thought fit to continue him in, upon his conſtituting a new Privy-Council in April 1679 (p). The educating and well-grounding of the King's two nieces, the Princeſſes Mary and Anne (q), in the doctrine and communion of the Church of England, were committed to his care; and that important truſt he diſcharged, to the nation's univerſal ſatisfaction [G]. On the 4th of November, 1677, he had the honour of performing the ceremony of the marriage of the eldeſt, Mary, with William Prince of Orange; and on the 28th of July, 1683, that of Anne, the youngeſt, with George Prince of Denmark (r). The firmneſs of theſe two Princeſſes in the Proteſtant religion, was owing, in a great meaſure, to their learned tutor Biſhop Compton; which afterwards, when Popery came to prevail at the Court of England, was imputed to him as an unpardonable crime. During the mutual heats and animoſities in the latter part of King Charles the Second's reign, ſome of the moſt learned and exemplary Clergy endeavoured, both in private and public, to bring the Diſſenters to a ſenſe of the neceſſity of union among Proteſtants. To promote that good deſign, our worthy Biſhop held, in 1679, three conferences with his Clergy upon the two Sacraments, and upon catechiſing youth in the true principles of religion. In 1680, he purſued the ſame deſign in three other conferences; namely, on the half communion; prayers in an unknown tongue; and prayers to Saints: the ſubſtance of which he publiſhed in a letter to the Clergy of his dioceſe, dated July 6, 1680. He farther hoped, that it might tend to pacify and reconcile the Diſſenters, by bringing in the judgment of foreign Divines againſt their needleſs ſeparation. For that purpoſe, he wrote to Monſieur Le Moyne, Profeſſor in Divinity at Leyden, to Mr. de l'Angle, one of the Preachers at the Proteſtant Church at Charenton, near Paris; and to Mr. Claude, another eminent French Divine; who, in their ſeveral anſwers [H], agreed in vindicating the Church of England from any errors in its doctrine, or any unlawful impoſitions in its ſervice and diſcipline; and, therefore, did condemn a ſeparation from it, as needleſs and uncharitable (s). But Popery was what the Biſhop moſt ſtrenuouſly oppoſed: for, when it was gaining ground in theſe kingdoms, under the favour and influence of the heir-apparent to the Crown, James Duke of York, our worthy Prelate, at the head of his Clergy, made a noble ſtand; and, by his encouragement, their pulpits and their pens more ſtrenuouſly defended the reformed religion, than it had ever been, to the ſhame and ſilence of their Romiſh adverſaries [I]. The great diſſervice thereby done to theſe, and their cauſe, was remembered, and reſented, when King James II. aſcended the throne.

helped to lay the jealouſies of the Church-Party. About a year after that, Sheldon dying, Biſhop Compton was perſuaded that Lord Danby had tried with all his ſtrength to promote him to Canterbury; though that was never once intended. He was a great patron of the converts from Popery, and of thoſe Proteſtants whom the bad uſage they were beginning to meet with in France drove over to us: And by theſe means he came to have a great reputation. He uſed to make many complaints to the King, and often in Council, of the inſolence of the Papiſts, and of Coleman's in particular. So that the King ordered the Duke to diſmiſs Coleman out of his ſervice: yet he continued ſtill in his confidence.

[G] And that important truſt he diſcharged to the nation's univerſal ſatisfaction.] How well he executed it, as Dr. Gooch obſerves (10), let thoſe confeſs, who value the memory of the late moſt renowned Queen (Mary), or have not laid aſide all duty to our preſent moſt gracious Sovereign (11). They never forgot their obligations to him; but he was always in the eſteem of the former, and received marks of favour from the latter. He had the particular honour which no one Biſhop ever had, of marrying two Regent Queens to Proteſtant Princes. They were both confirmed by him January 23, 1675-6 (12).

[I] By his encouragement, their pulpits and their pens more ſtrenuouſly defended the Reformed Religion, than it had ever been.] This we learn from a Gentleman, who had been his Lordſhip's Chaplain (13). 'From 'whatever quarter, ſays he, or at what time ſoever 'any aſſault was made upon our Doctrine or Diſci-'pline, his vigilance and Chriſtian courage were 'upon the guard to defend them; of which I ſhall 'give only ſome few inſtances within the narrow 'compaſs of my own knowledge. 1. From hence 'proceeded that volume of uſeful Tracts againſt the 'Diſſenters, to convince them by Reaſon, Scripture, 'and Antiquity, of the unreaſonableneſs of their ſe-'paration, and ill-grounded ſcruples: never yet re-'plied to, or to be anſwered. 2. From hence like-'wiſe (before, and even under his ſuſpenſion) came 'forth the diſtinct Reply to all the pretences of the 'Church of Rome, in their day of exaltation and trial; 'moſt of them written by the beſt-learned Divines of 'this City. Join both theſe together, and you will 'find enough ſaid to confirm you in the faith and 'worſhip of this Church, againſt the adverſaries on 'either hand; not to ſeparate from our holy Apoſto-'lical Communion, out of needleſs ſcruple, and the 'ſo often-baffled pretences of ſeeking after greater 'purity, and better edification; nor yet to be per-'verted to Idolatry, in order to find out the true 'Church. 3. The danger of Socinianiſm, and other 'Hereſies, did not eſcape his care or remedy, as 'far as his power and perſuaſion could reach: to 'this end, many learned and rational treatiſes have 'been publiſhed by his Clergy on this ſubject. And 'when the diſpute about the holy undivided Trinity 'was managed by ſome, in new and unuſual terms, a 'Royal Letter was procured to forbid the bringing in 'ſuch terms into that controverſy, as were unknown 'to Antiquity or to Scripture.——By theſe-like 'means, our pious Biſhop, as the good ſhepherd of 'ſouls, uſed his ſtrenuous endeavour to hold up the 'weak, heal the ſick, bind up the broken, ſeek the 'loſt, and bring back the out-caſts, not by ſeverity 'even againſt the irreclaimable, or proſecutions 'againſt the deceived, but firſt and chiefly by argu-'ment and conviction: yet not ſo merciful, as to be 'remiſs againſt impious Heretics, and notorious 'immorality.'

To our Biſhop's immortal honour, this was his unpardonable crime; and, accordingly, he was marked out, as the firſt ſacrifice to Popiſh fury (t). The firſt inſtance of it was, his being diſmiſſed from the Council-table ſoon after King James's acceſſion; and, on the 16th of December, 1685, he was put out from being Dean of the Royal Chapel (u). Farther occaſions were ſought, and ſoon found, of moleſting, or entirely ruining him, if poſſible: for Dr. John Sharp, Rector of St. Giles's in the Fields, London, having, in ſome of his ſermons, vindicated the doctrine of the Church of England in oppoſition to Popery [K], the King ſent a letter, dated June 14, 1686, to Biſhop Compton, wherein his Majeſty 'required and commanded him, immediately upon receipt thereof, forthwith 'to ſuſpend Dr. Sharp from farther preaching in any pariſh church or chapel in his dio-'ceſe, until he had given the King ſatisfaction.' Upon the receipt of it, the Biſhop ſent an anſwer, June the 18th, to the Earl of Sunderland, Principal Secretary of State, wherein he ſaid, That 'he ſhould always count it his duty to obey the King in whatever commands 'he laid upon him, that he could perform with a ſafe conſcience; but in this, he con-'ceived, he was obliged to proceed according to law; and therefore it was impoſſible for 'him to comply, becauſe, though his Majeſty commanded him only to execute his plea-'ſure, yet in the capacity he was to do it, he muſt act as a Judge, and no Judge con-'demns any man before he has knowledge of the cauſe, and has cited the party.' But the Court being reſolved to be revenged on the Biſhop, for his exemplary zeal for the Proteſtant intereſt; and intending thereby to terrify all perſons (the Clergy in particular) from oppoſing their arbitrary deſigns, they cauſed his Lordſhip to be cited, on the 3d of Auguſt, to appear the 9th of the ſame month before the new Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion. At his appearance, he was charged with 'not having obſerved his Majeſty's commands 'in the caſe of Dr. Sharp, whom he was ordered to ſuſpend.' The Biſhop ſeemed to be ſurprized at this; and humbly begged a copy of the commiſſion, and a copy of his charge: but was anſwered by Chancellor Jefferys, 'That he ſhould neither have a copy of, nor ſee, the commiſſion; neither would they give him a copy of the charge.' Thereupon his Lordſhip deſired time to adviſe with counſel; and there was given him till the 16th, and afterwards till the 31ſt of Auguſt above-mentioned. In the mean time, he ſent his Proctor for a copy of what orders and minutes they had ſet down concerning his buſineſs; but it was refuſed, though never denied in any Court. On the 31ſt of Auguſt, when his Lordſhip appeared for the ſecond time, he declared, That the whole world could bear him witneſs, he had been that whole ſummer endeavouring with all the power and ſkill he had, to enforce the King's letter to the ſtrict obſervation of his Clergy. Then he offered his plea to their juriſdiction [L]: which being over-ruled, he proteſted to his right, in that or any other plea, that might be for his advantage. And obſerved, that, as a Biſhop, he had a right by the moſt authentic and univerſal Eccleſiaſtical Laws, to be tried firſt before his Metropolitan, precedent to any other Court whatſoever. But the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners would not, upon any account, ſuffer their juriſdiction to be called in queſtion; and therefore did not pay the leaſt regard to whatever his Lordſhip could alledge, even though he farther inſiſted, that in the capacity he was, they were warranted by their commiſſion to try him only for offences after the date of the commiſſion. But this plea likewiſe was over-ruled by the Chancellor, who affirmed, 'There were general words which 'gave authority ſufficient to look back.' Whereupon the Biſhop gave in his anſwer in writing [M]; and, after it was read, he obſerved, that the word ſuſpend was liable to two conſtructions.

(t) Dr. Gooch, as above. He alſo argued againſt giving up the Teſt, which incenſed the Court againſt him. Burnet's Hiſt. of his own Time, p. 665.

(u) Wood, Ath. ubi ſupra.

[K] Dr. John Sharp——having, in ſome of his ſermons vindicated the Doctrine of the Church of England in oppoſition to Popery.] He received one day, as he was coming out of the pulpit, a paper ſent him, as he believed, by a Prieſt, containing a ſort of challenge upon ſome points of controverſy, touched by him in ſome of his Sermons. Upon this, he, not knowing to whom he ſhould ſend an anſwer, preached a Sermon in anſwer to it: and, after he had confuted it, he concluded, ſhewing how unreaſonable it was for Proteſtants to change their religion on ſuch grounds. This was carried to Court, and repreſented there, as a reflection on the King for changing on thoſe grounds (14). But in order to underſtand how this could be imputed as a crime to Dr. Sharp, it is to be obſerved, that King James had cauſed the Directions concerning Preachers, publiſhed in 1662, to be now reprinted, and reinforced them by a letter directed to the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, given at Whitehall, 5 March, 1685-6, to prohibit the preaching upon controverſial points (15); which was, upon the matter, forbidding them to defend their religion in the pulpit; when it was at the ſame time attacked by the Popiſh Prieſts with all the vigour they were capable of, both in their Sermons and books. This order was taken from a precedent in Queen Mary the Iſt's time; who ſoon after her acceſſion to the throne, iſſued out a proclamation, forbidding the preaching upon controverted points of religion; for fear, it was ſaid, of raiſing animoſities among the people (16).

[L] Then he offered his plea to their juriſdiction.] This plea was chiefly a recital of the ſtatute made in the 16th of King Charles I. entitled. 'A Repeal of 'the branch of a ſtatute primo Elizabethæ, concerning 'Commiſſioners for cauſes Eccleſiaſtical:' in which ſtatute of Charles I. it was, among other things, enacted,——'That no new Court ſhould be erected, 'ordained, or appointed, within this realm of England, or dominion of Wales, which ſhould, or might 'have the like power, juriſdiction, or authority as 'the ſaid High-Commiſſion Court then had, or pretended to have; but that all and every ſuch Letters-'Patents, Commiſſions and Grants, made or to be 'made by his Majeſty, his heirs or ſucceſſors, and all 'powers and authorities granted thereby; and all 'Acts, Sentences, and Decrees, to be made by virtue 'or colour thereof, ſhould be utterly void and of 'none effect (17).'

(17) See Proceedings againſt Henry Lord Biſhop of London, as above, p. 16, &c. and Compl. Hiſt. p. 481.

[M] Whereupon the Biſhop gave in his anſwer in writing.] The Commiſſioners queſtion to him was, Why 'did you not obey the King's command, in his 'letter concerning the ſuſpending Doctor Sharp?' In anſwer to which, his Lordſhip, after reciting the King's letter of June 14, above-mentioned, ſays, 'I took conſtructions. In the firſt, which is the legal and ſtrict ſenſe of the word, he underſtood the King's letter; and was adviſed by his counſel, that it was a judicial act, and by conſequence could not be complied with, unleſs he had firſt cited the party, and heard the cauſe. In the other ſenſe of the word ſuſpend, that is, at large for ſilencing, he apprehended, he had in effect obeyed the King's letter. For he ſent for Dr. Sharp, ſhewed him that letter, adviſed him not to preach till he had endeavoured to know his Majeſty's farther pleaſure; and he had not preached to that day, ſo that his Majeſty's command was fulfilled. But, notwithſtanding all that his Lordſhip or his counſel could alledge, he was ſuſpended, on the 6th of September following [N], for his diſobedience, from the function and execution of his epiſcopal office, and from all epiſcopal and other eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, during his Majeſty's pleaſure (w). Immediately after, the Biſhops of Durham, Rocheſter, and Peterborough, were appointed commiſſioners to exerciſe all manner of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction within the dioceſe of London, during the ſuſpenſion of the Biſhop (x). He acquieſced in this hard ſentence [O]; but being ſuſpended only as a Biſhop, and remaining ſtill whole in his other capacities, he made a noble ſtand as one of the Governors of the Charter-Houſe [P]. However, as according to the form of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, a perſon under ſuſpenſion muſt make a ſubmiſſion within ſix months, otherwiſe he may be proceeded againſt as obſtinate: ſo, ſix months after ſentence, the Biſhop ſent a petition to the King, deſiring to be reſtored to the exerciſe of his epiſcopal function; but he made no acknowledgment of any fault. So this had no other effect, but that it ſtopt all farther proceedings; only the ſuſpenſion lay ſtill on him (y). Whilſt he was thus ſequeſtered from his epiſcopal function, he applied himſelf to the improvement of his garden at Fulham; and, having a great genius for Botany, enriched it with a new variety of domeſtic and exotic plants (z). His ſuſpenſion was ſo flagrant a piece of injuſtice, that the Prince of Orange, in his Declaration, could not omit taking notice of it [Q]; and, upon the dread of his Highneſs's coming over, the Court was willing to make the Biſhop reparation, by reſtoring him, on the 23d of September, 1688 (a), to his epiſcopal function. But he made no haſte to reſume his charge, and to thank the King for his reſtoration; which made ſome people believe, he had no mind to be reſtored after ſuch a manner, or that he knew well enough what paſſed in Holland (b). And, indeed, he was one of the noble perſons who often met at the Earl of Shrewſbury's, and concerted meaſures for the Prince of Orange's coming over, whoſe intereſt he heartily endeavoured to promote (c). On the 3d of October, 1688, he waited upon King James, with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſeven other Biſhops, when they ſuggeſted to his Majeſty ſuch advices as they thought proper at that ſeaſon, and conducing to his ſervice (d). Upon the Prince of Orange's landing, the firſt ſhare our Biſhop had in the enſuing Revolution, was, together with the Earl of Dorſet, the conveying ſafe from London to Nottingham the Princeſs Anne of Denmark [R], leſt ſhe, in the preſent confuſion of affairs,

'took the beſt advice I could get, concerning Doctor 'Sharp, and was informed, that the letter being di'rected to me, as Biſhop of London, to ſuſpend a 'perſon under my juriſdiction, I was therein to act 'as a Judge, it being a judicial act; and that no 'perſon could by Law be puniſhed by ſuſpenſion, be'fore he was called, or without being admitted to 'make his defence.' And then goes on to ſay, That he repreſented ſo much to the Earl of Sunderland, in the letter mentioned above. Nevertheleſs, that he might obey his Majeſty's commands as far as by Law he could, he had ſhewed the King's letter to Doctor Sharp, who had not preached ſince that time within the Dioceſe of London (18).

(18) Ibid. p. 21; and 482.

[N] He was ſuſpended, on the 6th of September following.] The Court did not think fit to meddle with his revenues. For the Lawyers had ſettled that point, that Benefices were of the nature of Freeholds. So, if the ſentence had gone to the Temporalities, the Biſhop would have had the matter tried over again in the King's Bench, where he was likely to find good juſtice, Herbert not being ſatisfied with the legality and juſtice of the ſentence. While this matter was in dependance, the Princeſs of Orange thought it became her to interpoſe a little in the Biſhop's favour. So ſhe wrote to the King, earneſtly begging him to be gentle to the Biſhop, who ſhe could not think would offend willingly. She alſo wrote to the Biſhop, expreſſing the great ſhare ſhe took in the trouble he was fallen into. The Prince wrote to him to the ſame purpoſe. The King wrote an anſwer to the Princeſs, reflecting ſeverely on the Biſhop, not without ſome ſharpneſs on her for meddling in ſuch matters (19).

(19) Burnet, ubi ſupra, p. 677.

[O] He acquieſced in this hard ſentence.] The Court ſeemed uneaſy, when they ſaw they had gained ſo poor a victory: for now the Biſhop was more conſidered than ever. His Clergy, for all the ſuſpenſion, were really more governed by the ſecret intimations of his pleaſure, than they had been by his authority before. So they reſolved to come off as well as they could (20).

(20) Burnet, as above, p. 677.

[P] He made a noble ſtand as one of the Governors of the Charter-Houſe.] For, King James having, on the 17th of December 1686, ſent a letter to the Governors of the Charter-Houſe, requiring them to admit one Andrew Popham into the firſt Penſioner's place in that Hoſpital, which ſhould become void, and be in his Majeſty's diſpoſal; without tendering any oaths to him, or requiring of him any ſubſcriptions, or other acts in conformity to the Doctrine aud Diſcipline of the Church of England: the Biſhop of London, jointly with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Duke of Ormond, the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Craven, Danby, and Nottingham, all Governors of that Hoſpital, and Dr. Thomas Burnet, Maſter of the ſame, agreed, not to comply with the King's illegal and unreaſonable command (21).

[Q] That the Prince of Orange, in his Declaration, could not omit taking notice of it.] In the following words: 'The ſaid Commiſſioners have ſuſpended the 'Biſhop of London, only becauſe he refuſed to obey 'an order that was ſent him to ſuſpend a worthy Di'vine, without ſo much as citing him before him to 'make his own defence, or obſerving the common 'forms of proceſs.'

[R] The conveying ſafe from London to Nottingham, the Princeſs Anne of Denmark.] We have a particular account of this tranſaction in the following words. 'When the news came to London, of Prince 'George of Denmark's having joined the Prince of 'Orange, fairs, might have been ſent away into France, or put under reſtraint, becauſe the Prince, her conſort, had left King James, and was gone over to the Prince of Orange. Biſhop Compton, at his return to London, ſet his hand to the Aſſociation begun at Exeter (e). Nor was he only one of the moſt inſtrumental in the Revolution, but alſo the moſt zealous in promoting the ſettlement of it: for, upon the 21ſt of December, he waited on the Prince of Orange, at the head of his Clergy, and even attended with ſome of the Diſſenting Miniſters; and in his own and their name, thanked his Highneſs 'for his very 'great and moſt hazardous undertaking for their deliverance, and the preſervation of the 'Proteſtant Religion, with the ancient laws and liberties of this nation (f).' On the 30th of December, he adminiſtered the holy Communion to his Highneſs, in the Royal Chapel at St. James's, according to the rites of the Church of England (g). The 29th of January, 1688-9, when the Houſe of Lords, in a grand Committee, debated the important queſtion, Whether, the throne being vacant, ought to be filled up by a Regent, or a King? Dr. Compton was one of the two Biſhops (Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Biſhop of Briſtol, being the other) who made the majority for filling up the throne by a King: for there were, upon that occaſion, only fifty-one votes to forty-nine (h). On the 14th of February he was appointed one of the Privy-Council (i), and made Dean of the Royal Chapel (k); and afterwards pitched upon by King William to perform the ceremony of his and Queen Mary's coronation, April 11, 1689 (l). The ſame year, he was conſtituted one of the Commiſſioners for reviewing the Liturgy, in the execution of which commiſſion he laboured with great zeal and earneſtneſs to reconcile the Diſſenters to the Church; and alſo in the Convocation that met November 21, 1689, of which he was Preſident. But the intended Comprehenſion met with inſuperable difficulties [S], the majority of the Lower Houſe being reſolved not to enter into any terms of accommodation with the Diſſenters (m). King William having, ſoon after, named Commiſſioners of Trade and Plantations, his Lordſhip was made one of them; and the Biſhop of London, for the time being, is always to be one, by reaſon of his ſuperintendency of all the Churches in the Plantations [T]. 'Orange, the Princeſs Anne was ſo ſtruck with the 'apprehenſions of the King's diſpleaſure, and of the 'ill effects it might have, that ſhe ſaid to the Lady 'Churchill, that ſhe could not bear the thoughts of 'it; and would leap out at window rather than ven-'ture on it. The Biſhop of London was then lodg-'ed very ſecretly in Suffolk-ſtreet. So the Lady 'Churchill, who knew where he was, went to him, 'and concerted with him the method of the Prin-'ceſs's withdrawing from the Court. The Princeſs 'went ſooner to bed than ordinary. And about 'midnight, ſhe went down a back ſtairs from her 'cloſet, attended only by the Lady Churchill, in 'ſuch haſte, that they carried nothing with them. 'They were waited for by the Biſhop of London, who 'carried them to the Earl of Dorſet's, whoſe Lady 'furniſhed them with every thing. And ſo they went 'northward, as far as Northampton; where that Earl 'attended on them with all reſpect, and quickly 'brought a body of Horſe to ſerve for a guard to the 'Princeſs. And in a little while a ſmall army was 'formed about her, who choſe to be commanded by 'the Biſhop of London; of which he too eaſily ac-'cepted (22).' So that, as Dr. Gooch obſerves (23), the Biſhop thought it then a proper time to reſume his care and charge, and to guard the Princeſs againſt any attempts on her Religion or her Liberty. This is that ſo much talked of part he acted at the Revolution. He reſcued the Princeſs Anne; he hid her (as it were) till Popiſh Tyranny was overpaſt. During that nice and difficult juncture, he was called peculiarly the Proteſtant Biſhop; and, indeed, he was the ornament and ſecurity of the Proteſtant cauſe.

[S] But the intended Comprehenſion met with inſuperable difficulties.] For, though many arguments were uſed to bring the more ſtiff of the inferior Clergy to a charitable condeſcenſion, and the much deſired union; yet there prevailed amongſt them a jealouſy and a diſtruſt not to be conquered. This appeared in the choice of a Prolocutor for the Lower-Houſe. Dr. Tillotſon was the perſon propoſed, and deſired by our Biſhop, and moſt of his Brethren; and yet Dr. Jane had the majority of votes. And when he was preſented to the Biſhop of London, as Preſident, for his approbation, he made a cuſtomary ſpeech in Latin, wherein he extolled the excellency of the Church of England as eſtabliſhed by Law, above all communities; implied that it wanted no amendments; and then ended with the application of this ſentence, by way of triumph, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. But the Biſhop of London, to whom Dr. Jane had been chaplain, made a ſpeech in the ſame language, wherein he told the Clergy; 'That they ought to endea-'vour a temper in thoſe things, that are not eſſential 'in religion, thereby to open the door of Salvation 'to a multitude of ſtraying Chriſtians: that it muſt 'needs be their duty, to ſhew the ſame indulgence 'and charity to the Diſſenters under King William, 'which ſome of the Biſhops and Clergy had promiſed 'to them in their addreſſes to King James;' and concluded with a pathetical exhortation to unanimity and concord (24). But though he made ſuch great advances towards a Comprehenſion, yet when he obſerved the perverſe and obſtinate diſpoſition of the Diſſenters; when he found, that not a ſenſe of true and undiſſembled religion, but intereſt and humour were at the bottom; and that there was no Comprehenſion to be propoſed, or ſatisfaction given, but by the expenſive ſacrifice of truth and order, then he thought it neceſſary to ſtop. He wiſhed as well as any body to the Proteſtant intereſt, and would gladly have ſeen it more united: but he was not well-bred enough to betray the rights of the Church in favour of a ſchiſm. He had ſeen ſo much the effects of popular frowardneſs and contention, men's aukward diſlike to what is ſettled, and deſire to change, that he dreaded the thoughts of innovations (25). His not complying ſo far as the Diſſenters liked, is undoubtedly what made an author who is very favourable to them (26) ſay, 'that Biſhop Compton was a weak man, wilful, 'and ſtrangely wedded to a party:' that is, he was not of the ſame party in that reſpect as Biſhop Burnet.

[T] By reaſon of his ſuperintendency of all the churches in the Plantations.] Biſhop Compton often declared his reſolution of going over himſelf, to ſettle the Chriſtian Church in thoſe American Plantations; but by his perſecution in King James's reign, and the miſchiefs of a long war ever ſince, he could never bring it to effect. Greater then was his care in ſending over good paſtors; more conſtant his attention to their lives, manners, and doctrine; by every conveyance, letters ſent of inſtruction, commendation, or reproof; a perpetual correſpondence, in anſwer to volumes of complaints, wants, and requeſts. And all this carried on by himſelf, againſt the perverſeneſs of the inhabitants, the wiles of the Church of Rome, and

King William to the famous Congreſs at the Hague, where the grand alliance againſt France was concluded. But, notwithſtanding the great part he acted in the Revolution, and his ſubſequent ſervices, no ſooner was the ſtorm over, but jealouſies were infuſed, and calumnies diſperſed, to ſupplant and undermine him; inſomuch, that though the Metropolitan See of Canterbury was twice vacant in that reign, yet he ſtill continued Biſhop of London [U]. However, he went on conſiſtently, and like himſelf, deſpiſing all other rewards but the quiet and the applauſe of his own conſcience, and the high eſteem and intimacy of Queen Mary, which he preſerved to her dying day (n). At the acceſſion of Queen Anne to the throne, he ſeemed to ſtand faireſt for the royal favour; and though many things were ſaid to diſparage him at Court [W], yet nothing could diſcourage him from paying his duty and attendance there. About the beginning of May, 1702, he was ſworn of her Majeſty's Privy-Council. The ſame year, he was put in the commiſſion for the Union of England and Scotland, but was left out in the new commiſſion iſſued out in April 1706. Two years before, he very much promoted the 'Act for making effectual her Majeſty's intention for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor 'Clergy, by enabling her Majeſty to grant the revenues of the Firſt-Fruits and Tenths.' He maintained all along a brotherly correſpondence with the foreign Proteſtant Churches, and endeavoured to promote in them a good opinion concerning the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church of England, and her moderate ſentiments of them, as appears both by his application to Meſſieurs Le Moyne, Claude, and de l'Angle before-mentioned (o), and the letters that paſſed between his Lordſhip and the Univerſity of Geneva in 1706 [X]. Towards the end of Queen Anne's reign, his acceſs became eaſier at Court, and he had greater power and intereſt there. But, whether the times were good or bad, he looked upon all that power and intereſt only as accidental circumſtances that attended the office of a Biſhop, and not as an eſſential part of it (p). In 1709-10, he was one of the Lords who oppoſed the proſecution then carried on againſt Dr. Sacheverel, and declared him Not Guilty; and likewiſe proteſted againſt ſeveral ſteps taken in that affair (q). His Lordſhip having, for ſome time, been afflicted with the Gout and Stone [Y], it turned at laſt to a complication of diſtempers, which put an end to his moſt valuable life, at Fulham, the ſubtilties of their ſocieties de Propaganda Fide, till the Society for propagating Chriſtian Knowledge was erected. It was no ſmall trouble or expence, to find out fit Paſtors for that refractory and unbelieving part of mankind: men of integrity; for they could not be under his inſpection as to their manners and doctrine, in thoſe remote territories; and men of prudence and conſtancy, to reclaim the inhabitants from their old imbittered leaven of Independency, Antinomianiſm, and Quakeriſm; and to reduce the natives from being worſhippers of evil dæmons (25).

[U] Though the metropolitan See of Canterbury was twice vacant in that reign, yet he ſtill continued Biſhop of London.] The firſt time indeed, it is no great wonder he ſhould miſs of it, ſince he had for competitor Dr. Tillotſon, the glory of the Engliſh nation. But why he ſhould not be promoted to it at the ſecond vacancy is entirely unaccountable, all circumſtances conſidered. And no truer reaſon of it can be aſſigned than this, that it was thought, Dr. Teniſon would be more ſubſervient to all the Court Deſigns, than Biſhop Compton could be expected to be.

[W] And though many things were ſaid to diſparage him at Court.] For then, as Dr. Gooch obſerves (26), was the time for the moſt artful management. Honeſty and integrity will always ſtand in ſome men's way. The Biſhop of London could neither be corrupted nor removed. But whatever attempts were made againſt him, they moved him not; neither counted he his life dear, while he was doing God and his Church good ſervice.

[X] The letters that paſſed between his Lordſhip, and the univerſity of Geneva in 1706.] What the ſubſtance of them was, we learn from the following paſſage in a letter from that Univerſity, to the Univerſity of Oxford, dated Feb. 5, 1706-7. Summo gaudio nos perfudit quod de veſtra in nos charitate ſcribere dignatus eſt illuſtriſſimus Præſul Henricus Londinenſis Epiſcopus. Cum enim accepiſſemus, nos male audire, & Genevæ famam apud vos deteri; nomine veſtro nos docuit, præjudicatas eſſe & veteres opiniones nondum penitus depoſitas; & quæ in medium à quibuſdam allata erant nos non ſpectare, verum nonnullos qui eccleſiæ Anglicanæ diſciplinam & liturgiam detrectantes, nomen noſtrum præ ſe ferebant: illud vero à ſententia noſtra omnino diſſitum eſſe noverat vir illuſtriſſimus, &c. i. e. 'The aſſurances we have received from the moſt illuſtrious 'Biſhop of London of your affection towards us, hath 'filled us with the utmoſt joy. For hearing that 'we were ill ſpoken of, and that Geneva was odious 'amongſt you, he hath aſſured us in your name, that 'thoſe were old prejudices, and wrong notions not 'yet laid aſide; and that what had been ſaid by 'ſome, did not concern us, but certain perſons, who 'diſſenting from, and railing at, the diſcipline and 'liturgy of the Church of England, made uſe of our 'name: but he knew us to be quite of another 'mind.'—The compliment paid to his Lordſhip by the Univerſity of Oxford, in their anſwer to this letter, is both very juſt and handſome. —Quo nemo aut Eccleſiam Anglicanam paterno magis affectu fovet ac tuetur, aut exteras omnes, utcunque locorum intervallis diſſitas, arctiſſimo tamen purioris Fidei vinculo conjunctas charitate magis fraterna proſequitur. i. e. 'Than 'whom, none hath a more paternal affection for the 'Church of England, nor a greater brotherly love 'for the foreign Churches, united by one cloſe bond 'of the true Faith, though never ſo far diſtant from 'each other (27).'

[Y] His Lordſhip having for ſome time, been afflicted with the Gout and Stone.] 'The Gout and Stone 'will make the ſtouteſt heart to ſhrink; yet (ſays Dr. 'Gooch) in the midſt of theſe tormenting pains, we 'never heard the voice of murmur; thoſe ſhocks that 'would make a beholder tremble, did not make him 'repine. He never complained againſt God, nor 'grew touchy and peeviſh to his domeſtics; (almoſt 'every body's caſe in pain and ſickneſs.) He was 'firm and conſtant, quiet and good-natured to the 'end. When his laſt illneſs came upon him, he 'foreſaw and foretold what would be the event on 'it, with the ſame compoſedneſs as if he had been 'ſure of his recovery. He knew his ſummons could 'never be ſudden, becauſe he was never unprepared 'to receive it. He had long ago ſettled his worldly 'affairs: indeed he had little worldly affairs to 'ſettle; for he had remitted his treaſure to the other 'world, and ſecured an eternal reverſion there. He 'talked of dying with the ſame unconcernedneſs, (or 'with the ſame pleaſure) as if he was only taking a 'journey; and wiſhed for nothing but an eaſy paſſage:——which he obtained; being taken out of 'this world in the ſame eaſy and quiet manner as he 'had endeavoured to live, and wiſhed to die (28).'

ham, on the 7th of July, 1713, in the eighty-firſt year of his age. His body was interred the 15th of the ſame month, in the church-yard of Fulham [Z], according to his particular direction (r). What few things he publiſhed, are mentioned in the note [AA]. As to his perſonal qualifications, he was, in all reſpects, one of the beſt-bred men in his time; courteous and affable; not full of words, but very converſable; and, as in his miniſterial offices, ſo in converſation too, willing and apt to teach. He was always eaſy of acceſs, and ready to do good offices. In his friendſhips he was conſtant, or rather inflexible. He was a man of the largeſt and moſt public ſpirit, and liked nothing that looked narrow or ſtingy. He had no little, artful, ſelfiſh deſigns. He was never ſeen to be afraid or concerned at danger. In the midſt of ſtorms he himſelf was calm. With regard to his moral character, he was a perſon of ſingular modeſty and humility; of great temperance and abſtinence; of exemplary piety [BB], and every virtue. Never did ſuch tender and ſuch manly paſſions meet before in the ſame breaſt! Never ſuch firmneſs and fortitude, mixed with ſo much meekneſs and condeſcenſion! But he was moſt particularly eminent for his unbounded charity and beneficence, being generous and charitable beyond example. He diſpoſed of money to every one who could make out (and it was very eaſy to make that out to him) that he was a proper object of charity. He anſwered literally the Apoſtle's character, poor enough himſelf, yet making many rich (s). He had divers ancient people, men and women, whom he ſupported by conſtant annual penſions; and ſeveral children at ſchool, at his own coſt and charge, beſides thoſe educated from children, and brought up to the Univerſities, to the ſea, or to trades, &c. (t). The poor of his pariſh were always attending his gate for their dole, and for the remains of his conſtant hoſpitable table, which was always furniſhed, and free to thoſe whom reſpect or buſineſs drew to him. His hall was frequented in the morning with petitioners of all ſorts (u). More particularly, he ſpared no coſt nor pains to ſerve the Church and Clergy. He bought many Advowſons out of Lay-hands [CC]. He gave great ſums for the rebuilding of Churches (w), and greater ſtill for the buying in Impropriations, and ſettling them on the poor Vicars [DD]. There was no poor honeſt Clergyman, or his widow, in want, but had his benevolence when applied for. Not any in the Reformed Churches abroad, to whom he was not a liberal patron, ſteward, and perpetual ſolicitor for. The French Refugees drank deep of his bounty for many years; ſo did the Iriſh in their day of affliction; and likewiſe the Scotch Epiſcopal party [EE] in their grievous perſecution (x). He was indeed upon ſome occaſions impoſed upon, and beſtowed his charity ſometimes upon forward and impudent perſons, who did not want or deſerve it; but that is frequently the caſe of generous well-meaning perſons, and muſt be owned to be a weakneſs rather than a fault [FF]. If we conſider him as a Biſhop, he was not only blameleſs, but a pattern of good behaviour in every reſpect. He applied himſelf more to his function than Biſhops had commonly done. He went much about his dioceſe, and preached [GG] and confirmed in many places (y). In order not to burden his Clergy with frequent viſitations, he was wont to hire houſes, and ſpend every ſummer in ſome new part of his dioceſe, where he rode out, and viſited in perſon the ſeveral churches, and parſonage, and vicarage-houſes. His method alſo was, in ſtated meetings with his Clergy, to propoſe ſome topic in divinity, on which they diſcourſed together in a ſerious, familiar, and judicious manner; which afterwards was ſummed up, and formed into a regular treatiſe. Many of theſe diſcourſes are publiſhed, under the title of The Biſhop of London's Conferences. At thoſe times, and indeed upon all other occaſions, he was extremely civil, affable, and courteous, full of candour and patience [HH]. In a word, by his death the Church

His contempt of gathering or leaving riches 'out of the patrimony of the Church, was worthy of 'his great mind and ſtation. And he died with that 'honour, with which he had always lived.'—We muſt not forget to obſerve, that he left the third part of his large and well-choſen library to the Corporation of Colcheſter. But, that noble gift was ſlighted, ſo that his Lordſhip's heir was forced to diſpoſe of it otherwiſe. The two other parts of his library he left to St. Paul's Cathedral, and to Sion-college.

[GG] And preached.] One author tells us (35), that 'his preaching was without much life or learning: for he had not gone through his ſtudies with 'the exactneſs that was fitting.' But another who knew him better, gives the following account. 'He 'ſpake with the affection and authority of a ſpiritual father; always above the affectation of popular 'eloquence, but in the power of the Spirit, and primitive ſimplicity, with the majeſty of plainneſs, in 'the utmoſt ſedateneſs and good judgment. His 'weighty reaſon needed not to be ſet off with trappings. The love with which his people met his 'doctrine, made it ſuperfluous to ſpeak to their paſſions ſo eaſily raiſed and ſo ſoon ſinking: he ſpake 'to convince their underſtanding. His deliberate 'way of utterance, gave them leiſure to receive and 'fix his notions, and brought forth nothing but with 'maturity of thought, and exactneſs of judgment.—'His knowledge and learning had been well cultivated in his privater ſtations in the Church, and 'particularly aſſiſted by his friendſhip with Dr. 'Rich. Alleſtry, Regius Profeſſor of Divinity at Oxford. His books had always attended him in his 'moſt youthful years; nor were they neglected to the 'laſt in his fulneſs of buſineſs. His library was an 'evidence of his knowledge in divine things eſpecially, and alſo in human learning, and in the modern 'languages (36).'

(36) Whitfeld, as above, p. 11, 12.

[HH] Full of candour and patience.] 'None of 'his Clergy ever felt his diſpleaſure, but for faults 'which carried their own mark and evidence. Not 'any difference of opinion in State-matters, did ever 'eſtrange him from a deſerving man: that which 'was good and virtuous in the ſon, he laid hold on, 'and cheriſhed with a fatherly tenderneſs, and paſſed 'by his miſtaken judgment in that which was amiſs. 'But in thoſe that were bad, no intereſt, no being 'attached to the ſame cauſe with himſelf, could ever 'make him overlook their faults. This was true 'moderation! candour and charity to good men of all 'opinions, and firmneſs to his own juſt principles (37).'

 [Though Dr. Henry Compton was undoubtedly a moſt excellent prelate, who deſerved to be ſpoken of in great terms of applauſe, it may, nevertheleſs, be queſtioned, whether his praiſes are always delivered in terms ſufficiently reſtricted and qualified. With the beſt intentions, the mind of the Biſhop does not appear to have been in all reſpects duely enlarged. As a teſtimony of this, we may mention his procuring a Royal Letter, to forbid the introduction of new and unuſual terms into the controverſy concerning the Trinity (38). When the good prelate was obliged ſo conſcientiouſly and nobly to oppoſe James the ſecond, he then found, by experience, how dangerouſly the King's authority might be exerted, when applied to matters of religion.

(38) See note [I].

In Mr. Macpherſon's collection of original papers, are two letters of Dr. Compton's, written in 1688. The firſt was to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, deſiring to know why the Biſhops were ſummoned to attend his Majeſty. It doth not appear to whom the ſecond letter was addreſſed; but it deſerves to be inſerted, as it contains a diſavowal, on the part of our prelate and his brethren, of their having invited over the Prince of Orange.

"My Lord, November, 1688.

"Having ſome neceſſary buſineſs in Eſſex which calls me away to-morrow for two or three days, I thought it my duty to give you this account.

"When I waited upon the King, by his command, on Wedneſday morning, the firſt of November, he told me that he had ſent for me, when he had nothing but the declaration of the States of Holland. But that the declaration of the Prince of Orange was now come to his hands, out of which he read to me that ſhort paragraph, of the Lords Temporal and Spiritual, inviting his Highneſs over; upon which I told him, I was confident the reſt of the Biſhops would as readily anſwer in the negative as myſelf; and his Majeſty was pleaſed then to ſay, he did believe us all innocent. Next he told me, he thought it requiſite we ſhould make ſome public declaration of our innocence in this matter, and likewiſe an abhorrence. I then deſired to ſee the declaration. But he refuſed. I told him this matter ought to be conſidered. "Every one," ſays he, "is to anſwer for himſelf. But I will ſend for my Lord of Canterbury, who ſhall call you together."

"On Friday, the ſecond of November, I waited upon the King with my Lord of Canterbury and others; when his Majeſty told him of the Prince's declaration, and made the Lord Preſton read it. Then he put the queſtion round, which was anſwered in the negative. The King deſired ſome ſuch denial ſhould be publiſhed, ſaying it would be for his ſervice. But he would not allow time to ſend for the Biſhops at a diſtance. So his Grace told him, he would ſend for thoſe in and about town to conſult about it. Upon which, the King repeated twice, that we ſhould add our diſlike; which would be very much for his ſervice (39)."

(39) Macpherſon's original Papers, vol. i. p. 277.

Notwithſtanding James the Second's importunity, the Biſhops could not be prevailed upon to vindicate themſelves in a public manner; and the following reaſons, which they alledged for their refuſal, reflect great credit on their wiſdom and diſcretion;

"Firſt, We humbly beſeech your Majeſty to receive what we offer in a favourable ſenſe, ſince we have done nothing that can juſtly deſerve miſconſtruction.

"Secondly, We humbly conceive, that a general clauſe in a declaration not avowed nor publiſhed, is not a ſufficient ground for a man or number of men to vindicate themſelves, as if they were concerned in it. And further, if this declaration ſhould be owned and publiſhed by the Prince of Orange, we beg leave to offer it, as our opinion to your Majeſty, that it would be a new thing and no good precedent, to put it in the power of a foreign and general accuſation to bring your Majeſty's ſubjects in particular, to a vindication of themſelves, as if they were regularly accuſed and legally tried, for a criminal correſpondence.

"Thirdly,

Church loſt a moſt excellent Biſhop; the kingdom a brave and able Stateſman; the Proteſtant religion, at home and abroad, its ornament and refuge; and the whole Chriſtian world, an eminent example of virtue and piety (z). His Lordſhip was never married.

(z) Dr. Gooch.

" Thirdly, if your Majeſty ſhould think fit to make it puniſhable to read or communicate the declaration; then, by making ſuch an addreſs as is required, we ſhould do an act grounded upon a thing which muſt not be produced; and conſequently we ſhall not be at liberty to alledge the reaſon of our doing it, which muſt unavoidably expoſe us, not only to cenſure, but ſuſpicion.

" Fourthly, As we have in all times adhered to our duty and allegiance, we are the leſs willing to do any thing now, which may diſtinguiſh us as men marked with a particular character of ſuſpicion, ſince we think our loyalty leſs blemiſhed by not being called in queſtion, than it would be by the cleareſt vindication that can be made of it upon this occaſion.

" Fifthly, We beg leave to obſerve to your Majeſty, that by an addreſs from a few of us, who are now in town, without the concurrence of the greater number who are abſent, it would look to the world, as if the Biſhops (who we hope are very well united) were of different opinions; or that we, who are now here, had more particular reaſons of a vindication than the reſt; which makes it reaſonable for us to be unwilling to come within the danger of ſuch an interpretation.

" Sixthly, We conſider that the clauſe in the declaration joineth the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, ſo that, if it has any meaning, it muſt intend, that there is a concurrence of many of both orders to invite them to this attempt, which would make it more imperfect for us, even though all the Biſhops were here to make a ſeparate vindication, where the accuſation is joined and comprehends the Temporal Lords in it. So that, if any notice is to be taken of it, it can be done no where ſo naturally or with ſo great effect as in Parliament; which, whenever your Majeſty ſhall think fit to call, we reſolve to do our duty, and to employ our utmoſt endeavours for the good of the Church and State, and for preventing the miſeries which now ſeem to threaten theſe diſtracted kingdoms, and to acquit ourſelves in all things which ſhall be there tranſacted, as becomes, &c (40)."

The preceding Letter, ſo far as it relates to the Biſhop of London, doth not at all coincide with the accounts which are uſually given of his conduct, previouſly to the Revolution. He is generally repreſented by our hiſtorians as one of thoſe noble perſons who concerted meaſures for the Prince of Orange's coming over to England. Burnet, who was likely to be well acquainted with the matter, poſitively aſſerts the fact, and farther informs us, that it was the Earl of Danby who prevailed upon the Biſhop to engage in the ſcheme (41). Sir John Dalrymple's papers confirm the ſame account. We there find a copy of the aſſociation, by which the Prince of Orange was invited to undertake an expedition into this kingdom, for the purpoſe of delivering it from the evils with which it was threatened. The aſſociation was ſigned by ſeven perſons, one of whom is expreſsly ſaid to have been the Biſhop of London. Indeed, the cyphers only of the aſſociators are annexed to the paper; but Mr. Sidney, who was one of them, and who wrote the original with his own hand, could not poſſibly be miſtaken in his explanation of the names to whom the ſignatures belonged (42). There is a letter of our Prelate's, written to the Prince of Orange about a month after the date of the aſſociation (43), in which there is a paſſage that may be conſtrued as referring to that tranſaction. The letter is as follows:

(43) It is dated June 30, 1688.

" SIR, July 28, 1688.

The honour your Highneſs did me in laying the charge upon me, to communicate to my Lords the Biſhops how much you were concerned in their behalf, had its juſt effect upon them: for they are highly ſenſible of the great advantage both they and the Church have, by the firmneſs of ſo powerful a friend; and as I dare undertake they ſhall never make an ill uſe of it, ſo as I am very ſure they will entirely rely upon it on all juſt occaſions. I dare likewiſe take upon me to aſſure you, that both they that ſuffered, and the reſt who concurred with them, are ſo well ſatisfied of the juſtneſs of their cauſe, that they will lay down their lives, before they will in the leaſt depart from it.

I ſhould ſay ſomething of myſelf, but I had ſo lately an opportunity of making my mind known to you, that it can be to no purpoſe to ſay more now to you, than that I am under all the obligations in the world of approving myſelf, Sir,

Your Highneſs's moſt devoted and faithful,

H. LONDON (44)."

What can we ſay to evidence ſo apparently contradictory? Shall we call in queſtion the authenticity of any of the papers from which it is derived; or ſhall we ſuppoſe that Biſhop Compton, being in the preſence of the King, and ſurrounded by his brethren, was oppreſſed by his timidity? If the latter ſuppoſition ſhould be made, every wiſe and good man will allow for the peculiarity and difficulty of his ſituation. The letter we have given from Mr. Macpherſon's publication, is taken from Tanner's collection, preſerved at Oxford. In Sir John Dalrymple's Memoirs, there are four letters from our Prelate to the Prince of Orange (45), beſides that which we have inſerted; but as they contain only general teſtimonies of his attachment to the Prince, they do not require to be particularly noticed. The Ducheſs Dowager of Marlborough, in the account of her conduct, has related the circumſtances of the Princeſs Anne of Denmark's quitting the Court, under the guidance of Biſhop Compton, in a manner which entirely correſponds with Burnet's narration of the ſame event, in note [R] (46).

(45) Dalrymple, ubi ſupra, p. 199. 209, 210, 211. 334.

(46) Ducheſs of Marlborough's Account of her Conduct, p. 16—18.

Our predeceſſor, Mr. Morant, ſeems angry that, after the death of Tillotſon, Dr. Teniſon was raiſed to the Metropolitan See of Canterbury, in preference to Compton. But it ſhould be conſidered that Teniſon, who was a very learned man, and of a moſt reſpectable character, was in himſelf highly worthy of the promotion; beſides which, his being a more determined whig rendered him at that period fitter for the ſtation. It is certain that the Biſhop of London, notwithſtanding the zeal he had ſhewn for the Prince of Orange, was greatly attached to Tory and High-Church principles. " His oppoſition to the Court, " ſays Dr. Birch, after the Revolution, in concur- " rence with the Tory party, began after he had been " ſet aſide in the diſpoſal of the Archbiſhopric to Dr. " Tillotſon, and it was ſtill heightened upon the " promotion of Dr. Teniſon to that See; and in the " reign of Queen Anne, he always ſupported thoſe " meaſures which were moſt agreeable to her Ma- " jeſty's own inclination and principles (47)."

(47) Birch's Life of Tillotſon, p. 186.

Though Biſhop Compton was not deſtitute of learning, his literature was not of the firſt rate; and the few works he publiſhed cannot rank him, in this reſpect, with the great Divines of the age in which he lived. The argument alledged, at the end of note [GG], in ſupport of the extent of his knowledge, from the books contained in his library, is but of little force. A man's erudition is not always proportioned to the excellence of his library. We do not mean, however, by this remark, to controvert the Biſhop's having had a conſiderable acquaintance both with divine and human learning; and we ſincerely join, at the ſame time, with our Biographical Predeceſſor, in giving our ſuffrage to his eminent worth. Mr. Granger concludes his account of our Prelate with obſerving, that he was a true ſon and brave champion of the Church, and a moſt munificent benefactor to it; and that whatever imperfections there might be in his character, he was allowed to be much a Gentleman, and no leſs a Chriſtian. The ſame agreeable Biographer has related an anecdote concerning him, which we have not met with in any other author. King James, diſcourſing with Dr. Compton on ſome tender point, was ſo little pleaſed with his anſwers, that he told him, " he talked more " like a Colonel than a Biſhop." To this he replied, " that his Majeſty did him honour in taking notice of his having formerly drawn his ſword in defence of the Conſtitution; and that he ſhould do the ſame again, if he lived to ſee it neceſſary (48).] K.

CONANT (JOHN), a very learned, pious, and eminent Engliſh Divine, in the XVIIth century. He was deſcended from a very good family, that had flouriſhed for many years in the county of Devon, but which was originally French (a). His father was Robert Conant, and his mother's name was Elizabeth, perſons of great integrity, having a competent, though not a large fortune, ſo that he had no reaſon to be aſhamed of his family, nor had a certain writer any need to have troubled himſelf with an apology about it (b); and one, who was much better informed, and more nearly concerned, hath, with great modeſty, ſet this point in the true light in which it ought to be known to poſterity (c) [A]. He was born October 18, 1608, at Yeatenton, a ſmall village in Bicton pariſh, in the ſouth-eaſt part of the county before-mentioned (d); and giving very early and lively tokens of his inclination to learning, his uncle, the Rev. Mr. John Conant, Rector of Lymington, near Ilcheſter, in Somerſetſhire, charged himſelf in a particular manner with the care of his education; and having kept him for ſome time at the free-ſchool at Ilcheſter, put him afterwards under the tuition of Mr. Thomas Branker, a very laborious and learned ſchool-maſter in the neighbourhood; and, while he was at both places, gave him occaſionally whatever helps he wanted in his ſtudies, with great readineſs and pleaſure (e). His youth promiſed all that his riper years produced: his diſpoſition was always mild, moderate, and modeſt, ſo that he contented himſelf rather with the ſatisfaction ariſing from the poſſeſſion of knowledge, than affected to diſplay it. In Lent Term, 1626, his uncle carried him to Oxford, and entered him of Exeter-College, of which he had been himſelf nine years a Fellow, placing him under a very ſtrict, pious, and learned tutor, Mr. Lawrence Bodley, B. D. (f). He ſtudied there with great vigour and application, and, in a ſhort time, diſtinguiſhed himſelf as one of the ſhrewdeſt diſputants in this College, then one of the moſt flouriſhing in that Univerſity. He was alſo very remarkable for the purity and perſpicuity of his Latin ſtyle; and of the Greek he was ſo perfect a maſter, as often to diſpute publicly in that language in the ſchools; which extraordinary accompliſhments recommended him highly to Dr. John Prideaux, then Rector of Exeter-College, and the King's Profeſſor of Divinity (g) [B]. It is very certain, that he took his degrees regularly, though the times, for what reaſon it is not eaſy to ſay, are omitted by the Oxford Hiſtorian (h); and ſo pious and prudent was the whole courſe of his life, that, without any other intereſt than his merit, he was choſen Probationer June 30, 1632, and became actual Fellow of Exeter-College, July 3, 1633 (i). He was alſo a very eminent tutor, and, in that capacity, had for his pupils ſeveral young gentlemen of the beſt families in his county, whom he educated with equal care, in ſound learning, and true piety (k). Upon the breaking out of the civil war, moſt of the ſtudents under his care leaving the Univerſity, he judged it moſt convenient for him to retire alſo; which he accordingly did in 1642, but certainly without any deſign of forſaking his College, as appeared by his leaving in his chamber a large and well-choſen collection of books, of which, in his abſence, he was plundered (l). Some ſhort time before he quitted the Univerſity, he had taken Deacon's orders, and had applied himſelf with very great diligence to the ſtudy of the Oriental languages, and whatever elſe might properly qualify him for the diſcharge of the miniſterial function, for which he had always a high reverence, and which he afterwards diſcharged, for many years, with great piety and zeal, and no leſs wiſdom and learning (m) [C]. He retired firſt to Lymington, his uncle's living

[A] In which it ought to be known to poſterity.] We are told by the Reverend Mr. Prince what follows, with reſpect to the deſcent of this worthy Perſon (1). 'He was not, ſays he, deſcended indeed from great, 'but from good parentage, more eminent for their 'piety than gentility, which in the eſtimation of 'God and good men, is the trueſt nobility. How-'ever, we are not to eſteem him as ſprung ex fæce 'virûm, from the dregs of the Plebeians: no; his name 'hath long flouriſhed, and his relations lived in good 'eſtate and reputation in thoſe parts.' Dr. John Conant, the ſon of our Divine, gives us the plain Engliſh of all this in the following words (2): 'He 'was the eldeſt ſon of Robert Conant, and Elizabeth 'his wife, who were perſons of great integrity. 'Robert was one of the ſons of Richard Conant, and 'Agnes his wife, who lived at Budley, near Yeaten-'ton, and were much eſteemed for their exemplary 'piety. Richard was the ſon of John Conant, de-'ſcended from ingenious parents of Gittiſham, near 'Honiton, in this county; whoſe anceſtors, for 'many generations, had been fixed there, but were 'originally of French extraction.'

[B] Recommended him highly to Dr. John Prideaux, then Rector of Exeter-college, and the King's Profeſſor of Divinity.] We have an account of this fact from both the writers before-mentioned; but the latter gives it in the cleareſt and moſt intelligent manner (3). 'Theſe his excellent endowments, ſays he, ſet off by 'a life every way regular and unblameable, could 'not eſcape ſo vigilant a governor, and ſo known an 'encourager of learning and virtue, as the reverend 'and learned Dr. John Prideaux, then Rector of 'Exeter-college; who, by an alluſion to his name 'Conanti, nihil eſt difficile; (this, according to the 'humour of thoſe times, is a playing upon words; 'for, in one ſenſe, it implies, to him who endeavours, 'every thing is eaſy; and in another, there is nothing 'difficult to Conant;) ſignified his opinion of him: 'and he once ſaid of him, Jack Conant will have my 'place. Dr. Prideaux was then Regius Profeſſor of 'Divinity in the Univerſity, as well as Rector of the 'College; both which eminent places were, in pro-'ceſs of time, conferred on Dr. Conant.'

(3) Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 226. Life of Dr. Conant, p. 7.

[C] And no leſs wiſdom and learning.] We have mentioned in the text the excellence he acquired in the Latin and Greek languages, to which he ſoon after added as perfect an acquaintance with the Hebrew and Syriac Tongues; and he was alſo a good proficient in Chaldee and Arabic (4); all which he thought neceſſary to the thorough underſtanding of the holy ſcriptures; in reading which in their originals, and in comparing them with each other, and with the beſt commentators, he ſpent ſeveral years, by which

ing in Somerſetſhire, not in Hampſhire, as Mr. Prince would have it; but finding his worthy relation forced from thence, he officiated for him as long as he could continue there with ſafety; but, after being rifled of all he had, and kept for ſome time a priſoner, he found it high time for him alſo to repair to London, where, having found his uncle ſettled in the church of St. Botolph, Alderſgate, he for ſome time aſſiſted him in his paſtoral duties (n). While he was at Lymington, he was conſtituted by the Parliament one of the Aſſembly of Divines (o); but I believe he ſat amongſt them, if ever, very ſeldom, ſince it is certain that he never took the Covenant. In order to avoid this, and other things not agreeable to his conſcience, he willingly accepted the offer made to him, of being domeſtic Chaplain to the Lord Chandos; in whoſe family he lived at Harefield, or, as it is commonly called, Harvill, near Uxbridge, in Middleſex, where his piety, learning, and exemplary life, gained him many friends, who would have procured him a much better ſettlement, his income there being but fourſcore pounds a year, the beſt part of which he beſtowed in charitable uſes (p); but the privacy in which he paſſed his days, and his great apprehenſion of charging his conſcience with the tranſactions of thoſe times, induced him to refuſe the favours offered him, and in particular a good living in his own country, from Mr. Duke, of Otterton (q). He carried this juſt and religious principle ſtill farther; for perceiving the effects of the Parliament viſitation of the Univerſity of Oxford, where the Solemn League and Covenant was preſſed upon all the members of the Univerſity, rather than break in upon his own innocence, by ſubmitting to a power, and taking an oath, both which wanted a legal authority, and rather than abjure the good order that was eſtabliſhed in this Church ſince the perfecting of the Reformation under Queen Elizabeth, or combine to promote a civil war, all which were thought to be virtually contained in that oath, he determined to quit his relation to Exeter-College (r), which he did, by reſigning his fellowſhip, September 27, 1647 (s). This proceeding of his, as it was equally candid and conſcientious, ſo the bare relation of it muſt ſufficiently refute a very groundleſs calumny inſerted in the work (t) of the Oxford Hiſtorian, concerning which the reader will be better informed in the notes [D]. While he lived as Chaplain to Lord Chandos, he preached a voluntary lecture, upon a week-day, at Uxbridge, where he had always a very numerous audience; and though this was purely from a principle of doing good, and not with any view of being talked of and known in the world, which no man of his abilities ever ſought leſs, yet it ſerved to keep alive that great reputation which he had acquired at the Univerſity; and of which the members of Exeter-College were ſo mindful, that upon the death of the learned Dr. George Hakewill, their Rector, in the month of April, 1649, there was a remarkable conteſt about chuſing either his uncle or him for his ſucceſſor (u): but Mr. John Conant, ſenior, who was then ſettled in the pariſh of St. Thomas, in Colcheſter, abſolutely declining that preferment, the Fellows thereupon unanimouſly choſe Mr. John Conant, on the 7th of June following; and on the 29th of the ſame month, he was admitted to that honourable office (w), which he executed with great prudence and fidelity, and with equal reputation to himſelf, and advantage to that which he became ſo thoroughly maſter of that ſort of learning, as to appear with equal luſtre in the pulpit and in the chair (5): nor was there any man of his time who was then deemed to be more remarkable for being a ſolid and ſound expoſitor, or for clearing the true ſenſe of ſuch texts as were miſinterpreted by the Socinians and other reputed heretics (6).

[D] Will be better informed in the notes.] The famous Mr. Anthony Wood informs us (7), that the Rev. Mr. Henry Tozer, Fellow and Sub-rector of Exeter-college, was ſummoned before the Parliament viſitors on the 21ſt of March, 1647, and by them queſtioned on eleven heads of offences by him committed in the management of the College; for which he was by theſe viſitors afterwards expelled, and flying into Holland, was there taken into the ſervice of the Engliſh merchants as their Chaplain, and in that poſt died at Rotterdam, Sept. 11, 1650. He farther adds, that theſe heads of accuſation were tranſmitted to the viſitors by Mr. John Conant, Mr. Anthony Clifford, Mr. John Martin, and Mr. Robert Hancock. This is a very heavy and a very extraordinary charge, which, at firſt ſight, ſeems to agree but very indifferently with Mr. Conant's known character, who, of all things, hated to concern himſelf in quarrels or diſputes. But the following refutation of this charge is ſo clear, ſo full, and ſo unanſwerable, that it muſt certainly ſatisfy every man that reads it (8). 'His 'reſignation in the College regiſter bears date the '27th of Sept. 1647. That he had never ſeen 'Oxford from the end of the year 1642, till June, '1649, I find expreſsly under his own hand-writing, 'in a book of accounts relating to his pupils and to 'his Oxford affairs, which I here particularly men'tion, in order to rectify a miſtake in a late author, 'who, in his book, intitled Hiſtoria & Antiquitates 'Univerſitatis Oxonienſis, reckons Mr. Conant 'among the Fellows of Exeter-college who accuſed 'Mr. H. Tozer, their Sub-rector, to the parliamen'tary viſitors; whereas Mr. Tozer was not called be'fore the viſitors till the 21ſt of March, 1647, as 'may be ſeen in the regiſter of the proceedings at 'that viſitation, now in the public library at Ox'ford, which was near half a year after Mr. Conant 'had ſent his reſignation to the College. Beſides the 'matters laid to Mr. Tozer's charge, as this very au'thor has repreſented them, were ſuch as could not 'poſſibly fall under the notice of any one who had 'not lived in the College very lately, which Mr. 'Conant had not done for more than five years paſt. 'But, had he been ſtill Fellow there, and reſident, 'yet it is very unlikely that he ſhould join in an ac'cuſation againſt Mr. Tozer, whoſe name he would 'never mention without reſpect: neither can it be 'thought, that he would accuſe any one, though 'never ſo faulty and unſtatutable to thoſe viſitors, 'whoſe power he would not acknowledge, and to 'whom he himſelf was obnoxious, for not having 'taken the Covenant.' It hence appears, with how great caution the facts advanced in that book of Mr. Wood's particularly, ought to be received, and in how great need they ſtand of ſome authority to ſupport them before they meet with allowance and credit.

ſociety which had given him ſo ſignal a proof of their affection and eſteem (x) [E]. In a very ſhort time, however, after his being thus ſettled, he was in danger of being driven out of all public employment again, and this by the Parliament's enjoining what was called the Engagement, which he did not take within the time preſcribed, but had a fortnight given him to conſider farther of it. After having maturely deliberated upon the ſubject a month longer (y), he ſubmitted, but under a declaration, ſubſcribed at the ſame time with the Engagement, which, as it in fact enervated that inſtrument entirely (z), is at once a demonſtrative proof of his great integrity, and of the general reputation he muſt have had to procure his ſubſcription to be received upon thoſe terms [F]. This difficulty being got over, he continued to diſcharge his office of Rector of Exeter-college with univerſal approbation; and though his labours therein were both conſtant and great, yet, being in virtue of that office Vicar of Kidlington, a large pariſh four miles from Oxford, he, for ſome time, officiated there in perſon, going thither on a Saturday, and preaching twice on Sunday, and catechizing the youth, leaving the care of the pariſh, during the week, to Mr. Rumbald, a very worthy and learned man (a), who kept a ſchool there. But finding his abſence from College detrimental to its diſcipline, he afterwards took care to have a ſufficient Curate at his living, to whom he allowed three-fourths of its revenue (b). After he was thus fixed at Oxford, he preached a voluntary lecture at Allhallow's-church every Friday morning at ſeven o'clock; almoſt every Sunday he preached at St. Michael's, and every other Sunday, during the ſummer half-year, in the afternoon, at St. Mary Magdalen's, in the ſuburbs; and this not only without deſiring, but even without accepting [E] So ſignal a proof of their affection and eſteem.] At the time Mr. Conant was admitted to the Rectory of Exeter-college, the ſtate of its revenue was very indifferent. The Collegians had contracted conſiderable debts by aſſiſting the King, while he remained at Oxford; and other misfortunes had contributed to heighten both the confuſion and diſtreſs of their affairs (9). Mr. Conant ſet about the removing of theſe inconveniencies with equal ſagacity and diligence: he put the method of receiving the College revenues upon the beſt footing poſſible, and, having adjuſted, in an equitable manner, the order in which their incumbrances were to be paid off, the very firſt notice of his ſcheme revived the credit of the College. In point of diſcipline, during the adminiſtration of Dr. Holland and Dr. Prideaux, it fell ſhort of none in the Univerſity; but that being afterwards broken in upon, the ſociety gradually declined, and was in a very low ſtate when he became Rector. He ſet about the correction of thoſe diſorders with the greateſt vigour and vigilance; and he perſiſted in that courſe with the utmoſt ſteadineſs and courage; did much by exhortation and encouragement; more by reproof and an unrelaxed ſtrictneſs in puniſhments; moſt of all by the brightneſs of his own example. He was conſtant in his attendance at public prayers; he expounded the holy ſcriptures learnedly, critically, and practically; he took care that the meaneſt ſervants in the College ſhould be inſtructed, and, for that purpoſe, catechized them often in his own apartment. He had a watchful eye over the ſcholars, more eſpecially ſuch as were intended for the Miniſtry; he enquired carefully into the progreſs of their ſtudies, and was ſtill ſtricter with regard to their morals; his way of puniſhing was by exerciſes, and not pecuniary mulcts; for he underſtood not making parent's pockets pay for their children's offences (10). He took no leſs pains with the tutors, to whom he frequently remonſtrated the great truſt that was repoſed in them, the obligations they were under to diſcharge it, and the folly of expecting any proficiency in their pupils, if they were at all wanting in their duty. But above all, he was remarkably juſt and candid in the affair of elections, where his intereſt, as Rector, could be procured no otherwiſe than by merit; and, where that appeared, his influence was ſure to be exerted as far as legally it might. What the effects were of this ſo painful and diligent diſcharge of his duty, may be learned from the following paragraph in his ſon's memoirs, out of which the foregoing particulars were extracted (11).

'Exeter-college flouriſhed ſo much under the government of Mr. Conant, that the ſtudents were many more than could be lodged within the walls. They crowded in here from all parts of the nation, and ſome from beyond ſea, where the fame of its diſcipline had reached. It would be tedious to enumerate thoſe eminent perſons, both in Church and State, thoſe learned and good men who were bred up under his care. In his time it afforded a Vice-chancellor, a Proctor, a Doctor of the chair in Divinity, a Moral Philoſophy and Rhetoric Reader to the Univerſity, a Preſident to St. John's, a Principal to Jeſus, and a Divinity Profeſſor to Magdalen-college; not to mention ſuch as were tranſplanted thence to ſcholarſhips and fellowſhips in other Colleges, many of whom were men of eminency afterwards.'

[F] To procure his ſubſcription to be received upon thoſe terms.] If, as the moſt judicious critics agree, the capital uſe of Biography, not compoſed by barely tacking together the circumſtances of a life, ſo as to render it a mere ſkeleton of facts and dates, is to inform and inſtruct by example; then, without doubt, there is nothing ſo much worthy of obſervation, in what is preſerved to us, of the conduct of this worthy perſon, as the ſteadineſs and integrity he ſhewed in thoſe times of confuſion, when, notwithſtanding the hypocritical ſhew of religion, there was as great a defection from virtue as in any of which we have authentic records (12). His ſon gives us thoſe particulars relative to this matter, which we have inſerted in the text; but, as to the reſtrictions, with which, after delaying ſo long, he at laſt ſigned the Engagement, we owe it entirely to Mr. Prince, that they have not been buried in oblivion. The terms of the Engagement were (13),

Being required to ſubſcribe, I humbly premiſe,

I. 'That I be not hereby underſtood to approve of what hath been done in order unto, or under this preſent government, or the government itſelf; nor will I be thought to condemn it: they being things above my reach, and I not knowing the grounds of the proceedings.

II. 'That I do not bind myſelf to do any thing contrary to the word of God.

III. 'That I do not ſo hereby bind myſelf; but, that if God ſhall remarkably call me to ſubmit to any other power, I may be at liberty to obey that call, notwithſtanding the preſent engagement.

IV. 'In this ſenſe, and in this ſenſe only, I do promiſe to be true and faithful to the preſent government, as it is now eſtabliſhed, without King or Houſe of Lords (15).

JOHN CONANT.'

any

any recompence when offered (c). October 28, 1652, he received Prieſt's orders, at Saliſbury; and (d) May the 29th, 1654, he was admitted to the degree of Doctor in Divinity (e). In the month of December, the ſame year, upon the deceaſe of Dr. Joſhua Hoyle, he became Divinity Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Oxford, where his lectures were received with univerſal applauſe, by a very numerous and learned audience, by whom, though often and warmly importuned, his modeſty was ſo great, that he could never be prevailed with to publiſh them (f). In 1657 he accepted the impropriate Rectory of Abergely, near St. Aſaph, in Denbighſhire, as ſome ſatisfaction for the benefices formerly annexed to the Divinity Chair, which he never enjoyed. This acceptance of his was very beneficial to the Curate, whoſe ſalary he augmented twenty pounds a year, gave him other encouragements beſides, and contributed largely to the relief of the poor, though the whole income of the living was but one hundred and twenty pounds a year (g). Upon the reſtoration of Epiſcopacy, knowing that this rectory had been anciently annexed to the Biſhopric of St. Aſaph, he not only immediately quitted it to Dr. Griffith, upon his coming to that See, but allowed him alſo to receive the laſt year's profits (h). On the 9th of October, 1657, he was admitted Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, to the great joy, and no leſs benefit, of that learned body (i). This high dignity he kept till the 1ſt of Auguſt, 1660, during which ſpace he corrected many abuſes, regulated the public exerciſes in a manner highly ſerviceable to the promoting ſolid learning, was very inſtrumental in procuring Mr. Selden's large and valuable collection of books for the public library, and had a great hand in defeating a deſign, to which the Protector, Oliver, gave his conſent, for erecting a kind of Univerſity at Durham (k). The moſt extraordinary thing of all that occurred during his adminiſtration, was preventing ſome eager perſons in the Univerſity from ſacrificing their own rights and privileges, by a petition to the Protector Richard's Parliament; which was the more honourable to Dr. Conant, as it was his own act entirely; and as his firmneſs in the oppoſition procured its ſucceſs, ſo far as to defeat this pernicious project, which would have been highly prejudicial to their academical immunities (l) [G]. Upon the reſtoration of King Charles II. Dr. Conant, as Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, came up to London, attended by the Proctors, and a great number of the principal members of that illuſtrious and learned body; and, June 15, 1660 (m), had the honour to be introduced to his Majeſty, to whom he would have made his ſpeech kneeling; but the King roſe himſelf from his ſeat, and commanded him to riſe; after which he made a ſuccinct and elegant oration in Latin, which is unfortunately loſt, and preſented his Majeſty with a book of verſes, written by the members of the Univerſity, and amongſt them ſome of his own, which have been deſervedly commended, as having in them a true ſpirit of poetry, a juſt ſtrain of panegyric, and a noble concern for religion (n) [H]. On the 25th of March, 1661, the King iſſued a commiſſion for [G] Which would have been highly prejudicial to their academical immunities.] The point aimed at was to obtain from the Parliament, local viſitors of ſuch Colleges, as, by their ſtatutes, were to be viſited by Archbiſhops and Biſhops. But Dr. Conant had ſo true an idea of parliamentary viſitations, that he had not the leaſt deſire of ſeeing any more of them in his time, and therefore would not, by any means, countenance a petition for that purpoſe. He was told, that a Convocation were the proper judges of the matter: but this he denied: he ſaid that local viſitors was not the affair of the Univerſity, but of particular Colleges, many of which conſiſted moſtly of Scholars and Undergraduates, and conſequently had no votes in Convocations; and it would be very hard to repreſent any thing as their ſenſe of the matter, who had no opportunity of expreſſing their ſentiments upon it. It was then ſuggeſted to him, that it was a thing to which the Univerſity in general inclined, and that he might make himſelf extremely popular by promoting it. His anſwer was, that he had found, by long experience, it was impoſſible to pleaſe the generality, without proſtituting a man's conſcience; that if he could ſtretch his to the meaſures of other men's judgments, he knew he ſhould not fail of the loud acclamations of the Univerſity; but he hoped never to purchaſe their applauſe at ſo dear a rate. It was then inſinuated, that by his ſtiffneſs he would raiſe himſelf many enemies, and that poſſibly he might bring the Parliament upon his head, who would take it amiſs that he checked any thing that tended to put greater power into their hands. This induced him to ſpeak his mind more plainly. I am ſenſible, ſaid he, how ill a negative vote may be reſented at this juncture, and how much it concerns every man that loves his own quiet and ſecurity, to keep himſelf out of their hands, who can do what they pleaſe: but, ſince I have no honeſt way of preventing what is feared, I ſubmit to God's providence. As to my being worſted in this buſineſs I value it not, for I aim not at victory, but to keep my conſcience clear; and as to this, it is not in any man's power to deprive me of my end. At laſt, they propoſed, as an accommodation, that he ſhould go out of town, and ſubſtitute a Pro-Vice-chancellor, who might do what he could not prevail upon himſelf to do; but he would hear of no ſuch expedient: he ſaid, it would be a betraying of his truſt, by a weak and mean compliance in a thing which, in his own judgment, he utterly diſallowed. The iſſue of this was, that after all the ſtir made about them, theſe petitions were quaſhed, and came to nothing.

for the review of the Book of Common Prayer, in which Dr. Conant was one of the commiſſioners, and aſſiſted at the Savoy conferences, which were the fruits of the commiſſion, in which he behaved with his uſual modeſty and moderation, expreſſing a deſire that ſome regard might be had to thoſe who had been otherwiſe educated, and ſuch condeſcenſion ſhewed, as might preſerve the peace of the Church (o). After this, upon the paſſing of the Act of Uniformity, which gave but a ſhort day for the conſideration of matters of very great importance, in the ſentiments of ſuch as were of truly tender conſciences, he did not ſee ſufficient cauſe to conform; and, as he had already given up his living in Denbighſhire to the Biſhop of St. Aſaph, loſt his Profeſſorſhip of Divinity by the return of Dr. Robert Saunderſon, to whom, of right, it belonged; ſo, rather than offer any violence to his principles, he ſuffered himſelf to be deprived of the Rectory of Exeter-College, which was pronounced vacant September 1, 1662 (p), and in which he was ſucceeded by Mr. Joſeph Maynard. And thus, as a judicious Prelate obſerves, Dr. Conant was diſabled from the public exerciſe of his miniſtry, to the great loſs of the Church of England in general, and more eſpecially of the Univerſity of Oxford, and of Exeter-College in particular (q). In this ſituation, however, he ſhewed that he had as great tenderneſs for the public peace, as for the quiet of his own conſcience; and, therefore, he was ſo far from ſetting himſelf at the head, as he might eaſily have done, of a ſeparation, that, on the contrary, he refuſed to join with, or countenance it, but went publicly to Church, and behaved there with exemplary piety and devotion (r). An eccleſiaſtical dignity was offered him about that time, which he refuſed (s), becauſe he was reſolved to conſider coolly and carefully the terms preſcribed by authority; that, after weighing every thing ſeriouſly, he might, if he ſaw evidence, conform, or, if not, remain firm in his preſent conduct [I]. At length, after eight years ſerious deliberation, his mind was ſatisfied, and he reſolved to comply in all points, and in particular with that which had probably ſtuck moſt with him, which was the being re-ordained, and accordingly was ſo, September 28, 1670 (t), by the Right Rev. Dr. Reynolds, Lord Biſhop of Norwich, whoſe daughter he had married. This behaviour of his ſurprized thoſe who beſt knew him leaſt; and Dr. Owen, his contemporary at Oxford, could not help ſaying, when he heard it, that he did not in the leaſt wonder at it, ſince he knew Dr. Conant's ſentiments were for Epiſcopacy all along (u). He had no ſooner qualified himſelf for the acceptance of eccleſiaſtical preferments, than many were offered him; and, on the 18th of December, the ſame year, he was actually elected Miniſter of the Church of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, in the city of London (w); but having ſpent ſome years in the town of Northampton, where he was much beloved, and highly eſteemed, he choſe rather to accept of the invitation of his neighbours to remain amongſt them; and Dr. Simon Ford, who was then Miniſter of All-Saints, being elected in the room of Dr. Conant, by the veſtry of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, December 29, 1670 (x), he was nominated by the corporation to the Vicarage of All-Saints, and had inſtitution given him February 15, 1670; which, though of the value only of a ſingle hundred pounds per annum, he would never part with, though very conſiderable offers were made him, and in particular one by his gracious maſter King Charles II. which was ſignified to him by a letter from the then Secretary of State (y).

In Engliſh thus.

To his SACRED MAJESTY.

Kindly accept, that tribute, beſt of Kings,
The college muſe, with trembling rev'rence brings,
The firſt eſſays of her unpractis'd ſong,
Whom war's harſh clamour doom'd to ſilence long.
But, now reviv'd, the lamps of learning burn,
And, arts returning, wait on thy return.
Heav'n has thy rights reſtor'd; do thou reſtore
The rights of heav'n! religion's ſacred power!
Return the ſceptre GOD beſtows again,
And a CHARLES reigning, let his Maker reign.
Thrice happy BRITONS, whom you thus ſhall ſway,
And only rule that they may CHRIST obey.
Our ſlaughter's paſt, no longer we deplore,
Nor ills regret that ſuch a PRINCE reſtore.

[I] Or, if not, remain firm in his preſent conduct.] We have a very curious, as well as circumſtantial account of his behaviour upon this occaſion, and of the methods he took to reſolve his own caſe of conſcience, whether he ought to conform or not, in his ſon's memoirs (17).

(17) Life of Dr. Conant, p. 44, 45.

'He applied himſelf very cloſely, for ſome time, 'to the ſtudy of the controverſies relating to Conformity. He had deliberately weighed and conſidered 'the whole compaſs of theſe diſputes, and made himſelf maſter of every turn in them. He had not only 'examined what had been objected to the ſeveral offices of the liturgy, its doxologies and reſponſals, 'its rubrics and kalendar, and thoroughly conſidered 'all the phraſes and modes of expreſſion in each ſervice, but likewiſe compared it with ancient liturgies, as well as with the holy ſcriptures, doctrines 'of the apoſtles, and later rituals and offices. This 'appears from his papers in my hands, running over 'many of the paſſages in the book of Common Prayer 'that have been objected to, and giving ſuch orthodox ſenſes of them, as he concludes were agreeable 'to the judgment of the firſt Right Reverend and 'pious compilers of them. And, I perſuade myſelf, 'were they perfect, they might reconcile the moſt 'ſcrupulous to join in thoſe excellent forms of prayer.' He adds afterwards, 'Dr. Conant's conformity could 'not be ſurprizing to any one who conſiders, that his 'prejudices were never many, and thoſe not ſtrong 'or violent, though his determinations were ſlow 'and adviſed. One would rather wonder, that he 'did not conform much ſooner than he did, ſince it 'is certain, that his temper was never ſoured by the 'loſs of his college; that he had an awful regard for 'the commands of authority in things indifferent; 'that he conſtantly blamed thoſe who held their 'aſſemblies at hours that interfered with the public 'worſhip of God, in affront to the civil ſanctions of 'the laws, to good order and parochial communion; 'that he was ſo far from being ambitious of a ſeparate congregation, or covetous of their contributions, that he had induſtriouſly kept out of the way 'of both.'

On

On the 20th of September, 1675, he had the mortification to ſee the greateſt part of his pariſh, together with his church, burnt to the ground, though providentially his own houſe eſcaped (z). His preſence was of great uſe to the town in that critical juncture, when he employed both his perſon and his purſe for the ſervice of the diſtreſſed, and would not, though new and great offers were made him, conſent to leave them under this calamity (a). So true a ſenſe had the inhabitants of Northampton of his wiſe conduct upon this occaſion, that they gave him the uſe of St. Peter's Church till his own could be repaired; and the gentlemen in the neighbourhood made up his year's ſalary, which, the next year, was paid him by his generous benefactor Mr. Montagu, of Horton, brother to his old patroneſs the Lady Chandos (b). He diſcharged his paſtoral duty there with the ſame zeal and application which he had ſhewn in other places, and was particularly inſtrumental in bringing over Diſſenters of all denominations to the Church [K]. In the beginning of the year 1676, the Archdeaconry of Norwich becoming vacant by the death of Mr. John Reynolds, his brother-in-law, the Biſhop offered him that preferment, with this ſingular compliment (c): I do not expect thanks from you, but I will be very thankful to you if you will accept of it; of which he deſired time to conſider, and reflecting on the miſconſtructions that might be made of his declining it, he embraced the propoſal, was inſtituted on the 7th, and inſtalled on the 8th of June following, in that Archdeaconry (d); and, ſo long as his health would permit, conſtantly diſcharged his duty by perſonal viſitations. Upon the death of Mr. Tomkins, one of the Prebendaries of the Cathedral Church of Worceſter, Dr. Conant's old friend and contemporary at Exeter-College, the worthy Earl of Radnor (e), aſked it for him from King Charles II. in theſe terms: Sir, I come to beg a preferment of you for a very deſerving perſon, who never ſought any thing for himſelf; and, upon naming him, the King very kindly conſented; ſo that December 3, 1681, he was inſtalled (f). He governed himſelf ſtrictly, with reſpect to this preferment, by the local ſtatutes, as to reſidence, preaching, and other circumſtances, ſo long as he was able to travel; and when his age and infirmities intitled him, in the judgment of the chapter, to ſtatuteable exemption, he directed a great part of the revenue of his prebend to be diſtributed among poor houſekeepers (g), and others, at Worceſter. In 1686, after his eyes had been for ſome time weak, he loſt his ſight entirely; which great misfortune, together with the common infirmities of old age, for ſharp and painful diſeaſes he had none, he bore not only with patience and reſignation, but with chearfulneſs and eaſe (h). As his public courſe of life was uſeful and honourable, ſo he was alſo very happy in his family. He married in Auguſt, 1651, Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. Edward Reynolds, afterwards the right reverend and learned Biſhop of Norwich, by whom he had ſix ſons, and as many daughters (i). In his private life, there was a happy mixture of mildneſs of temper, with ſeverity of morals. He had always as great a contempt of pomp and magnificence, as he had an unfeigned affection for a private and retired life (k). Temperate he was to a degree of abſtemiouſneſs, frugal in his expences, and more of his time, and yet no man freer of both where charity required. So little deſirous of the wealth of this world, that, when he had nothing but his Fellowſhip to ſupport him, he generouſly made over the eſtate that deſcended to him from his father, to his younger brother, Robert, who had married young, and had many children (l). He was not only a man of very ſolid, but of very extenſive learning, and yet ſo very modeſt, that though he underſtood moſt of the [K] In bringing over Diſſenters of all denominations to the Church.] He was not only conſtantly reſident in his pariſh, excepting when his other offices abſolutely required his attendance, but alſo conſtantly officiated in perſon, preaching twice every Sunday, and taking care to inculcate practical religion in the plaineſt and moſt pathetic language (18). In the evenings he catechized the children, and, amongſt them, his own were always preſent. He ſeldom, if ever, viſited his pariſhioners, more eſpecially thoſe of the better ſort, in a ceremonious way; but his clerk had ſtrict orders to inform him when any were ſick, and then, without ſtaying to be ſent for, he readily waited upon the meaneſt of his flock. He was not afraid to ſpeak freely where it was neceſſary, out of any reſpect to perſons; and, where he ſaw the appearance of diſtreſs, he relieved with a bounty ſuitable rather to his inclinations than his circumſtances. He was one of the moſt remarkable Caſuiſts in his time, and was not only reſorted to by ſome who lived at a great diſtance, but his advice was likewiſe aſked, by letters, even from foreigners. As his duties took up a great part of his time, ſo the ſhort ſpaces that he allowed to thoſe relaxations which are abſolutely neceſſary for the relief of human nature, were dedicated to things that would have hardly paſſed with many for recreation. Reading a few pages in the claſſics, hearing ſome remarkable piece of hiſtory, and diſcourſing upon it to his children, or explaining to them ſome point in Natural Philoſophy, that they might have juſt notions of the wiſdom of Providence, and an early impreſſion of the reverence due to its divine Author, were his only diverſions. Yet, with all this ſtrictneſs of manners, he had nothing either of moroſeneſs or pride, great evenneſs of temper, which never roſe higher than being chearful; and, on the other hand, was never depreſſed by temporal loſſes, or corporal pain; his humility ſo true, that it diſcovered itſelf upon all occaſions; he knew little of form and ceremonies, and, from the little he did know, deſpiſed them; yet, from natural ſweetneſs of temper, he was obliging to all, and courteous even to the meaneſt in his pariſh. His charity, as has been before hinted, had leſs relation to his circumſtances than any other point of his conduct. At Northampton, for twenty years together, he paid for the ſchooling of poor children, never fewer than twenty-four, and ſometimes nearer forty; and theſe he placed out with ſeveral needy widows, that what he gave might contribute to their aſſiſtance. He was, upon all occaſions, ready to promote the relief ſought by ſtrangers, of which various inſtances are given in his ſon's memoirs; but we have already exceeded the uſual limits of ſuch an article, for which, the worth of it muſt be our apology; for it would be hard, as well as unjuſt, to ſay but little of ſo great and good a man (19).

Oriental languages, and was particularly as well verſed in Syriac as any man of his time, yet his proficiency in theſe ſtudies was known to very few. It was with much difficulty that he was prevailed upon (for that is really the fact, though directly contrary to what ſeveral authors have aſſerted) (m) to ſuffer a volume of his ſermons to be publiſhed in his life-time; and as for the reſt, which eſcaped that ſevere cenſure he paſſed upon what would have been thought of the higheſt value by the reſt of the world, they were ſent abroad, by the pious care of ſeveral wiſe and worthy perſons, from a charitable deſire, that the Church might not be deprived of the labours of ſo painful and ſo practical a Preacher; which writings of his have met with that reſpect and eſteem they ſo highly deſerved (n) [L]. This learned perſon, after an exemplary life, deceaſed, in the eighty-ſixth year of his age, March 12, 1693, and was buried in his own pariſh church of All-Saints, in Northampton, with a ſuitable inſcription to his memory, upon a plain and decent monument, erected by his widow (o). His ſon, John Conant, Doctor of Laws, a man very eminent in his profeſſion, wrote his life with great care and judgment, from which many particulars have been taken, and the whole of which deſerves well to be publiſhed.

[L] With that reſpect and eſteem which they ſo highly deſerved.] In this note it is propoſed to give an account of ſuch of Dr. Conant's works as have been preſerved and made public, in order to rectify the miſtakes that have been made about them. There have been, in all, ſix volumes of his ſermons ſent abroad, at ſeveral times, by ſeveral hands.

Vol. I. Publiſhed in 1693, 8vo. by the care of Dr. John Williams, miniſter of St. Mildred's, in the Poultry, in the author's life-time, as appears by the preface, and Dr. Conant's dedication to the inhabitants of Northampton. There are in this volume eleven ſermons.

II. Publiſhed in 1697, 8vo. by Dr. John Williams, then become Biſhop of Chicheſter, with a preface before it, in which notice is taken of the former volume, publiſhed in the Doctor's life-time. This volume contains fifteen ſermons.

III. Publiſhed in 1698, 8vo. by the ſame editor, who ſays in the preface, that Dr. Conant committed to the flames many learned diſcourſes, and particularly thoſe which he had preached in a Lecture in the Univerſity on nice and difficult ſubjects, preſerving ſuch only as related to practice. He likewiſe mentions a life of the author, which was expected, but not come to hand. This volume contains fourteen ſermons.

IV. Publiſhed in 1703, 8vo. by the ſame editor. In the preface his Lordſhip takes notice, that there had been an intention of writing the author's life, as a thing that could not fail of being acceptable to thoſe who knew him, and very uſeful to thoſe who did not; but, for the preſent, this deſign being laid aſide, it was hoped the loſs of it would be compenſated by the publication of this fourth volume of ſermons from his own manuſcripts. This volume contains thirteen ſermons.

V. Publiſhed in 1708, 8vo. by the ſame editor, who, in his preface, ſays very confidently, that, with the next volume, an account of the author's life would appear, written by an able hand. This volume contains fourteen ſermons.

VI. Publiſhed in 1722, 8vo. by Digby Coates, M. A. Principal of Magdalen-hall, in Oxford, at the requeſt of the author's ſon, John Conant, LL.D. but without any life or preface before it. There are in this volume thirteen ſermons, making up the whole number fourſcore. C.

[Dr. Conant had a near relation, whoſe name was Samuel Conant, M. A. who was inſtituted to the Rectory of Lytchet Matravers, in the county of Dorſet, in the year 1662, and died in 1719, Rector of that pariſh. He was buried on the North-ſide of the pariſh-church; and this inſcription, written by the grandfather of our ingenious friend, the Rev. Mr. Hall, of Child-Okeford, is upon his tomb.

CONGREVE (WILLIAM), a celebrated Engliſh Poet in the laſt and preſent century. There is no ſort of queſtion about the deſcent of this gentleman, which was from the antient houſe of Congreve, in Staffordſhire, flouriſhing there with honour and reputation (a); neither is there any doubt as to his immediate family, for he was the only ſurviving ſon of William Congreve, Eſq; who was the ſecond ſon of Richard Congreve, Eſq; of Congreve and Stratton, in the county of Stafford (b). As to the place, and indeed as to the kingdom, in which he was born, authors differ; and not only ſo, but are poſitive on both ſides. Some are clear that he was a native of Ireland (c); but it ſeems more probable, or, to ſpeak more plainly, it is morally certain, that he was a native of England, and drew his firſt breath at the village of Bardſa, near Leeds, in Yorkſhire (d), which was the eſtate of a near relation of his by the mother's ſide. The reaſon of our giving the preference to this ſentiment, rather than that which entitles another iſland to the honour of his birth, will be found at the bottom of the page [A]. The time when it happened can only be collected by circumſtances, which place it in 1671 or 1672 (e). His father carried him, when a very child, into Ireland, where, at that time, he had a command in the army, but afterwards was entruſted with the management of a conſiderable part of the large eſtate of the noble family of Burlington, which fixed the reſidence of himſelf and family in that kingdom (f). Our author received the firſt tincture of letters in the great ſchool of Kilkenny, and gave very early proofs of his pregnant genius; and it is ſaid, that one of the firſt eſſays of his poetical talent was a copy of verſes upon the death of his maſter's magpye (g). He went from the ſchool of Kilkenny to the Univerſity of Dublin, then flouriſhing under the direction of Dr. St. George Aſh, where, in a very ſhort time, Mr. Congreve became perfectly acquainted with all the branches of polite literature, and acquired not only a general acquaintance with, but a correct and critical taſte in, the Claſſics (h). His father, however, was deſirous that his parts ſhould be applied to more profitable ſtudies, and therefore ſent him over to England a little after the Revolution, and placed him as a ſtudent in the Middle-Temple (i). But the ſevere ſtudy of the law had ſo little relation to the active diſpoſition and ſprightly humour of the young gentleman, that though he continued for three or four years to live in chambers, and paſs for a Templar, yet it does not appear that he ever applied himſelf with diligence to conquer his diſlike to a courſe of life which had been choſen for him, with ſo little reſpect either to the turn of his natural parts, or the preceding courſe of his education (k). But how little ſoever he anſwered the expectation of his friends in the proſecution of that profeſſion to which they had deſtined him, certain it is, that he was not either indolent or inactive in the cultivation of thoſe ſtudies, that were both his early and his lateſt care. His firſt performance, when almoſt a boy, was extraordinary in its kind; and though no more than a novel, which, under the aſſumed name of CLEOPHIL, he dedicated to Mrs. Catherine Leveſon, yet it was a proof, not only of the vivacity of his wit, and the fluency of his ſtyle, but alſo of the ſtrength of his judgment [B]. As he did not then think proper to own

[A] Will be found at the bottom of the page.] In the new Engliſh tranſlation, with great additions, of the learned Antiquary of Ireland's works, we find Mr. Congreve's life inſerted, as a native of that country; but it is not ſaid when or where he was born (1). In a very large collection of the ſame kind with this, we find the ſame fact aſſerted, from the information of the late ingenious Thomas Southerne, Eſq; who was Mr. Congreve's intimate friend, and out-lived him many years (2). He was himſelf of that country, and might very probably be firmly perſuaded, from his knowing him a youth there, that he was his countryman. The author, upon whoſe credit we rely, in giving a different account of this matter, is the late Mr. Giles Jacob; and (3) though at firſt ſight it muſt appear very ſingular, to prefer the authority of Mr. Jacob to that of Mr. Southerne; yet there is a reaſon for it, ſo ſtrong, that when it is once mentioned, it may perhaps clear this diſpute, in the reader's opinion as well as mine. In the preface, Mr. Jacob, ſpeaking of the communications which he had received from living authors, has this paſſage, 'I am in particular obliged 'to Mr. Congreve for his free and early communica- 'tion of what relates to himſelf, as well as his kind 'directions for the compoſing of this work.' This correſpondence was in the year 1719, though the book was not publiſhed till three years afterwards: but, however, as it was both written and publiſhed in Mr. Congreve's life-time, we muſt conclude from thence, that we have his own authority for the matter of fact, which is ſuperior even to the recollection of his old friend and acquaintance Mr. Southerne, who, as a man might miſtake, though he was certainly a man of too much honour, willingly, to miſinform any body.

[B] But alſo of the ſtrength of his judgment.] The title of this firſt work of our ingenious author's was, INCOGNITA: or, Love and Duty Reconciled. It has been always conſidered as a piece very well written, more eſpecially as it was the firſt production of a youth of ſeventeen. It has alſo been aſſerted, that at the bottom it is a true hiſtory, and though the ſcene is by Mr. Congreve laid in Italy, yet the adventures happened here in England. It is not our buſineſs to enter into the ſecret hiſtory of this entertaining piece, or to attempt giving the reader a key to what the writer took ſo much pains to conceal; but what we intend in this note, is to juſtify the obſervation in the text, and to prove, that though this was the firſt eſſay, and the firſt eſſay of a very young man, yet there is in it ſomething very extraordinary; more eſpecially when we add to what has been ſaid before, that it was a very haſty eſſay likewiſe. There is nothing more common, and indeed there is nothing more natural, than for young men to pique themſelves upon the brightneſs of their parts, the quickneſs of their wit, and, in pieces of this nature, on the elegancy and flowerineſs of their language. But this was not Mr. Congreve's point: he aimed at perfection from the very beginning, and his deſign in writing this novel, was to ſhew how novels ought to be written. Let us hear what he ſays himſelf, and thence we ſhall entertain a higher opinion of his abilities, than could poſſibly be raiſed by the warmeſt commendations. After obſerving, very judiciouſly, that there is the ſame relation between Romances and Novels, as between Tragedy and Comedy, he proceeds thus: 'Since all tradi- 'tions muſt indiſputably give place to the Drama; 'and ſince there is no poſſibility of giving that life 'to the writing or repetition of a ſtory, which it has 'in the action, I reſolved in another beauty to imitate 'dramatic writing, namely, in the deſign, contexture, 'and reſult of the plot. I have not obſerved it be- 'fore in a novel. Some I have ſeen begin with an 'unexpected accident, which has been the only ſur- 'priſing part of the ſtory, cauſe enough to make the 'ſequel look flat, tedious, and inſipid; for it is but 'reaſonable the reader ſhould expect, if not to riſe, at 'leaſt to keep upon a level in the entertainment; for 'ſo he may be kept on in hopes, that, at ſome time 'or other, it may mend; but the other is ſuch a balk 'to a man, it is carrying him up ſtairs to ſhew him 'the dining-room, and after forcing him to make a 'meal in the kitchen. This I have not only endea- 'voured to avoid, but alſo have uſed a method for 'the contrary purpoſe. The deſign of this novel is 'obvious, after the firſt meeting of Aurelian and 'Hippolito with Incognita and Leonora; the difficulty 'is in bringing it to paſs, maugre all apparent obſ- 'tacles, within the compaſs of two days. How 'many probable caſualties intervene in oppoſition to 'the main deſign, viz. of marrying two couple ſo 'oddly engaged in an intricate amour, I leave the 'reader at his leiſure to conſider: as alſo, whether 'every obſtacle does not, in the progreſs of the ſtory, 'act as ſubſervient to that purpoſe, which, at firſt, it 'ſeems to oppoſe. In a comedy this would be called 'the unity of action; here it may pretend to no more 'than own this piece to the world, ſo the reputation reſulting from it was confined within the narrow compaſs of his acquaintance. But as true genius cannot remain long hid, and as untoward accidents rather provoke than tame high ſpirits; ſo, upon a fit of ſickneſs (m), which ſeized him about three years after his return to England, he amuſed himſelf, during a ſlow recovery, in writing a Comedy, which he very ſoon finiſhed; and though he was very modeſt and diffident of his own abilities, yet he ſuffered himſelf to be overcome by the perſuaſion of his relations and friends, and conſented to bring it upon the ſtage. In order to this, he was recommended to Captain Southerne, who, in conjunction with the great Mr. Dryden, and that excellent Critic Arthur Manwairing, Eſq; reviſed the Old Batchelor, of which Mr. Dryden ſaid, he never ſaw ſuch a firſt play in his life (n); and that the author not being acquainted with the ſtage or the town, it would be pity to have it miſcarry for want of a little aſſiſtance. The ſtuff was rich indeed, only the faſhionable cut was wanting, which was ſoon given it. Mr. Thomas Davenant, who had then the direction of the Theatre-Royal in Drury-lane, was ſo much ſtruck with the merit of the piece, and the author's converſation, that he granted him what is called the privilege of the houſe, half a year before his play came upon the ſtage; which, according to the maxims of theatrical government, was not barely an unuſual, but an unprecedented favour (o). In 1693, the Old Batchelor was acted before a numerous and noble audience. The prologue, intended to be ſpoken, was written by Lord Falkland. The play was admirably performed, and received with ſuch general applauſe, that Mr. Congreve was thenceforward conſidered as the prop of the declining ſtage, and as the riſing genius in Dramatic Poeſy (p) [C]. It was this play, and the very ſingular ſucceſs that attended it upon the ſtage, and after it came from the preſs, that brought our author to the notice of that great patron of the Engliſh Muſes, Charles Montague, Lord Halifax, who being deſirous to place ſo eminent a wit in a ſtate of eaſe and tranquillity, made him immediately one of the Commiſſioners for licenſing Hackney-coaches; beſtowed upon him, ſoon after, a place in the Pipe-office; and gave him, likewiſe, a poſt in the Cuſtom-houſe, of the value of ſix hundred pounds a year (q). As theſe were favours of a very extraordinary nature, ſo they raiſed in the breaſt of Mr. Congreve a noble ſpirit of gratitude and affection, which ſhewed itſelf in an unalterable attachment to that nobleman during his life, and the moſt profound re-

‘ than an unity of contrivance. The ſcene is continued in Florence from the commencement of the ‘ amour, and the time, from firſt to laſt, is but three ‘ days. If there be any thing more in particular reſembling the copy, which I imitate, as the curious reader will ſoon perceive, I leave it to ſhew itſelf, being very well ſatisfied how much more proper it had been for him to have found out this himſelf, than for me to prepoſſeſs him with an opinion of ſomething extraordinary in an eſſay, begun and finiſhed in the idler hours of a fortnight's time; for I can only eſteem that a laborious idleneſs, which is parent to ſo inconſiderable a birth.’

[C] And as the riſing genius in Dramatic Poeſy.] This play is dedicated to the Lord Clifford, of Laneſborough, the eldeſt ſon and heir apparent of the Earl of Burlington; but himſelf a Peer alſo, being, as we have told the reader elſewhere, called up to the Houſe of Lords, in the life-time of his father, by writ. In the text we have joined the two accounts of Mr. Congreve's father going over to Ireland and remaining there, becauſe, as it appears from what Mr. Congreve himſelf communicated to Mr. Jacob (4), that he went thither originally in a military capacity; ſo from this dedication we may be convinced of the truth of the other circumſtances as to his being intruſted with the concerns of the Burlington family. Mr. Congreve begins his dedication thus (5). ‘ My Lord, it is ‘ with a great deal of pleaſure that I lay hold on this ‘ firſt occaſion, which the accidents of my life have ‘ given me, of writing to your Lordſhip: for ſince, ‘ at the ſame time I write to all the world, it will be ‘ a means of publiſhing what I would have every body ‘ know, the reſpect and duty which I owe and pay to ‘ you. I have ſo much inclination to be your's, that ‘ I need no other engagement; but the particular ‘ ties by which I am bound to your Lordſhip and family, have put it out of my power to make you any ‘ compliment, ſince all offers of myſelf will amount ‘ to no more than an honeſt acknowledgment, and ‘ only ſhew a willingneſs in me to be grateful. I ‘ am very near wiſhing, that it were not ſo much ‘ my intereſt to be your Lordſhip's ſervant, that it ‘ might be more my merit: not that I would avoid ‘ being obliged to you, but I would have my own ‘ choice to run me into the debt, that I might have ‘ it to boaſt, I had diſtinguiſhed one to whom I would ‘ be glad to be obliged, even without the hopes of ‘ having it in my power ever to make him a return.’ There ſtand before this comedy three copies of verſes, by Mr. Southerne, Mr. Marſh, and Mr. Higgins, in which it is very highly commended. But that we may be convinced this did not at all proceed either from the excuſable fondneſs of friendſhip, or that more excuſable tenderneſs for a riſing genius which glows in the boſom of every true judge of writing, let us look a little into the merits of the cauſe, as they are ſtated by an excellent and impartial judge. The author of the Tatler ſays (6), ‘ In the character ‘ which gives name to the play, there is excellently ‘ repreſented the reluctance of a battered debauchee, ‘ to come into the trammels of order and decency: ‘ he neither languiſhes nor burns, but frets for love. ‘ The gentlemen of more regular behaviour are drawn ‘ with ſo much ſpirit and wit, and the drama introduced by the dialogue of the firſt ſcene, with uncommon, yet natural converſation. The part of ‘ Fondlewife is a lively image of the unſeaſonable ‘ fondneſs of age and impotence.’ We are told in another paper, by the ſame agreeable writer (7), That ‘ in this comedy there is a neceſſary circumſtance obſerved by the author, which moſt other ‘ poets either overlook, or do not underſtand; that is ‘ to ſay, the diſtinction of characters. It is very ordinary with writers to indulge a certain modeſty of ‘ believing all men as witty as themſelves, and making all the perſons of the play ſpeak the ſentiments ‘ of the author, without any manner of reſpect to the ‘ age, fortune, or quality of him that is on the ſtage. ‘ Ladies talk like rakes, and footmen make ſimilies; ‘ but this writer knows men, which makes his plays ‘ reaſonable entertainments, while the ſcenes of moſt ‘ others are like the tunes between the acts; they are ‘ perhaps agreeable ſounds, but they have no ideas ‘ affixed to them.’ But, notwithſtanding this, the remarks of Mr. Collier (8), upon ſome paſſages in this comedy, are not altogether wide of truth, or of ſound criticiſm; but they regard not the ſtructure of the play, and only cenſure a few libertiniſms, into which the author had fallen a little unwarily.

verence for his memory after his deceaſe. We need not be ſurprized, that after ſuch encouragement as the town, and even the Critics, had given him, our author quickly made his appearance again upon the ſtage, as he did the year following, when he brought on the Double Dealer (r). This play was honoured with the preſence of Queen Mary; and though it was not ſo univerſally applauded as his former performance, yet it had the honour to be very highly commended, as well as generally approved, by the beſt judges (s). We need not at all wonder at the fate of this fine performance, for regular Comedy was at that time a new thing. Our author was the very firſt who attempted it; I will not ſay he was the laſt who ſucceeded in it; but I may ſafely aſſert, that he carried it to the higheſt degree of perfection; and that if we were to wiſh any of our Comedies tranſlated into French, for the honour of our nation, it ſhould be his; and amongſt them there is none that does him greater credit than the Double Dealer, notwithſtanding ſome objections that have been made to it (t) [D]. It was towards the cloſe of that year that Queen Mary died, which melancholy accident, as it afforded a pregnant ſubject to Orators and Poets, ſo, amongſt all that attempted it, none ſucceeded better than Mr. Congreve, in the Paſtoral which he wrote upon that occaſion; and which, in point of ſimplicity, elegance, and correctneſs, is at leaſt equal to any thing of the kind that has appeared in our language (u). We have taken notice in another place, of the great revolution that happened in the theatrical world in the ſucceeding year, and of the juſtice and generoſity with which Mr. Congreve eſpouſed the cauſe of our Engliſh Roſcius (w), when he opened his new Theatre in Portugal-Row, Lincoln's-inn-fields, by giving him his excellent Comedy of Love for Love, ſo judiciouſly contrived, and ſo happily executed, as to unite at once the approbation of the few, and the tumultuous applauſe of the many, in its [D] Notwithſtanding ſome objections that have been made to it.] This play is dedicated to the Right Hon. Charles Montague, one of the Lords of the Treaſury: and though we are apt to overlook dedications, as ſeldom containing any thing except acknowledgments and praiſes, yet there are in this ſome paſſages of ſuch true and ſolid criticiſm, and which give ſo clear and ſo good an account of the play itſelf, that they very well deſerve the reader's notice (9).

(9) See the Dedication to this Play in the firſt volume of Mr. Congreve's Works.

'I have, ſince the acting of this play, hearkened after 'the objections which have been made to it, for I 'was conſcious where a true critic might have put 'me upon my defence. I was prepared for the attack, and am pretty confident, I could have vindicated ſome parts, and excuſed others; and, where 'there were many plain miſcarriages, I would moſt 'ingenuouſly have confeſſed them. But I have not 'heard any thing ſaid ſufficient to provoke an anſwer. 'That which looks moſt like an objection, does not 'relate in particular to this play, but to all, or moſt, 'that ever have been written, and that is ſoliloquy: 'therefore I will anſwer it, not only for my own 'ſake, but to ſave others the trouble to whom it may 'be hereafter objected. I grant, that for a man to 'talk to himſelf appears abſurd and unnatural, and 'indeed it is ſo in moſt caſes; but the circumſtances 'which may attend the occaſion, make great alteration. It oftentimes happens to a man to have deſigns, which confine him to himſelf, and, in their 'nature, cannot admit of a confident. Such, for 'certain, is all villainy; and other leſs miſchievous 'intentions, may be very improper to be communicated to a ſecond perſon. In ſuch a caſe therefore, 'the audience muſt obſerve, whether the perſon upon 'the ſtage takes any notice of them at all or no: for 'if he ſuppoſes any one to be by when he talks to 'himſelf, it is monſtrous and ridiculous to the laſt 'degree: nay, not only in this caſe, but in any part 'of a play, if there is expreſſed any knowledge of an 'audience, it is inſufferable. But otherwiſe, when 'a man in ſoliloquy reaſons with himſelf, and pro's 'and con's, and weighs all his deſigns, we ought not 'to imagine that this man either talks to us, or to 'himſelf; he is only thinking, and thinking ſuch 'matter as were inexcuſable folly in him to ſpeak. 'But, becauſe we are concealed ſpectators of the plot 'in agitation, and the poet finds it neceſſary to let us 'know the whole myſtery of his contrivance, he is 'willing to inform us of this perſon's thoughts, and 'to that end is forced to make uſe of the expedient 'of ſpeech, no other or better way being yet invented for the communication of thought. Another 'very wrong objection has been made by ſome, who 'have not taken leiſure to diſtinguiſh the characters. 'The hero of the play, as they are pleaſed to call 'him, (meaning Mellefont) is a gull, and made a 'fool, and cheated. Is every man a gull and a fool 'that is deceived? At that rate I am afraid the two 'claſſes of men will be reduced to one, and the 'knaves themſelves be at a loſs to juſtify their title; 'but if an open-hearted, honeſt man, who has an 'entire confidence in one whom he takes to be his 'friend, and one whom he has obliged to be ſo, 'and who, to confirm him in his opinion in all appearance, and upon ſeveral trials has been ſo: if 'this man be deceived by the treachery of the other, 'muſt he of neceſſity commence fool immediately, 'only becauſe the other has proved a villain? Ay, 'but there was caution given to Mellefont, in the 'firſt act, by his friend Careleſs. Of what nature was 'that caution? only to give the audience ſome light 'into the character of Maſkwell, before his appearance, and not to convince Mellefont of his treachery, 'for that was more than Careleſs was then able to 'do: he never knew Maſkwell guilty of any villainy; 'he was only a ſort of man which he did not like. 'As for his ſuſpecting his familiarity with my Lady 'Touchwood, let them examine the anſwer that Mellefont makes him, and compare it with the conduct 'of Maſkwell's character through the play. I would 'beg them again to look into the character of Maſkwell before they accuſe Mellefont of weakneſs, for 'being deceived by him; for, upon ſumming up the 'inquiry into this objection, it may be found, they 'have miſtaken cunning in one character, for folly in 'another.' To this play there is now prefixed a copy of verſes, by Mr. Dryden, that were addreſſed to the author upon its firſt appearing. They contain the higheſt compliments to him, and the ſtrongeſt commendations of the play poſſible, but are too well known to the world, and too commonly met with, to be inſerted here, and the force and meaning of them would be very much weakened and broken by citing parts of them. Mr. Charles Hopkins alſo wrote a copy of verſes upon the ſame occaſion; and the beſt judges in general have admitted, not only that the foregoing defence of Mr. Congreve was very well founded, but that he has fairly unravelled the true ſource of falſe criticiſm, and ſhewn himſelf thereby a deep enquirer, as well as an excellent judge of human nature; which, as we ſhall have frequent occaſions to ſhew hereafter, appears to have been the conſtant ſtudy of his life, as well as the chief fund whence he drew the many fine and beautiful ſtrokes that diſtinguiſh all, but more eſpecially his comic writings.

favour (x) [E]. The ſame year he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a new kind of Poetry, by addreſſing to King William an irregular Ode on the taking of Namur, in which the ſublimity of the ſentiments, the harmony of the numbers, the happy imitation of the antients, the graceful turn of his panegyric, are truly admirable; but perhaps there is nothing in it that deſerves higher commendation than the delicate compliment with which it ends, and where, in a ſingle line, he ſays the fineſt things poſſible of his two great patrons Halifax and Dorſet (y). As he had now attained the higheſt reputation as a Comic Poet, he was inclined to ſhew that a regular and finiſhed Tragedy might ſucceed upon the Engliſh Theatre. It was an adventurous taſk that he ſet himſelf, and a very high ſtake he made, when he hazarded all the reputation he had already acquired upon this new performance, which, though written according to the rules, was altogether deſtitute of thoſe artificial and irregular helps, frequently relied on by former writers. It ſeems to have coſt him more pains than any of his former pieces; for it was not till 1697, that the Mourning Bride (z) was acted at the new Theatre in Lincoln's-inn-fields. Very few plays ever excited ſo great expectations as this did, and fewer ſtill have met, after ſuch expectation raiſed, with ſo univerſal an approbation. In ſhort, it was the beſt received of all his pieces; and, without doubt, whatever credit he drew from this exquiſite Tragedy, was in ſome meaſure ſhared by the audience, who fairly entitled themſelves to the character of equal and able judges, by the applauſe they beſtowed upon that excellent performance [F]. He was called off from his attention to the Theatre to another kind of writing, that to him, of all men living, was the moſt tedious and tireſome, and that was controverſy. His four plays were attacked with equal fury and celerity by the famous Mr. Jeremy Collier, who, without the leaſt pity to his fine parts, or the ſlighteſt tenderneſs for a reputation raiſed with ſo much pains, fell upon him, not as a dull or taſteleſs, but as a dangerous and deſtructive writer (a). An anſwer was neceſſary, and therefore an anſwer was given, under a very plain title (b), and written with much modeſty as well as wit. There are abundance of judicious things in this defence, which was drawn up in the form of letters to that candid Critic, and the author's conſtant friend, Walter Moyle, Eſq; which, though the ſubject ſeems to render them now out of date, will make them always well worth a judicious reader's peruſal [G]. In all probability, this quarrel created in our author

[E] In its favour.] There is prefixed to this play a ſhort dedication to the then Lord Chamberlain, Charles, Earl of Dorſet and Middleſex, written, as all his dedications are, with great decency and good ſenſe, and without any of that fulſome flattery, which reflects at once on the patron and the writer, and is, at the ſame time, ſuch a plague and puniſhment to a reader, as he has ſeldom the patience to go through. Some faults have been found with ſeveral characters in this play; but if the reflections, proceeding from the ſevere morals of Mr. Collier, can be averted by any tolerable excuſes, drawn from the very nature of comedy, which requires the repreſenting the manners of the age as they really are, nothing elſe can affect it. The ſenſe of ſucceeding times has fully juſtified the judgment of thoſe in which it was firſt acted, and Love for Love continues, and is likely to continue, an admired comedy, as long as true taſte for theatrical entertainments ſhall prevail.

[F] They beſtowed upon that excellent performance.] This play was dedicated to Queen Anne, then princeſs; and it is not eaſy to imagine any thing, either more great or graceful, than the manner in which the author ſhews the conſiſtency of his addreſs; and as there is ſomething in this very peculiar, the following paragraphs will be peruſed with pleaſure (10). 'It 'is from the example of Princes that virtue becomes 'a faſhion in the people; for even they who are averſe 'to inſtruction, will yet be fond of imitation. But 'there are multitudes who never can have means nor 'opportunities of ſo near an acceſs, as to partake of 'the benefit of ſuch examples: and to theſe Tragedy, 'which diſtinguiſhes itſelf from the vulgar poetry, by 'the dignity of its characters, may be of uſe and in'formation; for they who are at that diſtance from 'original greatneſs, as to be deprived of the happi'neſs of contemplating the perfections and real excel'lencies of your Royal Highneſs's perſon, in your 'Court, may yet behold ſome ſmall ſketches and ima'ges of the virtues of your mind, abſtracted and re'preſented on the theatre. Thus poets are inſtructed 'and inſtruct, not alone by precepts, which perſuade, 'but alſo by examples, which illuſtrate Thus is de'light interwoven with inſtruction: when not only 'virtue is preſcribed, but alſo repreſented. But, if 'we are delighted with the livelineſs of a feigned re'preſentation of great and good perſons, and their 'actions, how muſt we be charmed with beholding 'the perſons themſelves? If one or two excelling qua'lities, barely touched in the ſingle action and ſmall 'compaſs of a play, can warm an audience with a 'concern and regard, even for the ſeeming ſucceſs 'and proſperity of the actor; with what zeal muſt 'the hearts of all be filled, for the continued and 'increaſing happineſs of thoſe who are the true and 'living inſtances of elevated and perfiſting virtue? 'Even the vicious themſelves, muſt have a ſacred ve'neration for thoſe peculiar graces and endowments 'which are daily ſo eminently conſpicuous in your 'Royal Highneſs; and, though repining, feel a plea'ſure, which, in ſpite of envy, they per force ap'prove.' This Tragedy has been highly commended by Sir Richard Blackmore (11), and he has ſhewn himſelf a very judicious critic in all that he ſays about it; nor is there any reaſon to diſpute the character which he has given it, of being the moſt perfect tragedy written in that age.

[G] Will make them always well worth a judicious reader's peruſal.] The title which our author gave this work was, Amendments of Mr. Collier's falſe and imperfect Citations, &c. from the Old Batchelor, Double Dealer, Love for Love, Mourning Bride. By the author of thoſe plays (12). In this apology for his own conduct, he lays down many things which are extremely well worth the knowing, and without knowing which, it is impoſſible to form a right notion of the innocence, excellency, or uſe of plays. He obſerves, that Ariſtotle defines comedy to be an imitation of the worſe ſort of people. He does not mean the worſe ſort of people in reſpect to their quality, but in reſpect to their manners. This is plain from his telling you immediately after, that he does not mean relating to all kinds of vice: there are crimes too daring and too horrid for comedy. But the vices moſt frequent, and which are the common practice of the looſer ſort of livers, are the ſubject matter of comedy. He tells us farther, that they muſt be expoſed after a ridiculous manner: For men are to be laughed out of their vices in comedy; the buſineſs of comedy is to delight, as well as to inſtruct: And as vicious people author ſome diſtaſte to the ſtage: however, he afterwards brought on another Comedy, the laſt, not the leaſt valuable, of his performances. It was intituled The Way of the World (c), of which it was ſo juſt a picture, that the world could not bear it, which compleated the diſguſt of our author to the Theatre: upon which Mr. Dennis (though not very famous for either) ſaid a very fine, and a very kind thing, That Mr. Congreve quitted the ſtage early, and that Comedy left it with him (d). He ſeems to have foreſeen the fate of his play, which is well revenged in his epilogue, as it is juſtly expoſed in the dedication prefixed to it when it was publiſhed; wherein our author ſhewed, that he knew how to reſent the injuries done him by little Critics: but it would have been better if he had ſtopped there, and not puniſhed the reſt of the world for their ſakes, by dropping his pen in the prime of life, and when he was moſt capable of doing honour to himſelf, and to his country. This play has long ago triumphed over its feeble adverſaries, and is now juſtly eſteemed as much as it deſerves [H]. He amuſed himſelf, however, after this, and people are made aſhamed of their follies or faults, by ſeeing them expoſed in a ridiculous manner, ſo are good people at once both warned and diverted at their expence. Our author next obſerves, that ſince comic poets are obliged by the laws of comedy, and to the intent that it may anſwer the end and purpoſe abovementioned, to repreſent vicious and fooliſh characters; it ought not therefore to be imputed to the perſuaſion or private ſentiments of the author, if at any time one of theſe vicious characters ſhall behave himſelf fooliſhly or immorally, in word or deed. This, ſays he, would be as hard and as unreaſonable, as to believe that a Painter ſhould reſemble all the ugly faces that he draws. He next remarks, that Mr. Collier's method of citing detached ſentences is unfair, becauſe when thus cited, they may, and indeed muſt, carry quite another ſenſe, than they do in the author's own work, ſo that a man becomes criminal by repreſentation only. 'I cannot think it reaſonable, ſays he, becauſe 'Mr. Collier is pleaſed to write one chapter of immodeſty, and another of profaneneſs, that therefore 'every expreſſion traduced by him under thoſe heads, 'ſhall be condemned as obſcene and profane immediately, and without any farther enquiry. Perhaps 'Mr. Collier is acquainted with the deceptio viſus, 'and preſents objects to the view through a ſtained 'glaſs: things may appear ſeemingly profane, 'when in reality they are only ſeen through a profane medium, and the true colour is diſſembled by 'the help of a ſophiſtical varniſh: Therefore I demand the privilege of the Habeas Corpus Act, that 'the priſoners may have liberty to remove, and to 'appear before a juſt judge in an open and uncounterfeit light:' To theſe he adds another remark. 'Becauſe, ſays he, Mr. Collier, in his chapter of the 'profaneneſs of the ſtage, has founded great part of 'his accuſation upon the liberty which poets take of 'uſing ſome words in their plays, which have been 'ſometimes employed by the tranſlators of the holy 'ſcriptures: I deſire that the following diſtinction 'may be admitted, viz. That when words are applied to ſacred things, and with a purpoſe to treat 'of ſacred things, they ought to be underſtood accordingly: But when they are otherwiſe applied, 'the diverſity of the ſubject gives a diverſity of 'ſignification. And in truth, he might as well except 'againſt the common uſe of the alphabet in poetry, 'becauſe the ſame letters are neceſſary to the ſpelling 'of words which are mentioned in ſacred Writ.' He adds farther, 'It may not be impertinent to take 'notice of a very common expedient, which is made 'uſe of to recommend the inſtruction of our plays, 'which is this: after the action of the play is over, 'and the delight of the repreſentation at an end, 'there is generally care taken that the moral of the 'whole ſhall be ſummed up and delivered to the 'audience, in the very laſt and concluding lines of 'the poem. The intention of this is, that the delight of the repreſentation may not ſo ſtrongly poſſeſs the minds of the audience, as to make them 'forget, or over-ſee the inſtruction: it is the laſt 'thing ſaid, that it may make the laſt impreſſion; 'and it is always comprehended in a few lines, and 'put into rhyme, that it may be eaſy and engaging to 'the memory.' Upon theſe foundations, he builds the juſtification of the greateſt part of the paſſages objected to: ſome others he excuſes, and very frankly gives up ſome, with a promiſe of correction. As we have already treated of this matter elſewhere, we ſhall not inſiſt any longer on it here, but content ourſelves with obſerving, that this diſpute had a very good effect upon the ſtage; and that of all the authors criticized by Mr. Collier, Mr. Congreve was thought to eſcape the beſt, and to have defended himſelf with the greateſt appearance of learning, juſtice, and candour.

[H] And is now juſtly eſteemed, as much as it deſerves.] The reaſons are mentioned in the text, why this comedy did not meet with ſo univerſal an approbation as his former pieces. It is very certain, the fault was not in the play but in the audience, who were not as yet arrived at that correct taſte, which requires that all kind of follies, how general or faſhionable ſoever, ſhould be ſubmitted to the chaſtiſement of the ſtage. In his dedication to Ralph Earl of Montague, a nobleman juſtly celebrated both as a competent and candid judge, the author treats this matter with great penetration and perſpicuity (13). 'But little of it, ſays he, was prepared for that general taſte, which ſeems now to be predominant in 'the palates of our audience. Thoſe characters 'which are meant to be ridiculed in moſt of our 'comedies, are of fools ſo groſs, that, in my humble 'opinion, they ſhould rather diſturb than divert the 'well-natured and reflecting part of an audience: 'they are rather objects of charity than contempt; 'and inſtead of moving our mirth, they ought very 'often to excite our compaſſion. This reflection 'moved me to deſign ſome characters, which ſhould 'appear ridiculous, not ſo much through a natural 'folly (which is incorrigible, and therefore not proper for the ſtage) as through an affected wit; a wit, 'which at the ſame time that it is affected, is alſo 'falſe. As there is ſome difficulty in the formation 'of a character of this nature, ſo there is ſome hazard 'which attends the progreſs of its ſucceſs upon the 'ſtage: for many come to a play ſo over-charged 'with criticiſm, that they very often let fly their cenſure, when, through their raſhneſs, they have miſtaken their aim. This I had occaſion lately to obſerve: for this play had been acted two or three 'days, before ſome of theſe haſty judges could find 'the leiſure to diſtinguiſh betwixt the character of 'a witwoud and a true wit.' In the following apology to his patron, for the liberty taken in the foregoing paragraphs, he ſufficiently ſhews, that he felt the treatment that he had met with from the many, to whoſe deciſion he was reſolved to truſt no more. 'I muſt, ſays he, beg your Lordſhip's pardon for this 'digreſſion, from the true courſe of this epiſtle; but 'that it may not ſeem altogether impertinent, I beg 'that I may plead the occaſion of it, in part of that 'excuſe, of which I ſtand in need, for recommending 'this comedy to your protection. It is only by the 'countenance of your lordſhip, and the few ſo qualified, that ſuch who write with care and pains, can 'hope to be diſtinguiſhed: for the proſtituted name 'of poet, promiſcuouſly levels all that bear it.' There ſtand prefixed to this comedy, a copy of verſes by Sir Richard Steele, in which he touches on the ſame ſubject, and condemns that coarſe taſte which induces the multitude to ſlight true Comedy for Farce. He inſinuates, that our author had conquered this folly, and that the crowd were diſpoſed to admire implicitly whatever had the ſtamp of his name. Mr. Congreve, it ſeems, would not truſt to theſe implicit admirers: he was reſolved not to write down to their underſtandings, or to put it in their power any more to queſtion his.

obliged the world by a great variety of poems and tranſlations (e). He had a fine taſte for Muſic as well as Poetry, which ſufficiently appears in his Hymn to Harmony, in honour of St. Cecilia's Day, 1701, ſet by Mr. John Eccles, his great friend, and one of the moſt elegant Compoſers our nation has produced. To him alſo our author was obliged for ſetting ſeveral of his ſongs, which are very beautiful in their kind, and have all that vivacity of wit which can give life and luſtre to ſuch performances. His early acquaintance with the great, had promiſed him not an eaſy only, but a happy ſtation in life, to which it is very rare that either true genius, or any kind of literary merit, recommends any man. This freed him from all obligations of courting any longer public favour, though it ſtill left him under the tie of gratitude to his illuſtrious friends (f). He acted in a manner ſuitable to his ſituation: he very ſeldom riſked the character he had obtained for the ſake of exalting it; but he never miſſed any opportunity of paying his compliments to his high patrons, in a manner worthy of himſelf and of them. The death of the Marquis of Blandford, only ſon to the Duke of Marlborough, which happened February 20, 1705, afforded him a melancholy occaſion of endeavouring to ſoften, by celebrating the diſtreſs of that illuſtrious family; which he did in a moſt beautiful Paſtoral (g), inſcribed to the Lord Godolphin, Lord High-Treaſurer of England. The glorious ſucceſſes of the Britiſh arms, under the invincible Duke before-mentioned, ſupplied a glorious theme for an Ode to the late Queen Anne, in which he celebrates victories moſt honourable to this nation, in numbers that juſtly entitle their author to unfading reputation, as they cannot fail of preſerving the memory of thoſe victories, as long as our language ſhall laſt, or a true taſte in poetry remains (h). In another Pindaric Ode, he celebrated that great Stateſman, and true Patriot, the Lord High-Treaſurer Godolphin; taking occaſion, from that nobleman's great delight in horſe-racing, to imitate, or rather to emulate, the Greek Poet, in his favourite manner of writing, by a truly elegant and exquiſite digreſſion (i). We owe to him not only theſe two pieces in a kind of poetry almoſt before unknown to our language, but alſo a very learned and judicious diſſertation upon this ſpecies of poeſy, which contains a ſolid and juſt criticiſm on thoſe ſort of irregular pieces, that hitherto have paſſed, though very undeſervedly, for Pindarics [I]. The clearneſs and candour of his criticiſm, ought to give him as high a character in the Republic of Letters, as even his fine performances in ſo many different kinds of poetry. His Birth of the Muſe, and his Dedication in verſe of his poems when collected, both addreſſed to his old patron Charles Lord Halifax, are equally grateful and pleaſing, though as different in their compoſition as any two pieces can be: the former is ſolemn and ſublime, the latter eaſy and familiar. We ſee, in one, how able the Poet was to riſe to the greateſt heights, without the leaſt mixture of bombaſt or fuſtian; and, in the other, how finely he could unite the becoming liberty of a friend, with that reſpect which was nevertheleſs due to his patron's ſuperior rank and dignity. But as, in the earlier part of his life, Mr. Congreve had received obligations from perſons of leſs exalted ſtation, ſo of theſe he was highly ſenſible, and never let ſlip any favourable opportunity of returning them. He wrote an Epilogue for his old friend Mr. Southerne's fine Tragedy of Oroonoko (k); and we learn from Mr. Dryden

[I] That hitherto have paſſed, though very undeſervedly, for Pindarics.] It has been hinted in the text, that whenever Mr. Congreve applied himſelf to any kind of writing in proſe or verſe, his conſtant aim was perfection; to which he had not the vanity of thinking he might arrive by the ſtrength of his genius, but applied himſelf firſt as a critic, to acquire a thorough knowledge of the nature of his taſk, before he undertook to execute it as a poet. It was this led him to examine the works of Pindar, with the greateſt care, before he attempted to imitate him; and at firſt ſight he diſcovered how little reſemblance the odes, pretending to the character of Pindaric, in our language, had to the odes of that author in reſpect to numbers, ſtructure, or ſentiment. He reſolved therefore to reſtore this ancient and ſublime manner of writing, by giving the world a true Pindaric in ſubſtance as well as ſhow, that it might appear the force and ſpirit of this kind of poetry, conſiſted in the ſtrength of the thought, and not in the looſeneſs or irregularity of the numbers. He enquired alſo into the cauſe of ſo general a miſtake, and has aſſigned it with an equal mixture of critical juſtice, and the candour of a gentleman. His words are theſe (14), 'Mr. Cowley, 'in his preface to his Pindaric odes, ſpeaking of the 'muſic of numbers, ſays, that theſe ſometimes, eſpe- 'cially in ſongs and odes, almoſt without any thing 'elſe, make an excellent poet. Having mentioned 'Mr. Cowley, it may be very well expected, that 'ſomething ſhould be ſaid of him, at a time when 'the imitation of Pindar is the theme of our diſcourſe. 'But there is that great deference due to the me- 'mory, great parts, and learning of that gentleman, 'that I think nothing ſhould be objected to the lati- 'tude he has taken in his Pindaric odes. The beauty 'of his verſes are an atonement for the irregularity 'of his ſtanzas; and though he did not imitate Pindar 'in the ſtrictneſs of his numbers, he has very often 'happily copied him in the force of his figures, and 'ſublimity of his ſtyle and ſentiments. Yet I muſt 'beg leave to add, that I believe thoſe irregular odes 'of Mr. Cowley, may have been the principal, 'though innocent, occaſion of ſo many deformed 'poems ſince; which inſtead of being true pictures of 'Pindar, have (to uſe the Italian Painters term) been 'only caricaturas of him, reſemblances that for the 'moſt part have been either horrid or ridiculous. For 'my own part I frankly own my error, in having 'heretofore miſ-called a few irregular ſtanzas a 'Pindaric ode; and poſſibly if others, who have 'been under the ſame miſtake, would ingenuouſly 'confeſs the truth, they might own, that never hav- 'ing conſulted Pindar himſelf, they took all his irre- 'gularity upon truſt; and finding their account in 'the great eaſe with which they could produce odes, 'without being obliged either to meaſure or deſign, 'remained ſatisfied, and it may be were not altoge- 'ther unwilling to neglect being undeceived.' This ſhews not only how deſirous Mr. Congreve was of writing correctly himſelf, but alſo how willing to eſtabliſh ſo true a taſte, as might render correctneſs neceſſary to applauſe.

(14) Congreve's Works, vol. iii. p. 345.

himſelf, how much he owed to his aſſiſtance in the tranſlation of Virgil (l) [K]. He contributed, by tranſlating the eleventh Satire, to the tranſlation of Juvenal publiſhed by that great Poet, and wrote an admirable copy of verſes on the verſion of Perſius performed by Mr. Dryden alone (m). He wrote likewiſe a Prologue for a play of Mr. Charles Dryden's, full of kindneſs for that young gentleman, and of reſpect for his father (n). But the nobleſt teſtimony he gave of his filial reverence for that exalted genius, was in that inimitable panegyric upon his writings, contained in the dedication of his plays to his Grace the Duke of Newcaſtle; a monument that will ever expreſs, in the moſt lively colours, the worth of him to whoſe honour it is conſecrated, and the capacity, candour, and critical juſtice, of the hand that raiſed it. His tranſlations have done him the greateſt honour, in the ſentiments of thoſe who were the beſt judges, and who have taken pains to compare them with their originals. The Hymn to Venus, and ſome of the moſt moving paſſages in the Iliad, appear with all the ſpirit and dignity of Homer in the Engliſh verſion; and as it is impoſſible for a learned writer to peruſe them without confeſſing his accuracy, ſo whoever has a true taſte for poetry muſt feel the effects of that art and force, with which all the emotions naturally riſing from the paſſions of the human mind, are expreſſed in theſe nervous pieces (o). His imitations of Horace have as much the air of that Poet, as our times or language will permit; that is, the ſame ſtrength, vivacity, and delicacy, for which, through a long ſeries of years, they have been admired in the original (p). The third book of Ovid's Art of Love, appears in our tongue with all the ſweetneſs and ſoftneſs peculiar to that author, who was perfectly acquainted with the paſſion, and knew how to deſcribe it with all the maſterly graces of a great Poet; and what was admired in the Auguſtan age, becomes excellent in ours, from the ſkill of Mr. Congreve, and the happy union of the moſt diſtant excellencies in a tranſlator, eaſe and exactneſs (q). He was the better qualified for an undertaking of this kind, from the natural turn of his own temper; for his Poem to, and his excellent Epigram on, Mrs. Arabella Hunt, are entirely in the Ovidian ſtrain, and are as pleaſingly pathetic as any Poems in their kind, in our own, or perhaps in any other language (r). There is a ſtrength and ſolemnity in his verſes to the memory of Lady Gethins, and in his Epitaph upon the two Huntingtons (s), that make one ſcarcely conceive it poſſible that he ſhould ſucceed as well in lighter compoſitions; and yet the tales that he has told after a celebrated French author, are ſo unaffected and natural, that if we were not appriſed of it, we ſhould never have ſuſpected they were tranſlations (t). But there is one piece of his which ought to be particularly diſtinguiſhed, as being ſo truly an original, that though it ſeems to be written with the utmoſt facility, yet we may deſpair of ever ſeeing it copied: this is his DORIS, ſo highly and ſo juſtly commended by Sir Richard Steele, as the ſharpeſt and moſt delicate ſatire he had ever met with (u). We muſt not omit, in this free catalogue of his works, two pieces of the dramatic kind, which do him equal honour as a Poet, and as a lover of Muſic, viz. the Judgment of Paris, a Maſque, and the Opera of Semele. Of theſe, the former was acted with great applauſe, and the latter finely ſet to muſic by Mr. Eccles. In reſpect to both, it is but bare juſtice to ſay, that they have the ſtamp of excellency borne by the reſt of Mr. Congreve's works, were conſidered as maſter-pieces when publiſhed, and may ſerve as models to poſterity [L]. We have now almoſt finiſhed the liſt of his poetical labours, [K] In the tranſlation of Virgil.] As there have been few authors, whoſe abilities have been more univerſally confeſſed than Mr. Dryden's, ſo never any author was more remarkable for modeſty. He ſhewed it in that civility, kindneſs, and candour, with which he corrected the works of others; but much more ſo in the readineſs and gratitude, with which he received any information of miſtakes made by himſelf. He knew that every man was fallible, and therefore, with all the great gifts he received from nature, did not at all repine at his being in that reſpect not exempt from the lot of mortals. It was from a true ſenſe of this, and not a vain affectation of hearing his own praiſes echoed, that he communicated his works, before they were printed, to the ableſt of his friends, that he might receive their help as well as cenſure. Neither was he afraid or aſhamed to confeſs this to the world; for he knew that men of parts and probity, would approve and applaud it. In his dedication therefore to the Marquis of Normanby, afterwards Duke of Buckinghamſhire, he makes the following mention of our author (15). Mr. Congreve has done me the favour to review the Æneis, and compare my verſion with the original. I ſhall never be aſhamed to own, that this excellent young man has ſhewed me many faults, which I have endeavoured to correct. The Engliſh tranſlation of Virgil was not publiſhed until 1697, but Mr. Dryden was engaged in it in 1695, and conſequently at the time he conſulted our author, he was only between twenty-three and twenty-four years of age. What an honour to have his opinion aſked by the greateſt poet of his time, upon a ſubject of ſuch importance to his reputation; what an honour to juſtify both his friendſhip and his judgment on ſo critical an occaſion; and what an honour to receive the laurel from his learned brow, only to fix it again upon his tomb; to be the defender of that great man's fame when he was dead, who had loved him ſo much living; and piouſly to vindicate the character of him, whoſe generous, though juſt, praiſes had laid the foundation of his own?

[L] And may ſerve as models to poſterity.] The great art of adapting poetry to muſic, though ſtudied by many, has been acquired by few. This very plainly appears from the want of a true poetic ſpirit, in many of the pieces ſet to fine muſic, in which we evidently perceive, that the notes were not accommodated to the words, but the words to the notes. We do not indeed perceive this ſo plainly, during the performance, when the faculties of the mind are ſo tranſported by the ſweetneſs of the ſound, that we have not power to diſcern the defects in the ſenſe. But what eſcapes us on the Theatre, ſtares us in the face in the cloſet; and we cannot help wondering, when we read what it was that tranſported us ſo much in the hearing. But the few great maſters that have reached the ſublime heights of Harmony, inſtead of receiving from, communicate helps to the moſt able

bours, in which we have been the more particular, becauſe it was peculiar to Mr. Congreve to have written and excelled, not barely in every kind of dramatic poetry, but almoſt in every kind of poetry. The laſt to which he turned his genius was that of familiar epiſtles. Of theſe, that on the Art of Pleaſing (w), addreſſed to Sir Richard Temple, afterwards Viſcount Cobham, is the only one inſerted in his works; and is ſo truly admirable, that the public has juſt reaſon to regret ſome others that are ſtill ſaid to be preſerved in the cabinets of his friends to whom they were addreſſed, and which it is hoped will one day ſee the light. Another epiſtle of his to the ſame noble perſon, as it is not to be found in his works, we have, as one of its brighteſt ornaments, inſerted in ours, from a copy that appeared to be very correct [M]. This naturally leads us to mention his proſe letters, compoſer. Of this we have the ſtrongeſt inſtance in Mr. Dryden's celebrated ode on St. Cecilia's day, which not only raviſhes us when performed, but when read, and thereby convinces the judicious peruſer of the real force of numbers. The ſame thing may with equal juſtice be ſaid of our author's maſque, the ſongs in which are moſt admirably adapted to the characters, as well as the muſic; and the performance is not only perfect upon the ſtage, but perfect alſo when conſidered only as a poetic entertainment; and though we may ſee it with more rapture, yet we read it too with the higheſt delight, and find nothing in it flat or inſipid for want of the ſupport of muſic. There is an excellency in every kind of writing; and as an author is juſtly entitled to reputation who reaches this in any, ſo admiration is the juſt tribute to that exalted genius that reaches it in all: I need not tell the reader, that this is Mr. Congreve's claim to admiration. His opera of Semele was never performed; but, for all that, it has been univerſally admired. The fable is happily choſen and ſkilfully managed; the ſcenes are finely diſpoſed, the ſentiments perfectly agreeable to the ſubject, and the language exactly ſuitable to the ſentiments. There is, however, one thing that deſerves peculiar notice, and that is, the manner in which our author has diſpoſed that part of his work which ſeemed leaſt ſuſceptible of ſenſe and grace at the ſame time. Himſelf ſhall give you an account of it, for none but himſelf could expreſs it ſo well. ‘ It was (16) not thought requiſite to have ‘ any regard either to rhyme or equality of meaſure, ‘ in the lines of that part of the dialogue, which was ‘ deſigned for the recitative ſtyle in muſic; for as that ‘ ſtyle in muſic is not confined to the ſtrict obſerva- ‘ tion of time and meaſure, which is required in the ‘ compoſition of airs and ſonata's; ſo neither is it ‘ neceſſary that the ſame exactneſs in numbers, ‘ rhymes, or meaſure, ſhould be obſerved in words ‘ deſigned to be ſet in that manner, which muſt ever ‘ be obſerved in the formation of odes and ſonnets: ‘ for what they call recitative in muſic, is only a ‘ more tunable ſpeaking; it is a kind of proſe in ‘ muſic; its beauty conſiſts in coming near nature, ‘ and in improving the natural accents of words by ‘ more pathetic or emphatical tones.’ This explains what had never been explained before, that is to ſay, the nature and meaning of the recitative; how far it approaches, and wherein it is removed from proſe; what the uſe of it, and conſequently what rules are to be obſerved in its compoſition, ſo as to keep it from ſinking ſervilely low, and to reſtrain it from ſwelling into rant and bombaſt.

(16) See the argument prefixed to Mr. Congreve's Opera of Semele, in the third vol. of his Works.

[M] Inſerted in ours, from a copy that appeared to be very correct.] This beautiful poem is written with that ſimple elegance, that force of genius, and that dignity of ſentiment, which leaves no room to doubt of its being juſtly attributed to Mr. Congreve. At what time it was written cannot be ſaid with any pretence to certainty; but as there is a viſible alluſion in the poem to meaſures, which the writer thought were too complaiſant to the French, it is very evident that it muſt have been penned but a very ſmall time before his death. The title it bears is this,

Of improving the preſent time.

Sincereſt critic of my proſe or rhyme,
Tell how thy pleaſing Stowe employs thy time.
Say, Cobham, what amuſes thy retreat?
Or ſtratagems of war, or ſchemes of ſtate?
Doſt thou re-call to mind, with joy or grief,
Great Marlbro's actions? that immortal chief,
Whoſe ſlighteſt trophy, rais'd in each campaign,
More than ſuffic'd to ſignalize a reign.
Does thy remembrance riſing, warm thy heart
With glory paſt, where thou thyſelf had'ſt part;
Or doſt thou grieve indignant, now to ſee
The fruitleſs end of all thy victory?
To ſee the audacious foe, ſo late ſubdu'd,
Diſpute thoſe terms for which ſo long they ſu'd,
As if Britannia now were ſunk ſo low,
To beg that peace ſhe wonted to beſtow.
Be far, that guilt! be never known that ſhame!
That England ſhould retract her rightful claim!
Or ceaſing to be dreaded and ador'd,
Stain with her pen the luſtre of her ſword.
Or doſt thou give the winds afar to blow,
Each vexing thought and heart-devouring woe,
And fix thy mind alone on rural ſcenes,
To turn the levell'd lawns to liquid plains;
To raiſe the creeping rills from humble beds,
And force the latent ſprings to lift their heads;
On watry columns capitals to rear,
That mix their flowing curls with upper air?
Or doſt thou, weary grown, theſe works neglect,
No temples, ſtatues, obeliſks erect;
But catch the morning breeze from fragrant meads,
Or ſhun the noon-tide ray in wholeſome ſhades;
Or lowly walk along the mazy wood,
To meditate on all that's wiſe and good?
For nature, bountiful in thee, has join'd,
A perſon pleaſing, with a worthy mind;
Not given the form alone, but means and art,
To draw the eye, or to allure the heart.
Poor were the praiſe in fortune to excel,
Yet want the way to uſe that fortune well.
While thus adorn'd, while thus with virtue crown'd,
At home in peace; abroad, in arms renown'd;
Graceful in form, and winning in addreſs,
While well you think what aptly you expreſs,
With health, with honour, with a fair eſtate,
A table free, and elegantly neat;
What can be added more to mortal bliſs?
What can he want that ſtands poſſeſt of this?
What can the fondeſt wiſhing mother more,
Of Heaven attentive, for her ſon implore?
And yet, a happineſs remains unknown,
Or to Philoſophy reveal'd alone;
A precept which, unpractis'd, renders vain
Thy flowing hopes, and pleaſure turns to pain.
Shou'd hope and fear thy heart alternate tear,
Or love, or hate, or rage, or anxious care,
Whatever paſſions may thy mind infeſt,
(Where is that mind which paſſions ne'er moleſt?)
Amidſt the pangs of ſuch inteſtine ſtrife,
Still think the preſent day the laſt of life;
Defer not 'till to-morrow to be wiſe,
To-morrow's ſun to thee may never riſe;
Or ſhou'd to-morrow chance to chear thy ſight
With her enliv'ning and unlook'd-for light,
How grateful will appear her dawning rays!
As favours unexpected doubly pleaſe.
Who thus can think, and who ſuch thoughts purſues,
Content may keep his life, or calmly loſe.
All proofs of this, thou may'ſt thyſelf receive,
When leiſure from affairs will give thee leave.
Come, ſee thy friend retir'd, without regret,
Forgetting care, or ſtriving to forget,
In eaſy contemplation, ſoothing time
With morals much, and now and then with rhyme;

letters, which are diſperſed through the works of other men; but, whenever they have a new edition, would make a very natural and a very valuable addition to his own. His letter upon Humour in Engliſh Comedy, is, without doubt, as inſtructive, as entertaining, and as correct a piece of criticiſm as is any where to be met with (x). All his other letters are written with infinite wit and ſpirit, and at the ſame time with a wonderful facility, and a fine flow of language, ſo happily intermixed with lively and inoffenſive raillery, that it is impoſſible not to be pleaſed with them at the firſt reading, or to find any fault with them on the moſt mature reflection. We may be ſatisfied from the peruſal of them, that his converſation muſt have been very engaging; and, therefore, we need not wonder that he lived in ſuch familiarity with the greateſt men of his time, or that they courted his friendſhip, by rendering him every good office in their power. It has been obſerved, that no change of Miniſtries affected him in the leaſt, nor was he ever removed from any poſt that was given him, excepting to a better (y). His place in the Cuſtom-Houſe, and his office of Secretary in Jamaica, are ſaid to have brought him in upwards of twelve hundred pounds a year; and though he lived in a manner ſuitable to ſuch a fortune, yet he was ſo far an œconomiſt, as to raiſe from thence a competent eſtate. No man of his parts and learning ever paſſed through life with more eaſe, or leſs envy; and as in the dawn of his reputation he was very dear to the greateſt wits of his time, ſo during his whole life he preſerved the utmoſt reſpect, and received continual marks of eſteem from men of genius and letters, without ever being involved in any of their quarrels, or drawing upon himſelf the leaſt mark of diſtaſte, or even diſſatisfaction. On the contrary, they ſought his approbation with concern, and received it as the higheſt ſanction of merit. Mr. Addiſon teſtified his perſonal regard for him, and his high eſteem of his writings, upon many occaſions. Sir Richard Steele conſidered him as his patron upon one occaſion, and was deſirous of ſubmitting to his judgment as an umpire on another (z). Even the judicious Mr. Pope, though ſufficiently jealous of his poetical character, thought fit to honour him with the higheſt teſtimony of deference and eſteem (a) [N]. We may add to all this, that Mr. John Dennis, who valued himſelf ſo much upon criticiſing the works of the ableſt writers of his time, was ſo ſenſible of the ſuperior excellence of Mr. Congreve's writings, or at leaſt was ſo grateful for the repeated marks of affability and beneficence which he received from him, that he always ſpoke of him, not with decency only, but with veneration; which, if not a peculiar felicity, muſt at leaſt have been a ſingular ſatisfaction to a man of Mr. Congreve's peaceable diſpoſition, who, as he never gave any offence, was very deſirous, if it was poſſible, to avoid abuſe (b). There is no doubt that Mr. Congreve had an appetite to fame, and was not inſenſible of praiſe: yet never any man was freer from vanity, or ſhewed leſs concern about the fate of his writings; inſomuch, that a foreigner of diſtinction, and, without compariſon, the beſt Poet his country has to boaſt, was a little offended at this, and thought him rather too careleſs as to his literary reputation (c) [O]. Not ſo robuſt in body as in mind,
And always undejected, tho' declin'd;
Not wond'ring at the world's new wicked ways,
Compar'd with thoſe of our fore-fathers days;
For virtue now is neither more or leſs,
And vice is only vary'd in the dreſs:
Believe it, men have ever been the ſame,
And Ovid's GOLDEN AGE is but a dream.

WILLIAM CONGREVE.

[N] With the higheſt teſtimony of deference and eſteem.] Thoſe who were well acquainted with the late Mr. Pope know, that there was nothing he deſpiſed ſo much in others, or the imputation of which he could have borne with ſo little patience himſelf, as the paying a ſervile court, and ſhewing a mean dependance upon any man, how great ſoever. He knew that virtue was true nobility, and parts the riches of nature: hence his deep reverence for Mr. Bethel, and his high regard for Mr. Congreve. To them, however, he would have been aſhamed to dedicate his works, and yet to them he was proud to inſcribe them. He looked upon his performances, as monuments ſecure from time and accident, and every name they bore as conſecrated to immortality. This was his ſentiment, nor was it vanity: the moſt generous poſſeſſor of gold knows the properties and value of the metal as well as the meaneſt miſer. Let us hear then what praiſes one who was ſo ſparing of them has beſtowed on Mr. Congreve. We ſhall find them at the cloſe of his poſtſcript to the tranſlation of Homer, and there they run thus (17). 'Inſtead of endeavouring to raiſe a vain monument to myſelf, let me 'leave behind me a memorial of my friendſhip, with 'one of the moſt valuable men, as well as fineſt 'writers of my age and country. One who has tried, 'and knows by his own experience, how hard an undertaking it is to do juſtice to Homer, and one who 'I am ſure, ſincerely rejoices with me at the period 'of my labours. To him therefore, having brought 'this long work to a concluſion, I deſire to dedicate 'it, and to have the honour and ſatisfaction of placing together in this manner the names of Mr. Congreve, and of

'A. POPE.'

(17) Poſtſcript to his Tranſlation of the Iliad of Homer, dated March 25, 1720.

[O] As to his literary reputation.] The gentleman mentioned in the text, was the late eminent wit, and juſtly eſteemed poet of France, Mr. Voltaire, who, in the ſhort time that he ſtayed here, acquired indeed a wonderful knowledge of our language, and of our manners; notwithſtanding which, however, he was ſometimes miſtaken; and it is the more neceſſary to take notice of his miſtakes, becauſe no man's authority in the world is more likely to paſs them upon the preſent age, or upon poſterity, for undoubted truths. The character he is pleaſed to give Mr. Congreve runs thus: 'He raiſed the glory of comedy to a 'greater height than any Engliſh writer before or 'ſince his time (18). He wrote only a few plays, 'but they are excellent in their kind. The laws of 'the drama are ſtrictly obſerved in them. They 'abound with characters, all which are ſhadowed with 'the utmoſt delicacy, and we do not meet with ſo 'much as one low or coarſe jeſt. The language is 'every where that of men of faſhion, but their actions 'are thoſe of knaves; a proof that he was perfectly 'well acquainted with human nature, and frequented what we call polite company. He was infirm, 'and come to the verge of life when I knew of him.

(18) Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, p. 188, 189.

The beſt part of the laſt twenty years of his life was ſpent in eaſe and retirement; but towards the end of his days he was very much afflicted with the gout, which at length broke his conſtitution ſo much, as to bring on a gradual decay. It was for this, that in the ſummer of the year 1728, he made a tour to the Bath for the benefit of the waters, where he had the misfortune to be overturned in his chariot, from which time he complained of a pain in his ſide, which was ſuppoſed to ariſe from ſome inward bruiſe. However it was, upon his return to London, his health declined more and more, but without making any impreſſion on his ſpirits or underſtanding. He had accuſtomed himſelf to conſider life, and every thing belonging to it, as bleſſings in which we have a very uncertain tenure, and therefore was not either ſurprized or diſturbed at the proſpect of loſing it: the only concern he expreſſed, was for the grief it occaſioned to his friends, more eſpecially thoſe for whom he had a tender affection, and a moſt profound eſteem. He yielded his laſt breath about the hour of five on Sunday morning, January 19, 1728-9, at his houſe in Surrey-ſtreet in the Strand, in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age (e); and on the Sunday following, January 26, his corpſe lay in ſtate in the Jeruſalem-Chamber, from whence, the ſame evening, between the hours of nine and ten, it was carried, with great decency and ſolemnity, into King Henry the VIIth's Chapel; and, after the funeral ſervice was performed, was interred in the Abbey. The pall was ſupported by the Duke of Bridgwater, Earl of Godolphin, Lord Cobham, Lord Wilmington, the Honourable George Berkeley, Eſq; and Brigadier-General Churchill; and Colonel Congreve followed his corpſe as chief mourner. Some time after, a neat and elegant monument, with a ſuitable inſcription thereupon [P], was erected to his memory by Henrietta Ducheſs of Marlborough.

(e) Mr. Congreve's laſt Will and Teſtament, Lond. 1730, 8vo, p. 10.

'Mr. Congreve had one defect, which was his entertaining too mean an idea of his firſt profeſſion, that 'of a writer, though it was to this he owed his fame 'and fortune. He ſpoke of his works as of trifles 'that were beneath him, and hinted to me in our firſt 'converſation, that I ſhould viſit him upon no other 'foot than that of a gentleman, who led a life of 'plainneſs and ſimplicity. I anſwered that had he 'been ſo unfortunate as to be a mere gentleman, I 'ſhould never have come to ſee him, and I was very 'much diſguſted at ſo unſeaſonable a piece of vanity.' It is ſomewhat ſtrange to hear an author accuſed of vanity, for undervaluing his own works. We often meet with cenſures even upon great men, for talking continually of themſelves and their writings; but it is a very ſingular cenſure that is paſſed upon Mr. Congreve, that he was troubled with an unſeaſonable vanity, which hindered him from talking of them at all. The truth of the matter ſeems to have been, that inſtead of feeling an unſeaſonable vanity, he had outlived the ſeaſon of vanity, if ever he had any; and having no longer any thing of the pride of an author about him, it is not at all wonderful that his converſation was not reliſhed by Mr. Voltaire, whoſe merit, as an author, was ſuperior to every thing ——but the ſenſe he had of that merit.

[P] With a ſuitable inſcription thereupon.] As the erecting of this monument is later, in point of time, than any of the collections of ſuch kind of ornaments in Weſtminſter-Abbey*, it is proper to inſert the inſcription here, which runs thus. 'Mr. William 'Congreve died Jan. the 19th, 1728, aged fifty-ſix, 'and was buried near this place; to whoſe moſt va'luable memory this monument is ſet up, by Henri'etta, Dutcheſs of Marlborough, as a mark how dearly 'ſhe remembers the happineſs and honour ſhe enjoy'ed in the ſincere friendſhip of ſo worthy and honeſt 'a man, whoſe virtue, candour and wit, gained him 'the love and eſteem of the preſent age, and whoſe 'writings will be the admiration of the future.' C.

*When this note was written.

 [There are ſcarcely any new circumſtances, relative to the perſonal hiſtory of Mr. Congreve, which can at preſent be collected by the moſt diligent inveſtigation. Notwithſtanding his own aſſertion that he was born in England, it is believed by many, and hath poſitively been affirmed by ſome of his Biographers, that Ireland was the country of his nativity. Dr. Johnſon appears to have been of this opinion. "It was ſaid by himſelf," obſerves the Doctor, "that "he owed his Nativity to England, and by every "body elſe that he was born in Ireland. Southerne "mentioned him with ſharp cenſure, as a man that "meanly diſowned his native country.——To doubt "whether a man of eminence has told the truth "about his own birth, is, in appearance, to be very "deficient in candour; yet nobody can live long "without knowing that falſehoods of convenience or "vanity, falſehoods from which no evil immediately "viſibly enſues, except the general degradation of "human teſtimony, are very lightly uttered, and "when once uttered, are ſullenly ſupported. "Boileau, who deſired to be thought a rigorous and "ſteady moraliſt, having told a petty lye to Lewis "the fourteenth, continued it afterwards by falſe "dates; thinking himſelf obliged in honour, ſays his "admirer, to maintain what, when he ſaid it, was ſo "well received (19)." Whilſt we are ſenſible of the acuteneſs of the preceding remark, and that it ſhews Dr. Johnſon's great knowledge of the human mind, we are not ſatisfied with the application of it, in regard to Mr. Congreve. There doth not appear to be any ſufficient reaſon for charging him with maintaining a falſehood; and his aſſigning ſo particularly the place in Yorkſhire in which he declared that he was born, has all the appearance of truth. Accordingly, his two laſt Biographers, in the New and General Biographical Dictionary, and in the Biographia Dramatica, decidedly prefer our Poet's own teſtimony to that of Mr. Southerne (20).

In contradiction to every account we have of Mr. Congreve, Dr. Swift, in the following lines, has repreſented him as but indifferently provided for, in the more early part of his life.

"Thus Congreve ſpent in writing plays,
And one poor office, half his days,
While Montagu, who claim'd the ſtation
To be Mecænas of the nation,
For Poets open table kept,
But ne'er conſider'd where they ſlept.
Himſelf, as rich as fifty Jews,
Was eaſy, tho' they wanted ſhoes;
And crazy Congrave ſcarce could ſpare
A ſhilling to diſcharge his chair,
Till prudence taught him to appeal
From pæan's fire to party zeal;
Not owing to his happy vein
The fortunes of his latter ſcene;
Took proper principles to thrive,
And ſo might every dunce alive."

Theſe lines afford a ſtriking inſtance how much men are biaſſed by a party ſpirit, and what little dependence can be placed on ſatirical writers, in their repreſentations of characters and facts. Swift's deſign was to throw abuſe on Lord Halifax, in the doing of which he has not ſcrupled to violate truth (21). It would have been ſtrange indeed, if Congreve could ſcarcely afford a ſhilling for the diſcharge of his chair,

(21) From the communications of a correſpondent, to whom we have often been obliged.

chair, when, from his firſt ſetting out in the world, he was put into valuable places by his noble patron.

Theophilus Cibber (or rather Mr. Shiells) informs us, that it is ſaid, that when Congreve found his play of the "Way of the World" not likely to be ſucceſsful, he came in a paſſion on the ſtage, and deſired the audience to ſave themſelves the trouble of ſhewing their diſlike; for he never intended to write again for the theatre, nor ſubmit his works to the cenſure of impotent critics (22). As this fact is grounded only upon report, we cannot pay much credit to it; eſpecially, as it doth not ſeem to comport with Mr. Congreve's acknowledged manners as a Gentleman.

(22) Cibber's Lives of the Poets, vol. iv. p. 90.

Of our author's controverſy with Jeremy Collier, proper notice is taken under that Gentleman's article; and, therefore, we ſhall only add in this place, that however ſucceſsful Congreve might be in his attempts to vindicate ſome particular paſſages in his comedies, it was totally out of his power to defend their general tendency. In the latter part of his life, he became convinced that his conduct as a writer could not admit of a juſtification. On a viſit to Mr. Bevern the Quaker, in company with Mr. Pope, he ſaid, in the courſe of the converſation, that he moſt ſincerely wiſhed that it were poſſible to obliterate all the offenſive and impure paſſages in his works; and that he was fully ſenſible of the errors into which he had been betrayed, by the livelineſs of youth (23).

(23) From the information of the late Robert Dingley, Eſq; whoſe account was from Mr. Bevern.

Our worthy Predeceſſor, Dr. Campbell, has taken ſome pains in vindicating Mr. Congreve's behaviour to Voltaire; but the generality of Biographers will be found to diſapprove of that behaviour. Cibber obſerves, that, when he owed to his wit and writings the reputation, as well as the fortune he acquired, his pretending to diveſt himſelf of human nature to ſuch a degree, as to have no conſciouſneſs of his own merit, was the moſt abſurd piece of vanity which ever entered into the heart of man; and that of all vanity, that is the greateſt which maſks itſelf under the appearance of the oppoſite quality (24). "He treated," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "the muſes with ingratitude: for, "having long converſed familiarly with the great, "he wiſhed to be conſidered rather as a man of "faſhion than of wit; and, when he received a viſit "from Voltaire, diſguſted him by the deſpicable "foppery of deſiring to be conſidered not as an "author but a gentleman (25)." Congreve, however, has had the good fortune to meet with an ingenious defender in an eminent modern Poet. "I "have often thought," ſays Mr. Maſon, "that Mr. "Congreve might very well be vindicated on this "head. It ſeldom happens that the vanity of au"thorſhip continues to the end of a man's days. It "uſually ſoon leaves him where it found him; and "if he has not ſomething better to build his ſelf"approbation upon than that of being a popular "writer, he generally finds himſelf ill at eaſe, if re"ſpected only on that account. Mr. Congreve was "much advanced in years when the young French "Poet paid him this viſit; and, though a man of "the world, he might now feel that indifference to "literary fame which Mr. Gray, who always led a "more retired and philoſophic life, certainly felt "much earlier. Both of them, therefore, might "reaſonably, at times, expreſs ſome diſguſt, if their "quiet was obtruded upon by perſons who thought "they flattered them by ſuch intruſion (26)." Whatever force there may be in this reaſoning, we believe that the common ſenſe of mankind will find it difficult to acquit Mr. Congreve of ſome degree of vanity and affectation, in his reception of Voltaire's viſit.

The bequeſt of Congreve to Henrietta, Ducheſs of Marlborough, has been expoſed to ſtrictures. It is Cibber's remark, that he would have made a better figure in his laſt will, had he remembered the friendſhip he profeſſed for Mrs. Bracegirdle, whoſe admirable performance added ſpirit to his dramatic pieces; but that he forgot her, and gratified his vanity by chooſing a rich Ducheſs his ſole legatee, and executrix (27). This ſhort paragraph is full of miſtakes. It is not true that Mr. Congreve forgot Mrs. Bracegirdle; for he left two hundred pounds to that Lady. He bequeathed, likewiſe, ſeveral other legacies, among which were ſome to his relations; and particularly, three hundred pounds to William Congreve, ſon of Colonel William Congreve of Highgate; and two hundred pounds to Mrs. Anne Congreve, daughter of Colonel Ralph Congreve, of Clarges-ſtreet. Neither was the Ducheſs of Marlborough the executrix of our Poet's laſt will. He conſtituted the Earl of Godolphin his ſole executor, in truſt for the Ducheſs his Lordſhip's wife, and in confidence of his honour and juſtice (28). Mr. Congreve's leaving to that Lady the bulk of his fortune, which amounted to ten thouſand pounds, is not to be juſtified. Dr. Johnſon juſtly obſerves, that this accumulation of attentive parſimony, though to her ſuperfluous and uſeleſs, might have given great aſſiſtance to the ancient family from which he deſcended, at that time, by the imprudence of his relation, reduced to difficulties and diſtreſs (29). The Ducheſs of Marlborough's attachment to Congreve appears to have been of a very extravagant nature. Cibber mentions it; but the following account of it hath been tranſmitted to us by a reſpectable correſpondent. "This Lady, com"monly known by the name of the young Ducheſs "of Marlborough, had a veneration for the memory "of Mr. Congreve which ſeemed nearly to approach "to madneſs. Common fame reports, that ſhe had "his figure made in wax after his death, talked to it "as if it had been alive, placed it at table with her, "took great care to help it with different ſorts of "food, had an imaginary ſore on its leg regularly "dreſſed; and to compleat all, conſulted Phyſicians "with relation to its health. Theſe things are "uſually ranked under the appellation of whim. "But whenever a perſon acts thus abſurdly, the beſt "excuſe is inſanity." It ought to be remembered, that as the preceding account is grounded only on common report, there is the higheſt probability of its being greatly exaggerated.

(28) See Mr. Congreve's Will, in Wilſon's Life of him.

(29) Johnſon's Lives, ubi ſupra, p. 56.

Of Congreve's works much hath been ſaid by various writers, whoſe remarks are not to be neglected; and particular regard will deſerve to be given to thoſe which have been made by Dr. Johnſon. Concerning the "Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled," the Doctor ſays, that "it is praiſed by the "Biographers, who quote ſome part of the preface, "that is indeed, for ſuch a time of life, uncommonly "judicious. I would rather praiſe it than read "it (30)." Not being altogether ſo faſtidious, we have peruſed this performance, and, as it is ſhort, without much hindrance to better objects. It has merit, conſidering the age of the author. What it is chiefly diſtinguiſhed by, is that intricacy of plot which he afterwards ſo much diſplayed in his dramatic writings; and ſomething may be traced in the dialogue parts, of his ſucceeding coruſcations of wit. The ſtory, however, is very unnatural. We ſhall not read it again.

(30) Ibid. p. 43.

Dr. Johnſon's general eſtimation of our Poet's genius as a Dramatiſt is finely expreſſed. "Congreve, ſays the Doctor, has merit of the higheſt kind; he is an original writer, who borrowed neither the models of his plot, nor the manner of his dialogue. Of his plays I cannot ſpeak diſtinctly; for ſince I inſpected them many years have paſſed; but what remains upon my memory is, that his characters are commonly fictitious and artificial, with very little of nature, and not much of life. He formed a peculiar idea of comic excellence, which he ſuppoſed to conſiſt in gay remarks and unexpected anſwers; but that which he endeavoured, he ſeldom failed of performing. His ſcenes exhibit not much of humour, imagery, or paſſion: his perſonages are a kind of intellectual gladiators; every ſentence is to ward or ſtrike; the conteſt of ſmartneſs is never intermitted; his wit is a meteor playing to and fro with alternate coruſcations. His comedies have therefore, in ſome degree, the operation of tragedies; they ſurpriſe rather than divert, and raiſe admiration oftener than merriment. But they are the works of a mind replete with images, and quick in combination (31)."

(31) Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, ubi ſupra, p. 57.

Of Mr. Congreve's firſt play, the "Old Batchelor," Dr. Johnſon thus ſpeaks:

"Such a comedy, written at ſuch an age, requires ſome conſideration. As the lighter ſpecies of dramatic poetry profeſſes the imitation of common life, of real manners, and daily incidents, it apparently preſuppoſes a familiar knowledge of many characters, and and exact obſervation of the paſſing world; difficulty therefore is to conceive how this knowledge can be obtained by a boy.

" But if the Old Batchelor be more nearly examined, it will be found to be one of thoſe comedies which may be made by a mind vigorous and acute, and furniſhed with comic characters by the peruſal of other poets, without much actual commerce with mankind. The dialogue is one conſtant reciprocation of conceits, or claſh of wit, in which nothing flows neceſſarily from the occaſion, or is dictated by nature. The characters both of men and women are either fictitious and artificial, as thoſe of Heartwell and the Ladies; or eaſy and common, as Wittol a tame idiot, Bluff a ſwaggering coward, and Fondlewife a jealous puritan; and the cataſtrophe ariſes from a miſtake not very probably produced, by marrying a woman in a maſk.

" Yet this gay comedy, when all theſe deductions are made, will ſtill remain the work of a very powerful and fertile mind: the dialogue is quick and ſparkling, the incidents ſuch as ſeize the attention, and the wit ſo exurberant that it o'er-informs its tenement (32)."

(32) Ibid. p. 45, 46.

Concerning our author's ſecond performance, the " Double Dealer," the Editors of the Biographia Dramatica obſerve, that " the characters of it are " ſtrongly drawn, the wit genuine and original, the " plot finely laid, and the conduct inimitable; yet " ſuch is, and ever has been the capricious diſpoſition of audiences, that it met not equal encouragement with the " Old Batchelor (in ſome reſpects a much more exceptionable play,) nor had " it the ſame ſucceſs with his later performances " (33)."

(33) Biographia Dramatica, vol. ii. p. 91.

Dr. Johnſon remarks, that the comedy of " Love for Love" is of nearer alliance to life, and exhibits more real manners, than either of the former. " The character of Foreſight, ſays that eminent Biographer, was then common. Dryden calculated " nativities; both Cromwell and King William had " their lucky days; and Shafteſbury himſelf, though " he had no religion, was ſaid to regard predictions. " The ſailor is not accounted very natural, but he " is very pleaſant (34)." We well remember that above forty years ago the character of Ben was not deemed unnatural. It was then a common tradition, that Congreve had reſided ſix weeks at Portſmouth, in order to draw the character from living manners. It is true, that the generality of ſeamen are not ſo witty as Ben; but there have always been ſome wits among that body of people. A man muſt be a great ſtranger to Portſmouth and Plymouth, who does not know that a good deal of ſea-wit ſubſiſts in thoſe places. Beſides, Ben is not a common ſailor, but a Gentleman's ſon brought up to the navy.

(34) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 47, 48.

The annotators, in the laſt edition of Beaumont and Fletcher's works, have pointed out two paſſages in the " Elder Brother" of thoſe Poets, which Congreve appears to have had in his eye when he wrote his " Love for Love (35)." We diſpute not the inſtances; but ſurely no Dramatiſt was ever leſs of a borrower.

(35) Beaumont and Fletcher's Dramatic Works, vol. ii. p. 116. 157. notes.

Scarcely any tragedy has had more different accounts given of it than Congreve's " Mourning Bride." We have inſerted a high character of it in the article of Blackmore (36), and Lord Kaims ſpeaks of it in very favourable terms. Treating on the violation of the unity of place, he adds: " From the " foregoing cenſure muſt be excepted the ' Mourning Bride' of Congreve, where regularity concurs " with the beauty of ſentiment and of language, to " make it one of the moſt complete pieces England " has to boaſt of." Lord Kaims acknowledges, however, that in point of regularity, it is not altogether unexceptionable; the unity of place being broken in the fifth act (37). The Editors of the Biographia Dramatica treat the " Mourning Bride" with no ſmall degree of contempt. " This, they ſay, is the " only tragedy our author ever wrote, and met with " more ſucceſs than any of his other pieces; yet it " is certainly greatly inferior to the very worſt of " them: for although the ſtory is a pleaſing and affecting one, and well told, yet the language has ſo " much of the bombaſt, and ſo little of real nature " in it, that it is ſcarcely credible it could be the " work of an author ſo remarkable for the contrary, " in the eaſy flowing wit of his comedies (38)." We have obſerved, that other critics have ſpoken of the " Mourning Bride" in the like contemptuous language; not, we confeſs, with our entire approbation; for, though we are not inſenſible of its faults, we think, at the ſame time, that it has conſiderable excellencies: and it is ſome argument in its favour, that it has maintained its popularity on the theatre, ſo as to be continued a ſtock play, down to the preſent period. Mrs. Siddons has not deemed it derogatory to her reputation to appear frequently in the character of Zara. Dr. Johnſon, though not partial to the " Mourning Bride," ſays, that it is ſo written as to ſhew that Mr. Congreve was ſufficiently qualified for either kind of dramatic poetry. The Doctor remarks, however, that there is more buſtle in this play than ſentiment; that the plot is buſy and intricate, and the events take hold on the attention; but that, excepting a very few paſſages, we are rather amuſed with noiſe, and perplexed with ſtratagem, than entertained with any true delineation of natural characters. To theſe ſtrictures Dr. Johnſon hath added a paſſage highly to Congreve's honour. " But " whatever objections may be made either to his " comic or tragic excellence, they are loſt at once in " a blaze of admiration, when it is remembered, that " he had produced theſe four plays before he had " paſſed his twenty-fifth year; before other men, " even ſuch as are ſome time to ſhine in eminence, " have paſſed their probation of literature, or preſume to hope for any other notice than ſuch as is " beſtowed on diligence and inquiry. Among all " the efforts of early genius which literary hiſtory " records, I doubt whether any one can be produced that more ſurpaſſes the common limits of " nature than the plays of Congreve (39)."

Our Author's " Way of the World" is generally eſteemed the moſt perfect of his comedies. It is obſerved, in the Biographia Dramatica, that, as it is the laſt, it is perhaps the beſt of his plays; that the language is pure, the wit genuine, the characters natural, and the paintings highly finiſhed; and that, though it was not well received at the firſt, time has ſince opened the eyes of the town to its perfections (40). Lord Kaims commends the " Way of the World," on account of its preſerving the unity of place during every act, and a ſtricter unity of time during the whole play than is neceſſary (41).

None of our readers can be ignorant of Mr. Pope's line,

" Tell me if Congreve's fools are fools indeed."

In reference to this line, and ſpeaking of the character of Lady Wiſhfort, Mr. Maſon has the following curious obſervation. " For my own part, I " think it one of the moſt entertaining characters " that ever was written. I know, however, that it " is commonly thought extravagant and unnatural; " and I believe it is true, that no woman ever exiſted who had ſo much folly and affectation, and at " the ſame time ſo much wit and fancy: yet every " one ſees that were this wit and fancy taken away, " her character would become inſipid, in proportion " as it became more natural; ſo that in this and " other inſtances, if Congreve's fools were fools indeed, " they would, by being true characters, ceaſe to be " entertaining ones (42)."

(42) Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Mr. Gray, p. 214. Quarto edition.

Mr. Murphy, in his life of Henry Fielding, having mentioned that he had contracted a vicious turn of writing by making Congreve his model, and that he had derived an error in his ſtyle from the ſame ſource, thus characterizes the latter Gentleman's comedies. " It has been obſerved, that the plays of Congreve " appear not to be legitimate comedies, but ſtrings " of repartees, and ſallies of wit, the moſt poignant " and polite indeed, but unnatural and ill-placed. " If we except the Old Batchelor, Foreſight, and " Sir Sampſon Legend, there will hardly, perhaps, be " found a character in this lively writer, exempt from " this general cenſure. The frequent ſurprizes of " alluſion, and the quickneſs and vivacity of theſe " ſudden turns, which abound in Mr. Congreve,

" breaking

" breaking out where you leaſt expected them, as if " a train of wit had been laid all around, put one in " mind of thoſe fire-works in a water-piece, which " uſed formerly to be played off in Cuper's Gardens. " No ſooner one tube, charged with powder, raiſed " itſelf in various forms and evolutions of fire, but " inſtantly another and another was lighted up; and " the pleaſure of the ſpectators aroſe from ſeeing " ſecret artificial mines blazing out of an element, " in which ſuch a machinery could not be expected " (43)." A ſhort character of our poet is drawn by Dr. Blair. " Congreve, ſays the Doctor, is, unqueſ- " tionably, a writer of genius. He is lively, witty, " and ſparkling; full of character, and full of action. " His chief fault as a comic writer, is, that he over- " flows with wit. It is often introduced unſeaſon- " ably; and, almoſt every where, there is too great " a proportion of it for natural well-bred converſa- " tion (44)." What this ingenious author hath added, concerning the immoral tendency of both Congreve's and Farquhar's play's, cannot be omitted. " Throughout them all, the rake, the looſe intrigue, " and the life of licentiouſneſs, are the objects con- " tinually held up to view; as if the aſſemblies of a " great and poliſhed nation could be amuſed with " none but vicious objects. The indelicacy of theſe " writers, in the female characters which they intro- " duce, is particularly remarkable. Nothing can be " more awkward than their repreſentations of a " woman of virtue and honour. Indeed, there are " hardly any female characters in their plays except " two; women of looſe principles, or women of af- " fected manners, when they attempt to draw a cha- " racter of virtue. The cenſure which I have now " paſſed upon theſe celebrated comedians, is far from " being overſtrained or ſevere. Accuſtomed to the " indelicacy of our own comedy, and amuſed with " the wit and humour of it, its immorality too eaſily " eſcapes our obſervation. But all foreigners, the " French eſpecially, who are accuſtomed to a better " regulated and more decent ſtage, ſpeak of it with " ſurprize and aſtoniſhment. Voltaire, who is, af- " ſuredly, none of the moſt auſtere Moraliſts, plumes " himſelf not a little upon the ſuperior bienſeance of " the French theatre; and ſays, that the language of " Engliſh comedy is the language of debauchery, " not of politeneſs. M. Moralt, in his Letters upon " the French and Engliſh nations, aſcribes the cor- " ruption of manners in London to comedy, as its " chief cauſe. Their comedy, he ſays, is like that " of no other country: it is the ſchool in which the " youth of both ſexes familiariſe themſelves with " vice, which is never repreſented there as vice, but " as mere gaiety (45)." To finiſh the cenſure of the immorality of the Engliſh comedies, we ſhall tranſcribe the concluſion of a fine paſſage upon the ſubject, by Lord Kaims, in his Elements of Criticiſm. " How odious ought thoſe writers to be, who thus " ſpread infection through their country, employing " the talents they have from their Maker moſt un- " gratefully againſt himſelf, by endeavouring to cor- " rupt and diſfigure his creatures! If the comedies " of Congreve did not rack him with remorſe in " his laſt moments, he muſt have been loſt to all " ſenſe of virtue. Nor will it afford any excuſe to " ſuch writers, that their comedies are entertaining, " unleſs it could be maintained, that wit, ſprightli- " neſs, and other ſuch qualifications, are better ſuited " to a vicious than a virtuous character: the direct con- " trary of which holds true in theory; and is exem- " pliſied in practice from the Merry Wives of Windſor, " where we are highly entertained with the conduct " of two ladies, not more remarkable for mirth and " ſpirit than for the ſtricteſt purity of manners(46)."

In our Predeceſſor's article, the moſt extravagant encomiums are beſtowed on Mr. Congreve's Miſcellaneous Poems. Such exuberant and indiſcriminate praiſe is ſeldom the reſult of judgment, and certainly is not ſo in the preſent caſe. Our Author's Dramatic Works excepted, few readers will now be able to go through his poetical productions with any great degree of pleaſure. Dr. Johnſon's criticiſm upon them affords a fine contraſt to the loud applauſes of the text; and, indeed, in every view, deſerves to be inſerted. Perhaps, in the faſtidiouſneſs of his taſte, he may ſometimes be thought too ſevere: but if he have erred in this reſpect, with regard to the inſtance before us, his error is very trifling. Nay, we can ſcarcely help thinking that the following remarks on Congreve are ſtrictly and univerſally juſt.

" Of his miſcellaneous poetry, I cannot ſay any thing very favourable. The powers of Congreve ſeem to deſert him when he leaves the ſtage, as Antæus was no longer ſtrong than he could touch the ground. It cannot be obſerved without wonder, that a mind ſo vigorous and fertile in dramatic compoſitions, ſhould on any other occaſion diſcover nothing but impotence and poverty. He has in theſe little pieces neither elevation of fancy, ſelection of language, nor ſkill in verſification: yet if I were required to ſelect from the whole maſs of Engliſh poetry the moſt poetical paragraph, I know not what I could prefer to an exclamation in The Mourning Bride:

ALMERIA.
It was a fancy'd noiſe; for all is huſh'd.

LEONORA.
It bore the accent of a human voice.

ALMERIA.
It was thy fear, or elſe ſome tranſient wind
Whiſtling thro' hollows of this vaulted iſle:
We'll liſten—

LEONORA.
Hark!

ALMERIA.
No, all is huſh'd, and ſtill as death.—'Tis dreadful!
How reverend is the face of this tall pile;
Whoſe ancient pillars rear their marble heads,
To bear aloft its arch'd and pond'rous roof,
By its own weight made ſtedfaſt and immoveable,
Looking tranquillity! It ſtrikes an awe
And terror on my aching ſight; the tombs
And monumental caves of death look cold,
And ſhoot a chilneſs to my trembling heart.
Give me thy hand, and let me hear thy voice;
Nay, quickly ſpeak to me, and let me hear
Thy voice—my own affrights me with its echoes.

" He who reads theſe lines, enjoys for a moment the powers of a poet; he feels what he remembers to have felt before, but he feels it with great increaſe of ſenſibility; he recognizes a familiar image, but meets it again amplified and expanded, embelliſhed with beauty, and enlarged with majeſty.

" Yet could the author, who appears here to have enjoyed the confidence of Nature, lament the death of queen Mary in lines like theſe:

The rocks are cleft, and new-deſcending rills
Furrow the brows of all th' impending hills.
The water-gods to floods their rivulets turn,
And each, with ſtreaming eyes, ſupplies his wanting urn.
The Fawns forſake the woods, the Nymphs the grove,
And round the plain in ſad diſtractions rove;
In prickly brakes their tender limbs they tear,
And leave on thorns their locks of golden hair.
With their ſharp nails, themſelves the Satyrs wound,
And tug their ſhaggy beards, and bite with grief the ground.
Lo Pan himſelf, beneath a blaſted oak,
Dejected lies, his pipe in pieces broke.
See Pales weeping too, in wild deſpair,
And to the piercing winds her boſom bare.
And ſee yon fading myrtle, where appears
The Queen of Love, all bath'd in flowing tears;
See how ſhe wrings her hands, and beats her breaſt,
And tears her uſeleſs girdle from her waiſt:
Hear the ſad murmurs of her ſighing doves!
For grief they ſigh, forgetful of their loves.

And many years after he gave no proof that time had improved his wiſdom or his wit; for on the death of the Marquis of Blandford this was his ſong:

And now the winds, which had ſo long been ſtill,
Began the ſwelling air with ſighs to fill:

The water-nymphs, who motionleſs remain'd,
Like images of ice, while ſhe complain'd,
Now loos'd their ſtreams; as when deſcending rains
Roll the ſteep torrents headlong o'er the plains.
The prone creation, who ſo long had gaz'd,
Charm'd with her cries, and at her griefs amaz'd,
Began to roar and howl with horrid yell,
Diſmal to hear, and terrible to tell;
Nothing but groans and ſighs were heard around,
And Echo multiplied each mournful ſound.

In both theſe funeral poems, when he has yelled out many ſyllables of ſenſeleſs dolour, he diſmiſſes his reader with ſenſeleſs conſolation: from the grave of Paſtora riſes a light that forms a ſtar; and where Amaryllis wept for Amyntas, from every tear ſprung up a violet.

"But William is his hero, and of William he will ſing;

The hovering winds on downy wings ſhall wait around,
And catch, and waft to foreign lands, the flying ſound.

It cannot but be proper to ſhew what they ſhall have to catch and carry:

'Twas now, when flowery lawns the proſpect made,
And flowing brooks beneath a foreſt ſhade,
A lowing heifer, lovelieſt of the herd,
Stood feeding by; while two fierce bulls prepar'd
Their armed heads for fight; by fate of war to prove
The victor worthy of the fair-one's love.
Unthought preſage of what met next my view;
For ſoon the ſhady ſcene withdrew.
And now, for woods, and fields, and ſpringing flowers,
Behold a town ariſe, bulwark'd with walls and lofty towers;
Two rival armies all the plain o'erſpread,
Each in battalia rang'd, and ſhining arms array'd;
With eager eyes beholding both from far,
Namur, the prize and miſtreſs of the war.

"The Birth of the Muſe is a miſerable fiction. One good line it has, which was borrowed from Dryden. The concluding verſes are theſe:

This ſaid, no more remain'd. Th' ethereal hoſt
Again impatient crowd the cryſtal coaſt.
The father, now, within his ſpacious hands,
Encompaſs'd all the mingled maſs of ſeas and lands;
And, having heav'd aloft the ponderous ſphere,
He launch'd the world to float in ambient air.

"Of his irregular poems, that to Mrs. Arabella Hunt ſeems to be the beſt: his ode for Cecilia's Day, however, has ſome lines which Pope had in his mind when he wrote his own.

"His Imitations of Horace are feebly paraphraſtical, and the additions which he makes are of little value. He ſometimes retains what were more properly omitted, as when he talks of vervain and gums to propitiate Venus.

"Of his Tranſlations the ſatire of Juvenal was written very early, and may therefore be forgiven, though it have not the maſſineſs and vigour of the original. In all his verſions ſtrength and ſprightlineſs are wanting: his hymn to Venus, from Homer, is perhaps the beſt. His lines are weakened with expletives, and his rhymes are frequently imperfect.

"His petty poems are ſeldom worth the coſt of criticiſm: ſometimes the thoughts are falſe, and ſometimes common. In his verſes on lady Gethin, the latter part is an imitation of Dryden's ode on Mrs. Killigrew; and Doris, that has been ſo laviſhly flattered by Steele, has indeed ſome lively ſtanzas, but the expreſſion might be mended; and the moſt ſtriking part of the character had been already ſhewn in Love for Love. His Art of Pleaſing is founded on a vulgar but perhaps impracticable principle, and the ſtaleneſs of the ſenſe is not concealed by any novelty of illuſtration or elegance of diction.

"This tiſſue of poetry, from which he ſeems to have hoped a laſting name, is totally neglected, and known only as it is appended to his plays.

"While comedy or while tragedy is regarded, his plays are likely to be read; but, except what relates to the ſtage, I know not that he has ever written a ſtanza that is ſung, or a couplet that is quoted. The general character of his Miſcellanies is, that they ſhew little wit, and little virtue.

"Yet to him it muſt be confeſſed, that we are indebted for the correction of a national error, and the cure of our Pindaric madneſs. He firſt taught the Engliſh writers that Pindar's odes were regular; and though certainly he had not the fire requiſite for the higher ſpecies of lyric poetry, he has ſhewn us that enthuſiaſm has its rules, and that in mere confuſion there is neither grace nor greatneſs (47)."

(47) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 57—64.

Mr. Melmoth, in his elegant Sir Thomas Fitzoſborne's Letters, hath clearly ſhewn, that ſome paſſages, which Congreve tranſlated from Homer, are perfectly contemptible, when compared with Pope's verſion of the ſame paſſages (48).

(48) Fitzoſborne's Letters, p. 271—276. Seventh edition.

Mr. Congreve's ſhort Eſſay on Humour in Comedy, though not a regular and finiſhed compoſition, contains ſome ſenſible obſervations on that difficult ſubject. Lord Kaims objects, and perhaps juſtly, to the exactneſs of his definition (49); but, notwithſtanding this, ſeveral of his remarks are deſerving of attention. Mr. Congreve refers humour to peculiarity of character, to which it does undoubtedly, in general, belong; though ſometimes it appears to ariſe from an odd combination of incidents. His Remarks on Ben Jonſon are very judicious (50).

We forgot to mention, in its proper courſe, that when, upon the extruſion of the Whigs, ſome interceſſion was uſed leſt Congreve ſhould be diſplaced, the Earl of Oxford made this anſwer:

CONNOR (BERNARD), an eminent Phyſician and learned Writer towards the cloſe of the laſt century. He was deſcended from an antient family in the kingdom of Ireland, and was born in the county of Kerry about the year 1666 (a). He had an early tincture of learning given him, though he was not regularly educated in the grammar-ſchools and univerſity of that iſland, on account of his family's being of the Popiſh religion (b). When he grew up towards man's eſtate, either out of regard to the exhortations of his family, or from the natural turn of his own diſpoſition, he determined to apply his thoughts to the ſtudy of Phyſic; and with that view, about the year 1686, he went over to France, reſided for ſome time in the univerſity of Montpelier, and went from thence to Paris, where he ſpent his time ſo well, and directed his ſtudies in ſo prudent and regular a manner, that he was very much eſteemed, not only for his proficiency in the art of Phyſic, but for his great ſkill in Anatomy and Chemiſtry (c). As he profeſſed himſelf deſirous of travelling, travelling, and as there were two ſons of the High-Chancellor of Poland then on the point of returning to their own country, it was thought expedient they ſhould take that long journey under the care and inſpection of Dr. Connor (d). He accordingly conducted them very ſafely to Venice, where he found the Honourable Mr. William Legg, afterwards Baron and Earl of Dartmouth, much indiſpoſed of a fever; from which, by his great ſkill and diligent attendance, he happily recovered him; and having accompanied him to Padua (e), went from thence through Tyrol, Bavaria, and Auſtria, down the Danube to Vienna; and after having made ſome ſtay at the Court of the Emperor Leopold, paſſed through Moravia and Sileſia to Cracow, and from thence, in eight days, to Warſaw (f). He was very well received at the Court of King John Sobieſki, and by the intereſt of Signor Hieronimo Alberto de Conti, Miniſter from the Serene Republic of Venice, who married the Lady Margaret Paſton, eldeſt daughter to Robert, and ſiſter to William Earl of Yarmouth, to whom he had been ſtrongly recommended, he became Phyſician to that Monarch (g). This was a very extraordinary preferment in ſo ſhort a time, and for ſo young a man; for it happened in the beginning of the year 1694, when Dr. Connor could not be above twenty-eight years of age. In right of his employment he was conſtantly near the perſon of that Prince, which gave him an opportunity of entering thoroughly into his character, and of diſcerning that he was not only a deep Politician, and one of the greateſt Captains of his age, but a perſon alſo of ſound ſenſe, great reading, quick parts, and much addicted to think freely upon all ſubjects. He gives us a very ſingular and curious inſtance of this (b), which, as it ſerves to let us into the Doctor's turn and diſpoſition, as well as the King's, is inſerted at the bottom of the page [A]. [A] At the bottom of the page.] The King, ſays he (1), was a well-ſpoken Prince, of very eaſy acceſs, extremely civil, and had moſt of the good qualities requiſite in a gentleman. He was not only well verſed in all military affairs, but likewiſe in all polite and ſcholaſtic learning. Beſides his own tongue, the Sclavonian, he underſtood the Latin, French, Italian, German, and Turkiſh languages: he delighted much in Natural Hiſtory, and in all the parts of Phyſic: he uſed to reprimand the Clergy for not admitting into the univerſity and ſchools the Modern Philoſophy. He loved to hear perſons diſcourſe of thoſe matters, and had a particular talent to ſet people about him very artfully by the ears, that, by their diſputes, he might be diverted, as happened often in my time, eſpecially once when I was undeſignedly concerned myſelf. The King being at dinner, and having the Biſhops of Poſnania, Ploſko, Vilna, and other Divines about him, particularly Father Vota, an ingenious Jeſuit, the King aſked me in Latin, 'What part of the body 'I thought the ſoul was in?' I was willing to decline talking on that ſubject, and told the King, 'That being a Phyſician, my chief enquiry was about 'the body, and that the Divines there preſent were 'able to ſatisfy his Majeſty.' The King replied, 'That ſince the ſoul has an influence upon the body, 'and ſince the paſſions of the mind, as anger and 'fear, breed fevers, and other diſtempers, it was neceſſary that the Phyſicians ſhould examine the ſoul 'in that reſpect, as well as the body.' I anſwered, 'That Phyſicians did enquire into the nature of the 'paſſions, and obſerved, that there was ſuch an influence of the ſoul upon the body, and of the body 'upon the ſoul, that altered the thoughts of the one, 'as well as the operations of the other; but that the 'ſoul being a ſubſtance inviſible, and without extenſion, it was impoſſible for Phyſicians to conceive 'the nature of it themſelves, or explain it to others, 'as they do that of the body, which they take to 'pieces by Anatomy, and reſolve into its minuteſt 'elements by Chemiſtry: that the Phyſicians only 'agree in the main, that the ſupreme Author of 'things has eſtabliſhed ſuch laws between the ſoul 'and the body, which make a mutual correſpondence 'between them: that as for the ſeat of the ſoul, I 'might perhaps differ from the Divines then preſent, 'and conſequently oppoſe the common doctrine of 'the ſchools; for they hold with Ariſtotle, that the 'ſoul is entire in all the body, and wholly in every 'part of the body, which was impoſſible to conceive; 'for if the ſoul was entire in every part of the body, 'there would be as many ſouls in the body as there 'are parts; ſince it is impoſſible that the ſelf-ſame 'ſubſtance, though an indiviſible ſpirit, can ever be 'in two places at the ſame time; beſides, the ſoul 'cannot be but where it thinks; and every one finds, 'by experience, that his thought is not in his hands 'nor feet, but is conſcious to himſelf, that his thought 'is in his head, and that conſequently the ſoul muſt 'be only in the brain, which is the ſeat of ſenſation, 'and the origin of all the nerves, which are the organs of perception and motion.' Father Vota being alarmed at this doctrine, which ſeemed altogether new in that part of Europe, ſaid, 'That if the ſoul 'was only in the head, the reſt of the body would 'be dead; ſince the received opinion was, that the 'ſoul was the life of the whole body, and that to 'enliven the whole body, the ſoul muſt be wholly 'preſent in every part of it.' This drew on a longer diſpute than I expected; for I anſwered, 'That the 'rational ſoul was not the life of the body, but the 'blood only, and the animal ſpirits; and that this 'blood and ſpirits circulated equally all over the 'body, and gave it natural heat and motion, which 'is properly its life; and that this circulation of the 'blood and ſpirits could not poſſibly depend on the 'rational ſoul, becauſe it was an involuntary motion, 'formed by the mechanic ſtructure of the body, and 'by the natural impulſe of the heart, which is the 'primum mobile of the whole machine; and that 'though they all held, not only in Poland, but in 'other countries, that the rational ſoul performed 'every minute action in the body, yet this opinion 'was very irreconcileable with the free-will of the 'mind, which they all admitted; for ſince they allow, that whatever the ſoul does, it is not only conſcious of it, but likewiſe does it freely, without being neceſſitated thereto; when, as it is very evidently obvious to every one, that the vital motions 'in our bodies, I mean the motion of the heart, and 'that of reſpiration, with the periſtaltic motion of 'the ſtomach and guts, are performed naturally with 'ſuch mechaniſm, that the ſoul cannot ſtop them, 'no, nor ſo much as haſten nor retard them; and 'that the ſoul is not at all conſcious of them; for if 'we think of any object, or not think at all, as when 'we are aſleep, or in an apoplexy, thoſe vital motions go on equally the ſame.' The Biſhop of Poſnania, who was bred up in his youth a Phyſician, ſeemed to ſpeak in favour of this opinion, as did likewiſe ſome others of the company, which made the Jeſuit very angry; inſomuch, that he acquainted them in a kind of paſſion, 'That neither the King nor 'they ought to hearken to any diſcourſe contrary to 'the received opinion of the Church: that it might 'have been a pernicious conſequence had it been 'public; for (ſays he) if the ſoul be not in all the 'body, and if it does not animate the body, and 'perform all its vital functions, it would be of no 'uſe, and conſequently we ſhould live like other animals.' I anſwered him, 'That doubtleſs the operations of life were performed by the ſame mechaniſm tion in the Court of Poland was highly raiſed by the judgment he made of the Ducheſs of Radzivil's diſtemper, which all the Phyſicians of the Court took to be no more than an ague, from which ſhe might be eaſily recovered by the regular and conſtant taking of the Bark; but Dr. Connor inſiſted, that ſhe had an abſceſs in her liver, and that her caſe was deſperate (i). As this Lady was the King's only ſiſter, his prediction made a great noiſe, more eſpecially when it was juſtified by the event; for ſhe not only died within a month, but, upon the opening of her body, the Doctor's ſentiments of her malady were fully verified. He might have continued, with great reputation, at that Court, if he had been ſo inclined; but as he never propoſed to remain longer in Poland than was requiſite to finiſh his enquiries into the Natural Hiſtory, and other remarkables of that kingdom; and as he foreſaw that the King's life could not laſt long, and that there was little reaſon to hope for the eſtabliſhment that was promiſed him, from the political views of the royal family, he reſolved to lay hold of the firſt favourable opportunity for quitting that country, and returning into the Britiſh dominions; nor was it long before he met with as fair an occaſion as he could wiſh (k). The King had an only daughter, the Princeſs Tereſa Cunigunda, who eſpouſed the Elector of Bavaria by proxy, in the month of Auguſt, 1694. As ſhe was to make a journey from Warſaw to Bruſſels, of nearly a thouſand miles, and in the midſt of winter, it was thought neceſſary that ſhe ſhould be attended by a Phyſician; and, by the intereſt of his good friend the Venetian Miniſter, he procured himſelf to be named to that employment (l), and accordingly ſet out with her on the 11th of November for Berlin, and continued his journey through the territories of the Elector of Hanover, the Biſhop of Hildeſheim, and the Biſhop of Munſter, to Wezel, where ſhe was met by the Elector of Bavaria; and from thence he proceeded in her train to Bruſſels, where ſhe arrived on the 12th of January following (m). He ſoon after reſigned his charge to Dr. Piſtorini, the Elector's Phyſician; and, having taken leave of the Princeſs, ſet out for Holland, and from thence came over to England, in the month of February 1695 (n). He ſtayed ſome ſhort time at London, and then went to Oxford, where, in the ſpring of the year laſt mentioned, he read his Lectures upon the Animal Œconomy, to a numerous and learned audience, with very great applauſe (o). In his travels through Italy he had converſed with Malpighi, Bellini, Redi, and other celebrated perſons (p), of whoſe acquaintance he made a proper uſe; and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by ſo clear, ſo methodical, and ſo judicious a manner of explaining the new diſcoveries in Anatomy, Chemiſtry, and Phyſic, that his reputation was very ſoon raiſed to a great height. This was not a little increaſed by his printing, during the time of his reſidence in that ſeat of the Muſes, ſeveral learned and accurate Diſſertations upon curious and important ſubjects; which treatiſe met with a very favourable reception (q), as it certainly deſerved, from the many new and ſenſible thoughts that occur in every part of it, and which diſcover their author to have been a man of much meditation, as well as of great reading and general knowledge.

'niſm in us as they were in brutes, ſince we have the 'ſame organs with them, as likewiſe the ſame fluids 'to enliven us: that the prerogatives of the ſoul are 'not leſs for its not being preſent to every action of 'the body; for the ſoul, though it is not the cauſe 'of ſpontaneous or vital motion in us, yet it performs 'all voluntary actions, as ſpeaking, walking, and all 'other free motions of the body; it receives all im'preſſions from the five ſenſes, it forms to itſelf all 'ideas of ambient objects, it reaſons upon them to 'know what is moſt uſeful and hurtful to itſelf and 'to the body. The ſoul, in ſhort, is like the pilot, 'though it does not ſet the body in motion, as the 'wind does a ſhip, yet it is capable of governing its 'actions, and directing voluntarily its courſe.' The King being thus ſatisfied, that the rational ſoul did not actuate, as they call it, or enliven, all the parts of the body, deſired to know what was properly Death. The ſchool Divinity maintains, that Death is a ſeparation of the rational ſoul from the body. I owned, indeed, 'That in death the ſoul was actually ſeparated 'from the body.' But I could not allow, 'That 'that ſeparation was the cauſe of death, but that the 'death of the body was the ceſſation of the motion 'of the heart, of the blood, and of the ſpirits; which 'ceſſation could not proceed from the ſeparation of 'the ſoul, ſince theſe do not at all depend upon it,' as I proved before, 'but it was occaſioned by ſome 'defects in the organs and fluids of the body, which, 'loſing their due diſpoſition, and their mutual cor'reſpondence one with another, all their actions 'ceaſe, which ceſſation is properly called Death; ſo 'that the ſoul, finding them incapable of receiving 'its influence, and of obeying its commands, quits 'the body after it is dead; by which it appears, that 'the ſeparation of the ſoul is not properly the cauſe 'of death, but that the death of the body is the 'cauſe of the ſeparation.' The King himſelf illuſtrated this opinion from a familiar example of an organ and an organiſt: while the parts of the organ were in their due order and ſymmetry, the organiſt played upon them; but when, by length of time, they were either broke, uſed too much, or any other way put quite out of tune, he leaves playing on them. This diſcourſe held from three of the clock till ſeven, and the Divines were extremely warm in it; and ſome of them had the boldneſs to tell the King, that his Majeſty ſhould not ſuffer ſuch heretical opinions to be introduced before ſuch a great aſſembly, contrary to the received doctrine of the Church. By this it may be plainly ſeen, how fond the Divines are of their old opinions; relying upon the doctrine of Ariſtotle, whom we cannot ſuppoſe to be ſo thoroughly acquainted with the ſtructure, ſprings, and motions of the human body, nor indeed with all other natural cauſes as the modern Phyſicians are; yet it is the policy of the Divines, not only in Poland, but in Spain, Italy, and in moſt other countries, where their power is very great, not to let any opinions creep in among them that would ſeem to contradict thoſe of Ariſtotle; for having built their ſyſtems of Divinity upon the principles of this Pagan Philoſopher, they are juſtly afraid, that if experience and reaſon ſhould ſhake the foundation, the ſuperſtructure would fall to the ground, as doubtleſs it would for the moſt part.

ledge [B]. He returned in the ſummer of 1695 to London, lived in Bow-ſtreet, Covent-Garden, and in the winter read a courſe of Lectures of the ſame kind that he had done at Oxford (r), and which were received with general approbation. He became, about this time, a member of the Royal Society, and a member of the Royal College of Phyſicians alſo, which were a kind of rewards juſtly due to his great application and ſingular merit (s). In the ſummer of the year 1696, he went to Cambridge, in conſequence of an invitation from ſome of the members of that Univerſity, read public Lectures there, and made various experiments in Chemiſtry (t). Upon his return from thence to London, he was honoured with a letter from the Biſhop of Ploſkow, wherein was contained the caſe of his old maſter the King of Poland, upon which his advice was deſired; but before he had an opportunity of returning an anſwer, the news came of that Monarch's death (u). As he was naturally addicted to ſpeak his ſentiments very freely, even upon very nice and delicate ſubjects, he adventured, both at Oxford and at Cambridge, to let fall ſome diſcourſes in relation to miracles, and of a new method of explaining the nature of them in a phyſical way, upon which he had digeſted his ſentiments into writing ſome years before. He was very much preſſed to make this work of his public; and though he could not but foreſee that many inconveniencies would attend it, yet the ſolicitations upon this head were ſo ſtrong, and came from perſons to whom he was ſo much obliged, that he could not avoid yielding to their requeſt (w). He took, however, the precaution of procuring the licence of the College of Phyſicians, which bears date April 9, 1697, and is ſubſcribed by Sir Thomas Millington, then Preſident, and by Dr. Barwick, Dr. Torleſſe, Dr. Dawes, and Dr. Gill, who were Cenſors (x). He dedicated it to the Right Honourable Charles Montague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Preſident of the Royal Society. This work of his made a very great noiſe in the world, and came to a ſecond edition the ſame year: it is written in Latin, with as much perſpicuity as the ſubject would permit, and with great prudence and circumſpection [C]. Notwithſtanding this, it made a bad

[B] As well as of great reading and general knowledge.] Theſe eſſays were printed together, under the following general title, viz. Diſſertationes Medico-Phyſicæ, de Antris Lethiferis. De Montis Veſuvii Incendio. De Stupendo Oſſium Coalitu. De Immani Hypogaſtrii Sarcomate, A. D. Bernardo Connor, M. D. Sereniſſimi Poloniæ Regis Medico, è Regia Cameræ Pariensis Societate. Oxonii. E Theatro Sheldoniano Sumptibus Henrici Clements Bibliopolæ, An. Dom. 1695, 8*vo*. That is, 'Medico-phyſical Diſſertations concern-'ing Peſtiferous Caverns, an extraordinary eruption 'of Mount Veſuvius, the wonderful coalition of hu-'man Bones, and of an extraordinary ſwelling or 'dropſy of the womb.' Theſe treatiſes are printed ſeparately, and with different title pages. There is a table of contents to the firſt, and another to the other three. The Vice-Chancellor's Imprimatur is dated June 5, 1695. The firſt of theſe diſcourſes is dedicated to Thomas, Earl of Pembroke and Montgomeryſhire, at that time Lord Privy-Seal, and one of the Lord Juſtices. It is written very ſuccinctly, and with great perſpicuity: the author introduces and diſcuſſes a multitude of curious queſtions, and gives his reaſons for believing, that there is nothing infectious or poiſonous in the famous cave near Naples; but that animals are killed therein, or rather loſe their lives, through the want of elaſticity in the air, which renders it unfit for animal reſpiration. The ſecond diſcourſe is addreſſed to Dr. Edward Browne, whom he compliments highly upon his Book of Travels that he had publiſhed. He therein gives a particular deſcription of a moſt remarkable eruption of Mount Veſuvius, which happened in the month of April, 1694, and which he attributes to the vaſt quantities of nitre and antimony lodged in the bowels of that mountain (2). He addreſſes his third diſcourſe to Dr. John Ratcliff, Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the College of Phyſicians; and therein he gives an accurate account of an anatomical prodigy which he had ſeen at Paris. The fourth treatiſe is dedicated to Dr. Hans Sloane, then one of the King's Phyſicians, Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the Royal College, who was afterwards knighted, and became Preſident of both thoſe learned bodies; in which he gives him an account of the diſſection of a widow at Paris, who died at the age of fifty-ſeven, and who laboured under a monſtrous big belly, occaſioned by a mole, or falſe conception, for twenty-five years. This fleſhy ſubſtance was of an enormous ſize, being in length twenty-two inches, twelve broad, ten thick, and weighing forty-two pounds. What is moſt obſervable in theſe diſſertations, is the great art and ſkill which the author has ſhewn in bringing in a great variety of uſeful ſubjects, more eſpecially relating to the animal œconomy, of which he diſcourſes with much freedom and judgment; from whence it is very evident, that they were not publiſhed ſo much with a view to gratify the curioſity of the learned men at that time, as to excite a good opinion of the author's capacity and knowledge in his profeſſion; and, at the ſame time, to ſhew the improvements he had made in his travels, that by this means he might come into practice with the greater eaſe and credit. It is pretty certain that this method had its effects, and that if he had not been taken off ſo ſuddenly, he would have very ſoon grown into as high repute as any Phyſician of his time. It ſeems to be a pity that theſe diſſertations have not been tranſlated, as there is a great variety of curious obſervations in them, that would prove very entertaining to the Engliſh reader.

(2) He gives a very clear and accurate deſcription of this mountain, from his own obſervation.

[C] And with great prudence and circumſpection.] In the firſt place it will be neceſſary to ſee the title of it at large, which we may preſume has given at leaſt as much offence as the book, it runs thus: Evangelium Medici: ſeu Medicina Myſtica de Suſpenſis Naturæ Legibus, ſive de Miraculis; Reliquiſque ἐν τοῖς βιβλίοις Memoratis, quæ Medicæ indagini ſubjici poſſunt. Ubi perpenſis priùs Corporum Naturâ, ſano & morboſo Corporis Humani Statu, nec non Motûs Legibus, Rerum Status ſuper naturam, præcipuè qui Corpus Humanum & Animam ſpectant, juxta Medicinæ Principia explicantur. A Bernardo Connor, M. D. & R. S. S. i. e. 'The Phyſician's Goſpel: or, Myſtical 'Phyſic, with reſpect to the ſuſpenſion of the laws 'of nature, or of miracles; and whatever elſe worthy 'of note occurs in the ſacred writings, that falls pro-'perly under the conſideration of Phyſic, wherein 'the nature of bodies, the ſound and diſeaſed ſtate of 'human bodies, as alſo the laws of motion, and the 'ſupernatural ſtate of things, more eſpecially of the 'human body and ſoul, are previouſly conſidered, and, 'according to the principles of Phyſic, explained.' Londini 1697, 8*vo* & 12*mo*. Amſtelodami 1699, 8*vo*. This curious little treatiſe contains ſixteen ſhort ſections, in which the author, with great clearneſs and conciſeneſs, and with the moſt perfect connection, treats every part of his ſubject ſo as to make the reader fully ſenſible, that he had not haſtily or ſuperficially run it over in his mind, but with great care and caution had conſidered all things that he advances, and the conſequences that might be drawn from them. The beſt, as well as moſt ſuccinct account that can be given of it, the reader will meet with in the following extract of a letter, written by himſelf, to an eminent Divine (3).

(3) This letter is to be found at the end of the firſt vol. of his Hiſt. of Poland.

'My deſign, Sir, ſays he, is to endeavour to make 'it no longer a difficulty to conceive and make evi-'dent, by reaſon and the principles of Phyſic, I mean 'the principles of nature, all the ſupernatural effects 'authentically delivered to us concerning bodies 'chiefly, but particularly the human: I mean, ſup-'poſing thoſe effects to be true matters of fact, and all 'matters of fact, as well natural as ſupernatural, to 'be immediate effects of a ſupreme Being, which 'muſt be granted; it is as eaſy to conceive the man-'ner how this infinite power may be applied to bodies 'to work ſupernatural effects, as to produce the com-'mon phænomena of nature. By this I hope to 'convince our Sceptics, the Deiſts, who muſt give 'their aſſent, when they have the ſame evident reaſon 'to conceive the poſſibility, and conſequently to be-'lieve the truth, of ſuch miraculous effects, that are 'authentically related, as they have to conceive, 'that ſtraw can burn in a flaming fire. The foun-'dation I go upon is the ſtructure of the human body, 'which I have often taken to pieces by Anatomy, 'and reſolved into its eſſential elements, or minute 'particles, by Chemiſtry; for I find it as neceſſary 'to be acquainted with its fabric, to give an account 'of the miraculous ſtates it is ſuppoſed to have been 'in ſupernaturally, as it is to explain the natural 'effects commonly produced in it. For want of a 'ſufficient inſight into this matter, ſeveral Divines in 'the latter ages have given very groſs ideas of the 'ſupernatural effects they have pretended to explain; 'and in ſeveral places where I have been, I ſaw 'them, either through ignorance, or for intereſt, 'give out for miracles, phænomena, that were only 'ſurpriſing effects of natural cauſes, which has given 'ſo great an occaſion to Sceptiſciſm, and increaſe of 'Deiſm. Having laid down for my baſis the ſtruc-'ture of the human body, as far as I could diſcover 'from my ſenſes, anatomy, fire, microſcopes, and 'experiments, I proceed to examine, and endeavour 'to explain, the different ways its natural ſtate is 'ſuppoſed to have been ſupernaturally altered by an 'infinite power: for finding that the human body is 'all matter, and that all this matter is nothing but an 'union of particles with bulk, figure, and reſpective 'ſituation, I thought that all the alterations that 'could ſupernaturally happen to this bulk, figure, or 'ſituation, could be conceived. But before I enter 'upon thoſe nice ſubjects, I find it firſt neceſſary to 'enquire into the cauſe, nature, and laws of motion, 'becauſe motion is the only true cauſe of all natural 'phænomena; and the ſuſpenſions of the laws of this 'motion, are the only cauſes of all ſupernatural 'effects. I conceive the laws of motion can be ſuſ-'pended three different ways; and by one or more of 'theſe laws of ſuſpenſion, it is as eaſy to ſolve clearly 'all ſupernatural effects, as it is to explain the moſt 'evident effects of natural cauſes by the common 'laws of motion. Though I mention, that all ſu-'pernatural effects whatſoever can be eaſily reduced 'to ſome of the three laws of ſuſpenſion of motion, 'notwithſtanding I do not deſign to ſpeak of them 'all in particular, but of ſuch only as are moſt in 'diſpute amongſt the learned; yet any underſtanding 'man may eaſily make his application, and reſolve 'all other miraculous effects into one or other of 'them. By the ſuſpenſion of the laws of motion, I 'do not mean, that theſe laws are changed or abro-'gated, but only that their courſe is ſtopt while an 'effect is produced by the immediate action of the 'Deity, without any influence of theirs, for ſome 'particular end; and it cannot be denied, but that 'ſupreme Legiſlator, who made firſt the laws, may 'ſuſpend them when he pleaſes, and, in that ſtate of 'ſuſpenſion, produce, of himſelf alone, without their 'concurrence, the ſame effects, which are wont to 'be produced only by the ſame laws put in execu-'tion; ſo that though a body; for example, of a 'hundred pound weight, by the eſtabliſhed laws of 'motion, muſt be moved by another that has ſeveral 'degrees of motion, yet an infinite power may, of 'himſelf, either move it without the concurrence of 'another body, or hinder its being moved by any 'other body of what weight ſoever, though put into 'the moſt rapid motion, as if combuſtible matter 'ſhould be in a flaming fire without burning. — Sir, 'the learned and judicious gentlemen of your own, 'can have no reaſon to complain, that I invade their 'province, or encroach upon their prerogatives; for 'I do not undertake to prove, that there ever were 'any ſupernatural effects produced: that matter, I 'think, belongs entirely to Divines to make evident 'from authentic teſtimony. I only endeavour to 'demonſtrate the poſſibility of them, and if there 'were ever any, to explain the mode and mechaniſm 'with which we may conceive how they might have 'been performed. This is not doing any prejudice 'to your profeſſion; for I have that reſpect to the 'Church, and that deference to the Clergy, that I 'did nothing in this matter without the advice and 'approbation of thoſe of them that are in the higheſt 'ſtation; and they owned, that though this ſubject 'had never yet been handled by any Phyſician, nor 'indeed by any Divine that I know of, yet it was 'only a Phyſician's buſineſs to treat of, according to 'the principles of Natural Philoſophy and Phyſic: 'for ſince it is on all ſides acknowledged, that mira-'culous effects are above natural cauſes, no people 'can better judge whether any effect is really ſuper-'natural, than thoſe that make it their buſineſs and 'profeſſion to know how far the activity of natural 'cauſes can reach. For Phyſicians may find ſome-'times that what the wilful miſtakes of ſome, and 'the ignorance of others, take for ſupernatural, is 'the viſible effect of a natural cauſe, as I obſerved 'once at Rome ſome years ſince; paſſing by chance 'through the Strada del Popolo, I ſaw a multitude 'of people hurrying a man to St. Mark's Chapel, 'which belongs to the Venetian Embaſſador; they 'told me, that he was poſſeſſed with the devil, and 'that they were carrying him to be exorciſed. I 'crowded through the throng into the church, and 'felt the man's pulſe; I found him in a fever, mak-'ing hideous grimaces and motions with his face, 'eyes, tongue, and all his limbs, which were nothing 'elſe but a fit of convulſive motions all over his body, 'occaſioned by diſorder of his blood and his ſpirits, 'being a hypochondriacal perſon. The clergy and 'people began very devoutly to fright the pretended 'devil out of him, and, in a little time, his diſor-'derly motion ceaſed; which, as they thought it to 'be the miraculous effect of their prayers, I attribut-'ed to the natural abatement and uſual ceſſation of 'ſuch fits. Every underſtanding Naturaliſt knows, 'that an able Chemiſt can work ſuch ſurprizing ef-'fects in his art, as may very eaſily paſs for miracles 'with ſuch as are unacquainted how far the force of 'natural cauſes can extend. It would ſeem to them 'very aſtoniſhing to ſee two liquors that are cold of 'their own nature ferment, boil, and become very 'hot, without any viſible cauſe to put them in mo-'tion: to ſee Aqua Regalis diſſolve maſſy gold, 'Aqua Fortis diſſolve ſilver, iron, Mercury, and moſt 'other minerals: to ſee the Spirit of Nitre, and the 'Oil of Cloves, which ſeparately are very quiet, turn 'into a burning flame when mixed together; to ſee 'tranſparent liquors, when mixed, turn red, green, 'white, and into all ſorts of colours. I ſay nothing 'of the Phoſphorus, of the ſurprizing effects of the 'Air-Pump, of the elaſticity of the Air, of the Mag-'net, nor of an infinite number of other wonderful 'Phænomena in nature, which though they may be 'common, yet they are not the leſs ſurprizing, be-'cauſe their cauſe is as hid from thoſe that do not, 'and even to thoſe that do, ſtudy nature, as that of abroad (y), to repreſent him as an abſolute Atheiſt; though there is nothing more certain, than that the Doctor was entirely free from any thing of that kind, and actually wrote this piece with a very good intention: neither is there any thing in the treatiſe, that, fairly conſidered, will admit of any ſuch conſtruction, notwithſtanding the prejudices that have been raiſed againſt it. The Poliſh election, upon the death of King John Sobieſki, having a ſtrong influence upon the general ſyſtem of affairs in Europe, and being from thence a common topic of diſcourſe at that time, induced many perſons of the firſt diſtinction to deſire the acquaintance of Dr. Connor, that they might inform themſelves as to the ſtate of that kingdom, than which there was none ſo little known, or ſo indifferently underſtood, amongſt the generality even of intelligent perſons: and the ſatisfaction given by the Doctor in his converſations upon theſe ſubjects was ſuch, that he was deſired to gratify the public, by committing what he knew of the Poliſh nation and country to the preſs (z). Upon his giving his conſent to this, he found himſelf ſo much hurried in the execution, and this hurry ſo inconvenient with reſpect to his practice, that he was obliged to engage one Mr. Savage to aſſiſt in compoſing, correcting, and publiſhing that performance (a). The method he took, was that of an ingenious French Jeſuit in his account of China; that is to ſay, he threw his materials into the form of letters, each of which he addreſſed to ſome perſon of high rank and diſtinction, who perhaps had formerly deſired thoſe lights from him, that are given in the Epiſtle thus addreſſed. The two volumes of which this work conſiſts, were publiſhed ſeparately; and the laſt more eſpecially, carries in it many marks of precipitation: but, however, it muſt be allowed to be the beſt book that we have upon the ſubject, or rather, to contain the beſt things in it, and may be read with equal pleaſure and improvement (b) [D]. There are ſome particulars which fell more immediately under the author's own inſpection, that are very curious, and not to be met with elſewhere; ſuch as his account of the ſalt-mines, of young children carried away and nouriſhed by bears, and of the diſeaſes peculiar to that country, ſupernatural effects is to thoſe Naturaliſts who trace natural cauſes to their higheſt ſphere of activity. I do not doubt, but that if the miſſionaries that are ſent from the Weſtern Churches to convert the Pagans of the Eaſtern Nations, were as well verſed in Anatomy and Chemiſtry, as they are in the tenets of the Chriſtian Religion, and in the Mathematics, and that if they did but dazzle the eyes of thoſe ignorant people with a great many curious and uſeful experiments in theſe two fundamental branches of Phyſic, they would perhaps make as deep impreſſions upon their minds, and give them as convincing teſtimonies of the power and legality of their miſſion, as they can at preſent by the ſpiritual or indelible character they ſay is inherent in them, by virtue of their commiſſion. Pope Clement X. knew well the effects which Chemiſtry, artfully applied, might produce in the minds of ignorant people, when he ſecured the perſon of the famous Italian, Signior Borri, who, about thirty-five years ago, by his ſkill in Chemiſtry, did work ſeveral extraordinary cures on diſeaſes in Germany, and gained ſuch univerſal reputation all over the Empire, and the northern kingdoms, that, (as it was reported of him) he thought he had credit and opportunity ſufficient to invent and propagate a new religion, by making his ſurprizing experiments in Chemiſtry paſs for miracles; which they might have eaſily done, ſince Chemiſtry being then in its minority was not much known in the world. But the Pope, foreſeeing the ill conſequence ſuch a deſign might produce, gave timely orders to his Nuncio, then at Vienna, to deſire the preſent Emperor to get him ſeized; which being accordingly done, he was ſent priſoner to Rome, on condition nevertheleſs, that his life ſhould be ſafe. Here he lived in Caſtello St. Angelo for ſeveral years, where I ſaw him, and his curious Laboratory for Chemiſtry, allowed him for his diverſion. Nobody was admitted to diſcourſe him without ſpecial leave, for fear, I ſuppoſe, he ſhould inform the world either of his pretended new doctrine, or of the injuſtice he might intimate that was done to him. He died lately in this cloſe confinement ſince I have been at Rome.' To this is added another little piece, intitled, Teutamen Epiſtolare de Secretione Animali, that is, 'An Epiſtolary Eſſay upon Animal Secretion,' addreſſed to Edward Southwell, Eſq; ſon to Sir Edward Southwell, formerly Preſident of the Royal Society.

[D] With equal pleaſure and improvement.] The title of this work promiſes largely (4), and there is no doubt that the author was both willing and able to have performed what he promiſed, if he had been ſuffered to proceed in his own way; for as he was naturally a very cloſe and conciſe writer, he intended to have inſiſted chiefly upon matters of the greateſt moment, and upon facts and things that fell under his immediate obſervation, and to have brought the whole into an octavo volume; which if he had done, there is no doubt it would have appeared a very correct, and finiſhed performance: but being prevailed upon to extend his plan, and to leave the open part of it, for which he had no materials, to be filled up from books by another perſon, it is, to ſay the truth, not a little confuſed and unequal; but wherever we can diſcern the Doctor's pen, the reader is ſure to meet with ſomething worthy his notice. The firſt volume is divided into ſix letters, viz. to the Earl of Dartmouth, the Earl of Rocheſter, the Duke of Devonſhire, the Earl of Yarmouth, the Lord Townſend, and Mr. Stepney. According to the plan of the ſecond volume, printed before the firſt, there is a ſcheme of twelve letters, notwithſtanding which, there are only ten in that volume, addreſſed to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Duke of Norfolk, Mr. Secretary Vernon, the Earl of Marlborough, the Marquis of Normanby, the Duke of Ormond, Mr. de Cleverſkerk the Dutch Embaſſador, the Earl of Burlington, Sir Thomas Millington, and Mr. Bridges, afterwards Duke of Chandos; but the laſt named letter is not upon the ſubject which was promiſed, for that and another, were never executed, though the contents of them ſhew that this was a loſs to the public. Letter XI. giving an anatomical account of the natural cauſe, why people muſt neceſſarily die of old age alone, attended with no other diſeaſe. Letter XII. explaining the nature of curable and incurable wounds, demonſtrating by practical obſervations, and anatomical experiments, the ſmall number of wounds which are of themſelves abſolutely mortal; and ſhewing the true and common abuſe of ſtyptic waters and powders, in the practice of Surgery. All the letters in the ſecond volume, excepting the firſt, are ſigned I. S. though it is evident, that part of the materials in each was furniſhed by Dr. Connor, who ſeeing them indifferently put together, did not care to own them.

of which ſome notice will be taken in its proper place (c) [E]. Dr. Connor's practice, by that time he had finiſhed the firſt volume of his work, was ſo much enlarged, that he was forced to charge his aſſiſtant with the care of the ſecond entirely, furniſhing him only with notes; and there is no doubt that if he had lived, he might have become a very eminent man in his profeſſion. But in the flower of his age, and juſt as he began to reap the fruits of his learning, ſtudy, and travels, he was attacked by a violent fever, which, after a ſhort illneſs, carried him off in the month of October 1698, when he was very little more than thirty-two years of age (d). He had, as we obſerved before, been bred in the Romiſh religion, but had embraced that of the Church of England, upon his firſt coming over from Holland; but in what communion he died is not perfectly clear, the reaſons of which the reader will learn at large in the notes (e) [F], from a funeral ſermon preached

[E] Of which ſome notice will be taken in its proper place.] We are told by Dr. Connor, that the ſalt-mines near Cracow, were diſcovered in 1548, by a cobler (5); and that they have been wrought ever ſince, without any danger of being exhauſted. They deſcend into them by ſeveral pair of wooden ſtairs, and the depth of the mine is computed at three hundred geometrical paces. There are a vaſt number of turnings and windings at that depth, ſome narrow like alleys, and others broad and large like ſtreets. The owner of the mine, Mr. Morſtin Covalſki, told the Doctor, it would require a week's time to go all over the mine, which muſt be conſequently of a vaſt extent. In ſome places there is a great deal of freſh water, but in moſt places it is ſalt. There are frequently ſuch fierce winds in the mine, as are not to be withſtood; and the air, to thoſe who are not uſed to it, is exceſſively penetrating and ſharp. The miners poſitively affirm, that the ſalt weighs leſs in the mine than when brought up into the air; of which, however, the Doctor ſeems a little to doubt. The ſalt found here is of four ſorts; the firſt clear, and hard like cryſtal; the ſecond clear, but not ſo hard; the third brittle and white, like ſugar; the fourth not ſo well coloured, and of a leſs pungent taſte. In ſome places it is impoſſible to work, becauſe the nitrous vapours are apt to take fire upon the approach of a candle. The revenue drawn from this mine by the public, amounts to eight hundred thouſand Poliſh florins a year; beſides which, the proprietor makes preſents to each of the cities and towns of Poland, and to the Staroſts, all which, and the expences of working defrayed, there remains a very great income.——The Doctor takes occaſion to prove at large, a ſtory he had before mentioned in one of his Latin treatiſes (6), of a boy kept in a convent in his time, that had been bred up by a ſhe bear, and was taken in the woods when he was about ten years old, as they gueſſed from his ſtature and aſpect: he was of a hideous countenance, and had not either the uſe of reaſon or of ſpeech: he went upon all four, and had nothing in him like a man, excepting his human ſtructure. But ſeeing he reſembled a rational creature, he was admitted to the font, and chriſtened; yet ſtill he was reſtleſs and uneaſy, and often inclined to flight; and at length being taught to ſtand upright, by clapping him againſt a wall, and holding him after the manner that dogs are taught to beg, and being by little and little accuſtomed to eat at table, he, after ſome time, became indifferently tame, and began to expreſs his mind with a hoarſe and inhuman tone; but being aſked concerning his courſe of life in the woods, he could not give much better account of it, than we can do of our actions in the cradle.——The account the Doctor gives us of the Plica (7) is very ſingular, but free from the abſurdities of former accounts. He tells us, that it conſiſts in the hairs being matted and intangled like fulled cloth, ſometimes on one ſide of the head, ſometimes on both; but he aſſures us, that no blood follows upon cutting it, nor does the patient feel any pain in that operation, though he is afterwards ſubject to a kind of rheumatic diſorder all over, and ſometimes to greater inconveniencies; yet he aſſures us, that Dr. Jonas, a Jew, and the King of Poland's Phyſician, found a very ſhort and ſafe method of curing it, by firſt ſalivating by friction, and then cutting off the hair, which was done without any dangerous conſequences enſuing. The moſt extraordinary circumſtances attending this diſeaſe are two (8); firſt, that it is peculiar to the kingdom of Poland, and Duchy of Lithuania; next, that it comes ſuddenly without any viſible cauſe, and, that too, frequently in a night's time.

[F] Will learn at large in the notes.] This funeral ſermon upon Dr. Bernard Connor, was preached by the Reverend William Hayley, D. D. Rector of St. Giles's in the Fields, on the 30th of October 1698, at which time the corps of Dr. Connor was interred there. What follows is in that Divine's own words (9). 'He had in his ſickneſs, before his diſtemper 'arrived to a great height, and while he was in his 'perfect ſenſes made a will, in which he left five 'pounds to the poor of this pariſh, where he now 'lived; and deſired, that if it ſhould pleaſe God to 'take him out of this world, I might preach his funeral ſermon, and that it might be made public; his 'friends let me know this, and at his and their re'queſt I viſited him: I found him very much decayed 'in ſtrength, but perfectly ſenſible, as he had ſtill 'been in the intervals of his fits, though the height 'of his fever put him into ravings. As ſoon as I 'ſaw him, he requeſted of me what his friends had 'told me before hand; and I preſumed his deſign in 'it was, that he might be vindicated from the ſuſpi'cion of ſome heterodox opinions, which his cenſurers 'imputed to him, as well as that his death might 'be the occaſion of an uſeful diſcourſe to the living. 'I therefore told him, that in caſe I complied with 'his deſire, I thought it would be expected I ſhould 'ſay ſomething of a perſon whoſe writings and cha'racter had rendered him ſo much known to the 'world, and had given occaſion to ſome people to 'ſpeak doubtfully of his principles in religion; and 'that for this reaſon, among others, it would be very 'proper for me to have ſome ſatisfaction from him as 'to his faith; upon which I put ſeveral queſtions to 'him, As whether he believed the goſpel? whether he 'gave credit to the miracles that are there recorded, and 'looked upon them as atteſtations of the truth of the 'Chriſtian religion? whether he believed that Jeſus 'Chriſt was the ſaviour of the world, and that he came 'to be our propitiation, and to ſatisfy divine juſtice for 'the ſins of mankind? To which, and ſuch like 'queſtions, he anſwered affirmatively with great ear'neſtneſs; and when I diſcourſed him on the ſubject 'of that book of his, which occaſioned ſuſpicion of 'his principles, he declared that he had no intention 'to prejudice religion thereby, and remitted me to his 'Grace the Archbiſhop of Canterbury for farther ſatis'faction, to whom he ſaid he had explained himſelf 'in this matter; and as an atteſtation of his ſince'rity, had received the ſacrament upon it at the pariſh 'church of St. Martin in the Fields, which I have 'ſince found to be true.

'I then began to examine him as to the ſtate of his 'ſoul, what ſenſe he had of his ſins, and what remorſe 'for having at any time offended God? And whether 'he were perſuaded of the neceſſity of repentance 'and amendment of life, in order to gain the ſalva'tion purchaſed by Jeſus Chriſt? To all which he 'gave me ſatisfactory anſwers, and expreſſed great 'ſorrow for the ſins and errors of his life paſt; and 'then joined with us very devoutly in the prayers of 'the Church, in the office for the viſitation of the ſick.

'In the afternoon of the ſame day, I went with a 'deſire to have had ſome farther diſcourſe with him, preached by an eminent Divine, at his own requeſt, who ſeems to have ſpoken of him with all the candour and charity that became a Chriſtian Prieſt. As his writings are very well known, and his character has been much canvaſſed in foreign countries, this article was thought the more neceſſary, in which we have endeavoured to collect all the ſcattered facts that can be met with about him.

'but the violence of his fit being upon him, he was 'not in a condition to be ſpoken with.

'The next morning I viſited him again, and found 'him in one of his intervals ſtill ſenſible, but very 'much weakened. I took this occaſion to talk with 'him more particularly concerning his principles; 'and upon mentioning the merits of our Saviour, 'aſked him whether he depended entirely on the me- 'rits of Jeſus Chriſt, and his interceſſion, for pardon 'of his ſins, and reconcilement to God? And he 'made anſwer, that he relied only on the merits of his 'Saviour. He was then put in mind of receiving 'the ſacrament, and he ſaid he deſired it with all his 'ſoul. I aſked, whether in receiving the ſacrament, 'he had in his view the profeſſing himſelf a diſciple 'of Chriſt, and a member of his body the Church? 'And if in receiving it from my hands, he deſired to 'profeſs himſelf a member of the Church of England, 'which queſtion being a ſecond time diſtinctly put to 'him by a friend of his then preſent, he anſwered, 'with very great ſeriouſneſs, that he did. Then I 'put him in mind of his neglect of receiving the ſa- 'crament, which he had not done ſince about two 'years ago, when he communicated at St. Martin's, 'and he expreſſed a ſorrow for it. By all this I 'thought he ſufficiently purged himſelf from the im- 'putation of Deiſm, Socinianiſm, or Popery. I looked 'on him as a true penitent member of the Church of 'England, and I gave him the ſacrament. He received 'it with ſigns of very great devotion, with expreſſions 'of hearty repentance for all the ſins and follies of his 'life, and earneſt petitions for pardon; and ſo I left 'him, as far as we could judge, in a Chriſtian diſpo- 'ſition for death, which I looked upon as very near.

'Theſe are things which I think myſelf obliged to 'give a particular account of, partly to anſwer what 'I conceive was the deſign of the deceaſed, and partly 'upon occaſion of an accident that happened ſome 'hours after I left him, which perhaps it will be 'thought not fair to conceal. A certain perſon, who 'it ſeems was a Romiſh Prieſt, came to the Doctor's 'lodgings, and deſired very earneſtly to ſee him; de- 'claring that he was his countryman, his friend, and 'his relation: thoſe about him looking upon him as 'very near his departure, were unwilling he ſhould 'be diſturbed; but upon great importunity did at laſt 'grant the ſtranger admittance, who coming to the 'bed-ſide, called the Doctor by his name, and ſalut- 'ed him three times before he regarded, but at the 'third time he cried out for God's ſake aſſiſt me. Upon 'which the company was prevailed with to leave the 'room, but the Doctor's moſt intimate friend return- 'ed to the door, and heard the Doctor repeating over 'his Confiteor in Latin, in a very huddled manner, 'upon which the prieſt gave him abſolution; and then 'aſked him, whether he would have extreme unction; 'and the Doctor ſaid yes, after which it is ſuſpected 'it was adminiſtered to him.

'Now here could I imagine the Doctor was in his 'ſenſes, and that he was really in his heart of the 'Roman communion, while he only acted this part in 'the laſt ſcene of his life, I ſhould look upon it as a 'very great ſtain on his memory; and I am perſuad- 'ed it would give every body a ſhocking idea of that 'religion, which would allow a perſon ſo to preva- 'ricate both with God and man.

'But I confeſs that I believe his judgment was now 'quite decayed, and that he did not know what he 'did; for he was thought dying by thoſe about him, 'though he recovered out of that agony and lived till 'next day. His friend aſſures me, that in his 'ſickneſs, he turned away another Romiſh prieſt who 'would have ſeen him: that the doctor thanked him 'for it, and deſired that none of thoſe perſons (ad- 'ding a reproachful word, which I do not think de- 'cent to publiſh) ſhould be admitted to him; and 'that it was the Doctor's own deſire that I ſhould at- 'tend him in his ſickneſs; and I cannot ſee what 'occaſion there ſhould be for ſuch a piece of diſſimu- 'lation if he had been of the Roman communion." C.

 [If it was true, when Dr. Campbell wrote the preceding article, that Dr. Connor's account of Poland was the beſt book we had upon the ſubject, or, at leaſt, contained the beſt things in it, this is no longer the caſe at preſent. Several performances have appeared of late years, which throw great light upon that country; and we are, in particular, highly indebted in this reſpect to Mr. Coxe's Travels, publiſhed in 1784. Our readers will there find the moſt exact and faithful deſcription of the ſtate of Poland, which, perhaps, has been yet given. Dr. Connor was undoubtedly a man of lively parts; but he doth not ſeem to have attained to a ſolid and regular mode of thinking. It is plain, from the letter inſerted in note [C], that his ideas concerning the Miracles of Scripture were very ill digeſted. His writings are now of little conſequence, and will probably never be enquired for: and with regard to his Hiſtory of Poland, it is evident, from our predeceſſor's account of it, that it is a confuſed production, and, in part, a haſty compilation. The circumſtances of Dr. Connor's death are extremely ſuſpicious. The truth of the matter ſeems to have been, that having been a Sceptic in life, but poſſibly not a confirmed Infidel, he was deſirous, in the darkneſs and diſtreſs of his laſt moments, to receive the conſolations of religion, we ſhould rather ſay of ſuperſtition; and theſe conſolations he was willing to derive from the hands both of a Divine of the Church of England, and of a Popiſh Prieſt. The latter, however, appears to have taken an undue advantage of Dr. Connor's weak ſtate of body and mind, and of his early prejudices, as having been brought up in the Roman Catholic communion.] K.

[CONYBEARE (JOHN), * a learned Divine and Prelate of the Church of England, was born at Pinhoe, near Exeter, on the 31ſt of January, 1691-2. His father was the Rev. John Conybeare, Vicar of Pinhoe [A]; and his mother, whoſe maiden name was Grace Wilcocks, was the daughter of a ſubſtantial Gentleman Farmer of that place. At a proper age, he was ſent to the free-ſchool of Exeter for grammatical education. In this city, Mr. Joſeph Hallet, afterwards a diſſenting Miniſter there, whoſe notes on the ſcripture are held in great eſteem by Clergymen of all denominations, was one of his ſchool-fellows (a). Another of his ſchool-fellows is ſaid to have been the celebrated Dr. James Foſter (b). But though they might be at the ſchool together at the ſame time, they were not of [A] Was the Rev. John Conybeare, Vicar of Pinhoe.] This gentleman died when his ſon was only in the fifteenth year of his age, having never recovered from a bad diſorder, which he had contracted on the night of the great ſtorm in 1703. At that time, his parſonage-houſe, which ſtood on an eminence, and was much expoſed to the ſouth-weſt winds, was totally unroofed. However, by the aſſiſtance of ſome good relations, young Mr. Conybeare was enabled to go on in his education, notwithſtanding the untimely death of his father.

of the ſame ſtanding, Foſter being more than five years and a half younger than Mr. Conybeare. We may judge, from the great literary improvements of the perſons educated in the free-ſchool of Exeter, that it was at that time under excellent tuition †. On the 23d of February, 1707-8, Mr. Conybeare was admitted a Battler of Exeter-College, Oxford, under the tuition of Mr. Thomas Rennel, afterwards Dr. Rennel, and who for many years was Rector of Drew's Teington, one of the beſt livings in the county of Devon. Mr. Conybeare, on his coming to the Univerſity, was, according to the language of that place, Chum with Mr. Richard Harding, who was elected Fellow of Exeter-College in 1709, and died Rector of Marwood in Devonſhire, in 1782, in the ninety-fifth year of his age. How early our young ſtudent obtained the eſteem of the learned ſociety with which he was connected, appears from his having been choſen on the 30th of June, 1710, and admitted on the 8th of July following, a Probationary Fellow of his College, upon Sir William Petre's foundation, in the room of Mr. Daniel Oſborne. When he was propoſed as a candidate, it was only with the deſign of recommending him to future notice; but ſuch was the ſenſe entertained of his extraordinary merit, that he was made the object of immediate election. Mr. Harding uſed to ſay, that Mr. Conybeare had every way the advantage of him, excepting in ſeniority; and that he ſhould have had no chance in a competition with him, if they had both been eligible at the ſame time. The patronage of Dr. Rennel, Mr. Conybeare's worthy tutor, concurred with his own deſert, in bringing him forward thus early to academical advantages. On the 17th of July, 1713, he was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and at the next election of college officers, upon the 30th of June, 1714, he was appointed Prælector, or Moderator, in Philoſophy. On the 19th of December following, he received Deacon's orders from the hands of Dr. William Talbot, Biſhop of Oxford; and on the 27th of May, 1716, he was ordained Prieſt by Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Biſhop of Wincheſter. On the 16th of April, 1716, he proceeded to the degree of Maſter of Arts (c); ſoon after which he entered upon the Curacy of Fetcham, in Surry, where he continued about a year. He was adviſed to this change of ſcene for the benefit of his health, which was always delicate, and had been greatly impaired by the intenſeneſs of his application. Upon his return from Fetcham to Oxford, he became a tutor in his own College, and was much noticed in the Univerſity as a Preacher ‡. In the beginning of the year 1722, he publiſhed a ſermon, which he had delivered before the Univerſity, on the 24th of December preceding, from Hebrews ii. 4. entitled, "The Nature, Poſſibility, and Certainty of Miracles, &c." This diſcourſe was ſo well received, that it went through four editions. Mr. Conybeare was hence encouraged to commit to the preſs a ſecond ſermon, from 1 Corinthians xiii. 12. (d), which he had preached before the Univerſity, on the 21ſt of October, 1724, and the title of which was, "The Myſteries of the Chriſtian Religion credible." It is probable, that the reputation our author gained by theſe diſcourſes, recommended him to the notice of the Lord Biſhop of London (Dr. Gibſon), who appointed him one of his Majeſty's Preachers at Whitehall, upon the firſt eſtabliſhment of that inſtitution. The eſteem in which his abilities and character were held, procured him, alſo, the favour of the Lord Chancellor Macclesfield, who, in May, 1724, preſented him to the Rectory of St. Clement's in Oxford; a preferment of no great value, but which was convenient to him from his conſtant reſidence at that place, and from its being compatible with his fellowſhip. In 1725, he was choſen ſenior Proctor of the Univerſity, which office he ſerved in conjunction with Mr. Barnaby Smyth, Fellow of Corpus-Chriſti College, and a ſcholar of eminence. In the ſame year, Mr. Conybeare was called upon to preach a viſitation ſermon before the Biſhop of Oxford, at whoſe requeſt it was publiſhed, under the title of "The Caſe of Subſcription to Articles of Religion conſidered." This ſermon, the text of which is taken from 1 Timothy vi. 3, 4. has obtained no ſmall degree of celebrity. It hath often been referred to in the controverſy relating to ſubſcription, and is particularly noticed by the acute and learned writer of the Confeſſional (e). The poſition of Mr. Conybeare is, that "every one who ſubſcribes the Articles of Religion, does thereby engage, "not only not to diſpute or contradict them; but his ſubſcription amounts to an approba-"tion of, and an aſſent to, the truth of the doctrines therein contained, in the very ſenſe "in which the compilers are ſuppoſed to have underſtood them (f)." Many perſons, who may not agree with our author in other reſpects, will concur with him in this point; and, indeed, it ſeems to be clearly confirmed by the avowed deſign of the Articles of the Church of England, which was to prevent diverſities of opinion. Mr. Conybeare's next publication was an aſſize ſermon, preached at St. Mary's, Oxford, in 1727, from Ezra vii. 26. and entitled, "The penal Sanctions of Laws conſidered (g)." This diſcourſe was dedicated by him to the Honourable Charles Talbot, at that time Solicitor General, afterwards Lord High Chancellor of Great-Britain, who had honoured our author with the care of his two eldeſt ſons, Mr. Charles Talbot, celebrated by the Poet Thomſon, and the late Earl Talbot, Steward of his Majeſty's Houſehold. On the 11th of July, 1728, Mr. Conybeare was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Divinity; and on the 24th of January following, he took his Doctor's degree (h). In the year 1729, he again appeared from the preſs, in a ſermon that had been preached before the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen at

at St. Paul's Cathedral, and which was entitled, " The Expediency of a divine Revelation repreſented." It was accompanied with a dedication to Biſhop Talbot, father of the Solicitor General. From Dr. Conybeare's introduction to this family, and the reputation he had acquired as a Divine, it was expected that he would ſoon have been promoted to ſome dignity in the Church. But the good Biſhop was taken off, before he had a proper opportunity of carrying his benevolent intentions, in our author's favour, into execution. In 1730, the Headſhip of Exeter-College becoming vacant, by the death of Dr. Hole, Dr. Conybeare was choſen to ſucceed him. His competitor, on this occaſion, was the Rev. Mr. Stephens, Vicar of St. Andrew's, Plymouth, a truly worthy Clergyman, and the author of ſeveral ingenious diſcourſes. Nevertheleſs, as he had retired early from the ſociety, he could not be ſuppoſed to carry ſuch weight with him as Dr. Conybeare, who had reſided conſtantly in the College. In this year Dr. Tindal's famous deiſtical book had appeared, entitled, " Chriſtianity as old as the Creation, or the Goſpel a Republication of the Law of Nature." This work excited the greateſt attention, and drew forth the pens of ſome of the ableſt Divines of the kingdom, both in the Church of England, and among the Proteſtant Diſſenters. Biſhop Gibſon, who had himſelf engaged in the controverſy, in his " Paſtoral Letters," encouraged Dr. Conybeare to undertake the taſk of giving a full and particular anſwer to Tindal's production. Accordingly, he publiſhed, in 1732, his " Defence of revealed Religion [B];" by which he gained great credit

[B] His defence of revealed Religion.] The whole title of the work is, " A Defence of revealed Religion " againſt the Exceptions of a late Writer, in his " Book, intitled, Chriſtianity as old as the Creation, " &c." By John Conybeare, D. D. Rector of Exeter-college in Oxford, 8vo. London, 1732. We ſhall extract the account which Dr. Leland has given of it, in his " View of the Deiſtical Writers."

' Another anſwer which particularly engaged the attention of the public, was that publiſhed by Dr. John Conybeare, Rector of Exeter-College, Oxford, now Lord Biſhop of Briſtol, viz. A Defence of revealed Religion, againſt the Exceptions of a late Writer in his Book, intitled, Chriſtianity as old as the Creation, London, 1732. This book is divided into nine chapters: The firſt is deſigned by the acute and learned author, to ſhew what we are to underſtand by the law or religion of nature, from what the obligation of it ariſes, and how far it extends. He ſhews, that the religion or law of nature, does not take in every thing that is founded in the nature or reaſon of things, which ſeems to be the ſenſe the author of Chriſtianity as old as the Creation, takes it in throughout his whole book, but only ſuch a collection of doctrines and precepts, as is diſcernible to us in the uſe of our natural faculties. And this, though founded in nature, becomes then only properly a law to us, when it is regarded as the will of God the ſupreme legiſlator; and our obligation to it, ſtrictly ſpeaking, is founded on the divine ſanctions of rewards and puniſhments. In the ſecond chapter it is ſhewn, that the law or religion of nature, in the ſenſe already explained, is not abſolutely perfect: ſince as the law of nature is only what men are capable of diſcerning in the uſe of their natural faculties, it can be no more perfect than human reaſon. If the law of nature was abſolutely perfect, it muſt have ſuch a clearneſs as to the meaning and authority of it, as can admit of nothing more in any poſſible circumſtance; it muſt have ſuch a ſtrength of inforcement, that it cannot be heightened in any way whatſoever; and ſuch an extent of matter, as to comprehend every thing that may be fit and proper to be known or done, and not to admit of any poſſible article to be added to it. And he plainly proves, that the law or religion of nature is not abſolutely perfect in any of theſe reſpects. Chap. 3d is intended to ſhew, that the law of nature is not immutable, in ſuch a ſenſe eſpecially as to be incapable of admitting any additional precepts. And here the queſtion concerning poſitive precepts is accurately ſtated, and it is proved that God may appoint them, and an anſwer is returned to the author's objections to the contrary. In chap. 4th he enquires, whether natural and revealed religion be neceſſarily the ſame, and if not, wherein the proper diſtinction between them doth conſiſt. In the former chapter he had ſhewn, that poſitive precepts might be given; here he carries it farther, and proves that ſome poſitive inſtitutions might reaſonably be expected, if ever God ſhould reveal his will at all; both as tokens of his authority and our ſubmiſſion, and for the better order and decency of his worſhip, and the outward part of religion, and for the increaſe and advancement of inward piety. The ſame thing is urged from the concurrent ſenſe of mankind in all ages, and under all religions. It is farther ſhewn, there are other things of higher importance in which natural and revealed religion differ, though they are not properly oppoſed to each other, e. g. with regard to principles and doctrines not diſcoverable by nature's light, or as to precepts, which though founded in the nature of things, yet are not knowable in the uſe of our own reaſon; they alſo differ in point of clearneſs, and in efficacy. He inſtances particularly in the aſſurance given us of the pardon of ſin, divine aſſiſtances, and the eternal retributions of a future ſtate. Chap. 5th is deſigned to ſhew, that a proper rule of life is not perfectly and eaſily diſcoverable by every man, even by thoſe of the meaneſt capacity. And here it is evinced, that the author's own ſcheme of natural religion, which he pretends is ſo obvious to all mankind, is perplexed, obſcure, and defective. In chap. 6th he inquires, whether a proper rule of life be more eaſily and perfectly diſcoverable by us in the uſe of our own reaſon, than the proof or meaning of a revelation can be. He ſhews the poſſibility of immediate revelation or inſpiration, and that this gives the higheſt evidence. And that as to traditional revelation, though the evidence be not ſtrictly demonſtrative, it may be ſuch as is ſufficient to determine the aſſent of a ſober thinking man. And he anſwers what the author had brought to prove, that the ſenſe and meaning of ſuch a revelation cannot be fixed and aſcertained. Chap. 7th is deſigned to ſhew, that a revelation is expedient in order to a more eaſy, more perfect, and more general knowledge of the rule of life. This is diſtinctly evinced, both with regard to the wiſer and better part of men, particularly the philoſophers, and with reſpect to perſons of a lower rank and meaner abilities. And a good anſwer is made to what the author had urged concerning the ſuppoſed inconſiſtency between our being governed by reaſon, and revelation. In chap. 8th it is ſhewn, that a revelation is expedient in order to inforce the general practice of the rule of life. That the mere pleaſure of doing well, or a moral taſte or ſenſe, is not alone a ſufficient balance for all the inconveniencies of doing otherwiſe, amidſt all the embaraſſments of paſſion and temptation; nor if to this be added the civil ſanctions of human authority, are theſe alone ſufficient. For theſe are deſigned not ſo much to reward virtues, ſeveral of which do not come under the cognizance of human courts, as to puniſh crimes, and thoſe only ſuch as tend to the hurt of the ſociety. Virtue can only be ſufficiently inforced by ſanctions eſtabliſhed by God himſelf; and a revelation is expedient for that purpoſe. He concludes this chapter with giving a clear anſwer to two objections urged by dit to himſelf, and performed an eminent ſervice to the cauſe of chriſtianity. In his dedication to the learned Prelate now mentioned, he obſerves, that if he has not ſucceeded in his book according to his wiſhes, he may plead that it was drawn up amidſt a variety of interruptions, and under a bad ſtate of health. "This, ſays he, will in ſome ſort excuſe "the author, though it may detract from the performance." But Dr. Conybeare's work did not ſtand in need of an apology. It is diſtinguiſhed by the perſpicuity of its method, and the ſtrength of its reaſoning; and is, indeed, one of the ableſt vindications of Revelation which England has produced. So well was the work received, that the third edition of it was publiſhed in 1733. Dr. Warburton juſtly ſtyles it one of the beſt reaſoned books in the world. It is, likewiſe, recommended by the temper and candour with which it is compoſed. Dr. Conybeare's Defence will always maintain its rank, and perhaps be thought to ſuſtain the firſt place, among the four capital anſwers which Tindal received. The other three were, Foſter's "Uſefulneſs, Truth, and Excellency of the Chriſtian Revelation;" Leland's "Anſwer to a late Book, intitled, Chriſtianity as old as the Creation;" and Mr. Simon Browne's "Defence of the Religion of Nature and the Chriſtian Revelation."

Though Dr. Conybeare, by his promotion to the Headſhip of Exeter-College, had obtained a conſiderable rank in the Univerſity, he did not, by the change of his ſituation, make any addition to his fortune. Indeed, the emoluments of his new place were ſo ſmall, that he was much richer as a private Fellow and Tutor, than as the Governor of his College. It may be preſumed that this circumſtance in part, and ſtill more the reputation he had acquired by his anſwer to Tindal, induced the Biſhop of London, who at that time had great influence in the diſpoſal of eccleſiaſtical preferments, to exert himſelf more vigorouſly in our author's behalf. This the good Prelate ſo effectually did, that on the death of Dr. Bradſhaw, Biſhop of Briſtol, and Dean of Chriſt-Church, Oxford, in December, 1732, Dr. Conybeare was appointed to ſucceed him in the latter dignity. Accordingly, the Doctor was inſtalled Dean of that Cathedral in the month of January following. On this occaſion, he reſigned the Headſhip of Exeter-College, in which he was ſucceeded by Mr. Atwell. Not long after, he gave up, likewiſe, the Rectory of St. Clement's, in favour of a friend, the Rev. Mr. Webber, one of the Fellows of Exeter. On the 6th of June, 1733, Dean Conybeare married Miſs Jemima Juckes, daughter of Mr. William Juckes, of Hoxton Square, near London; and in the ſame year he publiſhed a ſermon, which he had preached in the Cathedral of St. Peter, Exon, in Auguſt, 1732, from 2 Peter iii. 16. on the ſubject of Scripture-difficulties (i). In the beginning of the next year, he had the honour of entertaining the Prince of Orange, at the deanery of Chriſt-Church. The Prince, who had come into England to marry the Princeſs Royal, being deſirous of viſiting Oxford, and ſome of the places adjacent, took up his reſidence at Dr. Conybeare's apartments; and how ſolicitous the Dean was to treat his illuſtrious gueſt with a proper ſplendour and dignity, appears from his having received, by the hands of one of her ſervants, the eſpecial thanks of Queen Caroline on the occaſion.

When, in 1737, Dr. Morgan had publiſhed his "Moral Philoſopher," the Dean had it in contemplation to anſwer that work, ſo far as the general ſcheme of the writer might be thought to deſerve it; and he had prepared many materials for this purpoſe (k). The deſign, for what reaſon we know not, was never carried into execution; and the omiſſion of it will be reflected on with ſome regret by learned men; though it muſt, at the ſame time, be acknowledged, that Dr. Morgan was encountered by a number of very able and ſucceſsful antagoniſts. It is to the honour of Dean Conybeare's temper, that he expreſſed his hope, that none of the animadverters on the "Moral Philoſopher" would be provoked to imitate his ſcurrilities (l). In 1738, the Dean was requeſted to preach the ſermon at the annual meeting of the ſeveral Charity-ſchools in London, which he did from Galatians vi. 9.; and the diſcourſe was publiſhed (m). In 1747, he met with a great domeſtic affliction, in the loſs of his lady, who departed this life on the 29th of October, after their union had ſubſiſted not much longer than fourteen years. When, on the 25th of April, 1749, a day of ſolemn thankſgiving was held, on account of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which had been ſigned on the 18th of October in the preceding year, Dr. Conybeare was fixed upon to preach before the Honourable Houſe of Commons on this occaſion. The ſubject was "True Patriotiſm," and the following words of the Pſalmiſt furniſhed the text. "Pray for the peace of Jeruſalem: they ſhall proſper that "love thee. Peace be within thy walls, and proſperity within thy palaces. For my bre-

the author: The one is, that if a revelation be expedient to be made to any, it muſt be equally expedient to be made to all, and at all times. The other is, that the revelation hath not in fact anſwered that purpoſe for which we affirm it to be expedient. The ninth and laſt chapter is intended to evince that there is ſufficient evidence of the reality of a revelation, eſpecially of the Chriſtian. He obſerves, that what is uſually called the internal evidence of a revelation is not ſtrictly and properly an evidence, but only a neceſſary condition or qualification of a true revelation: That external proof is the only direct evidence of a divine revelation; and this conſiſteth in miracles as including prophecies, which may be conſidered as one ſort of miracles. He ſhews what reaſon we have to believe, that the miracles recorded to have been done in favour of the Chriſtian religion were really wrought; and that ſuppoſing them to have been wrought, they were real and ſatisfactory proofs of a divine original (1)."

As Dr. Conybeare was raiſed early in life to ſo conſpicuous a ſtation as that of the Deanery of Chriſt-Church, it might have been expected, from his eminent merit and learning, that he would ſooner have been called to the higher honours of his profeſſion. But it is to be remembered, that, not long after his promotion to the Deanery, his good friend, the Biſhop of London, loſt his influence at Court; and the Lord Chancellor Talbot dying in the year 1737, our author had no particular patron to recommend him to royal favour. It was not, therefore, till the latter end of 1750, that he attained the mitre; and this was more owing to his acknowledged abilities and character, than to any perſonal interpoſition. On the tranſlation of Dr. Joſeph Butler to the See of Durham, Dr. Conybeare was appointed to the Biſhoprick of Briſtol, and was conſecrated at Lambeth Chapel, on the 23d of December. The conſecration ſermon, which was ſoon afterwards publiſhed, was preached by Francis Webber, D. D. Rector of Exeter-College. The promotion of Dr. Conybeare to the Prelacy, whilſt it raiſed him to the higheſt order of the Church, and enlarged his ſphere of uſefulneſs, was injurious to his private fortune. The ſlender revenues of his Biſhoprick were not equal to the expences which accrued from his neceſſary reſidence ſometimes at Briſtol, and ſometimes at London. Four diſcourſes were publiſhed by our author, after he became a Biſhop. The firſt was the Eaſter Monday ſermon, in 1751, from Proverbs xi. 17. before the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London, in which the virtue of being merciful was ſtated and enforced. The ſecond was preached before the Houſe of Lords, on the 11th of June, in the ſame year, from Pſalm lxxviii. 72. upon occaſion of his Majeſty's acceſſion to the throne: the ſubject treated of, was civil government. The third was from Matthew xviii. 10, 11. in favour of the Iriſh Proteſtant ſchools; and the fourth, from James i. 27. was before the Sons of the Clergy, at Briſtol. Both theſe diſcourſes were printed in 1752 (o). It may be obſerved, with regard to the twelve ſingle ſermons publiſhed by our Prelate, that they were not vague, declamatory eſſays, calculated only to anſwer a preſent purpoſe, but judicious and ſolid compoſitions, in which important topics were diſcuſſed with great perſpicuity of method and language, and with equal ſtrength of reaſoning; ſo that it is not a little to be regretted, that they have not been collected together in a volume. Dr. Conybeare did not long enjoy a good ſtate of health, after his being raiſed to the Biſhoprick of Briſtol. He was much afflicted with the gout; and, having languiſhed about a year and a half, was carried off by that diſorder at Bath, on the 13th of July, 1755. He was interred in the Cathedral Church of Briſtol, where, ſome time after his death, the following inſcription was erected to his memory:

Biſhop Conybeare had by his lady five children, three of whom died in their infancy. A daughter and a ſon ſurvived him. The daughter, Jemima, departed this life at Oxford, on the 14th of March, 1785. The ſon, William, is the preſent Dr. Conybeare. As our worthy Prelate died in but indifferent circumſtances, and conſequently left behind him a very ſlender proviſion for his children, it was propoſed, by ſome friends of the family, to publiſh two volumes of ſermons by ſubſcription. The ſcheme ſucceeded ſo well, that perhaps a larger liſt of ſubſcribers never appeared on the like occaſion [C]. Beſides this, his Majeſty King George the Second was pleaſed, in conſideration of the Biſhop's merits, to beſtow upon the family, for the life of Miſs Jemima Conybeare, a penſion, the clear produce of which was about one hundred pounds a year.

Dr. Conybeare's connection with Biſhop Gibſon, and the Talbot family, has already been mentioned. Amongſt his moſt intimate private friends may be reckoned Dr. Hayter, ſucceſſively Biſhop of Norwich and London, Dr. Atwell, and the famous Dr. Rundle, afterwards Biſhop of Derry. The latter gentleman is underſtood to have been inſtrumental in recommending our author to the notice of the Talbots. There ſubſiſted, likewiſe, a great intimacy between Dr. Conybeare and Dr. Secker. When Secker entered himſelf a Gentleman Commoner at Exeter-College, with a view of taking a degree at the Univerſity of Oxford, Mr. Conybeare was appointed his nominal tutor. The preſent Dr. William Conybeare enjoys the Rectory of St. Botolph's, Biſhopſgate, as an option of Archbiſhop Secker's.

Biſhop Conybeare's character appears to have been, in every view of it, reſpectable and excellent. Whilſt he was a firm and faithful adherent to the doctrine and conſtitution of that Church of which he was ſo great an ornament, he was candid in his ſentiments, and friendly in his conduct, with regard to the Proteſtant Diſſenters. He occaſionally correſponded with his former ſchool-fellow, Mr. Joſeph Hallet; and in the article of Dr. George Benſon, we have inſerted ſome extracts from a letter written by him to that gentleman, which ſhew him to have been a truly Chriſtian Prelate, who had imbibed no ſmall portion of the benevolent and liberal ſpirit of his Divine Maſter (p)]. [C] That perhaps a larger liſt of ſubſcribers never appeared on the like occaſion.] The number of ſubſcribers amounted to nearly four thouſand ſix hundred perſons, many of whom took more than one copy. Such an almoſt unparalleled ſubſcription can only be accounted for from Dr. Conybeare's numerous connections, in conſequence of his having preſided over ſuch a ſociety as that of Chriſt-church, with the greateſt reputation, for twenty-two years and a half; from the general eſtimation in which his abilities and character were held in the world, among men of all denominations; and from the diſintereſtedneſs of his temper, in making but a ſmall proviſion for his family. The ſermons were publiſhed in 1757, and dedicated, by the Biſhop's daughter, to his Majeſty King George the Second. The ſubjects of the diſcourſes are as follows. Volume i. "Chriſtian Salvation the Matter of Joy and Praiſe to Angels." From Luke ii. 14. "The true Ground of the Jews rejecting the Meſſias, conſidered." From John i. 11. "The Excellency of Patience." From James i. 2, 3, 4. "The Hiſtory of Joſeph." In three parts. From Geneſis xxxvii. 36. xxxix. 1, 2. xli. 46. "The Diviſion of Mankind into Rich and Poor, conſidered." From Proverbs xxii. 2. "Reflections on the Conduct of Herod towards John the Baptiſt." In two parts. From Matthew xiv. 6, 7, 8, 9. "Prophecies and Miracles ſufficient Proofs of a Divine Commiſſion." From John xx. 31. "St. Paul's Difficulties and Diſtreſſes conſidered and applied." From 2 Corinthians xi. 23. "The Condition of Mankind in general unhappy, without the Belief of a future State." In two parts. From 1 Corinthians xv. 19. "Different degrees of Happineſs in a future State." From 1 John iii. 2. "The Excellency of Charity above Faith and Hope." From 1 Corinthians xiii. 13. Volume ii. "The Aggravations of Sin under the Goſpel." From Hebrews x. 29. "Reflections on the Diſpute between St. Paul and Barnabas." In two parts. From Acts xv. 39. "The Doctrine of Chriſt's Satisfaction agreeable to Reaſon." From 1 Peter iii. 18. "The Needfulneſs of a Revelation, ſhewn from the Imperfection of the Law of Nature conſidered as a Rule of Duty." From Luke i. 78, 79. "Hiſtory of Cain and Abel." In two parts. From Geneſis iv. 3, 4, 5. "The Example of Abraham's Faith propoſed to Chriſtians." From Hebrews xi. 17, 18, 19. "On the Nature and Employment of good Angels." From Hebrews i. 14. "Providence concerned in the Revolutions of Government." From Iſaiah xliv. 24, 25, 26. "Reaſons why God delays the puniſhments of wicked Men." From 2 Peter iii. 8, 9. "The Rule of Equity." In two parts. From Matthew vii. 12. "The Moral Infirmity of Human Nature conſidered." From Matthew xxv. 5. "Human Life a State of Pilgrimage." From Hebrews xi. 13. "On the Vanity of the World." From Eccleſiaſtes i. 2, 3. The ſecond volume is concluded with the Biſhop's charge to his clergy, delivered at his primary viſitation, in the month of July, 1752.

COOKE (Sir ANTHONY), Governor, Preceptor, or School-maſter to King Edward VI. and great-grandſon to Sir Thomas Cooke, Lord-Mayor of London, in 1462 [A], was born at Giddy, or Giddy-Hall, in Eſſex (a), about the year 1506 (b). Where the place of his education was, we cannot find any where mentioned, though it was moſt probably at Cambridge (c). But wherever it was, he became eminent in the whole circle of arts,

(b) Mr. Camden tells us, in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth under the year 1576, that Sir Anthony was ſeptuagenarius, 70 years old, that very year when he died; and therefore muſt have been born about the year 1506.

(c) He is not mentioned at all by A. Wood.

[A] Great Grandſon to Sir Thomas Cooke, Lord-Mayor of London, in 1462.] This Sir Thomas Cooke was ſon of Robert Cooke, of Lavenham, in Suffolk. He was of the Drapers Company, and probably brought up to that buſineſs. In the 5th of King Edward IV. he was made Knight of the Bath, and knighted in the field by the King (1); but in the year 1467 he came into great troubles: For one Hawkins having, ſome years before, deſired him to lend him a thouſand marks upon good ſecurity, Sir Thomas anſwered, he would firſt know for whom it was, and for what intent. Underſtanding it was for the uſe of Queen Margaret, (wife of King Henry VI.) he anſwered, he had no goods that he could convert into money without too much loſs; and, at length, refuſed to lend even a hundred pounds. Two or three years after, Hawkins being committed to the Tower, and put to the rack, impeached Sir Thomas Cooke of high-treaſon, for what ſhould then have been imputed to him as a virtue rather than a crime. However, he was for the ſame tried at Guildhall, by the procurement of Sir John Fogg; and though he was acquitted of treaſon, he was ſent to the Counter, and from thence to the King's-Bench. During his confinement, his houſe in London, and his country-ſeat at Giddy-Hall, were plundered by the ſervants of Sir John Fogg, and Anthony Rivers, Earl of Widville: for which damages Sir Thomas could never get the leaſt recompence: nor was he releaſed until he had paid eight thouſand pounds to the King, and eight hundred pounds to the Queen (2). His ſon was Philip Cooke, Eſq; — his grandſon John Cooke, Eſq; who died Oct. 10, 1516, — and his great grandſon, Sir Anthony, of whom we are now writing (3).

[B] Together with his uncommon prudence in the management of his own family.] His children's maintenance was always according to their quality, and their employment according to their diſpoſition; he neither allowing them to live above their fortunes, nor forcing them againſt their natures. His firſt care was to give them a true ſenſe of religion, and his next, to inure them to ſubmiſſion, modeſty, and obedience, and to let their inſtructions grow with their years. Their book and pen were their recreation; the muſic and dancing-ſchool, the court and city, their accompliſhment; the needle in the cloſet, and houſewifery in the hall and kitchen, their buſineſs. They were reproved, but with reaſon that convinced and checked; that wrought as well an ingenuous ſhame, as an unfeigned ſorrow, and a dutiful fear. He never loved them with over-fondneſs, nor chaſtiſed them in a paſſion. He ſaid, 'That the joys of parents are ſecrets, and 'ſo are their griefs and fears.' Children ſweeten labours, but they embitter misfortunes; they increaſe the care of life, and mitigate the remembrance of death. The recreations he indulged his in, were moderate, lawful, ſober, becoming, uſeful, and ſeaſonable: the expences he allowed, not ſo illiberal as to acquaint them with ſhifts, make them reſort with mean company, nor ſurfeit when they came to plenty; nor yet ſo prodigal, but that they were taught how to live in the world. The books he adviſed were not many, but choice; the buſineſs he preſſed, was not reading, but digeſting. The diet he preſcribed was moderate: in apparel he allowed for neceſſity, for decency, and in ſome caſes for magnificence, provided that it were neither too coſtly, nor too vain; neither above the purſe, nor beyond the calling, nor beſides the eſtate (4).

Writing to his daughter Mildred, he ſaid to her, 'My example is your inheritance, and my life is 'your portion.' This ſtory is likewiſe related of him: That a Suſſex Knight having ſpent a great eſtate at Court, and reduced himſelf to one park and a fine houſe in it, was yet ambitious to entertain King Edward VI. therein; and to that purpoſe had new-painted his gates, with a Coat of Arms, and this motto over them in large golden letters, OIA VANITAS.  [Sir Anthony Cooke's four daughters made ſo diſtinguiſhed a figure among the literary Ladies of the period in which they lived, and were otherwiſe ſo reſpectable, in point both of ſituation and character, that it cannot be improper to give a more particular account of them than has been done by our predeceſſors. Indeed, to record them in the Biographia, is only paying a deſerved tribute to their uncommon attainments and virtues.

Of Mildred, the eldeſt of theſe daughters, ſome notice was taken in the article of William Cecil, Lord Burleigh (10). It was there briefly mentioned, that ſhe was long the faithful wife of that great Stateſman; that ſhe was learned in the Greek tongue, and wrote a letter to the Univerſity of Cambridge in that language; that ſhe was a patroneſs of literature; and that ſhe was diſtinguiſhed by her numerous charities. It will, therefore, only be neceſſary to add a few circumſtances concerning her, which have not already been ſpecified. This Lady was born, probably at her father's houſe at Giddy-Hall, in Eſſex, in the year 1526. Her preceptor was Mr. Lawrence, an eminent Grecian; and ſhe fully anſwered the care and pains that were taken in her education. In due time ſhe became excellently acquainted with the Greek and Latin tongues, and eſpecially with the former. Her reading was not confined to the claſſic writers of Greece only, but extended, likewiſe, to the ancient Chriſtian fathers. Among the reſt, ſhe took great delight in peruſing Baſil, Cyril, Chryſoſtome, and Gregory Nazianzen. A piece of Saint Chryſoſtome's was tranſlated by her, from the original, into the Engliſh language. It was on the twenty-firſt of December, 1546, and in the twentieth year of her age, that ſhe was married to Sir William Cecil. Her death, as we have ſeen in her huſband's article, was on the 4th of April, 1589. She had an admirable underſtanding, and is ſaid to have been a good Politician. Nor is this at all ſurprizing, conſidering her intellectual powers, and that, for more than forty and two years, ſhe was the wife of ſuch an illuſtrious Stateſman as Lord Burleigh. As an evidence of her political talents, Mr. Ballard has produced a letter written by her, on the 26th of October, 1573, to Sir William Fitzwilliams, at that time Lord Deputy of Ireland. The letter contains ſome excellent advice, and ſhews that ſhe was not only a woman of great good ſenſe, but well acquainted with the world. Five days after her deceaſe, Lord Burleigh wrote what he calls a meditation on the death of his Lady. As it contains ſeveral farther particulars concerning her; as it is a ſtriking teſtimony of his affection to her memory; and as it is the production of ſo eminent a perſon, the inſertion of it will probably be a gratification to many of our readers.

Anna, the ſecond daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, was born in 1528. She had the ſame liberal education which was beſtowed upon her elder ſiſter, and perhaps under the ſame tutor. Having added much acquired knowledge to great natural endowments, ſhe made an illuſtrious figure among the literati of that period; and hence acquired ſo extraordinary a reputation, that ſhe is ſaid to have been conſtituted Governeſs to King Edward the ſixth (12). If this be a fact, it is a very ſurprizing one; ſince ſhe could not be much more than twenty-five years of age at the death of that young monarch, and only nineteen years old when he began to reign. However that matter may ſtand, it is certain that ſhe early became eminent for piety, virtue, and learning, and that ſhe was ſkilled in the Greek, Latin, and Italian tongues. At what time ſhe was married to Sir Nicholas Bacon has not exactly been aſcertained. Her eldeſt ſon, Anthony, was born in 1558 (13); and her youngeſt ſon, his four daughters, learned above their ſex in Greek and Latin; namely; 1. Mildred, married to Sir William Cecil, Baron Burleigh, Lord-Treaſurer of England. 2. Anne, to ſon, Francis, on the twenty-ſecond of January, 1560-61 (14). It was a great honour to her to be the parent of two gentlemen of ſuch diſtinguiſhed abilities, and eſpecially of the younger of them, whoſe intellectual powers and attainments are ſo well known to have been above all praiſe. There can be no doubt, but that they were much indebted to their mother for the early cultivation of their underſtandings; and we may be aſſured, from her acknowledged character, that ſhe was equally aſſiduous, if not equally ſucceſsful, in forming their minds to the principles of piety and virtue. Before ſhe became Lady Bacon, ſhe had given to the world a ſpecimen of her literary induſtry, in tranſlating, out of Italian into Engliſh, twenty-five ſermons, written by Barnardine Ochine, a celebrated Divine of that age, concerning the predeſtination and election of God. This tranſlation was publiſhed, in octavo, about the year 1550. Another edition, in 12mo, without a date, is mentioned in Ames's "Typographical Antiquities," under the following title: "Certayne ſermons of the ryghte "famous and excellent Clerk, maſter Barnardine "Ochine, born within the famous Univerſitie of "Siena in Italy, now alſo an example in thys lyfe, "for the faithful teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſte. Twen-"ty-five ſermons, tranſlated into Engliſh from the "Italian, by a gentleman, and the laſt twenty-five "tranſlated by a young Lady." Not long after her marriage, Lady Bacon again employed her pen, much to her own honour and to the advantage of her country. At that time, the Roman Catholics in general, and the Engliſh fugitives in particular, induſtriouſly applied all the learning, wit, and malice they were maſters of, to the purpoſes of blackening the reformation of the Church of England, and of bringing our excellent reformers into contempt. Pope Pius the fourth had called the council of Trent, and had ſent his nuncio, Martiningo, to invite Queen Elizabeth to accede to it. The chief Princes of Chriſtendom interpoſed, likewiſe, by letters to her Majeſty, ſoliciting her to entertain the nuncio, and ſubmit to the council. At ſuch a criſis, it was deemed neceſſary to give the world an account of what had been done in the Engliſh Parliament, and of the reaſons on which it had proceeded; and to retort the many accuſations that had been brought againſt our Church by the Papiſts. Upon this occaſion, the learned, eloquent, and maſterly pen of the incomparable Biſhop Jewel was employed in drawing up, in the Latin tongue, "An Apology for the Church of England." This taſk he performed to the infinite ſatisfaction of the reformed churches, and to the ſhame and confuſion of the Romaniſts. As the book made a great noiſe in the world, and excited no ſmall degree of alarm among the advocates of the Popiſh Communion, the common people of England were earneſtly deſirous of becoming acquainted with its contents. But the literary men of that period being wholly engaged in refuting the calumnies raiſed by the Papiſts, and in anſwering the numerous ſeditious libels which ſwarmed hither from Louvain, Doway, and other places, Lady Bacon determined to gratify the curioſity of the public, and to promote the edification of her countrymen, by tranſlating Biſhop Jewel's work. The verſion is ſaid not only to be faithful but elegant, due regard being had to the time in which it was made. When the tranſlation was finiſhed, Lady Bacon ſent the copy to Archbiſhop Parker for his peruſal, as a perſon to whom the care of the Church of England, and of its doctrine, chiefly belonged. Another copy was ſent by her to Biſhop Jewel, to be overlooked by him, leſt ſhe ſhould in any point have miſtaken his meaning. The tranſlation was accompanied by an epiſtle to him in Greek, which he anſwered in the ſame language. Both the Biſhop and the Archbiſhop, after reading over the verſion, found it to be ſo correct, as not to require the alteration of a ſingle word. Lady Bacon muſt undoubtedly have been an excellent Latiniſt, and have thoroughly entered into the ſpirit of the work, when the original author of it could find nothing to amend in her tranſlation. The letter written to her by the Archbiſhop was ſo highly to her honour, that were we not to tranſcribe part of it, we ſhould not render her that full juſtice to which her character is entitled. It was ſuperſcribed "To the Right Ho-"nourable, learned, and virtuous Lady, A.B. M.C. "wiſheth from God, Grace, Honour, and Felicity." The Archbiſhop tells her, "That according to her "requeſt, he had peruſed her ſtudious labour of "tranſlation, profitably employed in a right com-"mendable work. Whereof, for that it liked her "to make him a judge, and for that the thing itſelf "had ſingularly pleaſed his judgment, and delighted "his mind in reading it, he had right heartily to "thank her Ladyſhip, both for her well thinking of "him, and for the comfort that it wrought in him: "But far above theſe private reſpects, he was by "greater cauſes enforced, not only to ſhew his re-"joice of this her doing, but alſo to teſtify the ſame "by this his writing prefixed before the work, to "the commodity of others, and good encouragement "of herſelf. That ſhe had uſed her accuſtomed mo-"deſty, in ſubmitting it to judgment; but therein "her praiſe doubled, ſith it had paſſed judgment "without reproach. And whereas both the chief "author of the Latin work, and he, ſeverally peru-"ſing and conferring her whole tranſlation, had "without alteration allowed of it, he was both to "deſire her Ladyſhip, and advertiſe the readers, to "think that they had not therein given any thing to "any diſſembling affection towards her, as being "contented to wink at faults to pleaſe her, or to "make her without cauſe to pleaſe herſelf. For that "there were ſundry reſpects to draw them from ſo "doing, although they had been ſo ill minded, as "there was no cauſe why they ſhould be ſo thought "of. That her own judgment in diſcerning flat-"tery, her modeſty in miſliking it, the laying open "of their opinion to the world, the truth of their "friendſhip towards her, the unwillingneſs of them "both, in reſpect of their vocations, to have that "public work not truly and well tranſlated, were "good cauſes to perſuade, that their allowance was "of ſincere truth and underſtanding. That by her "travail ſhe expreſſed an acceptable duty to the glory "of God, deſerved well of this Church of Chriſt, "honourably defended the good fame and eſtimation "of her own native tongue, ſhewing it ſo able to "contend with a work originally written in the moſt "praiſed ſpeech. That beſides the honour done to "her ſex, and to the degree of Ladies, ſhe had done "pleaſure to the author of the Latin book, in deli-"vering him, by her clear tranſlation, from the pe-"rils of ambiguous and doubtful conſtructions; and "in making his good work more publicly beneficial: "whereby ſhe had raiſed up great comfort to her "friends, and had furniſhed her own conſcience joy-"fully with the fruit of her labour, in ſo occupying "her time. Which muſt needs redound to the en-"couragement of noble youth in their good educa-"tion, and to ſpend their time and knowledge in "godly exerciſe, ſhe having delivered them ſo ſin-"gular a precedent. That as God, he was ſure, did "accept that her doing, and would bleſs with in-"creaſe; ſo her, and their moſt virtuous and learned "ſovereign Lady and miſtreſs, it ſhould be good "cauſe to commend; and all noble gentlewomen "ſhould, he truſted, hereby be allured from vain de-"lights, to doings of more perfect glory.

"That he, for his part, as occaſion might ſerve, "ſhould exhort others to take profit by her work, "and follow her example: whoſe ſucceſs he be-"ſeeched our heavenly Father to bleſs and proſper. "That to the end, both to acknowledge his good "approbation, and to ſpread the benefit more largely, "where her Ladyſhip had ſent him her book written, "he had, with moſt hearty thanks, returned it her, "as ſhe ſaw, printed: knowing that he had thereby "done for the beſt, and in this point uſed a reaſon-

" able policy; that is, to prevent ſuch excuſes as " her modeſty would have made in ſtay of publiſhing " it (15)." Lady Bacon's verſion of Jewel's Apology was accompanied, when printed, with ſome additions by the Archbiſhop (16). It firſt appeared, in quarto, in 1564. Another edition, in 12mo. was publiſhed in 1600 (17). That her Ladyſhip's literary reputation extended beyond her own country, is evident from the famous Theodore Beza's dedication to her of his Meditations (18). In Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, Lady Bacon's name frequently occurs; and we there meet with ſome of her letters at full length, and with extracts from others of them (19), which will fully juſtify the following character given of her by the hiſtorian now mentioned. " She frequently introduces Greek as well as Latin " into her letters, ſometimes with a view of ſecrecy, " but more commonly from the cuſtom of that age, " wherein ſuch an intermixture of languages had " leſs the air of pedantry and affectation, than it " would have in the preſent. She was very ſtrict in " the duties of piety, and inclined to the principles " of the Puritans, to whom her huſband had not " been thought unfavourable: but her temper ſeems " to have been ſevere and peeviſh, eſpecially in the " latter years of her life, when it was probably af- " fected by her ill health. Her advices and remon- " ſtrances to her elder ſon, Anthony, were generally " delivered in a ſtyle of authority, and in terms of " reproach, which rendered them leſs acceptable and " effectual, than otherwiſe they might have been (20)." Of her letters to Mr. Anthony Bacon, we have taken particular notice in that gentleman's article (*). The advice ſhe gave to the Earl of Eſſex, when ſhe apprehended him to be in danger of a criminal connection, reflects great credit upon her integrity; and the Earl's anſwer (both of which may be ſeen in the book referred to) was as honourable to himſelf as it was reſpectful to her Ladyſhip (21). What was the exact time of Lady Bacon's death cannot now be aſcertained; but it is certain, from the dates of the circumſtances laſt related, that ſhe was living in December, 1596. Mr. Ballard conjectures, that ſhe died about the beginning of King James the Firſt's reign, at Gorhambury, near St. Alban's, where her picture ſtill remains. According to Dr. Rawley, ſhe was buried at St. Michael's Church, in that town; but Mr. Ballard could not find there any monument or inſcription to her memory (22).

Elizabeth, third daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, was born about the year 1529, and enjoyed the ſame liberal education which was beſtowed upon her ſiſters. She was equally happy in improving the advantages conferred upon her; for ſuch was her progreſs in the learned languages, that ſhe gained the applauſe of the moſt eminent ſcholars of the age. It was obſerved by Sir John Harrington, that if Madam Vittoria, an Italian Lady, deſerved to have her name celebrated and tranſmitted to poſterity by Arioſto, for writing ſome verſes, in the manner of an epitaph, upon her huſband, after his deceaſe; no leſs commendation was due to the Lady before us, who did as much and more, not only for two huſbands, but for her ſon, daughter, brother, ſiſter, and venerable old friend Mr. Noke of Shotteſbrooke, in the Greek, Latin, and Engliſh tongues. She was married, firſt, to Sir Thomas Hobby, and accompanied him to France, when he went there, as Embaſſador from Queen Elizabeth. At Paris Sir Thomas died, on the 13th of July, 1566, aged thirty-ſix years. His diſconſolate Lady, who was big with child, brought him honourably home, and having erected a chapel in the chancel of the church at Biſham, in Berkſhire, ſhe carefully depoſited the remains of her huſband, and of his brother, Sir Philip Hobby, in one tomb together, which ſhe adorned with large inſcriptions, in Latin and Engliſh verſe, of her own compoſition. She had by Sir Thomas Hobby four children, Edward, Elizabeth, Anne, and Thomas Poſthumus. It doth not appear that ſhe had great comfort in either of her ſons; and the youngeſt in particular, as is manifeſt from a letter written by her to Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, was guilty of ſuch extravagancies and undutifulneſs, as gave her much uneaſineſs. It is evident, from the letter, that ſhe was a woman of uncommon ſpirit and ſenſe, and an excellent oeconomiſt. Some years after the deceaſe of Sir Thomas Hobby, ſhe was married, a ſecond time, to John, Lord Ruſſel, ſon and heir to Francis Ruſſel, Earl of Bedford. Her huſband, dying before his father, in the year 1584, was buried in the Abbey Church of Weſtminſter, where there is a noble monument erected to his memory, and embelliſhed with inſcriptions, in Greek, Latin, and Engliſh, by this his ſurviving Lady. Her children, by John Lord Ruſſel, were one ſon, who died young in 1580, and two daughters, Anne and Elizabeth. The laſt of them ſurvived her father but a little time, and is ſaid to have bled to death by the prick of a needle in the forefinger of her left hand. This ſtory has been ſupported by the figure placed on her monument, which is in the ſame grate with that of her father; where, on a pedeſtal of black and white marble made column-wiſe, in imitation of a Roman altar, may be ſeen the ſtatue of a young Lady ſeated in a moſt curiouſly wrought oſier chair, of the fineſt poliſhed alabaſter, in a very melancholy poſture, inclining her head to the right hand, and with the fore-finger of her left only extended downwards, to direct us to behold the death's-head underneath her feet, and, as the tradition goes, to ſignify the diſaſter that brought her to her end. Mr. Ballard thinks, that if the fact be true, it muſt be attributed to ſome gangrene, or other dangerous ſymptom, occaſioned, perhaps, at firſt, by the pricking of an artery or nerve, which at laſt brought her to the grave. The matter, however doth not deſerve to be reaſoned upon; being, in truth, no other than an idle and groundleſs tale, which very well anſwers the purpoſe of amuſing the croud who go to viſit the tombs in the Abbey.

Lady Ruſſel tranſlated out of French into Engliſh a tract, entitled, " A Way of Reconciliation of a " good and learned Man, touching the true Nature " and Subſtance of the Body and Blood of Chriſt in " the Sacrament." This work was printed in 1605 (†), and is dedicated to her only daughter, Anne Herbert, wife to Henry Lord Herbert, ſon and heir to Edward Earl of Worceſter. A ſhort extract from the dedication will afford a ſpecimen of Lady Ruſſel's diſpoſition of mind, and of her manner of writing. " Moſt vertuous and worthily beloved daughter; " even as from your firſt birth and cradle, I was ever " moſt careful, above any worldly thing, to have " you ſuck the perfect milk of ſincere religion; ſo, " willing to end as I began, I have left to you, as my " laſt legacy, this book, a moſt precious jewel, to " the comfort of your ſoul; being the work of a " good learned man, made above fifty years ſince in " Germany; after by travail a French creature, now " naturalized by me into Engliſh." Then proceeding to give the reaſon of her publiſhing this piece, ſhe added, " That at firſt ſhe meant not to ſet it " abroad in print; but herſelf only to have ſome cer- " tainty to lean unto in a matter ſo full of contro- " verſy, and to yield a reaſon of her opinion. But " ſince lending the copy of her own hand to a " friend, ſhe was bereft thereof by ſome: and fear- " ing leſt after her death it ſhould be printed accord- " ing to the humours of others, and wrong of the " dead: who in his life approved her tranſlation " with his own allowance: therefore dreading, ſhe " ſaid, wrong to him, above any other reſpect, ſhe " had by anticipation prevented the worſt. And " then piouſly and affectionately ſhe concludes thus; " that ſhe meant it for a new-year's gift: and then, " farewel, my good Nancy. God bleſs thee with a " continuance of the comfort of the holy Spirit; " that it may ever work in you, and perſevere with " you to the end, and in the end."

(†) We have ſome doubts whether this was the firſt edition.

" And all thy days from ev'ry ill be free."

The time of Lady Ruſſel's death has not been aſcertained. In a letter written by her to Sir Robert Cecil, without date, ſhe complains of her bad health and infirmities, and mentions her having compleated ſixty-eight years. She ſeems to have been buried at Biſham, in Berks, near the remains of her firſt huſband, and in the chapel which ſhe herſelf had founded (23). From Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, it appears that Lady Ruſſel intereſted herſelf in the concerns of her nephew Anthony Bacon, and endeavoured to do him ſervice with the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh. In that work there are ſome extracts from two of her letters upon this occaſion, and a long account of a curious converſation which ſhe had with her nephew, relative to the diſputes between him and the Treaſurer. The fact was, that Lord Burleigh was diſſatisfied with the connections both of Mr. Anthony and Mr. Francis Bacon, and eſpecially with their attachment to the Earl of Eſſex, and on theſe accounts was not favourable to their promotion (24).

Katherine, the fourth daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, was born about the year 1530; and her natural genius being improved by the ſame excellent education which was beſtowed upon her ſiſters, ſhe became famous for her knowledge in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin tongues, and for her ſkill in poetry. A ſhort ſpecimen of her talent in that art has been preſerved by Sir John Harington and Dr. Thomas Fuller; but there is ſome difficulty in determining the occaſion upon which the verſes were written. Sir John Harington ſays, that her deſign in writing them was to get a kinſman of her's ſent to Cornwall, where ſhe inhabited, and to prevent his going beyond ſea. Mr. Phillips, in his " Theatrum Poetarum," aſſerts that it was her lover. Dr. Fuller, however, with greater appearance of reaſon, informs us, that her huſband being deſigned by Queen Elizabeth Embaſſador to France, in troubleſome times, when the employment, always difficult, was then apparently dangerous, his Lady wrote theſe lines to her ſiſter Mildred Cecil, to engage her intereſt with Lord Burleigh for preventing the appointment. The verſes are as follows:

" Si mihi quem cupio cures Mildreda remitti,
" Tu bona, tu melior, tu mihi ſola ſoror:
" Sin male ceſſando retines, & trans mare mittis,
" Tu mala, tu pejor, tu mihi nulla ſoror.
" Is ſi Cornubiam, tibi pax ſit & omnia læta;
" Sin mare, Ciciliæ nuncio bella. Vale."

Thus tranſlated by a friend of Mr. Ballard's.

" If, Mildred, to my wiſhes kind,
" Thy valued charge thou ſend,
" In thee my ſoul ſhall own combin'd
" The ſiſter and the friend.

" If from my eyes by thee detain'd
" The wanderer croſs the ſeas,
" No more thy love ſhall ſooth, as friend,
" No more as ſiſter, pleaſe.

" His ſtay let Cornwall's ſhore engage;
" And peace with Mildred dwell:
" Elſe war with Cecil's name I wage,
" Perpetual war. Farewell."

The perſon to whom Katherine Cooke was married was Henry Killegrew, Eſq; a Gentleman of good abilities, and who, for the ſervices he performed to his country in the quality of an Embaſſador, was afterwards knighted. It ſhould ſeem, therefore, that, if Fuller be right in the account he has given of the purpoſe of the preceding verſes, the fair author did not obtain her requeſt. Sir Henry Killegrew had a daughter, probably by this Lady, married to Sir Jonathan Trelawny, a Gentleman of Cornwall, about the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign. Sir Henry was living in great eſteem, in the year 1602. It appears, from her father's will, that Lady Killegrew was alive on the 22d of May, 1576. She was buried in the Chancel of the Church of St. Thomas the Apoſtle, in Vintry-yard, London, where is an elegant monument erected to her memory, on which is the following inſcription, compoſed by herſelf.

" Dormio nunc Domino, Domini virtute reſurgam;
" Et σωτῆρα meum carne videbo mea.
" Mortua ne dicar, fruitur pars altera Chriſto:
" Et ſurgam Capiti, Tempore, tota meo."

" To God I ſleep, but I in God ſhall riſe,
" And, in the fleſh, my Lord and Saviour ſee.
" Call me not dead, my ſoul to Chriſt is fled,
" And ſoon, both ſoul and body join'd ſhall be.

The death of Lady Killegrew was lamented in various Epitaphs. Her ſiſter, Lady Ruſſel, wrote one, partly in Greek and partly in Latin verſe. Three others, in Latin verſe, were written by Robert Maſon Forman, Miniſter of the reformed French Church in London, by Andrew Melvin, and by William Chark. Such of our readers as are curious to ſee theſe productions, may find them in Ballard (25).

(25) Ballard, ubi ſupra, p. 142—146.

It is generally underſtood that Sir Anthony Cooke had only four daughters; but there is ſome reaſon to believe that he had, at leaſt, one more. Camden, Fuller, Lloyd, Bohun, and Strype concur in mentioning a fifth daughter, whoſe name, they ſay, is loſt. Nevertheleſs, they all obſerve that ſhe was married to Sir Ralph Rowlet. Nay, Sir William Dugdale informs us (though without producing any authority for his aſſertion), that Sir Anthony Cooke had ſix daughters. On the other hand, Sir John Harington, who correſponded with Lady Ruſſel, and who might be ſuppoſed not likely to be miſtaken in this affair, ſpeaks only of four. What is ſtill more material, there is a monumental inſcription for Sir Anthony Cooke, in the Church of Rumford in Eſſex, that contains a ſort of pedigree of the family, and which mentions two ſons, Richard and William, and the above-named four daughters. It is, likewiſe, obſervable, that the monument repreſents Sir Anthony with two ſons behind him; and his Lady with only four daughters behind her. Strong as this evidence may be thought, it is weakened by the teſtimony of Mr. Fulman's manuſcripts, in which that indefatigable Gentleman remarks, that the name of Sir Anthony Cooke's fifth daughter was Margaret, and that ſhe was married to Ralph Rowlet. Theſe facts are farther confirmed by the following tetraſtich in Dr. Haddon's poems.

In nuptias Rodolphi Rouleti, & Thomæ Hobei, qui duas D. Antonii Coci filias, duxere uxores eodem die.

" Margaritam, Roulete, tuam fac mente recondas,
" Gemma ſit ut tuto tam pretioſa loco.
" Sit frater fratri ſimilis, ſit filia patri,
" Sic vir erit dignus conjuge, ponſa viro."

On the nuptials of Ralph Rowlet, and Thomas Hobby, who, on the ſame day, married two daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke.

" Rowlet, in pureſt heart thy Marg'ret wear,
" A caſket proper for a gem ſo rare!

" The

" The brother's merit let the brother claim,
" The daughter emulate the father's fame:
" So ſhall the bridegroom to his like be join'd,
" The bride her virtues in her conſort find."

Strype, in his Memorials Eccleſiaſtical, under the year 1557, ſays, that " December the eighth, the " Lady Rowlet, one of the learned daughters of Sir " Anthony Cooke, and the youngeſt of the five, wife " of Sir Ralph Rowlet, Knight, was buried in the " pariſh of St. Mary Staining, London." Mr. Ballard propoſes a query, whether Lady Rowlet might not be a natural daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke; but this is a ſuppoſition to which we cannot give our aſſent. It doth not well accord with her being married to a Gentleman of ſuch rank as her huſband was, nor with the celebration of her marriage on the ſame day with that of her ſiſter Elizabeth. Neither does Strype's account of her agree with Mr. Ballard's ſuggeſtion. Mr. Strype ſpeaks of her without ignominy as one of the learned daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke, and as the youngeſt of the five (26). Her not being mentioned in the inſcription of the monument at Rumford may be accounted for, by her having died nearly twenty years before her father. The ſurviving children only appear to have been repreſented in that monument. If, however, Lady Rowlet poſſeſſed as much literature as her ſiſter, no memorials of it have come to our knowledge. Her early deceaſe, for ſhe could not, at moſt, be above twenty-ſix years of age when ſhe died, might prevent the public fruits which would otherwiſe have been produced from her literary accompliſhments. We are ſenſible, that this ſhort diſquiſition concerning her is of little importance; but, when ſuch ſubjects come properly before us, it is our duty to aſcertain hiſtorical truth, as far as we are able. Bayle, whoſe genius was ſo much ſuperior to our's, did not think theſe minute diſcuſſions beneath his attention; and whilſt we are in ſome meaſure juſtified by his example, it fortunately happens that we ſhall not have occaſion to enter into them ſo frequently as was done by that great Biographer.

(26) Ballard, ubi ſupra, p. 146, 7.

We cannot diſmiſs Sir Anthony Cooke's four celebrated daughters, without making a few obſervations on the general ſtate of female literature in that period. It has been remarked by Mr. Wotton, that no age was ſo productive of learned women as the ſixteenth century. Speaking of the flouriſhing condition of learning in that century, he ſays, it was ſo very modiſh, that the fair ſex ſeemed to believe that Greek and Latin added to their charms; and that Plato and Ariſtotle untranſlated were frequent ornaments of their cloſets. " One would think by the " effects, that it was a proper way of educating " them, ſince there are no accounts in hiſtory of ſo " many great women in any one age, as are to be " found between the years fifteen and ſixteen hun- " dred." Eraſmus, alſo, deſcribing thoſe times, ſays, " Scena rerum humanarum invertitur: mo- " narchi literas neſciunt, & fœminæ libris indulgent. " ——Bellum eſt eum ſexum ad priſca exempla ſeſe " poſtliminio recipere." " The ſcene of human " affairs is changed: the monks are ignorant of li- " terature, and women are fond of books.——It is " a pleaſing circumſtance, that the female ſex ſhould " at length have recourſe to the ancient examples." Learning was then held in ſuch high eſtimation, that ſeveral great men were deſirous that their daughters ſhould be poſſeſſed of it, as well as their ſons. The examples of King Henry the Eighth, in the education of the Princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth, and of Sir Thomas More with regard to Mrs. Roper, are thought to have chiefly contributed to the introduction of this cuſtom (27). There can be no doubt but that the conduct of perſons ſo illuſtrious would have much effect upon the ſentiments of our countrymen, and be productive of imitation. But, beſides this, there was a concurrence of other cauſes; ſuch as the recent origin of printing; the curioſity hence excited in the human mind; the admiration with which the ancient writers, ſo lately brought to light, were contemplated; and the diſtinguiſhed honour that aroſe from literary purſuits. In ſhort, the general ſpirit of the age nouriſhed the principle of training up women in learning. Nor was a ſlight degree of learning deemed ſufficient for them. They were rendered complete miſtreſſes of the Greek and Latin, as well as of the modern languages. Their reading was not confined to the claſſic authors, but comprehended the fathers of the Church. They could write Greek epiſtles, and compoſe Greek verſes. It ſhould be remembered, however, that the literature of the women of that period extended comparatively but to a few perſons, and thoſe only of conſiderable rank, the generality of the female ſex being in a ſtate of ignorance. There was by no means that diffuſion of knowledge, that cultivation of mind, that taſte for books, which we now meet with in almoſt every company of ladies. Neither do we find that the learned women of the ſixteenth century produced ſuch works as have continued to be read much by poſterity. The moſt important production of any of Sir Anthony Cooke's daughters, was Lady Bacon's tranſlation of Biſhop Jewel's Apology; and yet, who but an Antiquary would now ſeek for it, or give himſelf the trouble of peruſing it? Not a ſingle Poeteſs, deſerving to be mentioned, aroſe in this country till the ſeventeenth century. The Ducheſs of Newcaſtle, Mrs. Katherine Philips, and Mrs. Behn, appear to have been the firſt who could, in any degree, merit that appellation. If we come down to later times, we ſhall be ſenſible that, independently of poetry, the learned women of the ſixteenth century have been far exceeded by the ingenious ladies of the preſent age, both in the general and extenſive utility of their writings, and in the elegancies of compoſition. We pretend not to enumerate all thoſe whoſe works will be read and admired by ſucceeding generations; but it is impoſſible, whilſt we are treating on ſuch a ſubject, to forget the names of a Cockburn, a Rowe, a Montagu, a Carter, a Chapone, a More, and a Barbauld. We are ſpeaking of proſe works only, ſince otherwiſe we could not avoid adding to the catalogue a Seward and a Williams. Neither does novel-writing come under our immediate view, to which ſo many, perhaps too many female authors, apply themſelves, though none with a ſucceſs equal to that of a Burney.

There is a remark to be made concerning the difference between the literature of the ladies of the ſixteenth century, and that of the women of more recent times. The former entered deeply into the ſtudy of the ancient languages, whilſt the latter, beſides acquiring a ſkill in the modern tongues, eſpecially the French and the Italian, have paid their principal attention to the cultivation of general knowledge. Some of them, however, have been no ſmall proficients in the learning of antiquity. Mrs. Carter ſtands, without competition, at the head of her ſex in this reſpect; having diſplayed her accurate acquaintance with the Greek writings and philoſophy, in a manner highly honourable to herſelf, and advantageous to the world. How admirably Mrs. Barbauld hath entered into the ſpirit of the Latin claſſics, is apparent from the uncommon propriety and beauty of her mottos. Mrs. Montagu, in her admirable Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Shakſpeare, hath ſhewn that, amongſt the other qualifications neceſſary to conſtitute a Critic of the firſt order, ſuch as a penetrating mind, a fine taſte, and a correct and elegant ſtyle, ſhe is well acquainted with ancient literature, and rich in the ſtores of various knowledge.

Another circumſtance obſervable in the learned ladies of the ſixteenth century is, that they were moſt eminent for their piety. Religion was deeply impreſſed upon their minds, and, agreeably to the faſhion of the times, religion was almoſt the ſole topic of their writings. It is pleaſing to reflect, that the beſt female authors of the preſent day are not inferior to them in pious and virtuous principles and conduct. Thoſe who have the happineſs of a perſonal intimacy with Mrs. Montagu, Mrs. Carter, Mrs. Barbauld, Mrs. Chapone, and Miſs Hannah More, will know that we ſpeak the truth; to which may be added, that theſe ladies are unaffected in their manners, and that they do not eſteem themſelves above the ordinary duties of domeſtic life.] K.

 [COOK (JAMES), one of the greateſt Navigators and Diſcoverers that ever exiſted, had no claim to diſtinction on account of the luſtre of his birth, or the dignity of his anceſtors. His father, James Cook, who from his dialect is ſuppoſed to have been a Northumbrian, was in the humble ſtation of a ſervant in huſbandry, and married a woman of the ſame rank with himſelf, whoſe chriſtian name was Grace. Both of them were noted in their neighbourhood for their honeſty, ſobriety, and diligence. They firſt lived at a village called Morton, and then removed to Marton, another village in the North-riding of Yorkſhire, ſituated in the high road from Giſbrough, in Cleveland, to Stockton upon Tees, in the county of Durham, at the diſtance of ſix miles from each of theſe towns. At Marton Captain Cook was born, on the 27th of October, 1728 (a); and, agreeably to the cuſtom of the Vicar of the pariſh, whoſe practice it was to baptize infants ſoon after their birth, he was baptized on the 3d of November following. He was one of nine children, all of whom are now dead, excepting a daughter, who married a fiſherman at Redcar. The firſt rudiments of young Cook's education were received by him at Marton, where he was taught to read by Dame Walker, the School-miſtreſs of the village. When he was eight years of age, his father, in conſequence of the character he had obtained for induſtry, frugality, and ſkill in huſbandry, had a little promotion beſtowed upon him, which was that of being appointed head ſervant, or hind (b), to a farm belonging to the late Thomas Skottow, Eſq; called Airy Holme, near Great Ayton. To this place, therefore, he removed with his family (c); and his ſon James, at Mr. Skottow's expence, was put to a day School in Ayton, where he was inſtructed in writing, and in a few of the firſt rules of arithmetic. Before he was thirteen years of age, he was bound an apprentice to Mr. William Sanderſon, a Haberdaſher, or Shopkeeper, at Staiths, a conſiderable fiſhing town, about ten miles north of Whitby. This employment, however, was very unſuitable to young Cook's diſpoſition. The ſea was the object of his inclination; and his paſſion for it could not avoid being ſtrengthened by the ſituation of the town in which he was placed, and the manner of life of the perſons with whom he muſt frequently converſe. Some diſagreement having happened between him and his Maſter, he obtained his diſcharge, and ſoon after bound himſelf for ſeven years to Meſſrs. John and Henry Walker, of Whitby, Quakers by religious profeſſion, and principal owners of the ſhip Free-love, and of another veſſel, both of which were conſtantly employed in the coal trade. The greateſt part of his apprenticeſhip was ſpent on board the Free-love. After he was out of his time he continued to ſerve in the coal and other branches of trade (though chiefly in the former) in the capacity of a common ſailor; till, at length, he was raiſed to be mate of one of Mr. John Walker's ſhips. During this period it is not recollected that he exhibited any thing very peculiar, either in his abilities or his conduct; though there can be no doubt but that he had gained a conſiderable degree of knowledge in the practical part of navigation, and that his attentive and ſagacious mind was laying up a ſtore of obſervations which would be uſeful to him in future life (d). In the Spring of the year 1755, when hoſtilities broke out between England and France, and there was a hot preſs for ſeamen, Mr. Cook happened to be in the river Thames with the ſhip to which he belonged. At firſt he concealed himſelf, to avoid being preſſed; but reflecting that it might be difficult, notwithſtanding all his vigilance, to elude diſcovery or eſcape purſuit, he determined, upon farther conſideration, to enter voluntarily into his Majeſty's ſervice, and to take his future fortune in the Royal Navy. Perhaps he had ſome preſage in his own mind, that by his activity and exertions he might riſe conſiderably above his preſent ſituation. Accordingly, he went to a rendezvous at Wapping, and entered with an officer of the Eagle man of war, a ſhip of ſixty guns, at that time commanded by Captain Hamer. To this ſhip Captain (now Sir Hugh) Palliſer was appointed, in the month of October, 1755; and when he took the command, found in her James Cook, whom he ſoon diſtinguiſhed to be an able, active, and diligent ſeaman. All the officers ſpoke highly in his favour, and the Captain was ſo well pleaſed with his behaviour, that he gave him every encouragement which lay in his power. In the courſe of ſome time, Captain Palliſer received a letter from Mr. Oſbaldeſton, then Member of Parliament for Scarborough, acquainting him that ſeveral neighbours of his had ſolicited him to write in favour of one Cook, on board the Captain's ſhip. They had heard that Captain Palliſer had taken notice of him, and they requeſted, if he thought Cook deſerving of it, that he would point out in what manner Mr. Oſbaldeſton might beſt contribute his aſſiſtance towards forwarding the young man's promotion. The Captain, in his reply, did juſtice to Cook's merit; but, as he had been only a ſhort time in the Navy, informed Mr. Oſbaldeſton that he could not be promoted as a commiſſion officer. A Maſter's warrant, Captain Palliſer added, might perhaps be procured for Mr. Cook, by which he would be raiſed to a ſtation that he was well qualified to diſcharge with ability and credit (e). Such a warrant he obtained on the 10th of May, 1759, for the Grampus ſloop; but the proper Maſter having unexpectedly returned to her, the appointment did not take place. Four days after he was made Maſter of the Garland; when, upon enquiry, it was found that he could not join her, as the ſhip had already ſailed. On the next day, the 15th of May, he was appointed to the Mercury (f). Theſe quick quick and ſucceſſive appointments ſhew that his intereſt was ſtrong, and that the intention to ſerve him was real and effectual. The deſtination of the Mercury was to North America, where ſhe joined the fleet under the command of Sir Charles Saunders, which, in conjunction with the land forces under General Wolfe, was engaged in the famous ſiege of Quebec. During that ſiege, a difficult and dangerous ſervice was neceſſary to be performed. This was to take the ſoundings in the Channel of the river St. Lawrence, between the Iſland of Orleans and the north ſhore, directly in the front of the French fortified camp at Montmorency and Beauport, in order to enable the Admiral to place ſhips againſt the enemy's batteries, and to cover our army on a general attack, which the heroic Wolfe intended to make on the camp. Captain Palliſer, in conſequence of his acquaintance with Mr. Cook's ſagacity and reſolution, recommended him to the ſervice; and he performed it in the moſt complete manner. In this buſineſs he was employed during the night-time, for ſeveral nights together. At length he was diſcovered by the enemy, who collected a great number of Indians and canoes, in a wood near the water-ſide, which were launched in the night, for the purpoſe of ſurrounding him, and cutting him off. On this occaſion, he had a very narrow eſcape. He was obliged to run for it, and puſhed on ſhore on the Iſland of Orleans, near the guard of the Engliſh Hoſpital. Some of the Indians entered at the ſtern of the boat, as Mr. Cook leaped out at the bow; and the boat, which was a barge belonging to one of the ſhips of war, was carried away in triumph. However, he furniſhed the Admiral with as correct and complete a draught of the Channel and ſoundings as could have been made after our countrymen were in poſſeſſion of Quebec. Sir Hugh Palliſer has good reaſon to believe, that before this time Mr. Cook had ſcarcely ever uſed a pencil, and that he knew nothing of drawing. But ſuch was his capacity, that he ſpeedily made himſelf maſter of every object to which he applied his attention. Another important ſervice was performed by Mr. Cook while the fleet continued in the river of St. Lawrence. The navigation of that river is exceedingly difficult and hazardous. It was particularly ſo to the Engliſh, who were then in a great meaſure ſtrangers to this part of North America, and who had no chart, on the correctneſs of which they could depend. It was, therefore, ordered by the Admiral, that Mr. Cook ſhould be employed to ſurvey thoſe parts of the river, below Quebec, which navigators had experienced to be attended with peculiar difficulty and danger; and he executed the buſineſs with the ſame diligence and ſkill of which he had already afforded ſo happy a ſpecimen. When he had finiſhed the undertaking, his Chart of the river St. Lawrence was publiſhed, with ſoundings, and directions for ſailing in that river. Of the accuracy and utility of this Chart it is ſufficient to ſay, that it hath never ſince been found neceſſary to publiſh any other. One which has appeared in France is only a copy of our author's, on a reduced ſcale. After the expedition at Quebec, Mr. Cook, by warrant from Lord Colvill, was appointed, on the 22d of September, Maſter of the Northumberland man of war, the ſhip in which his lordſhip ſtaid, in the following winter, as Commodore, with the command of a ſquadron at Halifax. In this ſtation Mr. Cook's behaviour did not fail to gain him the eſteem and friendſhip of his commander. During the leiſure which the ſeaſon of Winter afforded him, he employed his time in the acquiſition of ſuch knowledge as eminently qualified him for future ſervice. It was at Halifax that he firſt read Euclid, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of aſtronomy and other branches of ſcience. The books of which he had the aſſiſtance were few in number; but his induſtry enabled him to ſupply many defects, and to make a progreſs far ſuperior to what could be expected from the advantages he enjoyed (g). While Mr. Cook was Maſter of the Northumberland under Lord Colvill, that ſhip came to Newfoundland, in September, 1762, to aſſiſt in the recapture of the Iſland from the French, by the forces under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Amherſt. When the Iſland was recovered, the Engliſh fleet ſtaid ſome days at Placentia, in order to put it in a more complete ſtate of defence. During this time Mr. Cook manifeſted a diligence in ſurveying the harbour and heights of the place, which arreſted the notice of Captain (now Admiral) Graves, Commander of the Antelope, and Governor of Newfoundland. The Governor was hence induced to aſk Cook a variety of queſtions, from the anſwers to which he was led to entertain a very favourable opinion of his abilities. This opinion was increaſed, the more he ſaw of Mr. Cook's conduct; who, wherever they went, continued to diſplay the moſt unremitting attention to every object that related to the knowledge of the coaſt, and which was calculated to facilitate the practice of navigation. The eſteem which Captain Graves had conceived for him, was confirmed by the teſtimonies to his Character that were given by all the officers under whom he ſerved (h). In the latter end of 1762, Mr. Cook returned to England; and, on the 21ſt of December, in the ſame year, married, at Barking in Eſſex, Miſs Elizabeth Batts (i), an amiable and deſerving woman, who was juſtly entitled to, and enjoyed his tendereſt regard and affection. But his ſtation in life, and the high duties to which he was called, did not permit him to partake of matrimonial felicity without many and very long interruptions. Early in the year of 1763, after the peace with France and Spain was concluded, it was determined that Captain Graves ſhould go out again, as Governor of Newfoundland. As the country was very valuable in a commercial view, and had been an object of great contention between the Engliſh and the French, the Captain obtained an eſtabliſhment for the ſurvey of its coaſts; which, however, he procured with ſome difficulty, becauſe the matter was not ſufficiently underſtood by Government at home. In conſidering the execution of the plan, Mr. Cook appeared to Captain Graves to be a proper perſon for the purpoſe; and propoſals were made to him, to which, notwithſtanding his recent marriage, he readily and prudently acceded. Accordingly, he went out with the Captain as ſurveyor; and was firſt employed to ſurvey Miquelon and St. Pierre, which had been ceded by the treaty to the French, who, by order of Adminiſtration, were to take poſſeſſion of them at a certain period, even though the Engliſh Commander ſhould not happen to be arrived in the country. When Captain Graves had reached that part of the world, he found there the Governor who had been ſent from France (Monſ. D'Anjac), with all the ſettlers and his own family, on board a frigate and ſome tranſports. It was contrived, however, to keep them in that diſagreeable ſituation for a whole month, which was the time taken by Mr. Cook to complete his ſurvey. When the buſineſs was finiſhed, the French were put into poſſeſſion of the two iſlands, and left in the quiet enjoyment of them, with every profeſſion of civility (k). At the end of the ſeaſon, Mr. Cook returned to England, but did not long continue at home. In the beginning of the year 1764, his old and conſtant friend and patron, Sir Hugh Palliſer, was appointed Governor and Commodore of Newfoundland and Labradore; upon which occaſion he was glad to take Mr. Cook with him, in the ſame capacity that he had ſuſtained under Captain Graves. Indeed, no man could have been found who was better qualified for finiſhing the deſign which had been begun in the preceding year. The charts of the coaſts, in that part of North America, were very erroneous; and it was highly neceſſary to the trade and navigation of his Majeſty's ſubjects, that new ones ſhould be formed, which would be more correct and uſeful. Accordingly, under the orders of Commodore Palliſer, Mr. Cook was appointed, on the 18th of April, 1764, Marine Surveyor of Newfoundland and Labradore; and he had a veſſel, the Grenville ſchooner, to attend him for that purpoſe. How well he executed his commiſſion is known to every man acquainted with navigation. The Charts which he afterwards publiſhed of the different ſurveys he had made, reflected great credit on his abilities and character, and the utility of them is univerſally acknowledged. It is underſtood, that, ſo far as Newfoundland is concerned, they were of conſiderable ſervice to the King's Miniſters, in ſettling the terms of the laſt peace. Mr. Cook explored the inland parts of this Iſland in a much completer manner than had ever been done before. By penetrating farther into the middle of the country than any man had hitherto attempted, he diſcovered ſeveral large lakes, which are indicated upon the general Chart (l) In theſe ſervices Mr. Cook appears to have been employed, with the intervals of occaſionally returning to England for the winter ſeaſon, till the year 1767, which was the laſt time that he went out upon his ſtation of Marine Surveyor of Newfoundland. It muſt not be omitted, that, while he occupied this poſt, he had an opportunity of exhibiting to the Royal Society a proof of his progreſs in the ſtudy of aſtronomy. A ſhort paper was written by him, and inſerted in the fifty-ſeventh volume of the Philoſophical Tranſactions, entitled, "An Obſervation of an Eclipſe of the Sun at the Iſland of Newfound-land, Auguſt 5, 1766, with the Longitude of the Place of Obſervation deduced from it." The obſervation was made at one of the Burgeo Iſlands, near Cape Ray, in latitude 47° 36′ 19″, on the ſouth-weſt extremity of Newfoundland. Mr. Cook's paper having been communicated by Dr. Bevis to Mr. Witchell, the latter Gentleman compared it with an obſervation taken at Oxford, by the Rev. Mr. Hornſby, on the ſame eclipſe, and thence computed the difference of longitude reſpecting the places of obſervation, making due allowance for the effect of parallax, and the prolate ſpheroidal figure of the earth. It appears from the "Tranſactions," that our navigator had already obtained the character of being an able Mathematician (m).

There is ſcarcely any thing from which the natural curioſity of man receives a higher gratification, than from the accounts of diſtant countries and nations. Nor is it curioſity only that is gratified by ſuch accounts; for the ſphere of human knowledge is hereby enlarged, and various objects are brought into view, an acquaintance with which greatly contributes to the improvement of life and the benefit of the world. With regard to information of this kind, the moderns have eminently the advantage over the ancients. The ancients could neither purſue their enquiries with the ſame accuracy, nor carry them on to the ſame extent. Travelling by land was much more inconvenient and dangerous than it hath been in later times; and, as navigation was principally confined to coaſting, it muſt neceſſarily have been circumſcribed within very narrow limits. The invention of the compaſs, ſeconded by the ardent and enterprizing ſpirit of ſeveral able men, was followed by wonderful diſcoveries. Vaſco di Gama doubled the Cape of Good Hope; and a new way being thus found out to the Eaſt Indies, the countries in that part of the earth became more accurately and extenſively known. Another world was diſcovered by Columbus; and, at length, Magalhaens accompliſhed the arduous and hitherto unattempted taſk of ſailing round the globe. At different periods, he was ſucceeded by other circumnavigators, of whom it is no part of the preſent narrative to give an account. The ſpirit of diſcovery, which was ſo vigorous during the latter end of the fifteenth and through the whole of the ſixteenth century, began, ſoon after the commencement of the ſeventeenth century, to decline. Great navigations were only occaſionally undertaken, and more from the immediate views of avarice or war, than from any noble and generous principles. But of late years they have been revived, with the enlarged and benevolent deſign of promoting the happineſs of the human ſpecies. A beginning of this kind was made in the reign of King George the Second, during which two voyages were performed; the firſt under the command of Captain Middleton, and the next under the direction of Captains Smith and Moore, in order to diſcover a North-weſt paſſage, through Hudſon's Bay (n). It was reſerved, however, for the glory of the preſent reign to carry the ſpirit of diſcovery to its height, and to conduct it on the nobleſt principles; not for the purpoſes of covetouſneſs or ambition; not to plunder or deſtroy the inhabitants of newly-explored countries; but to improve their condition, to inſtruct them in the arts of life, and to extend the boundaries of ſcience. No ſooner was peace reſtored, in 1763, than theſe laudable deſigns engaged his Majeſty's patronage; and two voyages round the world had been undertaken, before Mr. Cook ſet out on his firſt command. The conductors of theſe voyages were the Captains Byron, Wallis, and Carteret (o), by whom ſeveral diſcoveries were made, which contributed, in no ſmall degree, to increaſe the knowledge of geography and navigation. Nevertheleſs, as the purpoſe for which they were ſent out appears to have had a principal reference to a particular object in the South Atlantic, the direct tract they were obliged to hold, on their way homeward by the Eaſt Indies, prevented them from doing ſo much as might otherwiſe have been expected towards giving the world a complete view of that immenſe expanſe of ocean which the South Pacific comprehends (p). Before Captain Wallis and Captain Carteret had returned to Great Britain, another voyage was reſolved upon, for which the improvement of aſtronomical ſcience afforded the immediate occaſion. It having been calculated by Aſtronomers, that a tranſit of Venus over the Sun's diſk would happen in 1769, it was judged that the beſt place for obſerving it would be in ſome part of the South Sea, either at the Marqueſas, or at one of thoſe Iſlands which Taſman had called Amſterdam, Rotterdam, and Middleburg, and which are now better known under the appellation of the Friendly Iſlands (q). This being a matter of eminent conſequence in aſtronomy, and which excited the attention of foreign nations as well as of our own, the affair was taken up by the Royal Society, with the zeal which has always been diſplayed by that learned body for the advancement of every branch of philoſophical ſcience. Accordingly, a long memorial was addreſſed to his Majeſty, dated February the 15th, 1768, repreſenting the great importance of the object, together with the regard which had been paid to it by the principal Courts of Europe; and intreating, among other things, that a veſſel might be ordered, at the expence of Government, for the conveyance of ſuitable perſons, to make the obſervation of the tranſit of Venus at one of the places before mentioned. This memorial having been laid before the King by the Earl of Shelburne, (now the Marquis of Landſdown) one of the principal Secretaries of State, his Majeſty graciouſly ſignified his pleaſure to the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, that they ſhould provide a ſhip for carrying over ſuch obſervers as the Royal Society ſhould judge proper to ſend to the South Seas; and, on the 3d of April, Mr. Stephens informed the Society, that a bark had been taken up for the purpoſe (r). The Gentleman who had originally been fixed upon to take the direction of the expedition, was Alexander Dalrymple, Eſq; an eminent Member of the Royal Society, and who, beſides poſſeſſing an accurate knowledge of aſtronomy, had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his enquiries into the geography of the Southern Oceans, and by the collection he had publiſhed of ſeveral voyages to thoſe parts of the world. Mr. Dalrymple being ſenſible of the difficulty, or rather of the impoſſibility, of carrying a ſhip through unknown ſeas, the crew of which were not ſubject to the military diſcipline of his Majeſty's Navy, he made it the condition of his going, that he ſhould have a brevet commiſſion as Captain of the veſſel, in the ſame manner as ſuch a commiſſion had been granted to Dr. Halley in his voyage of diſcovery. To this demand Sir Edward Hawke, who was then at the head of the Admiralty, and who poſſeſſed more of the ſpirit of his profeſſion than either of education or ſcience, abſolutely refuſed to accede. He ſaid at the board, that his conſcience would not allow him to truſt any ſhip of his Majeſty's to a perſon who had not regularly been bred a ſeaman. On being farther preſſed upon the ſubject, Sir Edward declared, that he would ſuffer his right hand to be cut off, before he would ſign any ſuch commiſſion. In this he was, in ſome degree, juſtified by the mutinous behaviour of Halley's crew, who refuſed to acknowledge the legal authority of their commander, and involved him in a diſpute which was attended with pernicious conſequences. Mr. Dalrymple, on the other hand, was equally ſteady in requiring a compliance with the terms he had propoſed. Such was the ſtate of things, when Mr. Stephens, Secretary to the Admiralty, whoſe diſcrimination of the numerous characters, with which by his ſtation he is converſant, reflects as much credit on his underſtanding, as his upright and able conduct does on the office he has filled, for ſo many years, and under ſo many Adminiſtrations, with honour to to himſelf and advantage to the public, obſerved to the board, that, ſince Sir Edward Hawke and Mr. Dalrymple were equally inflexible, no method remained but that of finding out another perſon capable of the ſervice. He knew, he ſaid, a Mr. Cook, who had been employed as Marine Surveyor of Newfoundland, who had been regularly educated in the Navy, in which he was a Maſter, and whom he judged to be fully qualified for the direction of the preſent undertaking. Mr. Stephens, at the ſame time, recommended it to the Board, to take the opinion of Sir Hugh Palliſer, who had lately been Governor of Newfoundland, and was intimately acquainted with Cook's character. Sir Hugh rejoiced in the opportunity of ſerving his friend. He ſtrengthened Mr. Stephens's recommendation to the utmoſt of his power; and added many things in Mr. Cook's favour, ariſing from the particular knowledge which he had of his abilities and merit (s). Accordingly, Mr. Cook was appointed to the command of the expedition by the Lords of the Admiralty; and, on this occaſion, he was promoted to the rank of a Lieutenant in the Royal Navy, his commiſſion bearing date on the twenty-fifth of May, 1768 (t).

(t) From the books of the Admiralty.

When the appointment had taken place, the firſt object was to provide a veſſel adapted to the purpoſes of the voyage. This buſineſs was committed to Sir Hugh Palliſer; who took Lieutenant Cook to his aſſiſtance, and they examined together a great number of the ſhips which then lay in the river Thames. At length, they fixed upon one, of three hundred and ſeventy tons, to which was given the name of the Endeavour (u). While preparations were making for Lieutenant Cook's expedition, Captain Wallis returned from his voyage round the world. The Earl of Morton, Preſident of the Royal Society, had recommended it to this Gentleman, on his going out, to fix upon a proper place for obſerving the tranſit of Venus. He kept, accordingly, the object in view; and having diſcovered, in the courſe of his enterpriſe, an Iſland, called by him George's Iſland, but which hath ſince been found to bear the name of Otaheite, he judged that Port Royal harbour in this Iſland would afford an eligible ſituation for the purpoſe. Having, immediately on his return to England, ſignified his opinion to the Earl of Morton, the Captain's idea was adopted by the Society, and an anſwer conformable to it was ſent to the Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, who had applied for directions to what place the obſervers ſhould be ſent (w). Mr. Charles Green, a Gentleman who had been aſſiſtant to Dr. Bradley at the Royal Obſervatory at Greenwich, was united with Lieutenant Cook in conducting the aſtronomical part of the voyage; and, ſoon after their appointment, they received ample inſtructions, from the Council of the Royal Society, with regard to the method of carrying on their enquiries (x). The Lieutenant was alſo accompanied by Joſeph Banks, Eſq. (now Sir Joſeph Banks, Bart.) and Dr. Solander, who, in the prime of life, and the firſt of them at great expence to himſelf, quitted all the gratifications of poliſhed ſociety, and engaged in a very tedious, fatiguing, and hazardous navigation, with the laudable views, of acquiring knowledge in general, of promoting natural knowledge in particular, and of contributing ſomething to the improvement and the happineſs of the rude inhabitants of the earth. Though it was the principal, it was not the ſole object of Lieutenant Cook's voyage to obſerve the tranſit of Venus. A more accurate examination of the Pacific Ocean was committed to him, although in ſubſerviency to his main deſign; and, when his chief buſineſs was accompliſhed, he was directed to proceed in making farther diſcoveries in the great Southern Seas (y). The complement of Lieutenant Cook's ſhip conſiſted of eighty-four perſons, beſides the Commander. Her victualling was for eighteen months; and there were put on board of her ten carriage and twelve ſwivel guns, together with an ample ſtore of ammunition and other neceſſaries (z). On the 25th of May, 1768, Lieutenant Cook was appointed, by the Lords of the Admiralty, to the command of the Endeavour, in conſequence of which he went on board on the 27th, and took charge of the ſhip. She then lay in the baſon in Deptford-yard, where ſhe continued to lie till ſhe was completely fitted for ſea. On the 30th of July ſhe ſailed down the river, and on the 13th of Auguſt anchored in Plymouth Sound. The wind becoming fair on the 26th of that month, our navigators got under ſail, and on the 13th of September anchored in Funchiale Road, in the Iſland of Madeira (a). While Lieutenant Cook and his company were in this Iſland, they were treated with the utmoſt kindneſs and liberality by Mr. Cheap, the Engliſh Conſul there, and one of the moſt conſiderable Merchants in the town of Funchiale. He inſiſted upon their taking poſſeſſion of his houſe, and furniſhed them with every poſſible accommodation during their ſtay at Madeira. They received, likewiſe, great marks of attention and civility from Dr. Thomas Heberden, the principal Phyſician of the Iſland, and brother to the excellent and learned Dr. William Heberden, of London. Dr. Thomas Heberden afforded all the aſſiſtance in his power to Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander in their botanical enquiries (b). It was not ſolely from the Engliſh that the Lieutenant and his friends experienced a kind reception. The fathers of the Franciſcan Convent diſplayed a liberality of ſentiment towards them, which might not have been expected from Portugueſe Friars; and in a viſit which they paid to a Convent of Nuns, the Ladies expreſſed a particular pleaſure in ſeeing them. At this viſit the good Nuns gave an amuſing proof of the progreſs they had made in the cultivation of their underſtandings. Having heard that there were great Philoſophers among the Engliſh Gentle-

Gentlemen, they aſked them a variety of queſtions; one of which was, when it would thunder; and another, whether a ſpring of freſh water, which was much wanted, was any where to be found within the walls of the Convent. Eminent as our Philoſophers were, they were puzzled by theſe queſtions (c). Lieutenant Cook, having laid in a freſh ſtock of beef, water, and wine, ſet ſail from the Iſland of Madeira, in the night of the 18th of September, and proceeded on his voyage. By the 7th of November, ſeveral articles of the ſhip's proviſions began to fall ſhort; for which reaſon the Lieutenant determined to put into Rio de Janeiro. This place he preferred to any other port in Braſil or to Falkland's Iſlands, becauſe he could there be better ſupplied with what he wanted, and had no doubt of meeting with a friendly reception (d). During the run between Madeira and Rio de Janeiro, Lieutenant Cook and the Gentlemen in the Endeavour had an opportunity of determining a philoſophical queſtion. On the evening of the 29th of October, they obſerved that luminous appearance of the ſea which hath ſo often been mentioned by Navigators, and which has been aſcribed to ſuch a variety of cauſes. Flaſhes of light appeared to be emitted, exactly reſembling thoſe of lightning, though without being ſo conſiderable; and ſuch was the frequency of them that ſometimes eight or ten were viſible almoſt at the ſame moment. It was the opinion of Mr. Cook and the other Gentlemen, that theſe flaſhes proceeded from ſome luminous animal; and their opinion was confirmed by experiment (e). At Rio de Janeiro, in the port of which Lieutenant Cook came to an anchor on the 13th of November, he did not meet with the polite reception that, perhaps, he had too ſanguinely expected. His ſtay was ſpent in continual altercations with the Viceroy, who appeared not a little jealous of the deſigns of the Engliſh: nor were all the attempts of the Lieutenant to ſet the matter right, capable of producing any effect. The Viceroy was by no means diſtinguiſhed either by his knowledge or his love of ſcience; and the grand object of Mr. Cook's expedition was quite beyond his comprehenſion. When he was told that the Engliſh were bound to the Southward, by the order of his Britannic Majeſty, to obſerve a tranſit of the planet Venus over the ſun, an aſtronomical phænomenon of great importance to Navigation, he could form no other conception of the matter, than that it was the paſſing of the North ſtar through the South Pole. During the whole of the conteſt with the Viceroy, Lieutenant Cook behaved with equal ſpirit and diſcretion. A ſupply of water and other neceſſaries could not be refuſed him, and theſe were gotten on board by the 1ſt of December. On that day the Lieutenant ſent to the Viceroy for a pilot to carry the Endeavour to ſea; but the wind preventing the ſhip from getting out, ſhe was obliged to continue ſome time longer in the harbour. A Spaniſh packet having arrived at Rio de Janeiro on the 2d of December, with diſpatches from Buenos Ayres for Spain, the Commander, Don Antonio de Monte Negro y Velaſco, offered, with great politeneſs, to convey the letters of the Engliſh to Europe. This favour Lieutenant Cook accepted, and gave Don Antonio a packet for the Secretary of the Admiralty, containing copies of all the papers that had paſſed between himſelf and the Viceroy. He left, alſo, duplicates with the Viceroy, that he might forward them, if he thought proper, to Liſbon. On the 5th of December, it being a dead calm, our Navigators weighed anchor, and towed down the Bay; but, to their great aſtoniſhment, two ſhot were fired at them, when they had gotten abreaſt of Santa Cruz, the principal fortification of the harbour. Lieutenant Cook immediately caſt anchor, and ſent to the Fort to demand the reaſon of this conduct; the anſwer to which was, that the Commandant had received no order from the Viceroy to let the ſhip paſs; and that, without ſuch an order, no veſſel was ever ſuffered to go below the Fort. It now became neceſſary to ſend to the Viceroy, to enquire why the order had not been given; and his behaviour appeared the more extraordinary, as notice had been tranſmitted to him of the departure of the Engliſh, and he had thought proper to write a polite letter to Mr. Cook, wiſhing him a good voyage. The Lieutenant's meſſenger ſoon returned, with the information that the order had been written ſeveral days, and that its not having been ſent had ariſen from ſome unaccountable negligence. It was not till the 7th of December that the Endeavour got under ſail (f). In the account which Lieutenant Cook has given of Rio de Janeiro, and the country around it, one circumſtance is recorded, which cannot be otherwiſe than very painful to humanity. It is the horrid expence of life at which the gold mines are wrought. No leſs than forty thouſand negroes are annually imported for this purpoſe, on the King of Portugal's account; and the Engliſh were credibly informed, that, in the year 1766, this number fell ſo ſhort, that twenty thouſand more were drafted from the town of Rio (g). From Rio de Janeiro Lieutenant Cook purſued his voyage, and, on the 14th of January, 1769, entered the Streight of Le Maire, at which time the tide drove the ſhip out with ſo much violence, and raiſed ſuch a ſea off Cape St. Diego, that ſhe frequently pitched, ſo that the bowſprit was under water (h). On the next day, the Lieutenant anchored, firſt before a ſmall cove, which was underſtood to be Port Maurice, and afterwards in the Bay of Good Succeſs. While the Endeavour was in this ſtation, happened the memorable adventure of Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, Mr. Monkhouſe the Surgeon, and Mr. Green the Aſtronomer, together with their attendants and ſervants, and two ſeamen, in aſcending a mountain to ſearch for plants. In this expedition, they were all of them expoſed to the utmoſt utmoſt extremity of danger and of cold; Dr. Solander was ſeized with a torpor which had nearly proved fatal to his life; and two black ſervants actually died. When the Gentlemen had, at length, on the ſecond day of their adventure, gotten back to the ſhip, they congratulated each other on their ſafety, with a joy that can only be felt by thoſe who have experienced equal perils; and Mr. Cook was relieved from a very painful anxiety. It was a dreadful teſtimony of the ſeverity of the climate, that this event took place when it was the midſt of ſummer in that part of the world (i), and at the cloſe of a day the beginning of which was as mild and warm as the month of May uſually is in England. In the paſſage through the Streight of Le Maire, Lieutenant Cook and his ingenious aſſociates had an opportunity of gaining a conſiderable degree of acquaintance with the inhabitants of the adjoining country. Here it was that they ſaw human nature in its loweſt form. The natives appeared to be the moſt deſtitute and forlorn, as well as the moſt ſtupid, of the children of men. Their lives are ſpent in wandering about the dreary waſtes that ſurround them; and their dwellings are no other than wretched hovels of ſticks and graſs, which not only admit the wind, but the ſnow and the rain. They are almoſt naked; and ſo devoid are they of every convenience which is furniſhed by the rudeſt art, that they have not ſo much as an implement to dreſs their food. Nevertheleſs, they ſeemed to have no wiſh for acquiring more than they poſſeſſed; nor did any thing that was offered them by the Engliſh appear acceptable but beads, as an ornamental ſuperfluity of life. A concluſion is hence drawn by Dr. Hawkeſworth, that theſe people may be upon a level with ourſelves, in reſpect to the happineſs they enjoy (k). This, however, is a poſition which ought not haſtily to be admitted. It is, indeed, a beautiful circumſtance, in the order of Divine Providence, that the rudeſt inhabitants of the earth, and thoſe who are ſituated in the moſt unfavourable climates, ſhould not be ſenſible of their diſadvantages. But ſtill it muſt be allowed, that their happineſs is greatly inferior, both in kind and degree, to that intellectual, ſocial, and moral felicity which is capable of being attained in a highly-cultivated ſtate of ſociety.

In voyages to the South Pacific Ocean, the determination of the beſt paſſage from the Atlantic is a point of peculiar importance. It is well known what prodigious difficulties were experienced in this reſpect by former Navigators. The doubling of Cape Horn, in particular, was ſo much dreaded, that, in the general opinion, it was far more eligible to paſs through the Streight of Magalhaens. Lieutenant Cook hath fully aſcertained the erroneouſneſs of this opinion. He was but three-and-thirty days in coming round the land of Terra del Fuego, from the Eaſt entrance of the Streight of Le Maire, till he had advanced about twelve degrees to the weſtward, and three and a half to the northward of the Streight of Magalhaens; and, during this time, the ſhip ſcarcely received any damage. Whereas, if he had come into the Pacific Ocean by that paſſage, he would not have been able to accompliſh it in leſs than three months; beſides which, his people would have been fatigued, and the anchors, cables, ſails, and rigging of the veſſel much injured. By the courſe he purſued, none of theſe inconveniencies were ſuffered. In ſhort, Lieutenant Cook, by his own example in doubling Cape Horn, by his accurate aſcertainment of the latitude and longitude of the places he came to, and by his inſtructions to future Voyagers, performed the moſt eſſential ſervices to this part of navigation (l). It was on the 26th of January that the Endeavour took her departure from Cape Horn; and it appeared, that, from that time to the 1ſt of March, during a run of ſix hundred and ſixty leagues, there was no current which affected the ſhip. Hence it was highly probable that our Navigators had been near no land of any conſiderable extent, currents being always found when land is not remote (m). In the proſecution of Lieutenant Cook's voyage from Cape Horn to Otaheite ſeveral Iſlands were diſcovered, to which the names were given of Lagoon Iſland, Thrumb-cap, Bow Iſland, The Groups, Bird Iſland, and Chain Iſland. It appeared that moſt of theſe Iſlands were inhabited; and the verdure, and groves of palm-trees, which were viſible upon ſome of them, gave them the aſpect of a terreſtrial paradiſe to men who, excepting the dreary hills of Terra del Fuego, had ſeen nothing for a long time but ſky and water [A]. On the 11th of April, the Endeavour arrived in ſight of Otaheite, and on the 13th ſhe came to an anchor in Port Royal Bay, which is called Matavai by the natives. As the ſtay of the Engliſh in the Iſland was not likely to be very ſhort, and much depended on the manner in which traffic ſhould be carried on with the inhabitants, Lieutenant Cook, with great good ſenſe and humanity, drew up a ſet of regulations for the behaviour of his people, and gave it in command that they ſhould punctually be obſerved [B]. One of the firſt things that occupied the Lieutenant's attention, after his arrival arrival at Otaheite, was to prepare for the execution of his grand commiſſion. For this purpoſe, as, in an excurſion to the weſtward, he had not found any more convenient harbour than that in which the Endeavour lay, he determined to go on ſhore and fix upon ſome ſpot, commanded by the guns of the ſhip, where he might throw up a ſmall fort for defence, and get every thing ready for making the aſtronomical obſervation. Accordingly, he took a party of men, and landed, being accompanied by Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and Mr. Green. They ſoon fixed upon a place very proper for their deſign, and which was at a conſiderable diſtance from any habitation of the natives. While the Gentlemen were marking out the ground which they intended to occupy, and ſeeing a ſmall tent erected that belonged to Mr. Banks, a great number of the people of the country gathered gradually around them, but with no hoſtile appearance, as there was not among the Indians a ſingle weapon of any kind. Mr. Cook, however, intimated that none of them were to come within the line he had drawn, excepting one, who appeared to be a chief, and Owhaw, a native who had attached himſelf to the Engliſh, both in Captain Wallis's expedition and in the preſent voyage. The Lieutenant endeavoured to make theſe two perſons underſtand that the ground which had been marked out was only wanted to ſleep upon for a certain number of nights, and that then it would be quitted. Whether his meaning was comprehended or not, he could not certainly determine; but the people behaved with a deference and reſpect that could ſcarcely have been expected, and which were highly pleaſing. They ſat down without the circle, peaceably and uninterruptedly attending to the progreſs of the buſineſs, which was upwards of two hours in completing. This matter being finiſhed, and Mr. Cook having appointed thirteen Marines and a petty officer to guard the tent, he and the Gentlemen with him ſet out upon a little excurſion into the woods of the country. They had not, however, gone far, before they were brought back by a very diſagreeable event. One of the Indians, who remained about the tent after the Lieutenant and his friends had left it, watched an opportunity of taking the ſentry at unawares, and ſnatched away his muſquet. Upon this, the petty officer who commanded the party, and who was a Midſhipman, ordered the Marines to fire. With equal want of conſideration, and, perhaps, with equal inhumanity, the men immediately diſcharged their pieces among the thickeſt of the flying crowd, who conſiſted of more than a hundred. It being obſerved that the thief did not fall, he was purſued, and ſhot dead. From ſubſequent information it happily appeared, that none of the natives beſides were either killed or wounded. Lieutenant Cook, who was highly diſpleaſed with the conduct of the petty officer, uſed every method in his power to diſpel the terrors and apprehenſions of the Indians, but not immediately with effect. The next morning but few of the inhabitants were ſeen upon the beach, and not one of them came off to the ſhip. What added particularly to the regret of the Engliſh was, that even Owhaw, who had hitherto been ſo conſtant in his attachment, and who the day before had been remarkably active in endeavouring to renew the peace which had been broken, did not now make his appearance. In the evening, however, when the Lieutenant went on ſhore with only a boat's crew and ſome of the Gentlemen, between thirty and forty of the natives gathered around them, and trafficked with them, in a friendly manner, for cocoa-nuts and other fruit (p). On the 17th, Mr. Cook and Mr. Green ſet up a tent on ſhore, and ſpent the night there, in order to obſerve an Eclipſe of the firſt ſatellite of Jupiter; but they met with a diſappointment, in conſequence of the weather's becoming cloudy. The next day, the Lieutenant, with as many of his people as could poſſibly be ſpared from the ſhip, began to erect the fort. While the Engliſh were employed in this buſineſs, many of the Indians were ſo far from hindering, that they voluntarily aſſiſted them, and with great alacrity brought the pickets and faſcines from the wood where they had been cut. Indeed, ſo ſcrupulous had Mr. Cook been of invading their property, that every ſtake which was uſed was purchaſed, and not a tree was cut down till their conſent had firſt been obtained (q). On the 26th, the Lieutenant mounted ſix ſwivel guns upon the fort, on which occaſion he ſaw, with concern, that the natives were alarmed and terrified. Some fiſhermen, who lived upon the point, removed to a greater diſtance; and Owhaw informed the Engliſh, by ſigns, of his expectation that in four days they would fire their great guns. The Lieutenant, on the ſucceeding day, gave a ſtriking proof of his regard to juſtice, and of his care to preſerve the inhabitants from injury and violence, by the puniſhment he inflicted on the butcher of the Endeavour, who was accuſed of having threatened, or attempted, the life of a woman that was the wife of Tubourai Tomaide, a chief remarkable for his attachment to our navigators. The butcher wanted to purchaſe of her a ſtone hatchet for a nail. To this bargain ſhe abſolutely refuſed to accede; upon which the fellow catched up the hatchet, and threw down the nail; threatening, at the ſame time, that if ſhe made any reſiſtance, he would cut her throat with a reaping-hook which he had in his hand. The charge was ſo fully proved in the preſence of Mr. Banks, and the butcher had ſo little to ſay in exculpation of himſelf, that not the leaſt doubt remained of his guilt. The affair being reported by Mr. Banks to Lieutenant Cook, he took an opportunity, when the Chief and his women, with others of the natives, were on board the ſhip, to call up the offender, and, after recapitulating the accuſation and the proof of it, to give orders for his immediate puniſhment. While the butcher was ſtripped, and tied up to the rigging, the Indians preſerved a fixed attention, and waited for the event in ſilent ſuſpenſe. But as ſoon as the firſt ſtroke was inflicted, ſuch was the humanity of theſe people, that they interfered with great agitation, and earneſtly intreated that the reſt of the puniſhment might be remitted. To this, however, the Lieutenant, for various reaſons, could not grant his conſent; and, when they found that their interceſſions were ineffectual, they manifeſted their compaſſion by tears (r). On the firſt of May, the obſervatory was ſet up, and the aſtronomical quadrant, together with ſome other inſtruments, was taken on ſhore. When, on the next morning, Mr. Cook and Mr. Green landed for the purpoſe of fixing the quadrant in a ſituation for uſe, to their inexpreſſible ſurprize and concern it was not to be found. It had been depoſited in a tent reſerved for the Lieutenant's uſe, where no one had ſlept: it had never been taken out of the packing-caſe, and the whole was of conſiderable weight: none of the other inſtruments were miſſing; and a centinel had been poſted the whole night within five yards of the tent. Theſe circumſtances induced a ſuſpicion that the robbery might have been committed by ſome of our own people, who having ſeen a deal box, and not knowing the contents, might imagine that it contained nails, or other articles for traffic with the natives. The moſt diligent ſearch, therefore, was made, and a large reward was offered for the finding of the quadrant, but with no degree of ſucceſs. In this exigency, Mr. Banks was of eminent ſervice. As this Gentleman had more influence over the Indians than any other perſon on board the Endeavour, and as there could now be little doubt of the quadrant's having been conveyed away by ſome of the natives, he determined to go in ſearch of it into the woods; and it was recovered in conſequence of his judicious and ſpirited exertions. The pleaſure with which it was brought back was equal to the importance of the event; for the grand object of the voyage could not otherwiſe have been accompliſhed (s). Another embarraſſment, though not of ſo ſerious a nature, was occaſioned, on the very ſame day, by one of our officers having inadvertently taken into cuſtody Tootahah, a chief who had connected himſelf in the moſt friendly manner with the Engliſh. Lieutenant Cook, who had given expreſs orders that none of the Indians ſhould be confined, and who, therefore, was equally ſurprized and concerned at this tranſaction, inſtantly ſet Tootahah at liberty. So ſtrongly had this Indian been poſſeſſed with the notion that it was intended to put him to death, that he could not be perſuaded to the contrary till he was led out of the fort. His joy at his deliverance was ſo great, that it diſplayed itſelf in a liberality which our people were very unwilling to partake of, from a conſcioufneſs that on this occaſion they had no claim to the reception of favours. The impreſſion, however, of the confinement of the chief operated with ſuch force upon the minds of the natives, that few of them appeared; and the market was ſo ill ſupplied, that the Engliſh were in want of neceſſaries. At length, by the prudent exertions of Lieutenant Cook, Mr. Banks, and Dr. Solander, the friendſhip of Tootahah was completely recovered, and the reconciliation worked upon the Indians like a charm; for it was no ſooner known that he had gone voluntarily on board the Endeavour, than bread-fruit, cocoa-nuts, and other proviſions, were brought to the fort in great plenty (t). The Lieutenant and the reſt of the Gentlemen had hitherto, with a laudable diſcretion, bartered only beads for the articles of food now mentioned. But the market becoming ſlack, they were obliged for the firſt time, on the eighth of May, to bring out their nails; and ſuch was the effect of this new commodity, that one of the ſmalleſt ſize, which was about four inches long, procured twenty cocoa-nuts, and bread-fruit in proportion (u). It was not till the tenth of the month that our voyagers learned that the Indian name of the Iſland was OTAHEITE, by which name it hath ſince been always diſtinguiſhed (w). On Sunday the fourteenth, an inſtance was exhibited of the inattention of the natives to our modes of religion. The Lieutenant had directed that divine ſervice ſhould be performed at the fort; and he was deſirous that ſome of the principal Indians ſhould be preſent. Mr. Banks ſecured the attendance of Tubourai Tomaide and his wife Tomio, hoping that it would give occaſion to ſome enquiries on their part, and to ſome inſtruction in return. During the whole ſervice, they very attentively obſerved Mr. Banks's behaviour, and ſtood, ſat, or kneeled, as they ſaw him do; and they appeared to be ſenſible that it was a ſerious and important employment in which the Engliſh were engaged. But when the worſhip was ended, neither of them aſked any queſtions, nor would they attend to any explanations which were attempted to be given of what had been performed (x). As the day approached for executing the grand purpoſe of the voyage, Lieutenant Cook determined, in conſequence of ſome hints which he had received from the Earl of Morton, to ſend out two parties, to obſerve the tranſit of Venus from other ſituations. By this means he hoped that the ſucceſs of the obſervation would be ſecured, if there ſhould happen to be any failure at Otaheite. Accordingly, on Thurſday the firſt of June, he diſpatched Mr. Gore in the long-boat to Eimeo, a neighbouring iſland, together with Mr. Monkhouſe, and Mr. Sporing, a Gentleman belonging to Mr. Banks. They were furniſhed by Mr. Green with proper inſtruments. Mr. Banks himſelf choſe to go upon this expedition, in which he was accompanied by Tubourai Tomaide and Tomio, and by others of the natives. Early the next morning, the Lieutenant ſent Mr. Hicks, in the pinnace, with Mr. Clerke and Mr. Pickerſgill, and Mr. Saunders, one of the midſhipmen, ordering them to fix upon ſome convenient ſpot to the eaſtward, at a diſtance from the principal obſervatory, where they alſo might employ the inſtruments they were provided with for obſerving the tranſit. The anxiety for ſuch weather as would be favourable to the ſucceſs of the experiment, was powerfully felt by all the parties concerned. They could not ſleep in peace the preceding night: but their apprehenſions were happily removed by the ſun's riſing, on the morning of the third of June, without a cloud. The weather continued with equal clearneſs through the whole of the day; ſo that the obſervation was ſucceſsfully made in every quarter. At the fort, where Lieutenant Cook, Mr. Green, and Dr. Solander were ſtationed, the whole paſſage of the planet Venus over the ſun's diſk was obſerved with great advantage. The magnifying power of Dr. Solander's teleſcope was ſuperior to that of thoſe which belonged to the Lieutenant and to Mr. Green. They all ſaw an atmoſphere or duſky cloud round the body of the planet; which much diſturbed the times of contact, and eſpecially of the internal ones; and, in their accounts of theſe times, they differed from each other in a greater degree than might have been expected. According to Mr. Green,

A more particular account of this great aſtronomical event, the providing for the accurate obſervation of which reflects ſo much honour on his Majeſty's munificent patronage of ſcience, may be ſeen in the ſixty-firſt volume of the Philoſophical Tranſactions (y).

(y) Ibid. p. 137. Tranſactions, vol. lxi. p. 397.

The pleaſure which Lieutenant Cook and his friends derived from having thus ſucceſsfully accompliſhed the firſt grand object of the voyage, was not a little abated by the conduct of ſome of the ſhip's company, who, while the attention of the officers was engroſſed by the tranſit of Venus, broke into one of the ſtore-rooms, and ſtole a quantity of ſpike nails, amounting to no leſs than an hundred weight. This was an evil of a public and ſerious nature; for theſe nails, if injudiciouſly circulated among the Indians, would be productive of irreparable injury to the Engliſh, by reducing the value of iron, their ſtaple commodity. One of the thieves, from whom only ſeven nails were recovered, was detected; but, though the puniſhment of two dozen laſhes was inflicted upon him, he would not impeach any of his accomplices (z). Upon account of the abſence of the two parties who had been ſent out to obſerve the tranſit, the King's birth-day was celebrated on the fifth, inſtead of the fourth of June (a); and the feſtivity of the day muſt have been greatly heightened by the happy ſucceſs with which his Majeſty's liberality had been crowned. On the twelfth, Lieutenant Cook was again reduced to the neceſſity of exerciſing the ſeverity of diſcipline. Complaint having been made to him, by certain of the natives, that two of the ſeamen had taken from them ſeveral bows and arrows, and ſome ſtrings of plaited hair, and the charge being fully ſupported, he puniſhed each of the criminals with two dozen of laſhes. On the ſame day it was diſcovered, that Otaheite, like other countries in a certain period of ſociety, has its bards and its minſtrels. Mr. Banks, in his morning's walk, had met with a number of natives, who appeared, upon enquiry, to be travelling muſicians; and having learned where they were to be at night, all the Gentlemen of the Endeavour repaired to the place. The band conſiſted of two flutes and three drums; and the drummers accompanied the muſic with their voices. To the ſurprize of the Engliſh Gentlemen, they found that themſelves were generally the ſubject of the ſong, which was unpremeditated. Theſe minſtrels were continually going about from place to place; and they were rewarded, by the maſter of the houſe and the audience, with ſuch things as they wanted. The repeated thefts which were committed by the inhabitants of Otaheite brought our voyagers into frequent difficulties, and it required all the wiſdom of Lieutenant Cook to conduct himſelf in a proper manner. His ſentiments on the ſubject diſplayed the liberality of his mind. He thought it of conſequence, to put an end, if poſſible, to thieviſh practices at once, by doing ſomething that ſhould engage the natives in general to prevent them, from a regard to their common intereſt. Strict orders had been given by him, that they ſhould not be fired upon, even when they were detected in attempting to ſteal any of the Engliſh property. For this the Lieutenant had many reaſons. The common centinels were in no degree fit to be entruſted with a power of life and death; neither did Mr. Cook think that the thefts committed by the Otaheitans deſerved ſo ſevere a puniſhment. They were not born under the law of England; nor was it one of the conditions under which they claimed the benefits of civil ſociety, that their lives ſhould be forfeited, unleſs they abſtained from theft. As the Lieutenant was not willing that the natives ſhould be expoſed to fire-arms loaded with ſhot, neither did he approve of firing only with powder, which, if repeatedly found to be harmleſs, would at length be deſpiſed. At a time when a conſiderable robbery had been committed, an accident furniſhed him with what he hoped would be a happy expedient for preventing future attempts of the ſame kind. Above twenty of the ſailing canoes of the inhabitants came in with a ſupply of fiſh. Upon theſe Lieutenant Cook immediately ſeized, and, having brought them into the river behind the fort, gave notice, that unleſs the things which had been ſtolen were returned, the canoes ſhould be burnt. This menace, without deſigning to put it into execution, he ventured to publiſh, from a full conviction that, as reſtitution was thus made a common cauſe, the ſtolen goods would all of them ſpeedily be brought back. In this, however, he was miſtaken. An iron coal-rake, indeed, was reſtored; upon which great ſolicitation was made for the releaſe of the canoes; but he ſtill inſiſted on his original condition. When the next day came, he was much ſurprized to find that nothing farther had been returned; and, as the people were in the utmoſt diſtreſs for the fiſh, which would in a ſhort time be ſpoilt, he was reduced to the diſagreeable alternative, either of releaſing the canoes, contrary to what he had ſolemnly and publicly declared, or of detaining them, to the great damage of thoſe who were innocent. As a temporary expedient, he permitted the natives to take the fiſh, but ſtill detained the canoes. So far was this meaſure from being attended with advantage, that it was productive of new confuſion and injury; for as it was not eaſy at once to diſtinguiſh to what particular perſons the ſeveral lots of fiſh belonged, the canoes were plundered by thoſe who had no right to any part of their cargo. At length, moſt preſſing inſtances being ſtill made for the reſtoration of the canoes, and Lieutenant Cook having reaſon to believe, either that the things for which he detained them were not in the Iſland, or that thoſe who ſuffered by their detention were abſolutely incapable of prevailing upon the thieves to relinquiſh their booty, he determined, though not immediately, to comply with the ſolicitations of the natives. Our commander was, however, not a little mortified at the ill ſucceſs of his project (b). About the ſame time, another accident occurred, which, notwithſtanding all the caution of our principal voyagers, was very near embroiling them with the Indians. The Lieutenant having ſent a boat on ſhore to get ballaſt for the ſhip, the officer, not immediately finding ſtones ſuitable to the purpoſe, began to pull down ſome part of an incloſure in which the inhabitants had depoſited the bones of their dead. This action a number of the natives violently oppoſed; and a meſſenger came down to the tents, to acquaint the Gentlemen that no ſuch thing would be ſuffered. Mr. Banks directly repaired to the place, and ſoon put an amicable end to the conteſt, by ſending the boat's crew to the river, where a ſufficient quantity of ſtones might be gathered without a poſſibility of giving offence. Theſe Indians appeared to be much more alarmed at any injury which they apprehended to be done to the dead than to the living. This was the only meaſure in which they ventured to oppoſe the Engliſh: and the only inſult that was ever offered to any individual belonging to the Endeavour was upon a ſimilar occaſion (c). It ſhould undoubtedly be the concern of all voyagers, to abſtain from wantonly offending the religious prejudices of the people among whom they come. To extend the knowledge of navigation and the ſphere of diſcovery, objects which we need not ſay that Lieutenant Cook kept always ſteadily in view, he ſet out, in the pinnace, on the twenty-ſixth of June, accompanied by Mr. Banks, to make the circuit of the Iſland. The particulars of this circuit, in which the Lieutenant and his companions were once thrown into great alarm by the apprehended loſs of the boat, are fully related in Dr. Hawkeſworth's Narrative. By this expedition Mr. Cook obtained an acquaintance with the ſeveral diſtricts of Otaheite, the chiefs who preſided over them, and a variety of curious circumſtances reſpecting the manners and cuſtoms of the inhabitants. On the firſt of July, he got back to the fort at Matavai, having found the circuit of the iſland, including the two peninſulas of which it conſiſted, to be about thirty leagues (d). The circumnavigation of Otaheite was followed by an expedition of Mr. Banks's to trace the river up the valley from which it iſſues, and examine how far its banks were inhabited. During this excurſion, he diſcerned many traces of ſubterraneous fire. The ſtones, like thoſe of Madeira, diſplayed evident tokens of having been burnt; and the very clay upon the hills had the ſame appearance. Another valuable employment of Mr. Banks was the planting of a great quantity of the ſeeds of water-melons, oranges, lemons, limes, and other plants and trees which he had collected collected at Rio de Janeiro. For theſe he prepared ground on each ſide of the fort, and ſelected as many varieties of ſoil as could be found. He gave, alſo, liberally of theſe ſeeds to the natives, and planted many of them in the woods (e). Lieutenant Cook now began to prepare for his departure. On the ſeventh of July, the carpenters were employed in taking down the gates and palliſadoes of the fortification; and it was continued to be diſmantled during the two following days. Our Commander and the reſt of the Gentlemen were in hopes that they ſhould quit Otaheite without giving or receiving any farther offence; but in this reſpect they were unfortunately diſappointed. The Lieutenant had prudently overlooked a diſpute of a ſmaller nature between a couple of foreign ſeamen and ſome of the Indians, when he was immediately involved in a quarrel which he greatly regretted, and which yet it was totally out of his power to avoid. In the middle of the night, between the eighth and the ninth, Clement Webb and Samuel Gibſon, two of the marines, went privately from the fort. As they were not to be found in the morning, Mr. Cook was apprehenſive that they intended to ſtay behind; but, being unwilling to endanger the harmony and good-will which at preſent ſubſiſted between our people and the natives, he determined to wait a day for the chance of the men's return. As, to the great concern of the Lieutenant, the marines were not come back on the morning of the tenth, enquiry was made after them of the Indians, who acknowledged that each of them had taken a wife, and had reſolved to become inhabitants of the country. After ſome deliberation, two of the natives undertook to conduct ſuch perſons to the place of the deſerters' retreat as Mr. Cook ſhould think proper to ſend; and accordingly he diſpatched with the guides a petty officer, and the corporal of the marines. As it was of the utmoſt importance to recover the men, and to do it ſpeedily, it was intimated to ſeveral of the Chiefs who were in the fort with the women, among whom were Tubourai Tomaide, Tomio, and Oberea, that they would not be permitted to leave it till the fugitives were returned; and the Lieutenant had the pleaſure of obſerving that they received the intimation with very little indications of alarm, and with aſſurances that his people ſhould be ſecured and ſent back as ſoon as poſſible. While this tranſaction took place at the fort, our Commander ſent Mr. Hicks in the pinnace to fetch Tootahah on board the ſhip. Mr. Cook had reaſon to expect, if the Indian guides proved faithful, that the deſerters, and thoſe who went in ſearch of them, would return before the evening. Being diſappointed, his ſuſpicions increaſed, and thinking it not ſafe, when the night approached, to let the perſons whom he had detained as hoſtages to continue at the fort, he ordered Tubourai Tomaide, Oberea, and ſome others, to be taken on board the Endeavour; a circumſtance which excited ſo general an alarm, that ſeveral of them, and eſpecially the women, expreſſed their apprehenſions with great emotions and many tears. Webb, about nine o'clock, was brought back by ſome of the natives, who declared that Gibſon, and the petty officer and corporal, would not be reſtored till Tootahah ſhould be ſet at liberty. Lieutenant Cook now found that the tables were turned upon him; but, having proceeded too far to retreat, he immediately diſpatched Mr. Hicks in the long-boat, with a ſtrong party of men, to reſcue the priſoners. Tootahah was, at the ſame time, informed, that it behoved him to ſend ſome of his people with them, for the purpoſe of affording them effectual aſſiſtance. With this injunction he readily complied, and the priſoners were reſtored without the leaſt oppoſition. On the next day they were brought back to the ſhip, upon which the chiefs were releaſed from their confinement. Thus ended an affair which had given the Lieutenant a great deal of trouble and concern. It appears, however, that the meaſure which he purſued was the reſult of an abſolute neceſſity; ſince it was only by the ſeizure of the Chiefs that he could have recovered his men. Love was the ſeducer of the two marines. So ſtrong was the attachment which they had formed to a couple of girls, that it was their deſign to conceal themſelves till the ſhip had ſailed, and to take up their reſidence in the Iſland (f). Tupia was one of the natives who had ſo particularly devoted himſelf to the Engliſh, that he had ſcarcely ever been abſent from them during the whole of their ſtay at Otaheite. He had been Oberea's firſt Miniſter, while ſhe was in the height of her power; and he was alſo Chief Prieſt of the country. To his knowledge of the religious principles and ceremonies of the Indians, he added great experience in navigation, and a particular acquaintance with the number and ſituation of the neighbouring Iſlands. This man had often expreſſed a deſire to go with our Navigators, and when they were ready to depart, he came on board, with a boy about thirteen years of age, and intreated that he might be permitted to proceed with them on their voyage. To have ſuch a perſon in the Endeavour, was deſirable on many accounts; and, therefore, Lieutenant Cook gladly acceded to his propoſal. On the thirteenth of July, the Engliſh weighed anchor; and as ſoon as the ſhip was under ſail, the Indians on board took their leaves, and wept, with a decent and ſilent ſorrow, in which there was ſomething very ſtriking and tender. Tupia ſuſtained himſelf in this ſcene with a truly admirable firmneſs and reſolution; for, though he wept, the effort he made to conceal his tears concurred, with them, to do him honour. The ſtay of our voyagers at Otaheite was three months, the greater part of which time was ſpent in the moſt cordial friendſhip with the inhabitants, and a perpetual reciprocation of good offices. That any differences ſhould happen, was greatly regretted on the part of Lieutenant Cook and his friends, who were ſtudious to avoid them as much as poſſible. The principal cauſes of them reſulted from the peculiar ſituation and circumſtances of the Engliſh and the Indians, and eſpecially from the diſpoſition of the latter to theft. The effects of this diſpoſition could not always be ſubmitted to or prevented. It was happy, however, that there was only a ſingle inſtance in which the differences that aroſe were attended with any fatal conſequence; and by that accident the Lieutenant was inſtructed to take the moſt effectual meaſures for the future prevention of ſimilar events. He had nothing ſo much at heart, as that in no caſe the intercourſe of his people with the natives ſhould be productive of bloodſhed. The traffic with the inhabitants for proviſions and refreſhments, which was chiefly under the management of Mr. Banks, was carried on with as much order as in any well-regulated market in Europe. Axes, hatchets, ſpikes, large nails, looking-glaſſes, knives, and beads, were found to be the beſt articles to deal in; and for ſome of theſe, every thing which the inhabitants poſſeſſed might be procured. They were, indeed, fond of fine linen cloth, whether white or printed; but an axe, worth half a crown, would fetch more than a piece of cloth of the value of twenty ſhillings (g). It would deviate from the plan of this narrative, to enter into a minute account of the nature, productions, inhabitants, cuſtoms, and manners of the countries which were diſcovered or viſited by Mr. Cook; or to give a particular detail of every nautical, geographical, and aſtronomical obſervation. Theſe things muſt be ſought for in the voyages at large which have been publiſhed by authority. It will be ſufficient here to take notice, that our Commander did not depart from Otaheite without accumulating a ſtore of information and inſtruction for the enlargement of knowledge and the benefit of navigation.

(g) Hawkeſworth, ubi ſupra, p. 180—183.

While the Endeavour proceeded on her voyage under an eaſy ſail, Tupia informed Lieutenant Cook, that, at four of the neighbouring Iſlands, which he diſtinguiſhed by the names of HUAHEINE, ULIETEA, OTAHA, and BOLABOLA, hogs, fowls, and other refreſhments, which had latterly been ſparingly ſupplied at Otaheite, might be procured in great plenty. The Lieutenant, however, was deſirous of firſt examining an Iſland that lay to the northward, and was called TETHUROA. Accordingly, he came near it; but having found it to be only a ſmall low Iſland, and being told, at the ſame time, that it had no ſettled inhabitants, he determined to drop any farther examination of it, and to go in ſearch of Huaheine and Ulietea, which were deſcribed to be well peopled, and as large as Otaheite. On the fifteenth of July, the weather being hazy, with light breezes and calms ſucceeding each other, ſo that no land could be ſeen, and little way was made, Tupia afforded an amuſing proof that, in the exerciſe of his prieſtly character, he knew how to unite ſome degree of art with his ſuperſtition. He often prayed for a wind to his god Tane, and as often boaſted of his ſucceſs. This, indeed, he took a moſt effectual method to ſecure; for he never began his addreſs to his Divinity, till he perceived the breeze to be ſo near, that he knew it muſt approach the ſhip before his ſupplications could well be brought to a concluſion (b). The Endeavour, on the ſixteenth, being cloſe in with the north-weſt part of Huaheine, ſome canoes ſoon came off, in one of which was the King of the Iſland and his wife. At firſt the people ſeemed afraid; but, upon ſeeing Tupia, their apprehenſions were in part diſperſed, and, at length, in conſequence of frequent and earneſtly-repeated aſſurances of friendſhip, their Majeſties and ſeveral others ventured on board the ſhip. Their aſtoniſhment at every thing which was ſhewn them was very great; and yet their curioſity did not extend to any objects but what were particularly pointed out to their notice. When they had become more familiar, Mr. Cook was given to underſtand, that the King was called OREE, and that he propoſed, as a mark of amity, their making an exchange of their names. To this our Commander readily conſented; and, during the remainder of their being together, the Lieutenant was Oree, and his Majeſty was Cookee. In the afternoon, the Endeavour having come to an anchor, in a ſmall but excellent harbour on the Weſt ſide of the Iſland, the name of which was OWHARRE, Mr. Cook, accompanied by Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, Mr. Monkhouſe, Tupia, and the natives who had been on board ever ſince the morning, immediately went on ſhore. The Engliſh Gentlemen repeated their excurſions on the two following days; in the courſe of which they found that the people of Huaheine had a very near reſemblance to thoſe of Otaheite, in perſon, dreſs, language, and every other circumſtance; and that the productions of the country were exactly ſimilar. In trafficking with our people, the inhabitants of Huaheine diſplayed a caution and heſitation which rendered the dealing with them ſlow and tedious. On the nineteenth, therefore, the Engliſh were obliged to bring out ſome hatchets, which it was at firſt hoped there would be no occaſion for, in an Iſland that had never before been viſited by any European. Theſe procured three very large hogs; and as it was propoſed to ſail in the afternoon, Oree and ſeveral others came on board to take their leave. To the King Mr. Cook gave a ſmall pewter plate, on which was ſtamped this inſcription; "His Britannic Majeſty's ſhip Endeavour, Lieutenant James Cook Commander, "16th July 1769, Huaheine." Among other preſents made to Oree, were ſome medals or counters, reſembling the coin of England, and ſtruck in the year 1761; all of which, and particularly the plate, he promiſed carefully and violably to preſerve. This the Lieutenant thought to be as laſting a teſtimony as any he could well provide, that the

Engliſh had firſt diſcovered the Iſland; and having diſmiſſed his viſiters, who were highly pleaſed with the treatment they had met with, he ſailed for Ulietea, in a good harbour of which he anchored the next day [C]. Tupia had expreſſed his apprehenſion that our Navigators, if they landed upon the Iſland, would be expoſed to the attacks of the men of Bolabola, whom he repreſented as having lately conquered it, and of whom he entertained a very formidable idea. This, however, did not deter Mr. Cook, Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and the other Gentlemen, from going immediately on ſhore. Tupia, who was of the party, introduced them, by performing ſome ceremonies which he had practiſed before at Huaheine. After this, the Lieutenant hoiſted an Engliſh jack, and, in the name of his Britannic Majeſty, took poſſeſſion of Ulietea, and the three neighbouring Iſlands, Huaheine, Otaha, and Bolabola, all of which were in ſight. On the twenty-firſt, the Maſter was diſpatched in the long-boat, to examine the coaſt of the South part of the Iſland; and one of the Mates was ſent in the yawl, to ſound the harbour where the Endeavour lay [D]. At the ſame time, Lieutenant Cook went himſelf in the pinnace, to ſurvey that part of Ulietea which lies to the North. Mr. Banks, likewiſe, and the Gentlemen again went on ſhore, and employed themſelves in trading with the natives, and in examining the productions and curioſities of the country; but they ſaw nothing worthy of notice, excepting ſome human jaw-bones, which, like ſcalps among the Indians of North America, were trophies of war, and had probably been hung up, by the warriors of Bolabola, as a memorial of their conqueſt. The weather being hazy on the twenty-ſecond and twenty-third, with ſtrong gales, the Lieutenant did not venture to put to ſea; but, on the twenty-fourth, though the wind continued to be variable, he got under ſail, and plied to the northward within the reef, purpoſing to go out at a wider opening than that by which he had entered the harbour. However, in doing this, he was in imminent danger of ſtriking on the rock. The Maſter, who by his order had kept continually ſounding in the chains, ſuddenly called out, "two fathom." Though our Commander knew that the ſhip drew at leaſt fourteen feet, and conſequently that the ſhoal could not poſſibly be under her keel, he was, nevertheleſs juſtly, alarmed. Happily, the Maſter was either miſtaken, or the Endeavour went along the edge of a coral rock, many of which, in the neighbourhood of theſe Iſlands, are as ſteep as a wall (i). After a tedious navigation of ſome days, during which ſeveral ſmall Iſlands were ſeen, and the long-boat landed at Otaha, Lieutenant Cook returned to Ulietea, but to a different part of it from that which he had viſited before. In a harbour, belonging to the Weſt ſide of the Iſland, he came to an anchor on the firſt of Auguſt. This meaſure was neceſſary, in order to ſtop a leak which the ſhip had ſprung in the powder-room, and to take in more ballaſt, as ſhe was found too light to carry ſail upon a wind. The place where the Endeavour was ſecured was conveniently ſituated for the Lieutenant's purpoſe of obtaining ballaſt and water. Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and the Gentlemen who went on ſhore this day, ſpent their time much to their ſatisfaction. The reception they met was reſpectful in the higheſt degree, and the behaviour of the Indians to the Engliſh indicated a fear of them, mixed with a confidence that they had no propenſity to commit any kind of injury. In an intercourſe which the Lieutenant and his friends carried on, for ſeveral days, with the inhabitants of this part of the Iſland, it appeared that the terrors which Tupia had expreſſed of the Bolabola conquerors were wholly groundleſs. Even Opoony, the formidable King of Bolabola, treated our Navigators with reſpect. Being at Ulietea on the fifth of Auguſt, he ſent Mr. Cook a preſent of three hogs, ſome fowls, and ſeveral pieces of cloth, of uncommon length, together with a conſiderable quantity of plantains, cocoa-nuts, and other refreſhments. This preſent was accompanied with a meſſage, that, on the next day, he intended to pay our Commander a viſit. Accordingly, on the ſixth, the Lieutenant and the reſt of the Gentlemen all ſtaid at home, in expectation of this important viſiter; who did not, however, make his appearance, but ſent three very pretty girls as his meſſengers, to demand ſomething in return for his preſent. In the afternoon, as the great King would not go to the Engliſh, the Engliſh determined to go to the great King. From the account which had been given of him, as lord of the Bolabola men, who were the conquerors of Ulietea, and the terror of all the other Iſlands, Lieutenant Cook and his companions expected to ſee a young and vigorous Chief, with an intelligent countenance, and the marks of an enterprizing ſpirit; inſtead of which, they found a feeble wretch, withered and decrepit, half blind with age, and ſo ſluggiſh and ſtupid that he ſcarcely appeared to be poſſeſſed even of a common degree of underſtanding. Otaha being the principal place of Opoony's reſidence, he went with our Navigators to that Iſland on the next day; and they were in hopes of deriving ſome advantage from his influence, in obtaining ſuch proviſion as they wanted. In this reſpect, however, they were diſappointed; for, though they had preſented him with an axe, as an inducement to him to encourage his ſubjects in dealing with them, they were obliged to leave him without having procured a ſingle article. The time which the Carpenters had taken up in ſtopping the leak of the ſhip, having detained our Voyagers longer at Ulietea than they would otherwiſe have ſtaid, Lieutenant Cook determined to give up the deſign of going on ſhore at Bolabola, eſpecially as it appeared to be difficult of acceſs. The principal Iſlands, about which the Engliſh had now ſpent ſomewhat more than three weeks, were ſix in number; Ulietea, Otaha, Bolabola, Huaheine, Tubai, and Maurua [E]. As they lie contiguous to each other, the Lieutenant gave them the general appellation of SOCIETY ISLANDS; but did not think proper to diſtinguiſh them ſeparately by any other names than thoſe by which they were called by the natives. On the ninth of Auguſt, the leak of the veſſel having been ſtopped, and the freſh ſtock that had been purchaſed being brought on board, our Commander took the opportunity of a breeze which ſprang up at Eaſt, and ſailed out of the harbour. As he was ſailing away, Tupia ſtrongly urged him to fire a ſhot towards Bolabola; and, though that Iſland was at ſeven leagues diſtance, the Lieutenant obliged him by complying with his requeſt. Tupia's views probably were, to diſplay a mark of his reſentment, and to ſhew the power of his new allies (k). Our Voyagers purſued their courſe, without meeting with any event worthy of notice, till the thirteenth, when land was diſcovered bearing South-eaſt, and which Tupia informed them to be an Iſland called OHETEROA. On the next day, Mr. Cook ſent Mr. Gore, one of his Lieutenants, in the pinnace, with orders that he ſhould endeavour to get on ſhore, and learn from the natives whether there was anchorage in a bay then in ſight, and what land lay farther to the Southward. Mr. Gore was accompanied in this expedition by Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and Tupia, who uſed every method, but in vain, to conciliate the minds of the inhabitants, and to engage them in a friendly intercourſe. As, upon making the circuit of the Iſland, neither harbour nor anchorage could be found upon it, and, at the ſame time, the diſpoſition of the people was ſo hoſtile, that landing would be rendered impracticable without bloodſhed, Mr. Cook determined, with equal wiſdom and humanity, not to attempt it, having no motive that could juſtify the riſk of life [F]. From Tupia our Navigators learned that there were various Iſlands lying at different diſtances and in different directions from Oheteroa, between the South and the North-weſt; and that to the North-eaſt there was an Iſland called Manua, Bird Iſland. This he repreſented as being at the diſtance of three days ſail; but he ſeemed moſt deſirous that Lieutenant Cook ſhould proceed to the Weſtward, and deſcribed ſeveral Iſlands in that ſituation, which he ſaid he had viſited. It appeared, from his deſcription of them, that theſe were probably Boſcawen and Keppel's Iſlands, which were diſcovered by Captain Wallis. The fartheſt Iſland that Tupia knew of to the Southward, lay, he ſaid, at the diſtance of about two days ſail from Oheteroa, and was called MOUTOU. But he added, that his father had informed him of there being Iſlands ſtill more to the South. Upon the whole, our Commander determined to ſtand Southward in ſearch of a Continent, and to loſe no time in attempting to diſcover any other Iſlands than ſuch as he might happen to fall in with during his courſe (l).

On the fifteenth of Auguſt, our Voyagers ſailed from Oheteroa; and on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month was celebrated the anniverſary of their departure from England. The comet was ſeen on the thirtieth. It was a little above the horizon, in the eaſtern part of the heavens, at one in the morning; and at about half an hour after four it paſſed the meridian, and its tail ſubtended an angle of forty-two degrees (m). Tupia, who was among others that obſerved the comet, inſtantly cried out, that as ſoon as it ſhould be ſeen by the people of Bolabola, they would attack the inhabitants of Ulietea, who would be obliged to endeavour to preſerve their lives by fleeing with the utmoſt precipitation to the mountains. On the ſixth of October land was diſcovered, which appeared to be large. When, on the next day, it was more diſtinctly viſible, it aſſumed a ſtill larger appearance, and diſplayed four or five ranges of hills, riſing one over the other, above all which was a chain of mountains of an enormous height. This land naturally became the ſubject of much eager converſation; and the general opinion of the Gentlemen on board the Endeavour was, that they had found the Terra auſtralis incognita. In fact, it was a part of New Zealand, where the firſt adventures the Engliſh met with were very unpleaſant, on account of the hoſtile diſpoſition of the inhabitants. Lieutenant Cook, having anchored, on the eighth, in a bay, at the entrance of a ſmall river, went on ſhore in the evening, with the pinnace and yawl, accompanied by Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander, and attended with a party of men. Being desirous of conversing with some natives whom he had observed on the opposite side of the river from that on which he had landed, he ordered the yawl in, to carry himself and his companions over, and left the pinnace at the entrance. When they came near the place where the Indians were assembled, the latter all ran away; and the Gentlemen, having left four boys to take care of the yawl, walked up to several huts which were about two or three hundred yards from the water-side. They had not gone very far, when four men, armed with long lances, rushed out of the woods, and running up to attack the boat would certainly have cut her off, if they had not been discovered by the people in the pinnace, who called to the boys to drop down the stream. The boys instantly obeyed; but being closely pursued by the natives, the cock-swain of the pinnace, to whom the charge of the boat was committed, fired a musquet over their heads. At this they stopped and looked around them; but their alarm speedily subsiding, they brandished their lances in a threatening manner, and in a few minutes renewed the pursuit. The firing of a second musquet over their heads did not draw from them any kind of notice. At last, one of them having lifted up his spear to dart it at the boat, another piece was fired, by which he was shot dead. At the fall of their associate, the three remaining Indians stood for a while motionless, and seemed petrified with astonishment. No sooner had they recovered themselves, than they went back, dragging after them the dead body, which, however, they were obliged to leave, that it might not retard their flight. Lieutenant Cook and his friends, who had straggled to a little distance from each other, were drawn together upon the report of the first musquet, and returned speedily to the boat, in which having crossed the river, they soon beheld the Indian lying dead upon the ground. After their return to the ship, they could hear the people on shore talking with great earnestness, and in a very loud tone of voice (n). Notwithstanding this disaster, the Lieutenant, being desirous of establishing an intercourse with the natives, ordered, on the following day, three boats to be manned with seamen and marines, and proceeded towards the shore, accompanied by Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, the other Gentlemen, and Tupia. About fifty of the inhabitants seemed to wait for their landing, having seated themselves upon the ground, on the opposite side of the river. This being regarded as a sign of fear, Mr. Cook, with only Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and Tupia, advanced towards them; but they had not gone many paces before all the Indians started up, and every man produced either a long pike, or a small weapon of green talk. Though Tupia called to them in the language of Otaheite, they only answered by flourishing their weapons, and making signs for the Gentlemen to depart. On a musquet's being fired wide of them, they desisted from their threats, and our Commander, who had prudently retreated till the marines could be landed, again advanced towards them, with Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and Tupia, to whom were now added Mr. Green and Mr. Monkhouse. Tupia was a second time directed to speak to them, and it was perceived with great pleasure that he was perfectly understood, his and their language being the same, excepting only in a diversity of dialect. He informed them that our Voyagers only wanted provision and water, in exchange for iron, the properties of which he explained as far as he was able. Though the natives seemed willing to trade, Tupia was sensible, during the course of his conversation with them, that their intentions were unfriendly; and of this he repeatedly warned the English Gentlemen. At length, twenty or thirty of the Indians were induced to cross the river, upon which presents were made them of iron and beads. On these they appeared to set little value, and particularly on the iron, not having the least conception of its use, so that nothing was obtained in return excepting a few feathers. Their arms, indeed, they offered to exchange for those of our Voyagers, and this being refused, they made various attempts to snatch them out of their hands. Tupia was now instructed to acquaint the Indians, that our Gentlemen would be obliged to kill them, if they proceeded to any farther violence; notwithstanding which, one of them, while Mr. Green happened to turn about, seized his hanger, and retired to a little distance, with a shout of exultation. The others, at the same time, began to be extremely insolent, and more of the natives were seen coming to join them from the opposite side of the river. It being, therefore, necessary to repress them, Mr. Banks fired, with small shot, at the distance of about fifteen yards, upon the man who had taken the hanger. Though he was struck, he did not return the hanger, but continued to wave it round his head, while he slowly made his retreat. Mr. Monkhouse then fired at him with ball, and he instantly dropped. So far, however, were the Indians from being sufficiently terrified, that the main body of them, who, upon the first discharge, had retired to a rock in the middle of the river, began to return, and it was with no small difficulty that Mr. Monkhouse secured the hanger. The whole number of them continuing to advance, three of the English party discharged their pieces at them, loaded only with small shot, upon which they swam back for the shore, and it appeared, upon their landing, that two or three of them were wounded. While they retired slowly up the country, Lieutenant Cook and his companions reimbarked in their boats. As the Lieutenant had unhappily experienced that nothing, at this place, could be done with these people, and found that the water in the river was ſalt, he proceeded in the boats, round the head of the bay, in ſearch of freſh water. Beſide this, he had formed a deſign of ſurprizing ſome of the natives, and taking them on board, that, by kind treatment and preſents, he might obtain their friendſhip, and render them the inſtruments of eſtabliſhing for him an amicable intercourſe with their countrymen. While, upon account of a dangerous ſurf which every where beat upon the ſhore, the boats were prevented from landing, our Commander ſaw two canoes coming in from the ſea, one under ſail, and the other worked with paddles. This he thought to be a favourable opportunity for executing his purpoſe. Accordingly, the boats were diſpoſed in ſuch a manner as appeared moſt likely to be ſucceſsful in intercepting the canoes. Notwithſtanding this, the Indians, in the canoe which was paddled, exerted themſelves with ſo much vigour, at the firſt apprehenſion of danger, that they eſcaped to the neareſt land. The other canoe ſailed on without diſcerning the Engliſh, till ſhe was in the midſt of them; but no ſooner had ſhe diſcovered them than the people on board ſtruck their ſail, and plied their paddles ſo briſkly as to outrun the boat by which they were purſued. Being within hearing, Tupia called to them to come alongſide, with aſſurances that they ſhould not in any degree be hurt or injured. They truſted, however, more to their own paddles, than to Tupia's promiſes, and continued to flee from our Navigators with all their power. Mr. Cook, as the leaſt exceptionable expedient of accompliſhing his deſign, ordered a muſquet to be fired over their heads. This, he hoped, would either make them ſurrender or leap into the water, but it produced a contrary effect. The Indians, who were ſeven in number, immediately formed a reſolution not to fly, but to fight. When, therefore, the boat came up, they began the attack with their paddles, and with ſtones and other offenſive weapons; and they carried it on with ſo much vigour and violence, that the Engliſh thought themſelves obliged to fire upon them in their own defence; the conſequence of which was, that four were unhappily killed. The other three, who were boys, the eldeſt about nineteen, and the youngeſt about eleven, inſtantly leaped into the water, and endeavoured to make their eſcape; but being with ſome difficulty overpowered by our people, they were brought into the boat (o). It is impoſſible to reflect upon this part of Lieutenant Cook's conduct with any degree of ſatisfaction. He, himſelf, upon a calm review, did not approve of it; and he was ſenſible that it would be cenſured by the feelings of every reader of humanity. It is probable that his mind was ſo far irritated by the diſagreeable preceding events of this unfortunate day, and by the unexpected violence of the Indians in the canoe, as to loſe ſomewhat of that ſelf-poſſeſſion by which his character in general was eminently diſtinguiſhed. Candour, however, requires that I ſhould relate what he hath offered in extenuation, not in defence, of the tranſaction; and this ſhall be done in his own words, as they are given us by Dr. Hawkeſworth. "Theſe "people certainly did not deſerve death for not chooſing to confide in my promiſes, or "not conſenting to come on board my boat, even if they had apprehended no danger. "But the nature of my ſervice required me to obtain a knowledge of their country, "which I could no otherwiſe effect than by forcing my way into it in a hoſtile manner, "or gaining admiſſion through the confidence and good-will of the people. I had "already tried the power of preſents without effect; and I was now prompted, by my "deſire to avoid farther hoſtilities, to get ſome of them on board, as the only method left of "convincing them that we intended them no harm, and had it in our power to contribute "to their gratification and convenience. Thus far my intentions certainly were not "criminal; and though in the conteſt, which I had not the leaſt reaſon to expect, our "victory might have been complete without ſo great an expence of life; yet in ſuch ſitu-"ations, when the command to fire has been given, no man can reſtrain its exceſs, or "preſcribe its effect (p)."

Our Voyagers were ſucceſsful in conciliating the minds of the three boys; to which Tupia particularly contributed. When their fears were allayed, and their chearfulneſs returned, they ſang a ſong with a degree of taſte that ſurprized the Engliſh Gentlemen. The tune, like thoſe of our pſalms, was ſolemn and ſlow, containing many notes and ſemitones. Some farther attempts were made to eſtabliſh an intercourſe with the natives, and Mr. Cook and his friends, on the tenth, went on ſhore for this purpoſe; but being unſucceſsful in their endeavours, they reſolved to re-imbark, leſt their ſtay ſhould embroil them in another quarrel, and coſt more of the Indians their lives. On the next day, the Lieutenant weighed anchor, and ſtood away from this unfortunate and inhoſpitable place. As it had not afforded a ſingle article that was wanted, excepting wood, he gave it the name of Poverty Bay. By the inhabitants it is called Taoneroa, or Long Sand (q). I ſhall not regularly purſue the courſe of our Commander round New Zealand. In this courſe he ſpent nearly ſix months, and made large additions to the knowledge of navigation and geography. By making almoſt the whole circuit of New Zealand, he aſcertained it to be two Iſlands, with a ſtrength of evidence which no prejudice could gainſay or reſiſt. He obtained, likewiſe, a full acquaintance with the inhabitants of the different parts of the country, with regard to whom it was clearly proved, that they are eaters of human fleſh. Referring to the voyage at large for a more particular diſplay of a great number of circumſtances, I ſhall only ſelect a few things which mark Mr. Cook's perſonal conduct, and relate to his intercourſe with the natives. The good uſage the three boys had met with, and the friendly and generous manner in which they were diſmiſſed to their own homes, had ſome effect in ſoftening the diſpoſitions of the neighbouring Indians. Several of them, who had come on board while the ſhip lay becalmed in the afternoon, manifeſted every ſign of friendſhip, and cordially invited the Engliſh to go back to their old bay, or to a cove which was not quite ſo far off. But Lieutenant Cook choſe rather to proſecute his diſcoveries, having reaſon to hope that he ſhould find a better harbour than any he had yet ſeen. While the ſhip was hauling round to the South end of a ſmall Iſland, which the Lieutenant had named Portland (r), from its very great reſemblance to Portland in the Britiſh Channel, ſhe ſuddenly fell into ſhoal water and broken ground. The ſoundings were never twice the ſame, jumping at once from ſeven fathom to eleven. However, they were always ſeven fathom or more; and in a ſhort time the Endeavour got clear of danger, and again ſailed in deep water. While the ſhip was in apparent diſtreſs, the inhabitants of the Iſland, who, in vaſt numbers, ſat on its white cliffs, and could not avoid perceiving ſome appearance of confuſion on board, and ſome irregularity in the working of the veſſel, were deſirous of taking advantage of her critical ſituation. Accordingly, five canoes, full of men, and well armed, were put off with the utmoſt expedition; and they came ſo near, and ſhewed ſo hoſtile a diſpoſition, by ſhouting, brandiſhing their lances, and uſing threatening geſtures, that the Lieutenant was in pain for his ſmall boat, which was ſtill employed in ſounding. By a muſquet, which he ordered to be fired over them, they were rather provoked than intimidated. The firing of a four-pounder, loaded with grape-ſhot, though purpoſely diſcharged wide of them, produced a better effect. Upon the report of the piece, the Indians all roſe up and ſhouted; but, inſtead of continuing the chace, they collected themſelves together, and, after a ſhort conſultation, went quietly away. On the fourteenth of October, Lieutenant Cook having hoiſted out his pinnace and long-boat to ſearch for water, juſt as they were about to ſet off, ſeveral boats, full of the New Zealand people, were ſeen coming from the ſhore. After ſome time, five of theſe boats, having on board between eighty and ninety men, made towards the ſhip; and four more followed at no great diſtance, as if to ſuſtain the attack. When the firſt five had gotten within about a hundred yards of the Endeavour, they began to ſing their war ſong, and brandiſhing their pikes, prepared for an engagement. As the Lieutenant was extremely deſirous of avoiding the unhappy neceſſity of uſing fire-arms againſt the natives, Tupia was ordered to acquaint them, that our Voyagers had weapons which, like thunder, would deſtroy them in a moment; that they would immediately convince them of their power by directing their effect ſo that they ſhould not be hurt; but that if they perſiſted in any hoſtile attempt, they would be expoſed to the direct attack of theſe formidable weapons. A four-pounder, loaded with grape-ſhot, was then fired wide of them; and this expedient was fortunately attended with ſucceſs. The report, the flaſh, and, above all, the ſhot, which ſpread very far in the water, terrified the Indians to ſuch a degree, that they began to paddle away with all their might. At the inſtance, however, of Tupia, the people of one of the boats were induced to lay aſide their arms, and to come under the ſtern of the Endeavour; in conſequence of which they received a variety of preſents. On the next day a circumſtance occurred, which ſhewed how ready one of the inhabitants of New Zealand was to take an advantage of our Navigators. In a large armed canoe, which came boldly alongſide of the ſhip, was a man who had a black ſkin thrown over him, ſomewhat like that of a bear. Mr. Cook being deſirous of knowing to what animal it originally belonged, offered the Indian for it a piece of red baize. With this bargain he ſeemed to be greatly pleaſed, immediately pulling off the ſkin, and holding it up in the boat. He would not, however, part with it till he had the cloth in his poſſeſſion; and as there could be no transfer of property, if equal caution ſhould be exerciſed on both ſides, the Lieutenant ordered the baize to be delivered into his hands. Upon this, inſtead of ſending up the ſkin, he began, with amazing coolneſs, to pack up both that and the cloth, which he had received as the purchaſe of it, in a baſket: nor did he pay the leaſt regard to Mr. Cook's demand or remonſtrances, but ſoon after put off from the Engliſh veſſel. Our Commander was too generous to revenge this inſult by any act of ſeverity. During the courſe of a traffic which was carrying on for ſome fiſh, little Tayeto, Tupia's boy, was placed among others over the ſhip's ſide, to hand up what was purchaſed. While he was thus employed, one of the New Zealanders, watching his opportunity, ſuddenly ſeized him, and dragged him into a canoe. Two of the natives then held him down in the fore part of it, and the others, with great activity, paddled her off with all poſſible celerity. An action ſo violent rendered it indiſpenſably neceſſary that the marines, who were in arms upon the deck, ſhould be ordered to fire. Though the ſhot was directed to that part of the canoe which was fartheſt from the boy, and ſomewhat wide of her, it being thought preferable rather to miſs the rowers than to run the hazard of hurting Tayeto, it happened that one man dropped. This occaſioned the Indians to quit their hold of the youth, who inſtantly leaped into the water, and ſwam towards the ſhip. In the mean while, the largeſt of the canoes pulled round and followed him; and till ſome muſquets and a great gun were fired at her, did not deſiſt from the purſuit. The ſhip being brought to, a boat was lowered, and the poor boy was taken

taken up unhurt. Some of the Gentlemen, who with their glaſſes traced the canoes to ſhore, agreed in aſſerting, that they ſaw three men carried up the beach, who appeared to be either dead or wholly diſabled by their wounds [G]. While, on the eighteenth, the Endeavour lay a-breaſt of a peninſula within Portland Iſland, called TERAKAKO, two of the natives, who were judged to be Chiefs, placed an extraordinary degree of confidence in Mr. Cook. They were ſo well pleaſed with the kindneſs which had been ſhewn them in a viſit to the ſhip, that they determined not to go on ſhore till the next morning. This was a circumſtance by no means agreeable to the Lieutenant, and he remonſtrated againſt it; but as they perſiſted in their reſolution, he agreed to comply with it, provided their ſervants alſo were taken on board, and their canoe hoiſted into the ſhip. The countenance of one of theſe two Chiefs was the moſt open and ingenuous that our Commander had ever ſeen, ſo that he ſoon gave up every ſuſpicion of his entertaining any ſiniſter deſign. When the gueſts were put on ſhore the next morning, they expreſſed ſome ſurprize at ſeeing themſelves ſo far from their habitations. On Monday the twenty-third, while the ſhip was in Tegadoo Bay, Lieutenant Cook went on ſhore to examine the watering-place, and found every thing agreeable to his wiſhes. The boat landed in the cove, without the leaſt ſurf; the water was excellent, and conveniently ſituated; there was plenty of wood cloſe to the high water mark; and the diſpoſition of the people was as favourable in all reſpects as could be deſired [H]. Early the next morning, our Commander ſent Lieutenant Gore to ſuperintend the cutting of wood and filling of water, with a ſufficient number of men for both purpoſes, and all the marines as a guard. Soon after, he went on ſhore himſelf, and continued there during the whole day. Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander, who had landed on the ſame day, found in their walks ſeveral things worthy of notice. As they were advancing in one of the valleys, the hills on each ſide of which were very ſteep, they were ſuddenly ſtruck with the ſight of an extraordinary natural curioſity. "It was a rock, perforated through its whole ſubſtance, ſo as to form a rude but ſtupen- "dous arch or cavern, opening directly to the ſea. This aperture was ſeventy-five feet "long, twenty-ſeven broad, and five and forty feet high, commanding a view of the bay "and the hills on the other ſide, which were ſeen through it; and, opening at once upon "the view, produced an effect far ſuperior to any of the contrivances of art (s)." When, on the twenty-eighth, the Gentlemen of the Endeavour went on ſhore upon an Iſland which lies to the left hand of the entrance of Tolaga Bay, they ſaw there the largeſt canoe they had yet met with; her length being ſixty-eight feet and a half, her breadth five feet, and her height three feet ſix inches. In the ſame Iſland was a larger houſe than any they had hitherto ſeen; but it was in an unfiniſhed ſtate, and full of chips [I]. While the ſhip was in Hicks's Bay, the inhabitants of the adjoining coaſt were found to be very hoſtile. This gave much uneaſineſs to our Navigators, and was, indeed, contrary to their expectation; for they had hoped, that the report of their power and clemency had ſpread to a greater extent. At day-break, on the firſt of November, they counted no leſs than five and forty canoes that were coming from the ſhore towards the Endeavour; and theſe were followed by ſeveral more from another place. Some of the Indians traded fairly; but others of them took what was handed down to them without making any return, and added deriſion to fraud. The inſolence of one of them was very remarkable. Some linen hanging over the ſhip's ſide to dry, this man, without any ceremony, untied it, and put it up in his bundle. Being immediately called to, and required to return it, inſtead of doing ſo, he let his canoe drop a-ſtern, and laughed at the Engliſh. A muſquet which was fired over his head did not put a ſtop to his mirth. From a ſecond muſquet, which was loaded with ſmall ſhot, he ſhrunk a little, when the ſhot ſtruck him upon his back; but he regarded it no more than one of our men would have done the ſtroke of a rattan, and continued with great compoſure to pack up the linen which he had ſtolen. All the canoes now dropped a-ſtern, and ſet up their ſong of defiance, which laſted till they were at about four hundred yards diſtance from the ſhip. As they did not appear to have a deſign of attacking our Voyagers, Lieutenant Cook was unwilling to do them any hurt; and yet he thought that their going off in a bravado might have a bad effect when it ſhould be reported on ſhore. To convince them, therefore, that they were ſtill in his power, though far beyond the reach of any miſſile weapon with which they were acquainted, he

[G] Who appeared to be either dead or wholly diſabled by their wounds.] To the cape off which this unhappy tranſaction happened, Mr. Cook gave the name of CAPE KIDNAPPERS. It lies in latitude 39° 43′, and longitude 182° 24′ weſt. Its diſtance from the Iſle of Portland is thirteen leagues ſouth weſt and weſt. Between them is the bay of which it is the ſouth point, and which, in honour of Sir Edward Hawke, the Lieutenant called Hawke's Bay (4).

[H] And the diſpoſition of the people was as favourable in all reſpects as could be deſired.] Mr. Cook, with Mr. Green, having taken ſeveral obſervations of the ſun and moon, the mean reſult of them gave 180° 47′ weſt longitude; but, as all the obſervations made before exceeded theſe, the Lieutenant laid down the coaſt from the mean of the whole. At noon, this day, he took the ſun's meridian altitude with an aſtronomical quadrant which was ſet up at the watering-place, and found the latitude to be 38° 22′ 24″.

[I] But it was in an unfiniſhed ſtate, and full of chips.] Among other trifling curioſities, which Dr. Solander purchaſed of the Indians, was a boy's top, ſhaped exactly like thoſe which children play with in England; and the natives ſhewed, by ſigns, that it was to be whipped in order to make it ſpin (5).

ordered a four-pounder to be fired in ſuch a manner as to paſs near them. As the ſhot happened to ſtrike the water, and to riſe ſeveral times at a great diſtance beyond the canoes, the Indians were ſo much terrified, that, without once looking behind them, they paddled away as faſt as they were able. In ſtanding weſtward from a ſmall Iſland called Mowtohora, the Endeavour ſuddenly ſhoaled her water from ſeventeen to ten fathom. As the Lieutenant knew that ſhe was not far from ſome ſmall iſlands and rocks which had been ſeen before it was dark, and which he had intended to have paſſed that evening, he thought it more prudent to tack, and to ſpend the night under Mowtohora, where he was certain that there was no danger. It was happy for himſelf and for all our Voyagers that he formed this reſolution. In the morning they diſcovered, a-head of them, ſeveral rocks, ſome of which were level with the ſurface of the water, and ſome below it; and the ſtriking againſt which could not in the hour of darkneſs have been avoided. In paſſing between theſe rocks and the main, the ſhip had only from ten to ſeven fathom water (t). While Mr. Cook was near an Iſland which he called the MAYOR, the inhabitants of the neighbouring coaſt diſplayed many inſtances of hoſtility, and, in their traffic with our Navigators, committed various acts of fraud and robbery. As the Lieutenant intended to continue in the place five or ſix days, in order to make an obſervation of the tranſit of Mercury, it was abſolutely neceſſary, for the prevention of future miſchief, to convince theſe people that the Engliſh were not to be ill-treated with impunity. Accordingly, ſome ſmall ſhot were fired at a thief of uncommon inſolence, and a muſquet-ball was diſcharged through the bottom of his boat. Upon this it was paddled to about a hundred yards diſtance; and, to the ſurprize of Mr. Cook and his friends, the Indians in the other canoes took not the leaſt notice of their wounded companion, though he bled very much, but returned to the ſhip, and continued to trade with the moſt perfect indifference and unconcern. For a conſiderable time they dealt fairly. At laſt, however, one of them thought fit to move off with two different pieces of cloth which had been given for the ſame weapon. When he had gotten to ſuch a diſtance that he thought himſelf ſecure of his prizes, a muſquet was fired after him, which fortunately ſtruck the boat juſt at the water's edge, and made two holes in her ſide. This excited ſuch an alarm, that not only the people who were ſhot at, but all the reſt of the canoes, made off with the utmoſt expedition. As the laſt proof of ſuperiority, our Commander ordered a round ſhot to be fired over them, and not a boat ſtopped till they got to land. After an early breakfaſt on the ninth of November, Lieutenant Cook went on ſhore, with Mr. Green, and proper inſtruments, to obſerve the tranſit of Mercury. Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander were of the party. The weather had for ſome time been very thick, with much rain; but this day proved ſo favourable, that not a cloud intervened during the whole tranſit. The obſervation of the ingreſs was made by Mr. Green alone, Mr. Cook being employed in taking the ſun's altitude to aſcertain the time [K]. While the Gentlemen were thus engaged on ſhore, they were alarmed by the firing of a great gun from the ſhip; and on their return received the following account of the tranſaction from Mr. Gore, the ſecond Lieutenant, who had been left commanding officer on board. During the carrying on of a trade with ſome ſmall canoes, two very large ones came up, full of men. In one of the canoes were forty-ſeven perſons, all of whom were armed with pikes, ſtones, and darts, and aſſumed the appearance of a hoſtile intention. However, after a little time, they began to traffic, ſome of them offering their arms, and one of them a ſquare piece of cloth, which makes a part of their dreſs, called a Haahow. Mr. Gore having agreed for it, ſent down the price, which was a piece of Britiſh cloth, and expected his purchaſe. But as ſoon as the Indian had gotten Mr. Gore's cloth in his poſſeſſion, he refuſed to part with his own, and put off his canoe. Upon being threatened for his fraud, he and his companions began to ſing their war ſong in defiance, and ſhook their paddles. Though their inſolence did not proceed to an attack, and only defied Mr. Gore to take any remedy in his power, he was ſo provoked, that he levelled a muſquet loaded with ball at the offender, while he was holding the cloth in his hand, and ſhot him dead. When the Indian fell, all the canoes put off to ſome diſtance, but continued to keep together in ſuch a manner that it was apprehended they might ſtill meditate an attack. To ſecure, therefore, a ſafe paſſage for the boat of the Endeavour, which was wanted on ſhore, a round ſhot was fired with ſo much effect over their heads, as to make them all flee with the utmoſt precipitation. It was matter of regret to Lieutenant Cook that Mr. Gore had not, in the caſe of the offending Indian, tried the experiment of a few ſmall ſhot, which had been ſucceſsful in former inſtances of robbery.

[K] Mr. Cook being employed in taking the ſun's altitude to aſcertain the time.] The tranſit came on at 7h. 20′ 58″ apparent time. According to Mr. Green's obſervations, the internal contact was at 12h. 8′ 58″, the external at 12h. 9′ 55″ P. M. According to Mr. Cook's, the internal contact was at 12h. 8′ 54″, and the external 12h. 9′ 48″. The latitude of the place of obſervation was 36° 48′ 5½″. The latitude obſerved at noon was 36° 48′ 28″. The mean of this and of an obſervation made the day before gave 36° 48′ 28″ ſouth, the latitude of the place of obſervation. The variation of the compaſs was 11° 9′ eaſt.

On the preceding day, the Lieutenant had obſerved the ſun's meridional zenith diſtance by an aſtronomical quadrant, which gave the latitude 36° 47′ 43″ within the ſouth entrance of Mercury Bay.

On Friday the tenth, our Commander, accompanied by Mr. Banks and the other Gentlemen, went with two boats, to examine a large river that empties itſelf into the head of Mercury Bay. As the ſituation they were now in abounded with conveniencies, the Lieutenant has taken care to point them out for the benefit of future navigators. If any occaſion ſhould ever render it neceſſary for a ſhip either to winter here, or to ſtay for a conſiderable length of time, tents might be built on a high point or peninſula in this place, upon ground ſufficiently ſpacious for the purpoſe; and they might eaſily be made impregnable to the whole force of the country. Indeed, the moſt ſkilful engineer in Europe could not chooſe a ſituation better adapted to enable a ſmall number to defend themſelves againſt a greater. Among other accommodations which the Endeavour's company met with in Mercury Bay, they derived an agreeable refreſhment from ſome oyſter beds, which they had fortunately diſcovered. The oyſters, which were as good as ever came from Colcheſter, and about the ſame ſize, were ſo plentiful, that not the boat only, but the ſhip itſelf, might have been loaded in one tide (t). On Wedneſday, the fifteenth, Lieutenant Cook ſailed out of MERCURY BAY. This name had been given to it on account of the obſervation which had there been made of the tranſit of that planet over the ſun (u). The river where oyſters had been ſo plentifully found, he called OYSTER RIVER. There is another river, at the head of the bay, which is the beſt and ſafeſt place for a ſhip that wants to ſtay any length of time. From the number of mangroves about it, the Lieutenant named it MANGROVE RIVER. In ſeveral parts of Mercury Bay, our Voyagers ſaw, thrown upon the ſhore, great quantities of iron ſand, which is brought down by every little rivulet of freſh water that finds its way from the country. This is a demonſtration that there is ore of that metal not far inland; and yet none of the inhabitants of New Zealand who had yet been ſeen knew the uſe of iron, or ſet upon it the leaſt degree of value. They had all of them preferred the moſt worthleſs and uſeleſs trifle, not only to a nail, but to any tool of that metal. Before the Endeavour left the bay, the ſhip's name and that of the Commander were cut upon one of the trees near the watering place, together with the date of the year and month when our Navigators were there. Beſides this, Mr. Cook, after diſplaying the Engliſh colours, took formal poſſeſſion of the place in the name of his Britannic Majeſty, King George the Third (w). In the range from Mercury Bay, ſeveral canoes, on the eighteenth, put off from different places, and advanced towards the Endeavour. When two of them, in which there might be about ſixty men, came within reach of the human voice, the Indians ſang their war ſong; but ſeeing that little notice was taken of them, they threw a few ſtones at the Engliſh, and then rowed off towards the ſhore. In a ſhort time, however, they returned, as if with a fixed reſolution to provoke our Voyagers to a battle, animating themſelves by their ſong as they had done before. Tupia, without any directions from the Gentlemen of the Endeavour, began to expoſtulate with the natives, and told them that our people had weapons which could deſtroy them in a moment. Their anſwer to this expoſtulation was, in their own language, "come on ſhore, and we will kill you all." "Well, replied Tupia, but why ſhould you "moleſt us while we are at ſea? As we do not wiſh to fight, we ſhall not accept your "challenge to come on ſhore; and here there is no pretence for a quarrel, the ſea being "no more your property than the ſhip." This eloquence, which greatly ſurprized Lieutenant Cook and his friends, as they had not ſuggeſted to Tupia any of the arguments he made uſe of, produced no effect upon the minds of the Indians, who ſoon renewed their attack. The oratory of a muſquet, which was fired through one of their boats, quelled their courage, and ſent them inſtantly away. While our Commander was in the Bay of Iſlands, he had a favourable opportunity of examining the interior part of the country and its produce. At day break, therefore, on the twentieth of the month, he ſet out in the pinnace and long-boat, accompanied by Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and Tupia, and found the inlet at which they entered end in a river, about nine miles above the ſhip. Up this river, to which was given the name of the Thames, they proceeded till near noon, when they were fourteen miles within its entrance. As the Gentlemen then found the face of the country to continue nearly the ſame, without any alteration in the courſe of the ſtream, and had no hope of tracing it to its ſource, they landed on the Weſt ſide, to take a view of the lofty trees which every where adorned its banks. The trees were of a kind which they had ſeen before, both in Poverty Bay and Hawke's Bay, though only at a diſtance. They had not walked a hundred yards into the woods, when they met with one of the trees, which, at the height of ſix feet above the ground, was nineteen feet eight inches in the girt. Lieutenant Cook, having a quadrant with him, meaſured its height from the root to the firſt branch, and found it to be eighty-nine feet. It was as ſtrait as an arrow, and tapered but very little in proportion to its height; ſo that, in the Lieutenant's judgment, there muſt have been three hundred and fifty-ſix feet of ſolid timber in it, excluſive of the branches. As the party advanced, they ſaw many other trees, which were ſtill larger. A young one they cut down, the wood of which was heavy and ſolid, not fit for maſts, but ſuch as would make the fineſt plank in the world. The Carpenter of the ſhip, who was with the party, ſaid that the timber reſembled that of the pitch-pine, which is lightened by tapping. If it ſhould appear that ſome ſuch method would be ſuc-ceſsful in lightening theſe trees, they would then furniſh maſts ſuperior to thoſe of any country in Europe. As the wood was ſwampy, the Gentlemen could not range far; but they found many ſtout trees of other kinds, with which they were totally unacquainted, and ſpecimens of which they brought away. On the twenty-ſecond, another inſtance occurred, in which the commanding officer left on board did not know how to exerciſe his power with the good ſenſe and moderation of Mr. Cook. While ſome of the natives were in the ſhip below with Mr. Banks, a young man who was upon the deck ſtole a half-minute glaſs, and was detected juſt as he was carrying it off. Mr. Hicks, in his indignation againſt the offender, was pleaſed to order that he ſhould be puniſhed, by giving him twelve laſhes with a cat-o'nine tails. When the other Indians who were on board ſaw him ſeized for this purpoſe, they attempted to reſcue him; and being reſiſted, they called for their arms, which were handed from the canoes. At the ſame time, the people of one of the canoes attempted to come up the ſide of the Endeavour. The tumult having called up Mr. Banks and Tupia, the natives ran to the latter, and ſolicited his interpoſition. All, however, which he could do, as Mr. Hicks continued inexorable, was to aſſure them that nothing was intended againſt the life of their companion, and that it was neceſſary that he ſhould ſuffer ſome puniſhment for his offence. With this explanation they appeared to be ſatisfied; and when the puniſhment had been inflicted, an old man among the ſpectators, who was ſuppoſed to be the criminal's father, gave him a ſevere beating, and ſent him down into his canoe. Notwithſtanding this, the Indians were far from being reconciled to the treatment which their countryman had received. Their chearful confidence was gone; and though they promiſed, at their departure, to return with ſome fiſh, the Engliſh ſaw them no more (x). On the twenty-ninth of November, Lieutenant Cook, Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and others with them, were in a ſituation ſomewhat critical and alarming. Having landed upon an Iſland in the neighbourhood of Cape Bret, they were in a few minutes ſurrounded by two or three hundred people. Though the Indians were all armed, they came on in ſo confuſed and ſtraggling a manner, that it did not appear that any injury was intended by them; and the Engliſh Gentlemen were determined that hoſtilities ſhould not begin on their part. At firſt the natives continued quiet; but their weapons were held ready to ſtrike, and they ſeemed to be rather irreſolute than peaceable. While the Lieutenant and his friends remained in this ſtate of ſuſpence, another party of Indians came up; and the boldneſs of the whole body being increaſed by the augmentation of their numbers, they began the dance and ſong, which are their preludes to a battle. An attempt that was made by a number of them, to ſeize the two boats which had brought our Voyagers to land, appeared to be the ſignal for a general attack. It now became neceſſary for Mr. Cook to exert himſelf with vigour. Accordingly, he diſcharged his muſquet, which was loaded with ſmall ſhot, at one of the foremoſt of the aſſailants, and Mr. Banks and two of our men fired immediately afterwards. Though this made the natives fall back in ſome confuſion, nevertheleſs, one of the Chiefs, who was at the diſtance of about twenty yards, had the courage to rally them, and, calling loudly to his companions, led them on to the charge. Dr. Solander inſtantly diſcharged his piece at this champion, who, upon feeling the ſhot, ſtopped ſhort, and then ran away with the reſt of his countrymen. Still, however, they did not diſperſe, but got upon riſing ground, and ſeemed only to want ſome leader of reſolution to renew their aſſault. As they were now gotten beyond the reach of ſmall ſhot, the Engliſh fired with ball, none of which taking place, the Indians continued together in a body. While our people were in this doubtful ſituation, which laſted about a quarter of an hour, the ſhip, from which a much greater number of natives were ſeen than could be diſcovered on ſhore, brought her broadſide to bear, and entirely diſperſed them, by firing a few ſhot over their heads. In this ſkirmiſh, only two of them were hurt with the ſmall ſhot, and not a ſingle life was loſt; a caſe which would not have happened if Lieutenant Cook had not reſtrained his men, who, either from fear or the love of miſchief, ſhewed as much impatience to deſtroy the Indians as a ſportſman to kill his game. Such was the difference between the diſpoſition of the common ſeamen and marines, and that of their humane and judicious Commander (y). On the ſame day Mr. Cook diſplayed a very exemplary act of diſcipline. Some of the ſhip's people, who, when the natives were to be puniſhed for a fraud, aſſumed the inexorable juſtice of a Lycurgus, thought fit to break into one of their plantations, and to dig up a quantity of potatoes. For this the Lieutenant ordered each of them to receive twelve laſhes, after which two of them were diſcharged. But the third, in a ſingular ſtrain of morality, inſiſted upon it that it was no crime in an Engliſhman to plunder an Indian plantation. The method taken by our Commander to refute his caſuiſtry, was to ſend him back to his confinement, and not to permit him to be releaſed till he had been puniſhed with ſix laſhes more. The Endeavour, on the fifth of December, was in the moſt imminent hazard of being wrecked. At four o'clock in the morning of that day, our Voyagers weighed, with a light breeze; but it being variable with frequent calms, they made little way. From that time till the afternoon, they kept turning out of the bay, and about ten at night were ſuddenly becalmed, ſo that the ſhip could neither wear nor exactly keep her ſtation. The tide or current ſetting ſtrong, ſhe drove toward land ſo faſt, that before any meaſures could be taken for her ſecurity, ſhe was within a cable's length of the breakers. Though our people had thirteen fathom water, the ground was ſo foul, that they did not dare to drop their anchor. In this criſis, the pinnace being immediately hoiſted out to take the ſhip in tow, and the men, ſenſible of their danger, exerting themſelves to the utmoſt, a faint breeze ſprang up off the land, and our Navigators perceived with unſpeakable joy that the veſſel made headway. So near was ſhe to the ſhore, that Tupia, who was ignorant of the hair's breadth eſcape the company had experienced, was at this very time converſing with the Indians upon the beach, whoſe voices were diſtinctly heard, notwithſtanding the roar of the breakers. Mr. Cook and his friends now thought that all danger was over; but about an hour afterwards, juſt as the man in the chains had cried "ſeventeen fathom," the ſhip ſtruck. The ſhock threw them into the utmoſt conſternation; and almoſt inſtantly the man in the chain cried out "five fathom." By this time, the rock on which the ſhip had ſtruck being to the windward, ſhe went off without having received the leaſt damage; and the water very ſoon deepening to twenty fathom, ſhe again ſailed in ſecurity. The inhabitants in the Bay of Iſlands were found to be far more numerous than in any other part of New Zealand which Lieutenant Cook had hitherto viſited. It did not appear that they were united under one head; and, though their towns were fortified, they ſeemed to live together in perfect amity. The Endeavour, on the ninth of December, lying becalmed in DOUBTLESS BAY, an opportunity was taken to enquire of the natives concerning their country; and our Navigators learned from them, by the help of Tupia, that at the diſtance of three days rowing in their canoes, at a place called MOORE-WHENNUA, the land would take a ſhort turn to the ſouthward, and thence extend no more to the Weſt. This place the Engliſh Gentlemen concluded to be the land diſcovered by Taſman, and which had been named by him CAPE MARIA VAN DIEMEN. The Lieutenant, finding the inhabitants ſo intelligent, enquired farther, if they knew of any country beſides their own. To this they anſwered, that they had never viſited any other; but that their anceſtors had told them that there was a country of great extent, to the North-weſt by North, or North North Weſt, called ULIMAROA, to which ſome people had ſailed in a very large canoe; and that only a part of them had returned, who reported, that after a paſſage of a month, they had ſeen a country where the people eat hogs. On the thirtieth of December, our Navigators ſaw the land, which they judged to be Cape Maria van Diemen, and which correſponded with the account that had been given of it by the Indians. The next day, from the appearance of Mount Camel, they had a demonſtration that, where they now were, the breadth of New Zealand could not be more than two or three miles from ſea to ſea. During this part of the navigation, two particulars occurred which are very remarkable. In latitude 35° South, and in the midſt of ſummer, Lieutenant Cook met with a gale of wind, which, from its ſtrength and continuance, was ſuch as he had ſcarcely ever been in before; and he was three weeks in getting ten leagues to the weſtward, and five weeks in getting fifty leagues; for at this time, being the firſt of January, 1770, it was ſo long ſince he had paſſed Cape Bret. While the gale laſted, our Voyagers were happily at a conſiderable diſtance from the land; ſince otherwiſe it was highly probable that they would never have returned to relate their adventures (z). The ſhore at Queen Charlotte's Sound, where the Engliſh had arrived on the fourteenth of January, ſeemed to form ſeveral bays, into one of which the Lieutenant propoſed to carry the ſhip, which was now become very foul, in order to careen her, to repair ſome defects, and to obtain a recruit of wood and water. At day-break the next morning, he ſtood in for an inlet, and at eight got within the entrance. At nine o'clock, there being little wind, and what there was being variable, the Endeavour was carried by the tide or current within two cables' length of the North-weſt ſhore, where ſhe had fifty-four fathom water. By the help of the boats ſhe was gotten clear; and about two our people anchored in a very ſafe and convenient cove. Soon after, Mr. Cook, with moſt of the Gentlemen, landed upon the coaſt, where they found a fine ſtream of excellent water, and wood in the greateſt plenty. Indeed the land, in this part of the country, was one foreſt, of vaſt extent. As the Gentlemen had brought the ſeine with them, it was hauled once or twice; and with ſuch ſucceſs, that different ſorts of fiſh were caught, amounting nearly to three hundred weight. The equal diſtribution of theſe among the ſhip's company, furniſhed them with a very agreeable refreſhment. When Lieutenant Cook, Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, Tupia, and ſome others, landed on the ſixteenth, they met with an Indian family, among whom they found horrid and indiſputable proofs of the cuſtom of eating human fleſh. Not to reſume ſo diſagreeable a ſubject, it may here be obſerved once for all, that evidences of the ſame cuſtom appeared on various occaſions. On the next day a delightful object engaged the attention of our Voyagers. The ſhip lying at the diſtance of ſomewhat leſs than a quarter of a mile from the ſhore, they were awakened by the ſinging of an incredible number of birds, who ſeemed to ſtrain their throats in emulation of each other. This wild melody was infinitely ſuperior to any they had ever heard of the ſame kind, and ſeemed to be like ſmall bells, moſt exquiſitely tuned. It is probable that the diſtance, and the water between, might be of no ſmall advantage to the ſound. Upon enquiry, the Gentlemen were informed that the birds here always began to ſing about about two hours after midnight; and that, continuing their muſic till ſun-riſe, they were ſilent the reſt of the day. In this laſt reſpect, they reſemble the nightingales of our own country. On the eighteenth, Lieutenant Cook went out in the pinnace to take a view of the bay in which the ſhip was now at anchor; and found it to be of great extent, conſiſting of numberleſs ſmall harbours and coves, in every direction. The Lieutenant confined his excurſion to the weſtern ſide, and the coaſt where he landed being an impenetrable foreſt, nothing could be ſeen worthy of notice. As our Commander and his friends were returning, they ſaw a ſingle man in a canoe fiſhing: rowing up to him, to their great ſurprize he took not the leaſt notice of them; and even when they were alongſide of him, continued to follow his occupation, without adverting to them any more than if they had been inviſible. This behaviour was not, however, the reſult either of ſullenneſs or ſtupidity; for upon being requeſted to draw up his net, that it might be examined, he readily complied. He ſhewed, likewiſe, to our people his mode of fiſhing, which was ſimple and ingenious. When, on the nineteenth, the armourer's forge was ſet up, and all hands on board were buſy in careening, and in other neceſſary operations about the veſſel, ſome Indians, who had brought plenty of fiſh, exchanged them for nails, of which they had now begun to perceive the uſe and value. This may be conſidered as one inſtance in which they were enlightened and benefited by their intercourſe with our Navigators. While, on the twenty-ſecond, Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander employed themſelves in botanizing near the beach, our Commander, taking a ſeaman with him, aſcended one of the hills of the country. Upon reaching its ſummit, he found the view of the inlet, the head of which he had a little before in vain attempted to diſcover in the pinnace, intercepted by hills ſtill higher than that on which he ſtood, and which were rendered inacceſſible by impenetrable woods. He was, however, amply rewarded for his labour; for he ſaw the ſea on the eaſtern ſide of the country, and a paſſage leading from it to that on the Weſt, a little to the eaſtward of the entrance of the inlet where the ſhip lay. The main land, which was on the South-eaſt ſide of this inlet, appeared to be a narrow ridge of very high hills, and to form part of the South-weſt ſide of the ſtreight. On the oppoſite ſide, the land trended away Eaſt as far as the eye could reach; and to the South-eaſt there was diſcerned an opening to the ſea, which waſhed the eaſtern coaſt. The Lieutenant ſaw, alſo, on the Eaſt ſide of the inlet, ſome Iſlands which he had before taken to be part of the main land. In returning to the ſhip, he examined the harbours and coves that lie behind the Iſlands which he had ſeen from the hills. The next day was employed by him in farther ſurveys and diſcoveries. During a viſit to the Indians, on the twenty-fourth, Tupia being of the party, they were obſerved to be continually talking of guns and ſhooting people. For this ſubject of their converſation, the Engliſh Gentlemen could not at all account. But, after perplexing themſelves with various conjectures, they at length learned, that, on the twenty-firſt, one of our officers, under the pretence of going out to fiſh, had rowed up to a hippah, or village, on the coaſt. When he had done ſo, two or three canoes coming off towards his boat, his fears ſuggeſted that an attack was intended, in conſequence of which three muſquets were fired, one with ſmall ſhot, and two with ball, at the Indians, who retired with the utmoſt precipitation. It is highly probable that they had come out with friendly intentions; for ſuch intentions were expreſſed by their behaviour, both before and afterwards. This action of the officer exhibited a freſh inſtance how little ſome of the people under Lieutenant Cook had imbibed of the wiſe, diſcreet, and humane ſpirit of their Commander. On the morning of the twenty-ſixth, the Lieutenant went again out in the boat, with Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander, and entered one of the bays, which lie on the Eaſt ſide of the inlet, in order to obtain another ſight of the ſtreight which paſſed between the eaſtern and weſtern ſeas. Having landed, for this purpoſe, at a convenient place, they climbed a hill of very conſiderable height, from which they had a full view of the ſtreight, with the land on the oppoſite ſhore, which they judged to be about four leagues diſtant. As it was hazy in the horizon, they could not ſee far to the South-eaſt; but Mr. Cook ſaw enough to determine him to ſearch the paſſage with the ſhip, as ſoon as he ſhould put to ſea. The Gentlemen found, on the top of the hill, a parcel of looſe ſtones, with which they erected a pyramid, and left in it ſome muſquet balls, ſmall ſhot, beads, and ſuch other things, which they happened to have about them, as were likely to ſtand the teſt of time. Theſe, not being of Indian workmanſhip, would convince any European who ſhould come to the place and pull it down, that natives of Europe had been there before. After this, the Lieutenant and his friends went to a town of which the Indians had informed them, and which, like one they had already ſeen, was built upon a ſmall Iſland or rock, ſo difficult of acceſs, that they gratified their curioſity at the riſk of their lives. Here, as had been the caſe in former viſits to the inhabitants of that part of the country near which the ſhip now lay, they were received with open arms, carried through the whole of the place, and ſhewn all that it contained. The town conſiſted of between eighty and a hundred houſes, and had only one fighting-ſtage. Mr. Cook, Mr. Banks, and Dr. Solander, happened to have with them a few nails and ribbands, and ſome paper, with which the people were ſo highly gratified, that when the Gentlemen went away, they filled the Engliſh boat with dried fiſh, of which it appeared that they had laid up large quantities. A report was ſpread that one of the men that had been ſo raſhly fired upon by the officer who had viſited the hippah, under the pretence of fiſhing, was dead of his wounds. But, on the twenty-ninth, the Lieutenant had the great conſolation of diſcovering that this report was groundleſs. On the ſame day he went again on ſhore, upon the weſtern point of the inlet, and, from a hill of conſiderable height, had a view of the coaſt to the North weſt. The fartheſt land he could ſee in that quarter, was an Iſland at the diſtance of about ten leagues, lying not far from the main. Between this Iſland and the place where he ſtood, he diſcovered, cloſe under the ſhore, ſeveral other Iſlands, forming many bays, in which there appeared to be good anchorage for ſhipping. After he had ſet off the different points for his ſurvey, he erected another pile of ſtones, in which he left a piece of ſilver coin, with ſome muſquet-balls and beads, and a fragment of an old pendant flying at the top. On the thirtieth of January, the ceremony was performed of giving name to the inlet where our Voyagers now lay, and of erecting a memorial of the viſit which they had made to this place. The carpenter having prepared two poſts for the purpoſe, our Commander ordered them to be inſcribed with the ſhip's name, and the dates of the year and the month. One of theſe he ſet up at the watering-place, hoiſting the union-flag upon the top of it; and the other he carried over to the Iſland that lies neareſt the ſea, and which is called by the natives MOTUARA. He went firſt, accompanied by Mr. Monkhouſe and Tupia, to the neighbouring village or hippah, where he met with an old man, who had maintained a friendly intercourſe with the Engliſh. To this old man, and ſeveral Indians beſides, the Lieutenant, by means of Tupia, explained his deſign, which he informed them was to erect a mark upon the Iſland, in order to ſhew to any other ſhip which ſhould happen to come thither, that our Navigators had been there before. To this the inhabitants readily conſented, and promiſed that they would never pull it down. He then gave ſomething to every one preſent, and to the old man a ſilver three-pence, and ſome ſpike-nails, with the King's broad arrow cut deep upon them. Theſe were things which Mr. Cook thought were the moſt likely to be long preſerved. After this he conveyed the poſt to the higheſt part of the Iſland; and, having fixed it firmly in the ground, hoiſted upon it the union-flag, and honoured the inlet with the name of QUEEN CHARLOTTE'S SOUND. At the ſame time, he took formal poſſeſſion of this and the adjacent country, in the name and for the uſe of his Majeſty King George the Third. The ceremony was concluded by the Gentlemens drinking a bottle of wine to her Majeſty's health; and the bottle being given to the old man who had attended them up the hill, he was highly delighted with his preſent (a). A philoſopher, perhaps, might enquire, on what ground Lieutenant Cook could take formal poſſeſſion of this part of New Zealand, in the name and for the uſe of the King of Great Britain, when the country was already inhabited, and of courſe belonged to thoſe by whom it was occupied, and whoſe anceſtors might have reſided in it for many preceding ages. To this the beſt anſwer ſeems to be, that the Lieutenant, in the ceremony performed by him, had no reference to the original inhabitants, or any intention to deprive them of their natural rights, but only to preclude the claims of future European Navigators, who, under the auſpices, and for the benefit of, their reſpective ſtates or kingdoms, might form pretenſions to which they were not entitled by prior diſcovery.

On the thirty-firſt, our Voyagers having compleated their wooding, and filled their water-caſks, Mr. Cook ſent out two parties, one to cut and make brooms, and another to catch fiſh. In the evening there was a ſtrong gale from the North-weſt, with ſuch a heavy rain that the little wild muſicians on ſhore ſuſpended their ſong, which till now had been conſtantly heard during the night, with a pleaſure that it was impoſſible to loſe without regret. The gale, on the firſt of February, encreaſed to a ſtorm, with heavy guſts from the high land, one of which broke the hawſer that had been faſtened to the ſhore, and induced the neceſſity of letting go another anchor. Though, towards midnight, the gale became more moderate, the rain continued with ſo much violence that the brook which ſupplied the ſhip with water overflowed its banks; in conſequence of which ten ſmall caſks, that had been filled the day before, were carried away, and notwithſtanding the moſt diligent ſearch for them, could not be recovered. The Endeavour, on Monday the fifth, got under ſail; but the wind ſoon failing, our Commander was obliged again to come to an anchor, a little above Motuara. As he was deſirous of making ſtill farther enquiries whether any memory of Taſman had been preſerved in New Zealand, he directed Tupia to aſk of the old man before mentioned, who had come on board to take his leave of the Engliſh Gentlemen, whether he had ever heard that ſuch a veſſel as theirs had before viſited the country. To this he replied in the negative; but ſaid that his anceſtors had told him that there once had arrived a ſmall veſſel from a diſtant land, called ULIMAROA, in which were four men, who upon their reaching the ſhore were all killed. On being aſked where this country lay, he pointed to the northward. Of Ulimaroa Lieutenant Cook had heard ſomething before, from the people about the Bay of Iſlands, who ſaid that it had been viſited by their anceſtors. Tupia had alſo ſome confuſed traditionary notions concerning it; but no certain concluſion could be drawn either from his account or that of the old Indian. Soon after the ſhip came to anchor the ſecond time, Mr. Banks, and Dr. Solander, who had gone on ſhore to ſee if any gleanings of natural knowledge remained, fell in, by accident, with the moſt agreeable Indian family they had yet ſeen, and which afforded them a better opportunity of remarking the perſonal ſubordination among the natives than had before offered. The whole behaviour of this family was affable, obliging, and unſuſpicious. It was matter of ſincere regret to the two Gentlemen that they had not ſooner met with theſe people, as a better acquaintance with the manners and diſpoſition of the inhabitants of the country might hence have been obtained in a day, than had been acquired during the whole ſtay of the Engliſh upon the coaſt. When, on the ſixth of February, Lieutenant Cook had gotten out of the ſound, he ſtood over to the eaſtward, in order to get the ſtreight well open before the tide of ebb approached. At ſeven in the evening, two ſmall Iſlands which lie off Cape Koamaroo, at the South-eaſt head of Queen Charlotte's Sound, bore Eaſt, at the diſtance of about four miles. It was nearly calm, and the tide of ebb ſetting out, the Endeavour, in a very ſhort time, was carried by the rapidity of the ſtream cloſe upon one of the Iſlands, which was a rock riſing almoſt perpendicularly out of the ſea. The danger encreaſed every moment, and there was but one expedient to prevent the ſhip's being daſhed to pieces, the ſucceſs of which a few moments would determine. She was now within little more than a cable's length of the rock, and had above ſeventy-five fathom water. But, upon dropping an anchor, and veering about one hundred and fifty fathom of cable, ſhe was happily brought up. This, however, would not have ſaved our Navigators, if the tide, which ſet South by Eaſt, had not, upon meeting with the Iſland, changed its direction to South-eaſt, and carried them beyond the firſt point. In this ſituation they were not above two cable's length from the rocks; and here they remained in the ſtrength of the tide, which ſet to the South-eaſt after the rate of at leaſt five miles an hour, from a little after ſeven till midnight, when the tide abated, and the veſſel began to heave. By three in the morning, a light breeze at north-weſt having ſprung up, our Voyagers ſailed for the eaſtern ſhore; though they made but little way, in conſequence of the tide being againſt them. The wind, however, having afterwards freſhened, and come to North and North-eaſt, with this, and the tide of ebb, they were in a ſhort time hurried through the narroweſt part of the ſtreight, and then ſtood away for the ſouthernmoſt land they had in proſpect. There appeared over this land a mountain of ſtupendous height, which was covered with ſnow. The narroweſt part of the ſtreight, through which the Endeavour had been driven with ſuch rapidity, lies between Cape Tierawitte, on the coaſt of Eaheinomauwe, and Cape Koamaroo; the diſtance between which our Commander judged to be four or five leagues. Notwithſtanding the difficulties ariſing from this tide, now its ſtrength is known, the ſtreight may be paſſed without danger. Some of the officers ſtarted a notion that Eaheinomauwe was not an Iſland, and that the land might ſtretch away to the South-eaſt, from between Cape Turnagain and Cape Palliſer, there being a ſpace of between twelve and fifteen leagues which had not yet been ſeen. Though Lieutenant Cook, from what he had obſerved the firſt time he diſcovered the ſtreight, and from many other concurrent circumſtances, had the ſtrongeſt conviction that they were miſtaken, he, nevertheleſs, reſolved to leave no poſſibility of doubt with reſpect to an object of ſo much importance. For this purpoſe he gave ſuch a direction to the navigation of the ſhip as would moſt effectually tend to determine the matter. After a courſe of two days, he called the officers upon deck, and aſked them, whether they were not now ſatisfied that Eaheinomauwe was an Iſland? To this queſtion they readily anſwered in the affirmative; and all doubts being removed, the Lieutenant proceeded to farther reſearches (b). During Mr. Cook's long and minute examination of the coaſt of New Zealand, he gave names to the bays, capes, promontories, iſlands, and rivers, and other places which were ſeen or viſited by him; excepting in thoſe caſes where their original appellations were learned from the natives. The names he fixed upon were either derived from certain characteriſtic or adventitious circumſtances, or were conferred in honour of his friends and acquaintance, chiefly thoſe of the naval line. Such of the readers of the preſent work as deſire to be particularly informed concerning them, will naturally have recourſe to the hiſtory of the Voyage at large, or, at leaſt, to the indications of them in the ſeveral maps on which they are deſcribed. The aſcertaining of New Zealand to be an iſland did not conclude Lieutenant Cook's examination of the nature, ſituation, and extent of the country. After this, he completed his circum-navigation, by ranging from Cape Turnagain ſouthward along the eaſtern coaſt of Poenammoo, round Cape South, and back to the weſtern entrance of the ſtreight he had paſſed, and which was very properly named Cook's Streight. This range, which commenced on the ninth of February, I ſhall not minutely and regularly purſue; but content myſelf, as in the former courſe, with mentioning ſuch circumſtances as are more directly adapted to my immediate deſign. In the afternoon of the fourteenth, when Mr. Banks was out in the boat a-ſhooting, our Voyagers ſaw, with their glaſſes, four double canoes put off from the ſhore towards him, having on board fifty-ſeven men. The Lieutenant, being alarmed for the ſafety of his friend, immediately ordered ſignals to be made for his return; but he was prevented from ſeeing them by the ſituation of the ſun with regard to the ſhip. However, it was ſoon with pleaſure obſerved that his boat was in motion; and he was taken on board before the Indians, who perhaps had not diſcerned him, came up. Their attention ſeemed to be wholly fixed upon the ſhip. They came within about a ſtone's caſt of her, and then ſtopped, gazing at the Engliſh with a look of vacant aſtoniſhment. Tupia in vain exerted his eloquence to prevail upon them to make a nearer approach. After ſurveying our Navigators ſome time, they left them, and made towards the ſhore. The Gentlemen could not help remarking, on this occaſion, the different diſpoſitions and behaviour of the different inhabitants of the country, at the firſt ſight of the Endeavour. The people now ſeen kept aloof with a mixture of timidity and wonder; others had immediately commenced hoſtilities; the man who was found fiſhing alone in his canoe appeared to regard our Voyagers as totally unworthy of notice; and ſome had come on board almoſt without invitation, and with an air of perfect confidence and good-will. From the conduct of the laſt viſiters, Lieutenant Cook gave the land from which they had put off, and which had the appearance of an Iſland, the name of LOOKERS-ON. When an Iſland, which lies about five leagues from the coaſt of Tovy-Poenammoo, and which was named Banks's Iſland, was firſt diſcovered in the direction of South by Weſt, ſome perſons on board were of opinion that they ſaw land bearing South-ſouth-eaſt, and South-eaſt by Eaſt. Our Commander, who was himſelf upon the deck at the time, told them, that in his judgment it was no more than a cloud, which as the ſun roſe would diſſipate and vaniſh. Being however determined to leave no ſubject for diſputation which experiment could remove, he ordered the ſhip to ſteer in the direction which the ſuppoſed country was ſaid to bear. Having gone in this direction eight and twenty miles, without diſcovering any ſigns of land, the Endeavour reſumed her intended courſe to the ſouthward, it being the particular view of the Lieutenant to aſcertain whether Poenammoo was an Iſland or a continent (c). In paſſing ſome rocks on the ninth of March, in the night, it appeared in the morning that the ſhip had been in the moſt imminent danger. Her eſcape was indeed critical in the higheſt degree. To theſe rocks, therefore, which, from their ſituation, are ſo well adapted to catch unwary ſtrangers, Mr. Cook gave the name of the TRAPS. On the ſame day he reached a point of land which he called the SOUTH CAPE, and which he ſuppoſed, as proved in fact to be the caſe, the ſouthern extremity of the country (d). In ſailing, on Wedneſday the fourteenth, the Endeavour paſſed a ſmall narrow opening in the land, where there ſeemed to be a very ſafe and convenient harbour, formed by an Iſland, which lay eaſtward in the middle of the opening. On the land behind the opening are mountains, the ſummits of which were covered with ſnow, that appeared to have recently fallen. Indeed our Voyagers, for two days paſt, had found the weather extremely cold. On each ſide the entrance of the opening, the land riſes almoſt perpendicularly from the ſea to a ſtupendous height. For this reaſon Lieutenant Cook did not chooſe to carry the ſhip into the harbour. He was ſenſible that no wind could blow there but right in or right out; and he did not think it by any means adviſable to put into a place whence he could not have gotten out but with a wind which experience had taught him did not blow more than one day in a month. Sagacious as this determination of our Commander was, it did not give univerſal ſatisfaction. He acted in it contrary to the opinion of ſome perſons on board, who expreſſed in ſtrong terms their deſire of coming to harbour; not ſufficiently conſidering, that preſent convenience ought not to be purchaſed at the expence of incurring great future diſadvantages (e). By the twenty-ſeventh of March, Mr. Cook had circumnavigated the whole country of Tovy-Poenammoo, and arrived within ſight of the Iſland formerly mentioned, which lies at the diſtance of nine leagues from the entrance of Queen Charlotte's Sound. Having at this time thirty tons of empty water-caſks on board, it was neceſſary to fill them before he finally proceeded on his voyage. For this purpoſe he hauled round the Iſland and entered a bay, ſituated between that and Queen Charlotte's Sound, and to which the name was given of ADMIRALTY BAY. The buſineſs of wooding and watering having been completed on the thirtieth, and the ſhip being ready for the ſea, the point now to be determined was, what route ſhould be purſued in returning home that would be of moſt advantage to the public ſervice. Upon this ſubject the Lieutenant thought proper to take the opinion of his officers. He had himſelf a ſtrong deſire to return by Cape Horn, becauſe that would have enabled him to determine, whether there is or is not a ſouthern continent. But againſt this ſcheme it was a ſufficient objection, that our Navigators muſt have kept in a high ſouthern latitude, in the very depth of winter, and in a veſſel which was not thought to be in a condition fit for the undertaking. The ſame reaſon was urged, with ſtill greater force, againſt their proceeding directly for the Cape of Good Hope, becauſe no diſcovery of moment could be expected in that route. It was, therefore, reſolved that they ſhould return by the Eaſt Indies; and that with this view they ſhould ſteer weſtward, till they ſhould fall in with the Eaſt coaſt of New Holland, and then follow the direction of that coaſt to the northward, till they ſhould arrive at its northern extremity. If that ſhould be found impracticable, it was farther reſolved that they ſhould endeavour to fall in with the land, or Iſlands, ſaid to have been diſcovered by Quiros (f). In the ſix months which Lieutenant Cook had ſpent in the examination of New Zealand, he made very large additions to the knowledge of geography and navigation. That country was firſt diſcovered in the year 1642, by Abel

Abel Janſen Taſman, a Dutch navigator. He traverſed the eaſtern coaſt from latitude 34° 43′, and entered the ſtreight now called Cook's Streight; but being attacked by the natives ſoon after he came to an anchor, in the place which he named Murderer's Bay, he never went on ſhore. Nevertheleſs, he aſſumed a kind of claim to the country, by calling it STAATEN LAND, or the Land of the States, in honour of the States-General. It is now uſually diſtinguiſhed in maps and charts by the name of NEW ZEALAND. The whole of the country, excepting that part of the coaſt which was ſeen by Taſman from on board his ſhip, continued from his time, to the voyage of the Endeavour, altogether unknown. By many perſons it has been ſuppoſed to conſtitute a part of a ſouthern continent; but it was now aſcertained by Mr. Cook to conſiſt of two large Iſlands, divided from each other by a ſtreight or paſſage, which is about four or five leagues broad. Theſe Iſlands are ſituated between the latitudes of 34° and 48° South, and between the longitudes of 181° and 194° Weſt; a matter which Mr. Green determined with uncommon exactneſs, from innumerable obſervations of the ſun and moon, and one of the tranſits of Mercury. The northernmoſt of theſe Iſlands is called by the natives Eaheinomauwe, and the ſouthernmoſt Tovy, or Tavai Poenammoo. It is not, however, certain, whether the whole ſouthern Iſland, or only part of it, is comprehended under the latter name. Tovy Poenammoo is principally a mountainous, and to all appearance a barren country. The only inhabitants, and ſigns of inhabitants, that were diſcovered upon all the Iſland, were the people whom our Voyagers ſaw in Queen Charlotte's Sound, ſome that came off to them under the ſnowy mountains, and ſeveral fires which were diſcerned to the Weſt of Cape Saunders. Eaheinomauwe has a much better appearance. Though it is not only hilly but mountainous, even the hills and mountains are covered with wood, and every valley has a rivulet of water. The ſoil in theſe vallies, and in the plains, many of which are not overgrown with wood, is in general light, but fertile. It was the opinion of Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander, as well as of the other Gentlemen on board, that all kinds of European grain, plants, and fruit, would flouriſh here in the utmoſt luxuriance. There is reaſon to conclude, from the vegetables which our Navigators found in Eaheinomauwe, that the winters are milder than thoſe in England; and the ſummer was experienced not to be hotter, though it was more equally warm. If this country, therefore, ſhould be ſettled by people from Europe, they might, with a little induſtry, very ſoon be ſupplied, in great abundance, not merely with the neceſſaries, but even with the luxuries of life. In Eaheinomauwe there are no quadrupeds but dogs and rats. At leaſt, no other were ſeen by our Voyagers; and the rats are ſo ſcarce, that they wholly eſcaped the notice of many on board. Of birds the ſpecies are not numerous; and of theſe no one kind, excepting perhaps the gannet, is exactly the ſame with thoſe of Europe. Inſects are not in greater plenty than birds. The ſea makes abundant recompence for this ſcarcity of animals upon the land. Every creek ſwarms with fiſh, which are not only wholeſome, but equally delicious with thoſe in our part of the world. The Endeavour ſeldom anchored in any ſtation, or with a light gale paſſed any place, that did not afford enough, with hook and line, to ſerve the whole ſhip's company. If the ſeine was made uſe of, it ſeldom failed of producing a ſtill more ample ſupply. The higheſt luxury of this kind, with which the Engliſh were gratified, was the lobſter, or ſea cray-fiſh. Among the vegetable productions of the country, the trees claim a principal place; there being foreſts of vaſt extent, full of the ſtraiteſt, the cleaneſt, and the largeſt timber Mr. Cook and his friends had ever ſeen. Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander were gratified by the novelty, if not by the variety, of the plants. Out of about four hundred ſpecies, there were not many which had hitherto been deſcribed by botaniſts. There is one plant that ſerves the natives inſtead of hemp and flax, and which excels all that are applied to the ſame purpoſes in other countries. If the ſettling of New Zealand ſhould ever be deemed an object deſerving the attention of Great Britain, our Commander thought that the beſt place for eſtabliſhing a colony would either be on the banks of the Thames, or in the territory adjoining to the Bay of Iſlands. Each of theſe places poſſeſſes the advantage of an excellent harbour. By means of the river, ſettlements might be extended, and a communication eſtabliſhed with the inland parts of the country. Veſſels might, likewiſe, be built of the fine timber which is every were to be met with, at very little trouble and expence (g). But I am in danger of forgetting myſelf, and of running into a detail, which may be thought rather to exceed the intentions of the preſent narrative. It is difficult to reſtrain the pen, when ſuch a variety of curious and entertaining matter lies before it; and I muſt entreat the indulgence of my readers while I mention two or three farther particulars. One circumſtance peculiarly worthy of notice, is the perfect and uninterrupted health of the inhabitants of New Zealand. In all the viſits made to their towns, where old and young, men and women, crouded about our Voyagers, they never obſerved a ſingle perſon who appeared to have any bodily complaint; nor among the numbers that were ſeen naked, was once perceived the ſlighteſt eruption upon the ſkin, or the leaſt mark which indicated that ſuch an eruption had formerly exiſted. Another proof of the health of theſe people is the facility with which the wounds they at any time receive are healed. In the man who had been ſhot with a muſquet-ball through the fleſhy part of his arm, the wound ſeemed to be ſo well digeſted, and in ſo fair a way of being perfectly healed, that if Mr. Cook had not known that no application had been made to it, he declared that he ſhould certainly have enquired, with a very intereſted curioſity, after the vulnerary herbs and ſurgical art of the country. An additional evidence of human nature's being untainted with diſeaſe in New Zealand, is the great number of old men with whom it abounds. Many of them, by the loſs of their hair and teeth, appeared to be very ancient, and yet none of them were decrepid. Although they were not equal to the young in muſcular ſtrength, they did not come in the leaſt behind them with regard to chearfulneſs and vivacity. Water, as far as our Navigators could diſcover, is the univerſal and only liquor of the New Zealanders (g). It is greatly to be wiſhed, that their happineſs in this reſpect may never be deſtroyed by ſuch a connection with the European nations, as ſhall introduce that fondneſs for ſpirituous liquors which hath been ſo fatal to the Indians of North America. From the obſervations which Lieutenant Cook and his friends made on the people of New Zealand, and from the ſimilitude which was diſcerned between them and the inhabitants of the South Sea Iſlands, a ſtrong proof aroſe that both of them had one common origin; and this proof was rendered indubitable by the conformity of their language. When Tupia addreſſed himſelf to the natives of Eaheinomomauwe and Poenammoo, he was perfectly underſtood. Indeed, it did not appear that the language of Otaheite differed more from that of New Zealand, than the language of the two Iſlands, into which it is divided, did from each other (h). Hitherto the navigation of Lieutenant Cook had been unfavourable to the notion of a ſouthern continent; having ſwept away at leaſt three-fourths of the poſitions upon which that notion had been founded. The track of the Endeavour had demonſtrated that the land ſeen by Taſman, Juan Fernandes, Hermite, the commander of a Dutch ſquadron, Quiros, and Roggewein, was not, as they had ſuppoſed, part of ſuch a continent. It had alſo totally deſtroyed the theoretical arguments in favour of a ſouthern continent, which had been drawn from the neceſſity of it to preſerve an equilibrium between the two hemiſpheres. As, however, Mr. Cook's diſcoveries, ſo far as he had already proceeded, extended only to the northward of forty degrees, South latitude, he could not, therefore, give an opinion concerning what land might lie farther to the ſouthward. This was a matter, therefore, which he earneſtly wiſhed to be examined (i); and to him was, at length, reſerved the honour, as we ſhall hereafter ſee, of putting a final end to the queſtion.

On Saturday the thirty-firſt of March, our Commander ſailed from Cape Farewell in New Zealand (k) and purſued his voyage to the weſtward. New Holland, or as it is now called, New South Wales, came in ſight on the nineteenth of April; and on the twenty-eighth of that month the ſhip anchored in Botany Bay. On the preceding day, in conſequence of its falling calm when the veſſel was not more than a mile and a half from the ſhore, and within ſome breakers, our Navigators had been in a very diſagreeable ſituation; but happily a light breeze had ſprang from the land, and carried them out of danger. In the afternoon the boats were manned; and Lieutenant Cook and his friends, having Tupia of their party, ſet out from the Endeavour. They intended to land where they had ſeen ſome Indians, and began to hope, that as theſe Indians had paid no regard to the ſhip when ſhe came into the bay, they would be as inattentive to the advances of the Engliſh towards the ſhore. In this, however, the Gentlemen were diſappointed; for as ſoon as they approached the rocks, two of the men came down upon them to diſpute their landing, and the reſt ran away. Theſe champions, who were armed with lances about ten feet long, called to our Navigators, in a very loud tone, and in a harſh diſſonant language, of which even Tupia did not underſtand a ſingle word. At the ſame time, they brandiſhed their weapons, and ſeemed reſolved to defend their coaſt to the uttermoſt, though they were but two to forty. The Lieutenant, who could not but admire their courage, and who was unwilling that hoſtilities ſhould commence with ſuch inequality of force on their ſide, ordered his boat to lie upon her oars. He and the other Gentlemen then parlied with them by ſigns; and, to obtain their good-will, he threw them nails, beads, and ſeveral trifles beſides, with which they appeared to be well pleaſed. After this our Commander endeavoured to make them underſtand that he wanted water, and attempted to convince them, by all the methods in his power, that he had no injurious deſign againſt them. Being willing to interpret the waving of their hands as an invitation to proceed, the boat put in to the ſhore; but no ſooner was this perceived, than it was oppoſed by the two Indians, one of whom ſeemed to be a youth about nineteen or twenty years old, and the other a man of middle age. The only reſource now left for Mr. Cook was to fire a muſquet between them, which being done, the youngeſt of them dropped a bundle of lances on the rock, but recollecting himſelf in an inſtant, he ſnatched them up again in great haſte. A ſtone was then thrown at the Engliſh, upon which the Lieutenant ordered a muſquet to be fired with ſmall-ſhot. This ſtruck the eldeſt upon the legs, and he immediately ran to one of the houſes, which was about a hundred yards diſtance. Mr. Cook, who now hoped that the conteſt was over, inſtantly landed with his party; but they had ſcarcely quitted the boat when the Indian returned, having only left the rock to fetch a ſhield or target for his defence. As ſoon as he came up, he and his comrade threw each of them a lance in the midſt of our people, but happily without hurting a ſingle perſon. At the firing of a third muſquet, one of the two men darted another lance, and then both of them ran away. After this the Gentlemen repaired to the huts, and threw into the houſe where the children were, ſome beads, ribbons, pieces of cloth, and other preſents. Theſe they hoped would procure them the good will of the inhabitants. When, however, the Lieutenant and his companions returned the next day, they had the mortification of finding that the beads and ribbons which they had left the night before, had not been removed from their places, and that not an Indian was to been ſeen (l). Several of the natives of the country came in ſight on the thirtieth, but they could not be engaged to begin an intercourſe with our people. They approached within a certain diſtance of them, and after ſhouting ſeveral times went back into the woods. Having done this once more, Mr. Cook followed them himſelf, alone and unarmed, a conſiderable way along the ſhore, but without prevailing upon them to ſtop [L]. On the firſt of May, he reſolved to make an excurſion into the country. Accordingly, our Commander, Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and ſeven others, all of them properly accoutred for the expedition, ſet out, and repaired firſt to the huts near the watering-place, whither ſome of the Indians continued every day to reſort. Though the little preſents which had been left there before had not yet been taken away, our Gentlemen added others of ſtill greater value, conſiſting of cloth, beads, combs, and looking glaſſes. After this they went up into the country, the face of which is finely diverſified by wood and lawn. The ſoil they found to be either ſwamp or light ſand [M]. In cultivating the ground there would be no obſtruction from the trees, which are tall, ſtrait, and without underwood, and ſtand at a ſufficient diſtance from each other. Between the trees, the land is abundantly covered with graſs. Our Voyagers ſaw many houſes of the inhabitants, but met with only one of the people, who ran away as ſoon as he diſcovered the Engliſh. At every place where they went they left preſents, hoping that at length they might procure the confidence and good will of the Indians. They perceived ſome traces of animals; and the trees over their heads abounded with birds of various kinds, among which were many of exquiſite beauty. Loriquets and cockatoos, in particular, were ſo numerous, that they flew in flocks of ſeveral ſcores together. While the Lieutenant and his friends were upon this excurſion, Mr. Gore, who had been ſent out in the morning to dredge for oyſters, having performed that ſervice, diſmiſſed his boat, and taking a midſhipman with him, ſet out to join the waterers by land. In his way he fell in with a body of two and twenty Indians, who followed him, and were often at no greater diſtance than that of twenty yards. When he perceived them ſo near, he ſtopped, and faced about, upon which they likewiſe ſtopped; and when he went on again, they continued their purſuit. But though they were all armed with lances, they did not attack Mr. Gore; ſo that he and the midſhipman got in ſafety to the watering-place. When the natives came in ſight of the main body of the Engliſh, they halted at about the diſtance of a quarter of a mile, and ſtood ſtill. By this Mr. Monkhouſe and two or three of the waterers were encouraged to march up to them; but ſeeing the Indians keep their ground, they were ſeized with a ſudden fear, which is not uncommon to the raſh and fool-hardy, and made a haſty retreat. This ſtep increaſed the danger which it was intended to avoid. Four of the Indians immediately ran forward, and diſcharged their lances at the fugitives, with ſuch force that they went beyond them. Our people, recovering their ſpirits, ſtopped to collect the lances, upon which the natives, in their turn, began to retire. At this time Mr. Cook came up, with Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and Tupia; and being deſirous of convincing the Indians that they were neither afraid of them, nor deſigned to do them any injury, they advanced towards them, endeavouring, by ſigns of expoſtulation and entreaty, to engage them to an intercourſe, but without effect. From the boldneſs which the natives diſcovered on the firſt landing of our Voyagers, and the terror that afterwards ſeized them at the ſight of the Engliſh, it appears that they were ſufficiently intimidated by our fire-arms. There was not, indeed, the leaſt reaſon to believe that any of them had been much hurt by the ſmall ſhot which had been fired at them when they attacked our people on their coming out of the boat. Nevertheleſs, they had probably ſeen, from their lurking places, the effects which the muſquets had upon birds. Tupia, who was become a good markſman, frequently ſtrayed abroad to ſhoot parrots; and while he was thus employed, he once met with nine Indians, who, as ſoon as they perceived that he ſaw them, ran from him, in great alarm and confuſion. While, on the third of May, Mr. Banks was gathering plants near the watering-place, Lieutenant Cook went with Dr. Solander and Mr. Monkhouſe to the head of the bay, for the purpoſe of examining that part of the country, and of making farther attempts to form ſome connections with the natives. In this excurſion they acquired additional knowledge concerning the nature of the ſoil, and its capacities for cultivation, but had no ſucceſs in their endeavours to engage the inhabitants in coming to a friendly intercourſe. Several parties that were ſent into the country, on the next day, with the ſame view, were equally unſucceſsful. In the afternoon our Commander himſelf, with a number of attendants, made an excurſion to the north ſhore, which he found to be without wood, and to reſemble, in ſome degree, our moors in England. The ſurface of the ground was, however, covered with a thin bruſh of plants, riſing to about the height of the knee. Near the coaſt the hills are low, but there are others behind them, which gradually aſcend to a conſiderable diſtance, and are interſected with marſhes and moraſſes. Among the articles of fiſh which, at different times, were caught, were large ſtingrays. One of them, when his entrails were taken out, weighed three hundred and thirty-ſix pounds. It was upon account of the great quantity of plants which Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander collected in this place, that Lieutenant Cook was induced to give it the name of BOTANY BAY. It is ſituated in the latitude of 34° South, and in the longitude of 208° 37′ Weſt; and affords a capacious, ſafe, and convenient ſhelter for ſhipping. The Endeavour anchored near the South ſhore, about a mile within the entrance, for the convenience of ſailing with a ſoutherly wind, and becauſe the Lieutenant thought it the beſt ſituation for watering. But afterwards he found a very fine ſtream on the North ſhore, where was a ſandy cove, in which a ſhip might lie almoſt land-locked, and procure wood and water in the greateſt abundance. Though wood is every where plentiful, our Commander ſaw only two ſpecies of it that could be conſidered as timber. Not only the inhabitants who were firſt diſcovered, but all who afterwards came in ſight, were entirely naked. Of their mode of life our Voyagers could know but little, as not the leaſt connection could be formed with them; but it did not appear that they were numerous, or that they lived in ſocieties. They ſeemed, like other animals, to be ſcattered about along the coaſt, and in the woods. Not a ſingle article was touched by them of all that were left at their huts, or at the places which they frequented; ſo little ſenſe had they of thoſe ſmall conveniencies and ornaments which are generally very alluring to the uncivilized tribes of the globe. During Mr. Cook's ſtay at this place, he cauſed the Engliſh colours to be diſplayed every day on ſhore, and took care that the ſhip's name, and the date of the year, ſhould be inſcribed upon one of the trees near the watering-place (m). At day-break, on Sunday the ſixth of May, our Navigators ſailed from Botany Bay; and as they proceeded on their voyage the Lieutenant gave the names that are indicated upon the map to the bays, capes, points, and remarkable hills which ſucceſſively appeared in ſight. On the fourteenth, as the Endeavour advanced to the northward, being then in latitude 30° 22′ South, and longitude 206° 39′ Weſt, the land gradually increaſed in height, ſo that it may be called a hilly country. Between this latitude and Botany Bay, it exhibits a pleaſing variety of ridges, hills, valleys, and plains, all clothed with wood, of the ſame appearance with that which has been mentioned before. The land near the ſhore is in general low and ſandy, excepting the points, which are rocky, and over many of which are high hills, that, at their firſt riſing out of the water, have the ſemblance of Iſlands. On the next day, the veſſel being about a league from the ſhore, our Voyagers diſcovered ſmoke in many places, and having recourſe to their glaſſes, they ſaw about twenty of the natives, who had each of them a large bundle upon his back. The bundles our people conjectured to be palm leaves for covering the houſes of the Indians, and continued to obſerve them above an hour, during which they walked upon the beach, and up a path that led over a hill of gentle aſcent. It was remarkable, that not one of them was ſeen to ſtop and look towards the Endeavour. They marched along without the leaſt apparent emotion either of curioſity or ſurprize, though it was impoſſible that they ſhould not have diſcerned the ſhip by ſome caſual glance as they went along the ſhore, and though ſhe muſt have been the moſt ſtupendous and unaccountable object they had ever beheld (n). While, on the ſeventeenth, our Navigators were in a bay, to which Lieutenant Cook had given the name of Moreton's Bay (o), and at a place where the land was not at that time viſible, ſome on board, having obſerved that the ſea looked paler than uſual, were of opinion that the bottom of the bay opened into a river. The Lieutenant was ſenſible that there was no real ground for this ſuppoſition. As the Endeavour had here thirty-four fathom water, and a fine ſandy bottom, theſe circumſtances alone were ſufficient to produce the change which had been noticed in the colour of the ſea. Nor was it by any means neceſſary to ſuppoſe a river, in order to account for the land at the bottom of the bay not being viſible. If the land there was as low as it had been experienced to be in a hundred other parts of the coaſt, it would be impoſſible to ſee it from the ſtation of the ſhip. Our Commander would, however, have brought the matter to the teſt of experiment, if the wind had been favourable to ſuch a purpoſe. Should any future Navigator be diſpoſed to determine the queſtion, whether there is or is not a river in this place, Mr. Cook has taken care to leave the beſt directions for finding its ſituation. On the twenty-ſecond, as our Voyagers were purſuing their courſe from HARVEY'S BAY, they diſcovered with their glaſſes that the land was covered with palm-nut trees, which they had not ſeen from the time of their leaving the Iſlands within the tropic. They ſaw alſo two men walking along the ſhore, who paid them as little attention as they had met with on former occaſions. At eight o'clock in the evening of this day, the ſhip came to an anchor in five fathom, with a fine ſandy bottom. Early in the morning of the next day, the Lieutenant, accompanied by Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, the other Gentlemen, Tupia, and a party of men, went on ſhore, in order to examine the country. The wind blew freſh, and the weather was ſo cold, that, being at a conſiderable diſtance from land, they took their cloaks as a neceſſary equipment for the voyage. When they landed, they found a channel leading into a large lagoon. Both the channel and the lagoon were examined by our Commander with his uſual accuracy. There is in the place a ſmall river of freſh water, and room for a few ſhips to lie in great ſecurity. Near the lagoon grows the true mangrove, ſuch as exiſts in the Weſt India Iſlands, and the firſt of the kind that had been yet met with by our Navigators. Among the ſhoals and ſand banks of the coaſt, they ſaw many large birds, and ſome in particular of the ſame kind which they had ſeen in Botany Bay. Theſe they judged to be pelicans, but they were ſo ſhy as never to come within reach of a muſquet. On the ſhore was found a ſpecies of the buſtard, one of which was ſhot that was equal in ſize to a turkey, weighing ſeventeen pounds and a half. All the Gentlemen agreed that this was the beſt bird they had eaten ſince they left England; and in honour of it they called the inlet BUSTARD BAY (p). Upon the mud banks, and under the mangroves, were innumerable oyſters of various kinds, and among others the hammer oyſter, with a large proportion of ſmall pearl oyſters. If in deeper water there ſhould be equal plenty of ſuch oyſters at their full growth, Mr. Cook was of opinion that a pearl fiſhery might be eſtabliſhed here to very great advantage (q). The people who were left on board the ſhip aſſerted, that, while the Gentlemen were in the woods, about twenty of the natives came down to the beach, a-breaſt of the Endeavour, and after having looked at her for ſome time, went away. Not a ſingle Indian was ſeen by the Gentlemen themſelves, though they found various proofs, in ſmoak, fires, and the fragments of recent meals, that the country was inhabited. The place ſeemed to be much trodden, and yet not a houſe, or the remains of a houſe, could be diſcerned. Hence the Lieutenant and his friends were diſpoſed to believe that the people were deſtitute of dwellings, as well as of clothes; and that, like the other commoners of nature, they ſpent their nights in the open air. Tupia himſelf was ſtruck with their apparently unhappy condition; and ſhaking his head, with an air of ſuperiority and compaſſion, ſaid that they were Taata Enos, "poor wretches [N]." On the twenty-fifth, our Voyagers, at the diſtance of one mile from the land, were a-breaſt of a point which Mr. Cook found to lie directly under the tropic of Capricorn; and for this reaſon he called it CAPE CAPRICORN (r). In the night of the next day, when the ſhip had anchored at a place which was diſtant four leagues from Cape Capricorn, the tide roſe and fell near ſeven feet; and the flood ſet to the weſtward, and the ebb to the eaſtward. This circumſtance was juſt the reverſe of what had been experienced when the Endeavour was at anchor to the eaſtward of Buſtard Bay. While our people were under ſail, on the twenty-ſixth, and were ſurrounded with Iſlands, which lay at different diſtances from the main land, they ſuddenly fell into three fathom of water. Upon this the Lieutenant anchored, and ſent away the Maſter to ſound a channel which lay between the northernmoſt Iſland and the main. Though the channel appeared to have a conſiderable breadth, our Commander ſuſpected it to be ſhallow, and ſuch was in fact the caſe. The Maſter reported, at his return, that he had only two fathom and a half in many places; and where the veſſel lay at anchor ſhe had only ſixteen feet, which was not two feet more than ſhe drew. Mr. Banks, who, while the Maſter was ſounding the channel, tried to fiſh from the cabin window with hook and line, was ſucceſsful in catching two ſorts of crabs, both of them ſuch as our Navigators had not ſeen before. One of them was adorned with a moſt beautiful blue, in every reſpect equal to the ultramarine. With this blue all his claws and joints were deeply tinged; while the under part of him was white, and ſo exquiſitely poliſhed, that in colour and brightneſs it bore an exact reſemblance to the white of old china. The other crab was alſo marked, though ſomewhat more ſparingly, with the ultramarine on his joints and his toes; and on his back were three brown ſpots of a ſingular appearance. Early the next morning, Lieutenant Cook, having found a paſſage between the Iſlands, ſailed to the northward, and on the evening of the ſucceeding day anchored at about two miles diſtance from the main. At this time a great number of Iſlands, lying a long way without the ſhip, were in ſight. On the twenty-ninth, the Lieutenant ſent away the Maſter with two boats to ſound the entrance of an inlet which lay to the Weſt, and into which he intended to go with the veſſel, that he might wait a few days for the moon's encreaſe, and have an opportunity of examining the country. As the tide was obſerved to ebb and flow conſiderably, when the Endeavour had anchored within the inlet, our Commander judged it to be a river that might run pretty far up into land. Thinking that this might afford a commodious ſituation for laying the ſhip aſhore, and cleaning her bottom, he landed with the Maſter, in ſearch of a proper place for the purpoſe. He was accompanied in the excurſion by Mr.

Banks

Banks and Dr. Solander; and they found walking exceedingly troublesome, in consequence of the ground's being covered with a kind of grass, the seeds of which were very sharp and bearded. Whenever these seeds stuck into their clothes, which happened at every step, they worked forwards by means of the beard, till they got at the flesh. Another disagreeable circumstance was, that the Gentlemen were incessantly tormented with the stings of a cloud of musquitos. They soon met with several places where the ship might conveniently be laid ashore; but were much disappointed in not being able to find any fresh water. In proceeding up the country, they found gum trees, the gum upon which existed only in very small quantities. Gum trees of a similar kind, and as little productive, had occurred in other parts of the Coast of New South Wales. Upon the branches of the trees were ants nests, made of clay, as big as a bushel. The ants themselves, by which the nests were inhabited, were small, and their bodies white. Upon another species of the gum tree, was found a small black ant, which perforated all the twigs, and, having worked out the pith, occupied the pipe in which it had been contained. Notwithstanding this, the parts in which these insects, to an amazing number, had formed a lodgment, bore leaves and flowers, and appeared to be entirely in a flourishing state. Butterflies were found in such multitudes that the account of them seems almost to be incredible. The air was so crowded with them, for the space of three or four acres, that millions might be seen in every direction; and the branches and twigs of the trees were at the same time covered with others that were not upon the wing. A small fish of a singular kind was likewise met with in this place. Its size was about that of a minnow, and it had two very strong breast-fins. It was found in places which were quite dry, and where it might be supposed that it had been left by the tide; and yet it did not appear to have become languid from that circumstance: for when it was approached, it leaped away as nimbly as a frog. Indeed it did not seem to prefer water to land. Though the curiosity of Mr. Cook and his friends were gratified by the sight of these various objects, they were disappointed in the attainment of their main purpose, the discovery of fresh water; and a second excursion, which was made by them on the afternoon of the same day, was equally unsuccessful. This failure of the Lieutenant's hopes determined him to make but a short stay in the place. Having, however, observed from an eminence that the inlet penetrated a considerable way into the country, he formed a resolution of tracing it in the morning. Accordingly, at sun-rise, on Wednesday the thirtieth of May, he went on shore, and took a view of the coast and the Islands that lie off it, with their bearings. For this purpose he had with him an azimuth compass; but he found that the needle differed very considerably in its position, even to thirty degrees; the variation being in some places more, in others less. Once the needle varied from itself no less than two points in the distance of fourteen feet. Mr. Cook having taken up some of the loose stones which lay upon the ground, applied them to the needle, but they produced no effect; whence he concluded that in the hills there was iron ore, traces of which he had remarked both here and in the neighbouring parts. After he had made his observations upon the hill, he proceeded with Dr. Solander up the inlet. He set out with the first of the flood, and had advanced above eight leagues long before it was high water. The breadth of the inlet thus far was from two to five miles, upon a direction South-west by South; but here it opened every way, and formed a large lake, which to the North-west communicated with the sea. Our Commander not only saw the sea in this direction, but found the tide of flood coming strongly in from that point. He observed, also, an arm of this lake extending to the eastward. Hence he thought it not improbable that it might communicate with the sea in the bottom of the bay, which lies to the westward of the cape that on the Chart is designated by the name of CAPE TOWNSHEND. On the South side of the lake is a ridge of hills which the Lieutenant was very desirous of climbing. As, however, it was high-water, and the day was far spent; and as the weather, in particular, was dark and rainy, he was afraid of being bewildered among the shoals in the night, and therefore was obliged to give up his inclination, and to make the best of his way to the ship. Two people only were seen by him, who followed the boat along the shore a good way at some distance; but he could not prudently wait for them, as the tide ran strongly in his favour. Several fires in one direction, and smoke in another, exhibited farther proofs of the country's being in a certain degree inhabited. While Mr. Cook, with Dr. Solander, was tracing the inlet, Mr. Banks and a party with him engaged in a separate excursion, in which they had not proceeded far within land, before their course was obstructed by a swamp, covered with mangroves. This, however, they determined to pass; and having done it with great difficulty, they came up to a place where there had been four small fires, near to which lay some shells and bones of fish that had been roasted. Heaps of grass were also found lying together, on which four or five people appeared to have slept. Mr. Gore, in another place, observed the track of a large animal. Some bustards were likewise seen, but not any other bird, excepting a few beautiful loriquets, of the same kind with those which had been noticed in Botany Bay. The country in general, in this part of New South Wales, appeared sandy and barren, and destitute of the accommodations which could fit it for being possessed by settled inhabitants. From the ill success that attended the searching for fresh water, Lieutenant Cook called the inlet in which the ſhip lay THIRSTY SOUND (s). No refreſhment of any other ſort was here procured by our Voyagers (t). Our Commander, not having a ſingle inducement to ſtay longer in this place, weighed anchor in the morning of the thirty-firſt, and put to ſea. In the proſecution of the voyage, when the Endeavour was cloſe under CAPE UPSTART, the variation of the needle, at ſun-ſet, on the fourth of June, was 9° Eaſt, and at ſun-riſe the next day, it was no more than 5° 35′. Hence the Lieutenant concluded that it had been influenced by iron ore, or by ſome other magnetical matter contained under the ſurface of the earth. In the afternoon of the ſeventh, our Navigators ſaw upon one of the Iſlands what had the appearance of cocoa-nut trees; and as a few nuts would at this time have been very acceptable, Mr. Cook ſent Lieutenant Hicks aſhore, to ſee if he could procure any refreſhment. He was accompanied by Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander; and in the evening the Gentlemen returned, with an account that what had been taken for cocoa-nut trees were a ſmall kind of cabbage palm, and that, excepting about fourteen or fifteen plants, nothing could be obtained which was worth bringing away. On the eighth, when the Endeavour was in the midſt of a cluſter of ſmall Iſlands our Voyagers diſcerned, with their glaſſes, upon one of the neareſt of theſe Iſlands, about thirty of the natives, men, women, and children, all ſtanding together, and looking with great attention at the ſhip. This was the firſt inſtance of curioſity that had been obſerved among the people of the country. The preſent Indian ſpectators were entirely naked. Their hair was ſhort, and their complexion the ſame with that of ſuch of the inhabitants as had been ſeen before (u).

In navigating the coaſt of New South Wales, where the ſea in all parts conceals ſhoals which ſuddenly project from the ſhore, and rocks that riſe abruptly like a pyramid from the bottom, our Commander had hitherto conducted his veſſel in ſafety, for an extent of two and twenty degrees of latitude, being more than one thouſand three hundred miles. But, on the tenth of June, as he was purſuing his courſe from a bay to which he had given the name of TRINITY BAY, the Endeavour fell into a ſituation as critical and dangerous as any that is recorded in the hiſtory of navigation; a hiſtory which abounds with perilous adventures, and almoſt miraculous eſcapes. Our Voyagers were now near the latitude aſſigned to the Iſlands that were diſcovered by Quiros, and which, without ſufficient reaſon, ſome geographers have thought proper to join to this land. The ſhip had the advantage of a fine breeze, and a clear moonlight night; and in ſtanding off from ſix till near nine o'clock, ſhe had deepened her water from fourteen to twenty-one fathom. But while our Navigators were at ſupper it ſuddenly ſhoaled, and they fell into twelve, ten, and eight fathom, within the compaſs of a few minutes. Mr. Cook immediately ordered every man to his ſtation, and all was ready to put about and come to an anchor; when deep water being met with again at the next caſt of the lead, it was concluded that the veſſel had gone over the tail of the ſhoals which had been ſeen at ſun-ſet, and that the danger was now over. This idea of ſecurity was confirmed by the water's continuing to deepen to twenty and twenty-one fathom, ſo that the Gentlemen left the deck in great tranquillity, and went to bed. However, a little before eleven, the water ſhoaled at once from twenty to ſeventeen fathom, and before the lead could be caſt again, the ſhip ſtruck, and remained immoveable, excepting ſo far as ſhe was influenced by the heaving of the ſurge, that beat her againſt the crags of the rock upon which ſhe lay. A few moments brought every perſon upon deck, with countenances ſuited to the horrors of the ſituation. As our people knew, from the breeze which they had in the evening, that they could not be very near the ſhore, there was too much reaſon to conclude that they were upon a rock of coral, which, on account of the ſharpneſs of its points, and the roughneſs of its ſurface, is more fatal than any other. On examining the depth of water round the ſhip, it was ſpeedily diſcovered that the misfortune of our Voyagers was equal to their apprehenſions. The veſſel had been lifted over a ledge of the rock, and lay in a hollow within it, in ſome places of which hollow there were from three to four fathom, and in others not ſo many feet of water. To complete the ſcene of diſtreſs, it appeared, from the light of the moon, that the ſheathing boards from the bottom of the ſhip were floating away all round her, and at laſt her falſe keel; ſo that every moment was making way for the whole company's being ſwallowed up by the ruſhing in of the ſea. There was now no chance but to lighten her, and the opportunity had unhappily been loſt of doing it to the beſt advantage, for as the Endeavour had gone aſhore juſt at high-water, and by this time it had conſiderably fallen, ſhe would, when lightened, be but in the ſame ſituation as at firſt. The only alleviation of this circumſtance was, that as the tide ebbed, the veſſel ſettled to the rocks, and was not beaten againſt them with ſo much violence. Our people had, indeed, ſome hope from the next tide, though it was doubtful whether the ſhip would hold together ſo long, eſpecially as the rock kept grating part of her bottom with ſuch force as to be heard in the fore ſtore-room. No effort, however, was remitted from deſpair of ſucceſs. That no time might be loſt, the water was immediately ſtarted in the hold, and pumped up: ſix guns, being all that were upon the deck, a quantity of iron and ſtone ballaſt, caſks, hoop ſtaves, oil jars, decayed ſtores, and a variety of things beſides, were thrown overboard with the utmoſt expedition. Every one exerted himſelf, not only without murmuring and diſcontent, but even with an alacrity which almoſt approached to chearfulneſs. So ſenſible, at the ſame time, were the men of the awefulneſs of their ſituation, that not an oath was heard among them, the deteſtable habit of profane ſwearing being inſtantly ſubdued by the dread of incurring guilt when a ſpeedy death was in view. While Lieutenant Cook and all the people about him were thus employed, the opening of the morning of the eleventh of June preſented them with a fuller proſpect of their danger. The land was ſeen by them at about eight leagues diſtance, without any Iſland in the intermediate ſpace, upon which, if the ſhip had gone to pieces, they might have been ſet a-ſhore by the boats, and carried thence by different turns to the main. Gradually, however, the wind died away, and early in the forenoon it became a dead calm; a circumſtance this, peculiarly happy in the order of Divine Providence; for if it had blown hard, the veſſel muſt inevitably have been deſtroyed. High-water being expected at eleven in the morning, and every thing being made ready to heave her off if ſhe ſhould float; to the inexpreſſible ſurprize and concern of our Navigators, ſo much did the day-tide fall ſhort of that of the night, that though they had lightened the ſhip nearly fifty ton, ſhe did not float by a foot and a half. Hence it became neceſſary to lighten her ſtill more, and every thing was thrown overboard that could poſſibly be ſpared. Hitherto the Endeavour had not admitted much water; but as the tide fell, it ruſhed in ſo faſt, that ſhe could ſcarcely be kept free, though two pumps were inceſſantly worked. There were now no hopes but from the tide at midnight; to prepare for taking the advantage of which the moſt vigorous efforts were exerted. About five o'clock in the afternoon the tide began to riſe, but, at the ſame time, the leak increaſed to a moſt alarming degree. Two more pumps, therefore, were manned, one of which unhappily would not work. Three pumps, however, were kept going, and at nine o'clock the ſhip righted. Nevertheleſs, the leak had gained ſo conſiderably upon her, that it was imagined that ſhe muſt go to the bottom as ſoon as ſhe ceaſed to be ſupported by the rock. It was, indeed, a dreadful circumſtance to our Commander and his people, that they were obliged to anticipate the floating of the veſſel not as an earneſt of their deliverance, but as an event which probably would precipitate their deſtruction. They knew that their boats were not capable of carrying the whole of them on ſhore, and that when the dreadful criſis ſhould arrive, all command and ſubordination being at an end, a conteſt for preference might be expected, which would increaſe even the horrors of ſhipwreck, and turn their rage againſt each other. Some of them were ſenſible that if they ſhould eſcape to the main land, they were likely to ſuffer more upon the whole than thoſe who would be left on board to periſh in the waves. The latter would only be expoſed to inſtant death; whereas the former, when they got on ſhore, would have no laſting or effectual defence againſt the natives, in a part of the country where even nets and fire-arms could ſcarcely furniſh them with food. But ſuppoſing that they ſhould find the means of ſubſiſtence; how horrible muſt be their ſtate, to be condemned to languiſh out the remainder of their lives in a deſolate wilderneſs, without the poſſeſſion or hope of domeſtic comfort; and to be cut off from all commerce with mankind, excepting that of the naked ſavages who prowl the deſert, and who perhaps are ſome of the moſt rude and uncivilized inhabitants of the earth! The dreadful moment which was to determine the fate of our Voyagers now drew on; and every one ſaw, in the countenances of his companions, the picture of his own ſenſations. Not, however, giving way to deſpair, the Lieutenant ordered the capſtan and windlace to be manned with as many hands as could be ſpared from the pumps; and the ſhip having floated about twenty minutes after ten o'clock, the grand effort was made, and ſhe was heaved into deep water. It was no ſmall conſolation to find that ſhe did not now admit of more water than ſhe had done when upon the rock. By the gaining, indeed, of the leak upon the pumps, three feet and nine inches of water were in the hold; notwithſtanding which, the men did not relinquiſh their labour. Thus they held the water as it were at bay: but having endured exceſſive fatigue of body, and agitation of mind, for more than twenty-four hours, and all this being attended with little hope of final ſucceſs, they began, at length, to flag. None of them could work at the pump above five or ſix minutes together, after which, being totally exhauſted, they threw themſelves down upon the deck, though a ſtream of water, between three or four inches deep, was running over it from the pumps. When thoſe who ſucceeded them had worked their time, and in their turn were exhauſted, they threw themſelves down in the ſame manner, and the others ſtarted up again, to renew their labour. While thus they were employed in relieving each other, an accident was very nearly putting an immediate end to all their efforts. The planking which lines the ſhip's bottom is called the cieling, between which and the outſide planking there is a ſpace of about eighteen inches. From this cieling only, the man who had hitherto attended the well had taken the depth of the water, and had given the meaſure accordingly. But, upon his being relieved, the perſon who came in his room reckoned the depth to the outſide planking, which had the appearance of the leak's having gained upon the pumps eighteen inches in a few minutes. The miſtake, however, was ſoon detected; and the accident, which in its commencement was very formidable to them, became, in fact, highly advantageous. Such was the joy which every man felt at finding his ſituation better better than his fears had ſuggeſted, that it operated with wonderful energy, and ſeemed to poſſeſs him with a ſtrong perſuaſion that ſcarcely any real danger remained. New confidence and new hope inſpired freſh vigour; and the efforts of the men were exerted with ſo much alacrity and ſpirit, that before eight o'clock in the morning the pumps had gained conſiderably upon the leak. All the converſation now turned upon carrying the ſhip into ſome harbour, as a thing not to be doubted; and as hands could be ſpared from the pumps, they were employed in getting up the anchors. It being found impoſſible to ſave the little bower anchor, it was cut away at a whole cable, and the cable of the ſtream anchor was loſt among the rocks; but in the ſituation of our people theſe were trifles which ſcarcely attracted their notice. The fore-topmaſt and fore-yard were next erected, and there being a breeze from the ſea, the Endeavour, at eleven o'clock, got once more under ſail, and ſtood for the land. Notwithſtanding theſe favourable circumſtances, our Voyagers were ſtill very far from being in a ſtate of ſafety. It was not poſſible long to continue the labour by which the pumps had been made to gain upon the leak; and as the exact place of it could not be diſcovered, there was no hope of ſtopping it within. At this criſis, Mr. Monkhouſe, one of the midſhipmen, came to Lieutenant Cook, and propoſed an expedient he had once ſeen uſed on board a merchant ſhip which had ſprung a leak that admitted more than four feet water in an hour, and which by this means had been ſafely brought from Virginia to London. To Mr. Monkhouſe, therefore, the care of the expedient, which is called fothering the ſhip, was, with proper aſſiſtance, committed; and his method of proceeding was as follows. He took a lower ſtudding ſail, and having mixed together a large quantity of oakham and wool, he ſtitched it down, as lightly as poſſible, in handfuls upon the ſail, and ſpread over it the dung of the ſheep of the veſſel, and other filth. The ſail being thus prepared, it was hauled under the ſhip's bottom by ropes, which kept it extended. When it came under the leak, the ſuction that carried in the water, carried in with it the oakham and wool from the ſurface of the ſail. In other parts the water was not ſufficiently agitated to waſh off the oakham and the wool. The ſucceſs of the expedient was anſwerable to the warmeſt expectations; for hereby the leak was ſo far reduced, that, inſtead of gaining upon three pumps, it was eaſily kept under with one. Here was ſuch a new ſource of confidence and comfort, that our people could ſcarcely have expreſſed more joy if they had been already in port. It had lately been the utmoſt object of their hope, to run the ſhip a-ſhore in ſome harbour, either of an Iſland or the main, and to build a veſſel out of her materials, to carry them to the Eaſt Indies. Nothing, however, was now thought of but to range along the coaſt in ſearch of a convenient place to repair the damage the Endeavour had ſuſtained, and then to proſecute the voyage upon the ſame plan, as if no impediment happened. In juſtice and gratitude to the ſhip's company, and the Gentlemen on board, Mr. Cook has recorded, that although in the midſt of their diſtreſs all of them ſeemed to have a juſt ſenſe of their danger, no man gave way to paſſionate exclamations, or frantic geſtures. "Every one appeared to have "the perfect poſſeſſion of his mind, and every one exerted himſelf to the uttermoſt, with "a quiet and patient perſeverance, equally diſtant from the tumultuous violence of terror, "and the gloomy inactivity of deſpair (w)." Though the Lieutenant hath ſaid nothing of himſelf, it is well known that his own compoſure, fortitude, and activity were equal to the greatneſs of the occaſion. To complete the hiſtory of this wonderful preſervation, it is neceſſary to bring forward a circumſtance, which could not be diſcovered till the ſhip was laid down to be repaired. It was then found that one of her holes, which was large enough to have ſunk our Navigators, if they had had eight pumps inſtead of four, and had been able to keep them inceſſantly going, was in a great meaſure filled up by a fragment of the rock, upon which the Endeavour had ſtruck. To this ſingular event, therefore, it was owing, that the water did not pour in with a violence which muſt ſpeedily have involved the Endeavour and all her company in inevitable deſtruction (x). Hitherto none of the names, by which our Commander had diſtinguiſhed the ſeveral parts of the country ſeen by him, were memorials of diſtreſs. But the anxiety and danger which he and his people had now experienced, induced him to call a point in ſight, which lay to the Northward, CAPE TRIBULATION (y). The next object after this event was to look out for a harbour where the defects of the ſhip might be repaired, and the veſſel put into proper order for future navigation. On the fourteenth, a ſmall harbour was happily diſcovered, which was excellently adapted to the purpoſe. It was, indeed, remarkable, that, during the whole courſe of the voyage, our people had ſeen no place which, in their preſent circumſtances, could have afforded them the ſame relief. They could not, however, immediately get into it; and in the midſt of all their joy for their unexpected deliverance, they had not forgotten that there was nothing but a lock of wool between them and deſtruction.

At this time, the ſcurvy, with many formidable ſymptoms, began to make its appearance among our Navigators. Tupia, in particular, was ſo grievouſly affected with the diſeaſe, that all the remedies preſcribed by the Surgeon could not retard it progreſs. Mr. Green, the Aſtronomer, was alſo upon the decline. Theſe and other circumſtances embittered the delay which prevented our Commander and his companions from getting on ſhore. In the morning of the ſeventeenth, though the wind was ſtill freſh, the Lieutenant ventured to weigh, and to put in for the harbour, the entrance into which was by a very narrow channel. In making the attempt the ſhip was twice run aground. At the firſt time ſhe went off without any trouble, but the ſecond time ſhe ſtuck faſt. Nevertheleſs, by proper exertions, in conjunction with the riſing of the tide, ſhe floated about one o'clock in the afternoon, and was ſoon warped into the harbour. The ſucceeding day was employed in erecting two tents, in landing the proviſions and ſtores, and in making every preparation for repairing the damages which the Endeavour had ſuſtained. In the mean while, Mr. Cook, who had aſcended one of the higheſt hills that overlooked the harbour, was by no means entertained with a comfortable proſpect; the low land near the river being wholly over-run with mangroves, among which the ſalt-water flows at every tide, and the high land appearing to be altogether ſtoney and barren. Mr. Banks alſo took a walk up the country, and met with the frames of ſeveral old Indian houſes, and places where the natives, though not recently, had dreſſed ſhell-fiſh. The boat, which had this day been diſpatched to haul the ſeine, with a view of procuring ſome fiſh for the refreſhment of the ſick, returned without ſucceſs. Tupia was more fortunate. Having employed himſelf in angling, and lived entirely upon what he caught, he recovered in a ſurprizing degree. Mr. Green, to the regret of his friends, exhibited no ſymptoms of returning health. On the nineteenth, Mr. Banks croſſed the river to take a farther view of of the country; which he found to conſiſt principally of ſand-hills. Some Indian houſes were ſeen by him, that appeared to have been very lately inhabited; and in his walk he met with large flocks of pigeons and crows. The pigeons were exceedingly beautiful. Of theſe he ſhot ſeveral; but the crows, which were exactly like thoſe in England, were ſo ſhy that they never came within the reach of his gun. It was not till the twenty-ſecond that the tide ſo far left the Endeavour, as to give our people an opportunity of examining her leak. In the place where it was found, the rocks had made their way through four planks, and even into the timbers. Three more planks were greatly damaged, and there was ſomething very extraordinary in the appearances of the breaches. Not a ſplinter was to be ſeen, but all was as ſmooth as if the whole had been cut away by an inſtrument. It was a peculiarly happy circumſtance that the timbers were here very cloſe, ſince otherwiſe the ſhip could not poſſibly have been ſaved. Now alſo it was that the fragment of the rock was diſcovered, which, by ſticking in the leak of the veſſel, had been ſuch a providential inſtrument of her preſervation. On the ſame day, ſome of the people who had been ſent to ſhoot pigeons for the ſick, and who had diſcovered many Indian houſes, and a fine ſtream of freſh water, reported at their return, that they had ſeen an animal as large as a greyhound, of a ſlender make, of a mouſe colour, and extremely ſwift. As the Lieutenant was walking, on the morning of the twenty-fourth, at a little diſtance from the ſhip, he had an opportunity of ſeeing an animal of the ſame kind. From the deſcription he gave of it, and from an imperfect view which occurred to Mr. Banks, the latter Gentleman was of opinion that its ſpecies was hitherto unknown. The poſition of the veſſel, while ſhe was refitting for ſea, was very near depriving the world of that botanical knowledge, which Mr. Banks had procured at the expence of ſo much labour, and ſuch various perils. For the greater ſecurity of the curious collection of plants which he had made during the whole voyage, he had removed them into the bread room. This room is in the after part of the ſhip, the head of which, for the purpoſe of repairing her, was laid much higher than the ſtern. No one having thought of the danger to which this circumſtance might expoſe the plants, they were found to be under water. However, by the exerciſe of unremitting care and attention, the larger part of them were reſtored to a ſtate of preſervation. On the twenty-ninth of June, at two o'clock in the morning Mr. Cook, in conjunction with Mr. Green, obſerved an emerſion of Jupiter's firſt ſatellite. The time here was $2^h\ 18'\ 53''$, which gave the longitude of the place at $214^\circ\ 42'\ 30''$ Weſt: its latitude is $15^\circ\ 26'$ South. The next morning the Lieutenant ſent ſome of the young Gentlemen to take a plan of the harbour, whilſt he himſelf aſcended a hill, that he might gain a full proſpect of the ſea: and it was a proſpect which preſented him with a lively view of the difficulties of his ſituation. To his great concern he ſaw innumerable ſand banks and ſhoals, lying in every direction of the coaſt. Some of them extended as far as he could diſcern with his glaſs, and many of them did but juſt riſe above water. To the northward there was an appearance of a paſſage, and this was the only direction in which our Commander could hope to get clear, in the proſecution of his voyage; for as the wind blew conſtantly from the South-eaſt, to return by the ſouthward would have been extremely difficult, if not abſolutely impoſſible. On this, and the preceding day, our people had been very ſucceſsful in hauling the ſeine. The ſupply of fiſh was ſo great, that the Lieutenant was now able to diſtribute two pounds and a half to each man. A quantity of greens having likewiſe been gathered, he ordered them to be boiled with the peas. Hence an excellent meſs was produced, which, in conjunction with the fiſh, afforded an unſpeakable refreſhment to the whole of the ſhip's company [O]. Early in the morning of the [O] Afforded an unſpeakable refreſhment to the whole of the ſhip's company.] On the firſt of July, the thermometer, in the ſhade, roſe to 87°, which was higher than it had been on any day ſince our Navigators had come upon the coaſt of New South Wales.

ſecond of July, Lieutenant Cook ſent the Maſter out of the harbour, in the pinnace, to ſound about the ſhoals, and to ſearch for a channel to the northward. A ſecond attempt, which was made this day to heave off the ſhip, was as unſucceſsful as a former one had been. The next day the Maſter returned, and reported that he had found a paſſage out to ſea, between the ſhoals. On one of theſe ſhoals, which conſiſted of coral rocks, many of which were dry at low water, he had landed, and found there cockles of ſo enormous a ſize, that a ſingle cockle was more than two men could eat. At the ſame place, he met with a great variety of other ſhell-fiſh, and brought back with him a plentiful ſupply for the uſe of his fellow Voyagers. At high-water, this day, another effort was made to float the ſhip, which happily ſucceeded; but it being found that ſhe had ſprung a plank between decks, it became neceſſary to lay her a-ſhore a ſecond time. The Lieutenant being anxious to attain a perfect knowledge of the ſtate of the veſſel, got one of the Carpenter's crew, a man in whom he could confide, to dive, on the fifth, to her bottom, that he might examine the place where the ſheathing had been rubbed off. His report, which was, that three ſtreaks of the ſheathing, about eight feet long, were wanting, and that the main plank had been a little rubbed, was perfectly agreeable to the account that had been given before by the Maſter and others, who had made the ſame examination; and our Commander had the conſolation of finding that, in the opinion of the Carpenter, this matter would be of little conſequence. The other damage, therefore, being repaired, the ſhip was again floated at high water, and all hands were employed in taking the ſtores on board, and in putting her into a condition for proceeding on her voyage (z). To the harbour in which ſhe was refitted for the ſea, Mr. Cook gave the name of the ENDEAVOUR RIVER. On the morning of the ſixth, Mr. Banks, accompanied by Lieutenant Gore, and three men, ſet out in a ſmall boat up the river, with a view of ſpending a few days in examining the country. In this expedition nothing eſcaped his notice which related either to the natural hiſtory or the inhabitants of the places he viſited. Though he met with undoubted proofs that ſeveral of the natives were at no great diſtance, none of them came within ſight. Having found, upon the whole, that the country did not promiſe much advantage from a farther ſearch, he and his party reimbarked in their boat, and returned, on the eighth, to the ſhip. During their excurſion, they had ſlept upon the ground in perfect ſecurity, and without once reflecting upon the danger they would have incurred, if in that ſituation they had been diſcovered by the Indians. Lieutenant Cook had not been ſatisfied with the account which the Maſter had given of his having traced a paſſage, between the ſhoals, into the ſea. He ſent him out, therefore, a ſecond time, upon the ſame buſineſs; and, on his return, he made a different report. Having been ſeven leagues out to ſea, the Maſter was now of opinion that there was no ſuch paſſage as he had before imagined. His expedition, however, though in this reſpect unſucceſsful, was not wholly without its advantage. On the very rock where he had ſeen the large cockles, he met with a great number of turtle; and though he had no better an inſtrument than a boat-hook, three of them were caught, which together weighed ſeven hundred and ninety-one pounds. An attempt, which, by order of the Lieutenant, was made the next morning to obtain ſome more turtle, failed through the miſconduct of the ſame officer, who had been ſo fortunate on the preceding day. Hitherto the natives of this part of the country had eagerly avoided holding any intercourſe with our people: but at length their minds, through the good management of Mr. Cook, became more favourably diſpoſed. Four of them having appeared, on the tenth, in a ſmall canoe, and ſeeming to be buſily employed in ſtriking fiſh, ſome of the ſhip's company were for going over to them in a boat. This, however, the Lieutenant would not permit, repeated experience having convinced him that it was more likely to prevent than to procure an interview. He determined to purſue a contrary method, and to try what could be done by letting them alone, and not appearing to make them, in the leaſt degree, the objects of his notice. So ſucceſsful was this plan, that, after ſome preparatory intercourſe, they came along-ſide the ſhip, without expreſſing any fear or diſtruſt. The conference was carried on, by ſigns, with the utmoſt cordiality till dinner-time, when, being invited by our people to go with them and partake of their proviſion, they declined it, and went away in their canoe. One of theſe Indians was ſomewhat above the middle age; the three others were young. Their ſtature was of the common ſize, but their limbs were remarkably ſmall. The colour of their ſkin was a dark chocolate. Their hair was black, but not woolly; and their features were far from being diſagreeable. They had lively eyes, and their teeth were even and white. The tones of their voices were ſoft and muſical, and there was a flexibility in their organs of ſpeech, which enabled them to repeat, with great facility, many of the words pronounced by the Engliſh. On the next morning, our Voyagers had another viſit from four of the natives. Three of them were the ſame who had appeared the day before, but the fourth was a ſtranger, to whom his companions gave the name of YAPARICO. He was diſtinguiſhed by a very peculiar ornament. This was the bone of a bird, nearly as thick as a man's finger, and five or ſix inches long, which he had thruſt into a hole, made in the griſtle that divides the noſtrils. An inſtance of the like kind, and only one, had been ſeen in New Zealand. It was found, however, that among all theſe people the ſame part of the noſe

noſe was perforated; that they had holes in their ears; and that they had bracelets, made of plaited hair, upon the upper part of their arms. Thus the love of ornament takes place among them, though they are abſolutely deſtitute of apparel. Three Indians, on the twelfth, ventured down to Tupia's tent, and were ſo well pleaſed with their reception, that one of them went with his canoe to fetch two others, who had never been ſeen by the Engliſh. On his return, he introduced the ſtrangers by name, a ceremony which was never omitted upon ſuch occaſions. From a farther acquaintance with the natives, it was found that the colour of their ſkins was not ſo dark as had at firſt been apprehended, and that all of them were remarkably clean limbed, and extremely active and nimble. Their language appeared to be more harſh than that of the Iſlanders in the South ſea. On the fourteenth, Mr. Gore had the good fortune to kill one of the animals before-mentioned, and which had been the ſubject of much ſpeculation. It is called by the natives Kanguroo; and when dreſſed proved moſt excellent meat. Indeed, our Navigators might now be ſaid to fare ſumptuouſly every day; for they had turtle in great plenty, and it was agreed that theſe were far ſuperior to any which our people had ever taſted in England. This the Gentlemen juſtly imputed to their being eaten freſh from the ſea, before their natural fat had been waſted, or their juices changed, by the ſituation and diet they are expoſed to when kept in tubs. Moſt of the turtle here caught were of the kind called green turtle, and their weight was from two to three hundred pounds. In the morning of the ſixteenth, while the men were engaged in their uſual employment of getting the ſhip ready for the ſea, our Commander climbed one of the heights on the North ſide of the river, and obtained from it an extenſive view of the inland country, which he found agreeably diverſified by hills, valleys, and large plains, that in many places were richly covered with wood. This evening, the Lieutenant and Mr. Green obſerved an emerſion of the firſt ſatellite of Jupiter, which gave 214° 53′ 45″ of longitude. The obſervation taken on the twenty-ninth of June had given 214° 48′ 30″; and the mean was 214° 48′ 7½″, being the longitude of the place Weſt of Greenwich. On the ſeventeenth, Mr. Cook ſent the Maſter and one of the Mates in the pinnace, to ſearch for a channel to the northward; after which, accompanied by Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander, he went into the woods on the other ſide of the water. In this excurſion the Gentlemen had a farther opportunity of improving their acquaintance with the Indians, who by degrees became ſo familiar, that ſeveral of them the next day ventured on board the ſhip. There the Lieutenant left them, apparently much entertained, that he might go with Mr. Banks to take a farther ſurvey of the country, and eſpecially to indulge an anxious curioſity they had of looking round about them upon the ſea; of which they earneſtly wiſhed, but ſcarcely dared to hope, that they might obtain a favourable and encouraging proſpect. When, after having walked along the ſhore ſeven or eight miles to the northward, they aſcended a very high hill, the view which preſented itſelf to them inſpired nothing but melancholy apprehenſions. In every direction, they ſaw rocks and ſhoals without number; and there appeared to be no paſſage out to ſea, but through the winding channels between them, the navigation of which could not be accompliſhed without the utmoſt degree of difficulty and danger. The ſpirits of the two Gentlemen were not raiſed by this excurſion. On the nineteenth our Voyagers were viſited by ten of the natives; and ſix or ſeven more were ſeen at a diſtance, chiefly women, who were as naked as the male inhabitants of the country. There being at that time a number of turtles on the deck of the ſhip, the Indians who came on board were determined to get one of them; and expreſſed great diſappointment and anger, when our people refuſed to comply with their wiſhes. Several attempts were made by them to ſecure what they wanted by force; but all their efforts proving unſucceſsful, they ſuddenly leaped into their canoe in a tranſport of rage, and paddled towards the ſhore. The Lieutenant, with Mr. Banks, and five or ſix of the ſhip's crew, immediately went into the boat, and got a-ſhore, where many of the Engliſh were engaged in various employments. As ſoon as the natives reached the land, they ſeized their arms, which had been laid up in a tree, and having ſnatched a brand from under a pitch-kettle that was boiling, made a circuit to the windward of the few things our people had on ſhore, and with ſurprizing quickneſs and dexterity ſet fire to the graſs in their way. The graſs, which was as dry as ſtubble, and five or ſix feet high, burnt with ſurprizing fury; and a tent of Mr. Banks's would have been deſtroyed, if that Gentleman had not immediately got ſome of the men to ſave it, by hauling it down upon the beach. Every part of the Smith's forge that would burn was conſumed. This tranſaction was followed by another of the ſame nature. In ſpite of threats and entreaties, the Indians went to a different place, where ſeveral of the Endeavour's crew were waſhing, and where the ſeine, the other nets, and a large quantity of linen were laid out to dry, and again ſet fire to the graſs. The audacity of this freſh attack rendered it neceſſary that a muſquet, loaded with ſmall ſhot, ſhould be diſcharged at one of them; who being wounded, at the diſtance of about forty yards, they all betook themſelves to flight. In the laſt inſtance the fire was extinguiſhed before it had made any conſiderable progreſs; but where it had firſt begun it ſpread far into the woods. The natives being ſtill in ſight, Mr. Cook, to convince them that they had not yet gotten out of his reach, fired a muſquet, charged with ball, a-breaſt of them among the mangroves, upon which they quickened their their pace, and were ſoon out of view. It was now expected that they would have given our Navigators no farther trouble; but in a little time their voices were heard in the woods, and it was perceived that they came nearer and nearer. The Lieutenant, therefore, together with Mr. Banks, and three or four more perſons, ſet out to meet them; and the reſult of the interview, in conſequence of the prudent and lenient conduct of our Commander and his friends, was a complete reconciliation. Soon after the Indians went away, the woods were ſeen to be on fire at the diſtance of about two miles. This accident, if it had happened a little ſooner, might have produced dreadful effects; for the powder had been but a few days on board, and it was not many hours that the ſtore tent, with all the valuable things contained in it, had been removed. From the fury with which the graſs would burn in this hot climate, and the difficulty of extinguiſhing the fire, our Voyagers determined never to expoſe themſelves to the like danger, but to clear the ground around them, if ever again they ſhould be under a neceſſity of pitching their tents in ſuch a ſituation. In the evening of this day, when every thing was gotten on board the ſhip, and ſhe was nearly ready for ſailing, the Maſter returned with the diſagreeable account that there was no paſſage for her to the northward. The next morning the Lieutenant himſelf ſounded and buoyed the bar. At this time all the hills for many miles round were on fire, and the appearance they aſſumed at night was eminently ſtriking and ſplendid. In an excurſion which was made by Mr. Banks, on the twenty-third, to gather plants, he found the greateſt part of the cloth that had been given to the Indians lying in a heap together. This, as well as the trinkets which were beſtowed upon them, they probably regarded as uſeleſs lumber. Indeed, they ſeemed to ſet little value on any thing poſſeſſed by our people, excepting their turtle; and that was a commodity which could not be ſpared. As Lieutenant Cook was prevented by blowing weather from attempting to get out to ſea, Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander ſeized another opportunity, on the twenty-fourth, of purſuing their botanical reſearches. Having traverſed the woods the greater part of the day without ſucceſs, as they were returning through a deep valley, they diſcovered lying upon the ground ſeveral marking nuts, the Anacardium orientale. Animated with the hope of meeting with the tree that bore them, a tree which perhaps no European botaniſt had ever ſeen, they ſought for it with great diligence and labour, but to no purpoſe. While Mr. Banks was again gleaning the country, on the twenty-ſixth, to enlarge his treaſure of natural hiſtory, he had the good fortune to take an animal of the Opoſſum tribe, together with two young ones. It was a female, and, though not exactly of the ſame ſpecies, much reſembled the remarkable animal which Monſ. de Buffon hath deſcribed by the name of phalanger. On the morning of the twenty-ninth, the weather becoming calm, and a light breeze having ſprung up by land, Lieutenant Cook ſent a boat to ſee what water was upon the bar, and all things were made ready for putting to ſea. But, on the return of the boat, the officer reported that there were only thirteen feet of water on the bar. As the ſhip drew thirteen feet ſix inches, and the ſea breeze ſet in again in the evening, all hope of ſailing on that day was given up. The weather being more moderate on the thirty-firſt, the Lieutenant had thoughts of trying to warp the veſſel out of the harbour; but upon going out himſelf in the boat, he found that the wind ſtill blew ſo freſh, that it would not be proper to make the attempt. A diſagreeable piece of intelligence occurred on the ſucceeding day. The Carpenter, who had examined the pumps, reported that they were all of them in a ſtate of decay. One of them was ſo rotten, that, when hoiſted up, it dropped to pieces, and the reſt were not in a much better condition. The chief confidence, therefore, of our Navigators was now in the ſoundneſs of the ſhip; and it was a happy circumſtance that ſhe did not admit more than one inch of water in an hour. Early on the third of Auguſt, another unſucceſsful attempt was made to warp the veſſel out of the harbour: but in the morning of the next day the efforts of our Voyagers were more proſperous, and the Endeavour got once more under ſail, with a light air from the land, which ſoon died away, and was followed by ſea breezes from South-eaſt by South. With theſe breezes the ſhip ſtood off to ſea, Eaſt by North, having the pinnace a-head, which was ordered to keep ſounding without intermiſſion. A little before noon the Lieutenant anchored in fifteen fathom water, with a ſandy bottom; the reaſon of which was, that he did not think it ſafe to run in among the ſhoals, till, by taking a view of them from the maſt-head, at low-water, he might be able to form ſome judgment which way it would be proper for him to ſteer. This was a matter of nice and arduous determination. As yet Mr. Cook was in doubt whether he ſhould beat back to the ſouthward, round all the ſhoals, or ſeek a paſſage to the eaſtward or the northward: nor was it poſſible to ſay whether each of theſe courſes might not be attended with equal difficulty and danger (a). The impartiality and humanity of Lieutenant Cook's conduct in the diſtribution of proviſions ought not to paſs unnoticed. Whatever turtle or other fiſh were caught, they were always equally divided among the whole ſhip's crew, the meaneſt perſon on board having the ſame ſhare with the Lieutenant himſelf. He hath juſtly obſerved, that this is a rule which every commander will find it his intereſt to follow, in any voyage of a ſimilar nature. Great difficulties occurred in the navigation from the Endeavour river. On the fifth of Auguſt, the Lieutenant had not kept his courſe long, before

before the ſhoals were diſcovered in every quarter, which obliged him, as night approached, to come to an anchor. In the morning of the ſixth, there was ſo ſtrong a gale, that our Voyagers were prevented from weighing. When it was low-water, Mr. Cook, with ſeveral of his officers, kept a look-out at the maſt-head, to ſee if any paſſage could be diſcovered between the ſhoals. Nothing, however, was in view excepting breakers, which extended from the South round by the Eaſt as far as to the North-weſt, and reached out to ſea, beyond the ſight of any of the Gentlemen. It did not appear that theſe breakers were cauſed by one continued ſhoal, but by ſeveral, which lay detached from each other. On that which was fartheſt to the eaſtward the ſea broke very high, ſo that the Lieutenant was induced to think that it was the outermoſt ſhoal. He was now convinced that there was no paſſage to ſea, but through the labyrinth formed by theſe ſhoals; and, at the ſame time, he was wholly at a loſs what courſe to ſteer, when the weather ſhould permit the veſſel to ſail. The Maſter's opinion was, that our Navigators ſhould beat back the way they came; but, as the wind blew ſtrongly, and almoſt without intermiſſion, from that quarter, this would have been an endleſs labour: and yet, if a paſſage could not be found to the northward, there was no other alternative. Amidſt theſe anxious deliberations, the gale increaſed, and continued, with little remiſſion, till the morning of the tenth, when, the weather becoming more moderate, our Commander weighed, and ſtood in for the land. He had now come to a final determination of ſeeking a paſſage along the ſhore to the northward (b). In purſuance of this reſolution, the Endeavour proceeded in her courſe, and at noon came between the farthermoſt headland that lay in ſight, and three Iſlands which were four or five leagues to the North of it, out at ſea. Here our Navigators thought that they ſaw a clear opening before them, and began to hope that they were once more out of danger. Of this hope, however, they were ſoon deprived; on which account the Lieutenant gave to the headland the name of CAPE FLATTERY (c). After he had ſteered ſome time along the ſhore, for what was believed to be the open channel, the petty officer at the maſt-head cried aloud that he ſaw land a-head, which extended quite round to the three Iſlands, and that between the ſhip and them there was a large reef. Mr. Cook upon this ran up the maſt-head himſelf, and plainly diſcerned the reef, which was ſo far to the windward that it could not be weathered. As to the land which the petty officer had ſuppoſed to be the main, our Commander was of opinion that it was only a cluſter of ſmall Iſlands. The Maſter and ſome others, who went up the maſt-head after the Lieutenant, were entirely of a different opinion. All of them were poſitive that the land in ſight did not conſiſt of Iſlands, but that it was a part of the main; and they rendered their report ſtill more alarming, by adding, that they ſaw breakers around them on every ſide. In a ſituation ſo critical and doubtful, Mr. Cook thought proper to come to an anchor, under a high point, which he immediately aſcended, that he might have a farther view of the ſea and country. The proſpect he had from this place, which he called POINT LOOK-OUT, clearly confirmed him in his former opinion; the juſtneſs of which diſplayed one of the numerous inſtances wherein it was manifeſt how much he exceeded the people about him in the ſagacity of his judgment concerning matters of navigation. The Lieutenant, being anxious to diſcover more diſtinctly the ſituation of the ſhoals, and the channel between them, determined to viſit the northernmoſt and largeſt of the three Iſlands before-mentioned; which, from its height, and its lying five leagues out to ſea, was peculiarly adapted to his purpoſe. Accordingly, in company with Mr. Banks, whoſe fortitude and curioſity ſtimulated him to take a ſhare in every undertaking, he ſet out in the pinnace, on the morning of the eleventh, upon this expedition. He ſent, at the ſame time, the Maſter in the yawl, to ſound between the low Iſlands and the main land. About one o'clock, the Gentlemen reached the place of their deſtination, and immediately, with a mixture of hope and fear, proportioned to the importance of the buſineſs, and the uncertainty of the event, aſcended the higheſt hill they could find. When the Lieutenant took a ſurvey of the proſpect around him, he diſcovered, on the outſide of the Iſlands, and at the diſtance of two or three leagues from them, a reef of rocks, upon which the ſea broke in a dreadful ſurf, and which extended farther than his ſight could reach. Hence, however, he collected that there were no ſhoals beyond them; and, as he perceived ſeveral breaks or openings in the reef, and deep water between that and the Iſlands, he entertained hopes of getting without the rocks. But though he ſaw reaſon to indulge, in ſome degree, this expectation, the hazineſs of the weather prevented him from obtaining that ſatisfactory intelligence which he ardently deſired. He determined, therefore, by ſtaying all night upon the Iſland, to try whether the next day would not afford him a more diſtinct and comprehenſive proſpect. Accordingly, the Gentlemen took up their lodging under the ſhelter of a buſh which grew upon the beach. Not many hours were devoted by them to ſleep; for at three in the morning Mr. Cook mounted the hill a ſecond time, but had the mortification of finding the weather much more hazy than it had been on the preceding day. He had early ſent the pinnace, with one of the mates, to ſound between the Iſland and reefs, and to examine what appeared to be a channel through them. The mate, in conſequence of its blowing hard, did not dare to venture into the channel, which he reported to be very narrow. Nevertheleſs, our Commander, who judged from the deſcrip-deſcription of the place that it had been ſeen to diſadvantage, was not diſcouraged by this account. While the Lieutenant was engaged in his ſurvey, Mr. Banks, always attentive to the great object of natural hiſtory, collected ſome plants which he had never met with before. No animals were perceived upon the place excepting lizards, for which reaſon the Gentlemen gave it the name of LIZARD ISLAND. In their return to the ſhip, they landed on a low ſandy Iſland that had trees upon it, and which abounded with an incredible number of birds, principally ſea-fowl. Here they found the neſt of an eagle, and the neſt of ſome other bird, of what ſpecies they could not diſtinguiſh; but it muſt certainly be one of the largeſt kinds that exiſts. This was apparent from the enormous ſize of the neſt, which was built with ſticks upon the ground, and was no leſs than ſix and twenty feet in circumference, and two feet eight inches in height [P]. The ſpot which the Gentlemen were now upon, they called EAGLE ISLAND.

When Lieutenant Cook got on board, he entered into a very ſerious deliberation concerning the courſe he ſhould purſue. After conſidering what he had ſeen himſelf, and the Maſter's report, he was of opinion that by keeping in with the main land, he ſhould run the riſk of being locked in by the great reef, and of being compelled at laſt to return back in ſearch of another paſſage. By the delay that would hence be occaſioned, our Navigators would almoſt certainly be prevented from getting in time to the Eaſt Indies, which was a matter of the utmoſt importance, and indeed of abſolute neceſſity; for they had now not much more than three months proviſion on board, at ſhort allowance. The judgment the Lieutenant had formed, together with the facts and appearances on which it was grounded, he ſtated to his officers, by whom it was unanimouſly agreed, that the beſt thing they could do would be to quit the coaſt entirely, till they could approach it again with leſs danger. In purſuance of this reſolution, the Endeavour, early in the morning of the thirteenth, got under ſail, and ſucceſsfully paſſed through one of the channels or openings in the outer reef, which Mr. Cook had ſeen from the Iſland. When the ſhip had gotten without the breakers, there was no ground within one hundred and fifty fathom, and our people found a large ſea rolling in upon them from the South-eaſt. This was a certain ſign that neither land nor ſhoals were near them in that direction. So happy a change in the ſituation of our Voyagers was ſenſibly felt in every breaſt, and was viſible in every countenance. They had been little leſs than three months in a ſtate that perpetually threatened them with deſtruction. Frequently had they paſſed their nights at anchor within hearing of the ſurge that broke over the ſhoals and rocks; and they knew that, if by any accident the anchors ſhould not hold againſt an almoſt continual tempeſt, they muſt in a few minutes inevitably periſh. They had ſailed three hundred and ſixty leagues, without once, even for a moment, having a man out of the chains heaving the lead. This was a circumſtance which perhaps had never happened to any other veſſel. But now, our Navigators found themſelves in an open ſea, with deep water; and the joy they experienced was proportioned to their late danger, and their preſent ſecurity. Nevertheleſs, the very waves, which proved by their ſwell that our people had no rocks or ſhoals to fear, convinced them, at the ſame time, that they could not put a confidence in the ſhip equal to what they had done before ſhe ſtruck. So far were her leaks widened by the blows ſhe received from the waves, that ſhe admitted no leſs than nine inches of water in an hour. If the company had not been lately in ſo much more imminent danger, this fact, conſidering the ſtate of the pumps, and the navigation which was ſtill in view, would have been a matter of very ſerious concern. The paſſage or channel, through which the Endeavour paſſed into the open ſea beyond the reef, lies in latitude 14° 32′ South. It may always be known by the three high Iſlands within it, to which, on account of the uſe they may be of in guiding the way of future voyagers, our Commander gave the appellation of the ISLANDS OF DIRECTION. It was not a long time that our Navigators enjoyed the ſatisfaction of being free from the alarm of danger. As they were purſuing their courſe in the night of the fifteenth, they ſounded frequently, but had no bottom with one hundred and forty fathom, nor any ground with the ſame length of line. Nevertheleſs, at four in the morning of the ſixteenth, they plainly heard the roaring of the ſurf, and at break of day ſaw it foaming to a vaſt height, at not more than the diſtance of a mile. The waves which rolled in upon the reef carried the veſſel towards it with great rapidity; and, at the ſame time, our people could reach no ground with an anchor, and had not a breath of wind for the ſail. In a ſituation ſo dreadful, there was no reſource but in the boats; and, moſt unhappily, the pinnace was under repair. By the help, however, of the long-boat and the yawl, which were ſent a-head to tow, the ſhip's head was got round to the northward, a circumſtance which might delay, if it could not prevent deſtruction. This was not effected till ſix o'clock, and our Voyagers were not then a hundred yards from the rock, upon which the ſame billow that waſhed the ſide of the veſſel broke to a tremendous height the very next time it roſe. There was only, therefore, a dreary valley between the Engliſh and deſtruction; a valley no wider than the baſe of one wave, while the ſea under them was unfathomable. The Carpenter, in the mean while, having haſtily patched up the pinnace, ſhe was hoiſted out, and ſent a-head to tow, in aid of the other boats. But all theſe efforts would have been ineffectual, if a light air of wind had not ſprung up, juſt at the criſis of our people's fate. It was ſo light an air, that at any other time it would not have been obſerved: but it was ſufficient to turn the ſcale in favour of our Navigators; and, in conjunction with the aſſiſtance which was afforded by the boats, it gave the ſhip a perceptible motion obliquely from the reef. The hopes of the company now revived: but in leſs than ten minutes a dead calm ſucceeded, and the veſſel was again driven towards the breakers, which were not at the diſtance of two hundred yards. However, before the ground was loſt which had already been gained, the ſame light breeze returned, and laſted ten minutes more. During this time, a ſmall opening, about a quarter of a mile diſtant, was diſcovered in the reef; upon which, Mr. Cook immediately ſent one of the Mates to examine it, who reported that its breadth was not more than the length of the ſhip, but that within it there was ſmooth water. This diſcovery preſented the proſpect of a poſſibility of eſcape, by puſhing the veſſel through the opening. Accordingly, the attempt was made, but it failed of ſucceſs; for when our people, by the joint aſſiſtance of their boats and the breeze, had reached the opening, they found that it had become high-water; and, to their great ſurprize, they met the tide of ebb running out like a mill-ſtream. In direct contrariety to their expectations, ſome advantage was gained by this event. Though it was impoſſible to go through the opening, the ſtream which prevented the Endeavour from doing it, carried her out about a quarter of a mile; and the boats were ſo much aſſiſted in towing her, by the tide of ebb, that at noon ſhe had gained the diſtance of nearly two miles. However, there was yet too much reaſon to deſpair of deliverance. For even if the breeze, which had now died away, had revived, our Navigators were ſtill embayed in the reef: and the tide of ebb being ſpent, the tide of flood, notwithſtanding their utmoſt efforts, drove the ſhip back again into her former perilous ſituation. Happily, about this time, another opening was perceived, nearly a mile to the weſtward. Our Commander immediately ſent Mr. Hicks, the firſt Lieutenant, to examine it; and in the mean while the Endeavour ſtruggled hard with the flood, ſometimes gaining and ſometimes loſing ground. During this ſevere ſervice, every man did his duty with as much calmneſs and regularity as if no danger had been near. At length, Mr. Hicks returned with the intelligence that the opening, though narrow and hazardous, was capable of being paſſed. The bare poſſibility of paſſing it was encouragement ſufficient to make the attempt; and indeed all danger was leſs to be dreaded by our people than that of continuing in their preſent ſituation. A light breeze having fortunately ſprung up, this, in conjunction with the aid of the boats, and the very tide of flood that would otherwiſe have been their deſtruction, enabled them to enter the opening, through which they were hurried with amazing rapidity. Such was the force of the torrent by which they were carried along, that they were kept from driving againſt either ſide of the channel, which in breadth was not more than a quarter of a mile. While they were ſhooting this gulph, their ſoundings were remarkably irregular, varying from thirty to ſeven fathom, and the ground at bottom was foul. As ſoon as our Navigators had gotten within the reef, they came to an anchor; and their joy was exceedingly great at having regained a ſituation which three days before they had quitted with the utmoſt pleaſure and tranſport. Rocks and ſhoals, which are always dangerous to the mariner even when they are previouſly known and marked, are peculiarly dangerous in ſeas which have never been navigated before; and in this part of the globe they are more perilous than in any other. Here they conſiſt of reefs of coral rock, which riſe like a wall almoſt perpendicularly out of the deep, and are always overflowed at high-water. Here, too, the enormous waves of the vaſt ſouthern ocean, meeting with ſo abrupt a reſiſtance, break, with inconceivable violence, in a ſurf which cannot be produced by any rocks or ſtorms in the northern hemiſphere. A crazy ſhip, ſhortneſs of proviſion, and a want of every neceſſary, greatly increaſed the danger to our preſent Voyagers of navigating in this ocean. Nevertheleſs, ſuch is the ardour of the human mind, and ſo flattering is the diſtinction of a firſt diſcoverer, that Lieutenant Cook and his companions chearfully encountered every peril, and ſubmitted to every inconvenience. They choſe rather to incur the charge of imprudence and temerity, than to leave a country unexplored which they had diſcovered, or to afford the leaſt colour for its being ſaid, that they were deficient in perſeverance and fortitude (d). It ſcarcely needs to be added, that it was the high and magnanimous ſpirit of our Commander, in particular, which inſpired his people with ſo much reſolution and vigour. The Lieutenant, having now gotten within the reef, determined, whatever might be the conſequence, to keep the main land on board in his future route to the northward. His reaſon for this determination was, that, if he had gone without the reef again, he might have been carried by it ſo far from the coaſt, as to prevent his being able to aſcertain whether this country did, or did not, join to New Guinea; a queſtion which he had fixed upon reſolving, from the firſt moment that he had come within ſight of land. To the opening through which the Endeavour had paſſed, our Commander, with a proper ſenſe of

of gratitude to the Supreme Being, gave the name of PROVIDENTIAL CHANNEL. In the morning of the ſeventeenth, the boats had been ſent out, to ſee what refreſhments could be procured; and returned in the afternoon with two hundred and forty pounds of the meat of ſhell-fiſh, chiefly of cockles. Some of the cockles were as much as two men could move, and contained twenty pounds of good meat. Mr. Banks, who had gone out in his little boat, accompanied by Dr. Solander, brought back a variety of curious ſhells, and many ſpecies of corals. In the proſecution of the voyage, our people, on the nineteenth, were encompaſſed on every ſide with rocks and ſhoals: but, as they had lately been expoſed to much greater danger, and theſe objects were now become familiar, they began to regard them comparatively with little concern. On the twenty-firſt, there being two points in view, between which our Navigators could ſee no land, they conceived hopes of having at laſt found a paſſage into the Indian ſea. Mr. Cook, however, that he might be able to determine the matter with greater certainty, reſolved to land upon an Iſland which lies at the South-eaſt point of the paſſage. Accordingly, he went into the boat, with a party of men, accompanied by Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander. As they were getting to ſhore, ſome of the natives ſeemed inclined to oppoſe their landing, but ſoon walked leiſurely away. The Gentlemen immediately climbed the higheſt hill, from which no land could be ſeen between the South-weſt and Weſt-ſouth-weſt; ſo that the Lieutenant had not the leaſt doubt of finding a channel through which he could paſs to New Guinea. As he was now about to quit the coaſt of New Holland, which he had traced from latitude thirty-eight to this place, and which he was certain no European had ever ſeen before, he once more hoiſted Engliſh colours. He had, indeed, already taken poſſeſſion of ſeveral particular parts of the country, but he now took poſſeſſion of the whole eaſtern coaſt, with all the bays harbours, rivers, and Iſlands ſituated upon it, from latitude 38° to latitude 10° ½′ South, in right of His Majeſty King George the Third, and by the name of NEW SOUTH WALES. The party then fired three vollies of ſmall arms, which were anſwered by the ſame number from the ſhip. When the Gentlemen had performed this ceremony upon the Iſland, which they called POSSESSION ISLAND, they reimbarked in their boat, and, in conſequence of a rapid ebb tide, had a very difficult and tedious return to the veſſel. On the twenty-third, the wind had come round to the South-weſt; and though it was but a gentle breeze, yet it was accompanied by a ſwell from the ſame quarter, which, in conjunction with other circumſtances, confirmed Mr. Cook in his opinion that he had arrived to the northern extremity of New Holland, and that he had now an open ſea to the weſtward. Theſe circumſtances afforded him peculiar ſatisfaction, not only becauſe the dangers and fatigues of the voyage were drawing to a concluſion, but becauſe it could no longer be doubted whether New Holland and New Guinea were two ſeparate Iſlands. The North-eaſt entrance of the ſtreight lies in the latitude of 10° 39′ South, and in the longitude of 218° 36′ Weſt; and the paſſage is formed by the main land, and by a congeries of Iſlands, to the North-weſt, called by the Lieutenant the PRINCE OF WALES'S ISLANDS, and which may probably extend as far as to New Guinea. Their difference is very great both in height and circuit, and many ſeemed to be well covered with herbage and wood: nor was there any doubt of their being inhabited. Our Commander was perſuaded, that among theſe Iſlands as good paſſages might be found as that through which the veſſel came, and the acceſs to which might be leſs perilous. The determination of this matter he would not have left to future navigators, if he had been leſs harraſſed by danger and fatigue, and had poſſeſſed a ſhip in better condition for the purpoſe. To the channel through which he paſſed, he gave the name of ENDEAVOUR STREIGHTS (e).

New Holland, or, as the eaſtern part of it was called by Lieutenant Cook, New South Wales, is the largeſt country in the known world which does not bear the name of a continent. The length of coaſt along which our people ſailed, when reduced to a ſtrait line, was no leſs than twenty-ſeven degrees of latitude, amounting nearly to two thouſand miles. In fact, the ſquare ſurface of the Iſland is much more than equal to the whole of Europe. For a particular account of the natural and animal productions of the country, and a minute deſcription of its inhabitants, we muſt refer to the voyage at large. In general, we may obſerve, with regard to the natives, that their number bears no proportion to the extent of their territory. So many as thirty of them had never been ſeen together but once, and that was at Botany Bay. Even when they appeared determined to engage the Engliſh, they could not muſter above fourteen or fifteen fighting men; and it was manifeſt that their ſheds and houſes did not lie ſo cloſe together, as to be capable of accommodating a larger party. Indeed our Navigators ſaw only the ſea-coaſt on the eaſtern ſide; between which and the weſtern ſhore there is an immenſe tract of land that is wholly unexplored. But it is evident, from the totally uncultivated ſtate of the country which was ſeen by our people, that this immenſe tract muſt either be altogether deſolate, or at leaſt more thinly inhabited than the parts which were viſited. Of traffic the natives had no idea, nor could any be communicated to them. The things which were given them they received, but did not appear to underſtand the ſigns of the Engliſh requiring a return. There was no reaſon to believe that they eat animal food raw. As they have no veſſel in which water can be boiled, they either broil their meat upon the coals, or bake it in a hole by the help of hot ſtones, agreeably to the cuſtom of the inhabitants of the South-Sea Iſlands. Fire is produced by them with great facility, and they ſpread it in a ſurprizing manner. For producing it they take two pieces of ſoft wood, one of which is a ſtick about eight or nine inches long, while the other piece is flat. The ſtick they ſhape into an obtuſe point at one end, and preſſing it upon the flat wood, turn it nimbly by holding it between both their hands. In doing this, they often ſhift their hands up, and then move them down, with a view of increaſing the preſſure as much as poſſible. By this proceſs they obtain fire in leſs than two minutes, and from the ſmalleſt ſpark they carry it to any height or extent with great ſpeed and dexterity. It was not poſſible, conſidering the limited intercourſe which our Navigators had with the natives of New South Wales, that much could be learned with regard to their language. Nevertheleſs, as this is an object of no ſmall curioſity to the learned, and is, indeed, of peculiar importance in ſearching into the origin of the various nations that have been diſcovered, Mr. Cook and his friends took ſome pains to collect ſuch a ſpecimen of it as might, in a certain degree, anſwer the purpoſe. Our Commander did not quit the country without making ſuch obſervations, relative to the currents and tides upon the coaſt, as, while they increaſe the general knowledge of navigation, may be of ſervice to future voyagers. The irregularity of the tides is an object worthy of notice (f).

From the coaſt of New South Wales the Lieutenant ſteered, on the twenty-third of Auguſt, for the coaſt of New Guinea, and on the twenty-fifth fell upon a dangerous ſhoal. The ſhip was in ſix fathom, but ſcarcely two were found, upon ſounding round her, at the diſtance of half a cable's length. This ſhoal was of ſuch an extent, reaching from the Eaſt round by the North and Weſt to the South-weſt, that there was no method for the veſſel to get clear of it, but by her going back the way in which ſhe came. Here was another hair's-breadth eſcape; for it was nearly high-water, and there ran a ſhort cockling ſea, which if the ſhip had ſtruck muſt very ſoon have bulged her. So dangerous was her ſituation, that if her direction had been half a cable's length more either to the right or left, ſhe muſt have ſtruck before the ſignal for the ſhoal could have been made. It had been Lieutenant Cook's intention to ſteer North-weſt till he had made the South coaſt of New Guinea, and it was his purpoſe to touch upon it, if that could be found practicable. But in conſequence of the ſhoals he met with, he altered his courſe, in the hope of finding a clearer channel, and deeper water. His hope was agreeably verified; for by noon, on the twenty-ſixth, the depth of water was gradually increaſed to ſeventeen fathom (g). On the twenty-eighth, our Voyagers found the ſea to be in many places covered with a brown ſcum, ſuch as the ſailors uſually call ſpawn. When the Lieutenant firſt ſaw it he was alarmed, fearing that the ſhip was again among ſhoals; but the depth of water, upon ſounding, was diſcovered to be equal to what it was in other places. The ſame appearance had been obſerved upon the coaſts of Brazil and New Holland, in which caſes it was at no great diſtance from the ſhore. Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander examined the ſcum, but could not determine what it was, any farther than as they ſaw reaſon to ſuppoſe that it belonged to the vegetable kingdom. The ſailors, upon meeting with more of it, gave up the notion of its being ſpawn, and finding a new name for it, called it ſea-ſaw-duſt. At day-break, on the third of September, our Navigators came in ſight of New Guinea, and ſtood in for it, with a freſh gale, till nine o'clock, when they brought to, being in three fathom water, and within about three or four miles of land. Upon this the pinnace was hoiſted, and the Lieutenant ſet off from the ſhip with the boat's crew, accompanied by Mr. Banks, Dr. Solander, and Mr. Banks's ſervants, being in all twelve perſons well armed. As ſoon as they came a-ſhore, they diſcovered the prints of human feet, which could not long have been impreſſed upon the ſand. Concluding, therefore, that the natives were at no great diſtance, and there being a thick wood which reached to within a hundred yards of the water, the Gentlemen thought it neceſſary to proceed with caution, leſt their retreat to the boat ſhould be cut off. When they had walked ſome way along the ſkirts of the wood, they came to a grove of cocoa-nut trees, at the fruit of which they looked very wiſhfully; but not thinking it ſafe to climb, they were obliged to leave it without taſting a ſingle nut. After they had advanced about a quarter of a mile from the boat, three Indians ruſhed out of the wood with a hideous ſhout, and as they ran towards the Engliſh, the foremoſt threw ſomething out of his hand, which flew on one ſide of him, and burned exactly like gunpowder, though without making any report. The two other natives having at the ſame inſtant diſcharged their arrows, the Lieutenant and his party were under a neceſſity of firing, firſt with ſmall ſhot, and a ſecond time with ball. Upon this, the three Indians ran away with great agility. As Mr. Cook had no diſpoſition forcibly to invade this country, either to gratify the appetites or the curioſity of his people, and was convinced that nothing was to be done upon friendly terms, he and his companions returned with all expedition towards their boat. When they were aboard, they rowed abreaſt of the natives, who had come down to the ſhore in aid of their countrymen, and whoſe number now amounted to between ſixty and a hundred. Their appearance was much the ſame as that of the New Hollanders: they nearly reſembled them in ſtature, and in having their hair ſhort and cropped. Like them, alſo, they were abſolutely naked; but the colour of their ſkin did not ſeem quite ſo dark, which, however, might be owing to their being leſs dirty. While the Engliſh Gentlemen were viewing them, they were ſhouting defiance, and letting off their fires by four or five at a time. Our people could not imagine what theſe fires were, or what purpoſes they were intended to anſwer. Thoſe who diſcharged them had in their hands a ſhort piece of ſtick, which they ſwung ſideways from them, and immediately there iſſued fire and ſmoke, exactly reſembling thoſe of a muſquet, and of as ſhort a duration. The men on board the ſhip who obſerved this ſurprizing phænomenon, were ſo far deceived by it as to believe that the Indians had fire-arms. To the perſons in the boat it had the appearance of the firing of vollies, without a report. The place where this tranſaction happened lies in the latitude of 6° 15′ South, and is about ſixty-five leagues to the North-eaſt of Port Saint Auguſtine, or Walche Caep, and is near what is called in the charts C. de la Colta de St. Bonaventura. In every part of the coaſt, the land is covered with a vaſt luxuriance of wood and herbage. The cocoa-nut, the bread-fruit, and the plantain-tree, flouriſh here in the higheſt perfection; beſides which the country abounds with moſt of the trees, ſhrubs, and plants, that are common to the South Sea Iſlands, New Zealand, and New Holland (b).

(g) The latitude was now 10° 10′ South, and the longitude 220° 12′ Weſt.

Soon after Mr. Cook and his party had returned to the ſhip, our Voyagers made ſail to the weſtward, the Lieutenant having reſolved to ſpend no more time upon this coaſt; a reſolution which was greatly to the ſatisfaction of a very conſiderable majority of his people. Some of the officers indeed were particularly urgent that a number of men might be ſent aſhore, to cut down the cocoa-nut trees for the ſake of their fruit. This, however, our Commander abſolutely refuſed, as equally unjuſt and cruel. It was morally certain, from the preceding behaviour of the natives, that if their property had been invaded they would have made a vigorous effort to defend it; in which caſe the lives of many of them muſt have been ſacrificed; and perhaps, too, ſeveral of the Engliſh would have fallen in the conteſt. The neceſſity of a quarrel with the Indians would have been regretted by the Lieutenant, even if he had been impelled to it by a want of the neceſſaries of life; but to engage in it for the tranſient gratification that would ariſe from obtaining two or three hundred green cocoa-nuts, appeared in his view highly criminal. The ſame calamity, at leaſt with regard to the natives, would probably have occurred, if he had ſought for any other place on the coaſt, to the northward and weſtward, where the ſhip might have lain ſo near the ſhore as to cover his people with the guns when they had landed. Beſides, there was cauſe to believe, that, before ſuch a place could have been found, our Navigators would have been carried ſo far to the Weſtward as to be obliged to go to Batavia, on the North ſide of Java. This, in Mr. Cook's opinion, would not have been ſo ſafe a paſſage as that to the South of Java, through the ſtreights of Sunda. Another reaſon for his making the beſt of his way to Batavia, was the leakineſs of the veſſel, which rendered it doubtful whether it would not be neceſſary to heave her down when ſhe arrived at that port. Our Commander's reſolution was farther confirmed by the conſideration, that no diſcovery could be expected in ſeas which had already been navigated, and where the coaſt had been ſufficiently deſcribed both by Spaniſh and Dutch geographers, and eſpecially by the latter. The only merit claimed by the Lieutenant, in this part of his voyage, was the having eſtabliſhed it as a fact beyond all controverſy, that New Holland and New Guinea are two diſtinct countries. Without ſtaying, therefore, on the coaſt of New Guinea, the Endeavour, on the ſame day, directed her courſe to the weſtward, in purſuing which Mr. Cook had an opportunity of rectifying the errors of former navigators. Very early in the morning of the ſixth of September, our Voyagers paſſed a ſmall Iſland which lay to the North-north-weſt; and at day-break they diſcovered another low Iſland, extending from that quarter to North-north-eaſt. Upon the laſt Iſland, which appeared to be of conſiderable extent, the Lieutenant would have landed to examine its produce, if the wind had not blown ſo freſh as to render his deſign impracticable. Unleſs theſe two Iſlands belong to the Arrou Iſlands, they have no place in the charts; and if they do belong to the Arrou Iſlands, they are laid down at too great a diſtance from New Guinea (i). Some other land which was ſeen this day ought, by its diſtance from New Guinea, to have been part of the Arrou Iſlands; but if any dependence can be placed on former charts, it lies a degree farther to the South. On the ſeventh, when the ſhip was in latitude 9° 30′ South, and longitude 229° 34′ Weſt, our people ought to have been in ſight of the Weaſel Iſles, which in the charts are laid down at the diſtance of twenty or twenty-five leagues from the coaſt of New Holland. But as our Commander ſaw nothing of them, he concluded that they muſt have been placed erroneouſly. Nor will this be deemed ſurprizing, when it is conſidered that not only theſe Iſlands, but the coaſt which bounds this ſea, have been explored at different times, and by different perſons, who had not all the requiſites for keeping accurate journals which are now poſſeſſed; and whoſe various diſcoveries have been delineated upon charts by others, perhaps at the diſtance of more than a century after ſuch diſcoveries had been made. In purſuing their courſe, our Navigators paſſed the Iſlands of Timor, Timor-lavet, Rotte, and Seman. While they were near the two latter Iſlands, they obſerved about ten o'clock at night, on the ſixteenth of the month, a phænomenon in the heavens, which in many particulars reſembled ſembled the Aurora Borealis, though in others it was very different. It conſiſted of a dull reddiſh light, which reached about twenty degrees above the horizon; and though its extent, at times, varied much, it never comprehended leſs than eight or ten points of the compaſs. Through, and out of the general appearance, there paſſed rays of light of a brighter colour, which vaniſhed, and were renewed nearly in the ſame manner as thoſe of the Aurora Borealis, but entirely without the tremulous or vibratory motion which is ſeen in that phænomenon. The body of this light bore South-ſou[illegible]-eaſt from the ſhip, and continued, without any diminution of its brightneſs, till twelve o'clo[illegible], and probably a longer time, as the Gentlemen were prevented from obſerving it farther, by [illegible] their retiring to ſleep. By the ſixteenth, Lieutenant Cook had gotten clear of all the Iſlands w[illegible]-hich had then been laid down in the maps as ſituated between Timor and Java, and did not ex[illegible]-ect to meet with any other in that quarter. But the next morning an Iſland was ſeen bearing Weſt-ſouth-weſt, and at firſt he believed that he had made a new diſcovery. As ſoon as our Voyagers had come cloſe in with the North ſide of it, they had the pleaſing proſpect of houſes and cocoa-nut trees, and of what ſtill more agreeably ſurprized them, numerous flocks of ſheep. Many of the people on board were at this time in a bad ſtate of health, and no ſmall number of them had been diſſatisfied with the Lieutenant for not having touched at Timor. He readily embraced, therefore, the opportunity of landing at a place which appeared ſo well calculated to ſupply the neceſſities of the company, and to remove both the ſickneſs and the diſcontent which had ſpread among them (k). This place proved to be the Iſland of SAVU, where a ſettlement had lately been made by the Dutch. The great deſign of our Commander was to obtain proviſions, which, after ſome difficulty, and ſome jealouſy on the part of Mr. Lange, the Dutch Reſident, were procured. Theſe proviſions were nine buffaloes, ſix ſheep, three hogs, thirty dozen of fowls, many dozens of eggs, ſome cocoa nuts, a few limes, a little garlic, and ſeveral hundred gallons of palm-ſyrup. In obtaining theſe refreſhments at a reaſonable price, the Engliſh were not a little aſſiſted by an old Indian, who appeared to be a perſon of conſiderable authority under the King of the country. The Lieutenant and his friends were one day very hoſpitably entertained by the King himſelf, though the royal etiquette did not permit his Majeſty to partake of the banquet (l). So little, in general, had the Iſland of Savu been known, that Mr. Cook had never ſeen a map or chart in which it is clearly or accurately laid down. The middle of it lies in about the latitude of 10° 35′ South, and longitude 237° 30′ Weſt; and from the ſhip it preſented a proſpect than which nothing can be more beautiful. This proſpect, from the verdure and culture of the country, from the hills, richly clothed, which riſe in a gentle and regular aſcent, and from the ſtatelineſs and beauty of the trees, is delightful to a degree that can ſcarcely be conceived by the moſt lively imagination. With regard to the productions and natives of the Iſland, the account which our Navigators were enabled to give of them, and which is copious and entertaining, was, in a great meaſure, derived from the information of Mr. Lange. An extraordinary relation is given of the morals of the people of this Iſland, and which, if true, muſt fill every virtuous mind with pleaſure. Their characters and conduct are repreſented as irreproachable, even upon the principles of Chriſtianity. Though no man is permitted to have more than one wife, an illicit commerce between the ſexes is ſcarcely known among them. Inſtances of theft are very rare; and ſo far are they from revenging a ſuppoſed injury by murder, that when any differences ariſe between them, they immediately and implicitly refer it to the determination of their King. They will not ſo much as make it the ſubject of private debate, leſt they ſhould hence be provoked to reſentment and ill-will. Their delicacy and cleanlineſs are ſuited to the purity of their morals. From the ſpecimen which is given of the language of Savu, it appears to have ſome affinity with that of the South Sea Iſlands. Many of the words are exactly the ſame, and the terms of numbers are derived from the ſame origin (m).

On the twenty-firſt of September, our Navigators got under ſail, and having purſued their voyage till the firſt of October, on that day they came within ſight of the Iſland of Java. During their courſe from Savu, Lieutenant Cook allowed twenty minutes a day for the weſterly current, which he concluded muſt run ſtrong at this time, eſpecially on the coaſt of Java; and accordingly, he found that this allowance was exactly equivalent to the effect of the current upon the ſhip. Such was the ſagacity of our Commander's judgment in whatever related to navigation. On the ſecond, two Dutch ſhips being ſeen to lie off Anger Point, the Lieutenant ſent Mr. Hicks on board one of them, to enquire news concerning England, from which our people had ſo long been abſent. Mr. Hicks brought back the agreeable intelligence, that the Swallow, commanded by Captain Carteret, had been at Batavia two years before. In the morning of the fifth, a prow came alongſide of the Endeavour, with a Dutch officer, who ſent down to Mr. Cook a printed paper in Engliſh, duplicates of which he had in other languages. This paper was regularly ſigned, in the name of the Governor and Council of the Indies, by their Secretary, and contained nine queſtions, very ill expreſſed, two of which only the Lieutenant thought proper to anſwer. Theſe were what regarded the nation and name of his veſſel, and whither whither ſhe was bound. On the ninth, our Voyagers ſtood in for Batavia road, where they found the Harcourt Indiaman from England, two Engliſh private traders, and a number of Dutch ſhips. Immediately a boat came on board the Endeavour, and the officer who commanded having enquired who our people were, and whence they came, inſtantly returned with ſuch anſwers as were given him. In the mean time, Mr. Cook ſent a Lieutenant aſhore to acquaint the Governor of his arrival, and to make an apology for not having ſaluted; a ceremony he had judged better to omit; as he could only make uſe of three guns, excepting the ſwivels, which he was of opinion would not be heard. It being univerſally agreed that the ſhip could not ſafely proceed to Europe without an examination of her bottom, our Commander determined to apply for leave to heave her down at Batavia; and for this purpoſe he drew up a requeſt in writing, which, after he had waited firſt upon the Governor-General, and then upon the Council, was readily complied with, and he was told that he ſhould have every thing he wanted. In the evening of the tenth, there was a dreadful ſtorm of thunder, lightning, and rain, during which the main-maſt of one of the Dutch Eaſt Indiamen was ſplit, and carried away by the deck; and the main-top-maſt, and top-gallant-maſt were ſhivered to pieces. The ſtroke was probably directed by an iron ſpindle which was at the main-top-gallant-maſt head. As this ſhip lay very near the Endeavour, ſhe could ſcarcely have avoided ſharing the ſame fate, had it not been for the conducting chain, which fortunately had been juſt gotten up, and which conveyed the lightning over the ſide of the veſſel. But though ſhe eſcaped the lightning, the exploſion ſhook her like an earthquake; and the chain, at the ſame time, appeared like a line of fire. Mr. Cook has embraced this occaſion of earneſtly recommending ſimilar chains to every ſhip; and hath expreſſed his hope that all who read his narrative will be warned againſt having an iron ſpindle at the maſt-head. The Engliſh Gentlemen had taken up their lodging and boarding at a hotel, or kind of inn, kept by the order of Government. Here they met with thoſe impoſitions, in point of expence and treatment, which are too common to admit of much ſurprize. It was not long, however, that they ſubmitted to ill uſage. By a farther acquaintance with the manner of dealing with their hoſt, and by ſpirited remonſtrances, they procured a better furniſhed table. Mr. Banks, in a few days, hired a ſmall houſe for himſelf and his party; and as ſoon as he was ſettled in his new habitation, ſent for Tupia, who had hitherto continued on board on account of ſickneſs. When he quitted the ſhip, and after he came into the boat, he was exceedingly lifeleſs and dejected; but no ſooner did he enter the town than he appeared to be inſpired with another ſoul. A ſcene ſo entirely new and extraordinary filled him with amazement. The houſes, carriages, ſtreets, people, and a multiplicity of other objects, ruſhing upon him at once, produced an effect ſimilar to what is aſcribed to enchantment. His boy, Tayeto, expreſſed his wonder and delight in a ſtill more rapturous manner. He danced along the ſtreets in a kind of extacy, examining every object with a reſtleſs and eager curioſity, which was excited and gratified every moment. Tupia's attention was particularly excited by the various dreſſes of the paſſing multitude; and when he was informed that at Batavia every one wore the dreſs of his own country, he expreſſed his deſire of appearing in the garb of Otaheite. Accordingly, South Sea cloth being ſent for from the ſhip, he equipped himſelf with great expedition and dexterity. Lieutenant Cook imagined that at Batavia he ſhould find it eaſy to take up what money he might want for repairing and refitting the Endeavour; but in this he was miſtaken. No private perſon could be found who had ability and inclination to furniſh the ſum which was neceſſary. In this exigency, the Lieutenant had recourſe, by a written requeſt, to the Governor, from whom he obtained an order for being ſupplied out of the Dutch Company's treaſury. When our Voyagers had been only nine days at Batavia, they began to feel the fatal effects of the climate and ſituation. Tupia, after his firſt flow of ſpirits had ſubſided, grew every day worſe and worſe; and Tayeto was ſeized with an inflammation upon his lungs. Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander were attacked by fevers, and, in a little time, almoſt every perſon, both on board and on ſhore, was ſick. The diſtreſs of our people was indeed very great, and the proſpect before them diſcouraging in the higheſt degree. Tupia, being deſirous of breathing a freer air than among the numerous houſes that obſtructed it aſhore, had a tent erected for him on Cooper's Iſland, to which he was accompanied by Mr. Banks, who attended this poor Indian with the greateſt humanity, till he was rendered incapable of doing it, by the violent increaſe of his own diſorder. On the fifth of November, Mr. Monkhouſe, the Surgeon of the ſhip, a ſenſible, ſkilful man, whoſe loſs was not a little aggravated by the ſituation of the Engliſh, fell the firſt ſacrifice to this fatal country. Tayeto died on the ninth, and Tupia, who loved him with the tenderneſs of a parent, ſunk at once after the loſs of the boy, and ſurvived him only a few days. The diſorders of Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander grew to ſuch a height, that the Phyſician declared they had no chance of preſerving their lives but by removing into the country. Accordingly, a houſe was hired for them at the diſtance of about two miles from the town; where, in conſequence of enjoying a purer air, and being better nurſed by two Malayan women, whom they had bought, they recovered by ſlow degrees. At length, Lieutenant Cook was himſelf taken ill; and out of the whole ſhip's company, not more than ten were able to do duty.

duty. In the midſt of theſe diſtreſſes, our Commander was diligently and vigorouſly attentive to the repair of his veſſel. When her bottom came to be examined, ſhe was found to be in a worſe condition than had been apprehended. Her falſe keel and main keel were both of them greatly injured; a large quantity of the ſheathing was torn off; and among ſeveral planks which were much damaged, two of them, and the half of a third, were ſo worn for the length of ſix feet, that they were not above the eighth part of an inch in thickneſs: and here the worms had made way quite into the timbers. In this ſtate the Endeavour had ſailed many hundred leagues, in a quarter of the globe where navigation is dangerous in the higheſt degree. It was happy for our Voyagers that they were ignorant of their perilous ſituation; for it muſt have deeply affected them, to have known that a conſiderable part of the bottom of the veſſel was thinner than the ſole of a ſhoe, and that all their lives depended upon ſo ſlight and fragile a barrier between them and the unfathomable ocean. The repair of the Endeavour was carried on very much to Mr. Cook's ſatisfaction. In juſtice to the Dutch officers and workmen, he hath declared that, in his opinion, there is not a marine yard in the world, where a ſhip can be laid with more convenience, ſafety, and diſpatch, or repaired with greater diligence and ſkill. He was particularly pleaſed with the manner of heaving down by two maſts, and gives it a decided preference to the method which had hitherto been practiſed by the Engliſh. The Lieutenant was not one of thoſe on whom the bigotry could be charged of adhering to old cuſtoms, in oppoſition to the dictates of reaſon and experience. By the eighth of December, the Endeavour was perfectly refitted. From that time to the twenty-fourth, our people were employed in completing her ſtock of water, proviſions, and ſtores, in erecting ſome new pumps, and in various other neceſſary operations. All this buſineſs could have been effected much ſooner, if it had not been retarded by the general ſickneſs of the men. In the afternoon of the twenty-fourth, our Commander took leave of the Governor of Batavia, and of ſeveral other Gentlemen belonging to the place, with whom he had formed connections, and to whom he had been greatly obliged for their civilities and aſſiſtance. In the mean while, an accident intervened, which might have been attended with diſagreeable effects. A ſeaman, who had run away from one of the Dutch ſhips in the road, entered on board the Endeavour. Upon his being reclaimed as a ſubject of Holland, Mr. Cook, who was on ſhore, declared, that, if the man appeared to be a Dutchman, he ſhould certainly be delivered up. When, however, the order was carried to Mr. Hicks, who commanded on board, he refuſed to ſurrender the ſeaman, alledging, that he was a ſubject of Great Britain, born in Ireland. In this conduct Mr. Hicks acted in perfect conformity to the Lieutenant's intention and directions. The captain of the Dutch veſſel, in the next place, by a meſſage from the Governor General, demanded the man as a ſubject of Denmark. To this Mr. Cook replied, that there muſt be ſome miſtake in the General's meſſage, ſince he would never demand of him a Daniſh ſeaman, whoſe only crime was that of preferring the Engliſh to the Dutch ſervice. At the ſame time the Lieutenant added, that to ſhew the ſincerity of his deſire to avoid diſputes, if the man was a Dane he ſhould be delivered up as a courteſy; but that if he appeared to be an Engliſh ſubject, he ſhould be kept at all events. Soon after, a letter was brought from Mr. Hicks, containing indubitable proofs that the ſeaman in queſtion was a ſubject of his Britannic Majeſty. This letter Mr. Cook ſent to the Governor, with an aſſurance to his Excellency that he would not part with the man on any terms. A conduct ſo firm and deciſive produced the deſired effect, no more being heard of the affair. In the evening of the twenty-fifth, our Commander went on board, together with Mr. Banks and the reſt of the Gentlemen who had reſided conſtantly on ſhore. The Gentlemen, though conſiderably better, were far from being perfectly recovered. At this time, the ſick perſons in the ſhip amounted to forty, and the reſt of the company were in a very feeble condition. It was remarkable, that every individual had been ill excepting the ſail-maker, who was an old man between ſeventy and eighty years of age, and who was drunk every day, during the reſidence of our people at Batavia. Three ſeamen, and Mr. Green's ſervant, died, beſides the Surgeon, Tupia, and Tayeto. Tupia did not entirely fall a ſacrifice to the unwholeſome, ſtagnant, and putrid air of the country. As he had been accuſtomed, from his birth, to ſubſiſt chiefly upon vegetable food, and particularly on ripe fruit, he ſoon contracted the diſorders which are incident to a ſea life, and would probably have ſunk under them, before the voyage of the Engliſh could have been completed, even if they had not been obliged to go to Batavia to refit their veſſel (n). Our Navigators did not ſtay at this place without gaining an extenſive acquaintance with the productions of the country, and the manners and cuſtoms of the inhabitants. The information which was obtained on theſe heads is detailed at large in Dr. Hawkeſworth's narrative, and will be found to conſtitute a very valuable addition to what was heretofore known upon the ſubject.

(n) Hawkeſworth, ubi ſupra, p. 704—723.

On Thurſday the twenty-ſeventh of December, the Endeavour ſtood out to ſea; and on the fifth of January, 1771, ſhe came to an anchor, under the South-eaſt ſide of Prince's Iſland. The deſign of this was to obtain a recruit of wood and water, and to procure ſome refreſhments for the ſick, many of whom had become much worſe than they were when they left Batavia. As ſoon as the veſſel was ſecured, the Lieutenant, Mr. Banks, and Dr. Solander went on ſhore, and were conducted, by ſome Indians they met with, to a perſon who was repreſented to be the King of the country. After exchanging a few compliments with his Majeſty, the Gentlemen proceeded to buſineſs, but could not immediately come to a ſettlement with him, in reſpect to the price of turtle. They were more ſucceſsful in their ſearch of a watering-place, having found water conveniently ſituated, and which they had reaſon to believe would prove good. As they were going off, ſome of the natives ſold them three turtle, under a promiſe that the King ſhould not be informed of the tranſaction. On the next day, a traffic was eſtabliſhed with the Indians, upon ſuch terms as were offered by the Engliſh; ſo that by night our people had plenty of turtle. The three which had been purchaſed the evening before, were in the mean time dreſſed for the ſhip's company, who, excepting on the preceding day, had not, for nearly the ſpace of four months, been once ſerved with ſalt proviſions. Mr. Banks, in the evening, paid his reſpects to the King at his Palace, which was ſituated in the middle of a rice field. His Majeſty was buſily employed in dreſſing his own ſupper; but this did not prevent him from receiving his viſitant in a very gracious manner. During the following days, the commerce with the natives for proviſions was continued; in the courſe of which they brought down to the trading place, not only a quantity of turtle, but fowls, fiſh, monkies, ſmall deer, and ſome vegetables. On the evening of the eleventh, when Mr. Cook went on ſhore to ſee how thoſe of his people conducted their buſineſs who were employed in wooding and watering, he was informed that an axe had been ſtolen. As it was a matter of conſequence to prevent others from being encouraged to commit theſts of the like kind, he reſolved not to paſs over the offence, but to inſiſt upon redreſs from the King. Accordingly, after ſome altercation, his Majeſty promiſed that the axe ſhould be reſtored in the morning, and the promiſe was faithfully performed. On the fifteenth, our Commander weighed, and ſtood out for ſea (o). Prince's Iſland, where he lay about ten days, was formerly much frequented by the India ſhips of many nations, and eſpecially thoſe of England; but it had lately been forſaken, on account of the ſuppoſed badneſs of its water. This ſuppoſition, however, aroſe from a want of duly examining the brook by which the water is ſupplied. It is, indeed, brackiſh at the lower part of the brook, but higher up it will be found excellent. The Lieutenant, therefore, was clearly of opinion, that Prince's Iſland is a more eligible place for ſhips to touch at, than either at North Iſland or New Bay; from neither of which places any conſiderable quantity of other refreſhments can be procured. As the Endeavour proceeded on her voyage to the Cape of Good Hope, the ſeeds of diſeaſe, which had been received at Batavia, appeared with the moſt threatening ſymptoms, and reduced our Navigators to a very melancholy ſituation. The ſhip was, in fact, nothing better than an hoſpital, in which thoſe who could go about were not ſufficient for a due attendance upon thoſe who were ſick. Leſt the water which had been taken in at Prince's Iſland ſhould have had any ſhare in adding to the diſorder of the men, the Lieutenant ordered it to be purified with lime; and as a farther remedy againſt infection, he directed all the parts of the veſſel between the decks to be waſhed with vinegar. The malady had taken too deep root to be ſpeedily eradicated. Mr. Banks was reduced ſo low by it, that for ſome time there was no hope of his life; and ſo fatal was the diſeaſe to many others, that almoſt every night a dead body was committed to the ſea. There were buried, in about the courſe of ſix weeks, Mr. Sporing, a Gentleman who was one of Mr. Banks's aſſiſtants, Mr. Parkinſon, his Natural Hiſtory Painter, Mr. Green the Aſtronomer [Q], the Boatſwain, the Carpenter and his mate, Mr. Monkhouſe

(o) Java Head, from which the Lieutenant took his departure, lies in latitude 6° 49′ South, and in longitude 255° 12′ Weſt.

[Q] Mr. Green the Aſtronomer.] Mr. Charles Green (the youngeſt ſon of Mr. Joſhua Green of Swinton, near Rotherham, in Yorkſhire, a conſiderable farmer, and a freeholder of the county) was born in the year 1735. The principal part of his education he derived from his eldeſt brother, the Rev. John Green, late of Denmark-ſtreet, Soho. Mr. John Green was maſter of a ſchool in that place, and, after ſome time, took in his brother Charles, as an aſſiſtant teacher. In this ſituation, he made ſuch a progreſs in aſtronomical knowledge, that, in the latter end of the year 1760, he became aſſiſtant to Dr. Bradley, at the Royal Obſervatory, at Greenwich. This was upon the occaſion of Mr. Charles Maſon's having quitted that office, to go to the Cape of Good Hope, for the purpoſe of obſerving the tranſit of Venus, in 1761. With Dr. Bradley Mr. Green remained at the obſervatory, till the Doctor's death, which happened in 1762. Upon Mr. Bliſs's appointment to the place of Aſtronomer Royal, Mr. Green continued to be aſſiſtant to that Gentleman. As Mr. Bliſs's health was very precarious, and his reſidence chiefly at Oxford, the principal care of the obſervations devolved on Mr. Green. Indeed, he was ſo uſeful to Mr. Bliſs, that when, in 1763, in conjunction with Dr. Maſkelyne, he was appointed by the Commiſſioners of the Board of Longitude to go to Barbadoes, to make obſervations for the trial of Mr. Harriſon's time-keeper, it was agreed that a temporary aſſiſtant only ſhould be provided at Greenwich, till his return. Accordingly, he remained at the Obſervatory till the death of Mr. Bliſs, in September, 1764, and the appointment of Dr. Maſkelyne, in the ſpring following. After this, he was employed by a number of Gentlemen, who had formed a ſcheme of bringing water from ſome part of the river Coln, below Uxbridge, to Marybone. But Mr. Green having proved, by this ſurvey, that there would be a deficiency of fall, if the water ſhould be taken from the tail of the loweſt mill in that ſtream, and objections being raiſed, by the proprietors of thoſe mills, to the water's being taken above them, the deſign dropped. Mr. Green's appointment, by the Royal Society, to obſerve, together with Lieutenant Cook, the tranſit of Venus in 1769, having already been related in the courſe of this work, it is ſufficient to add, that he fell a martyr to the houſe the Midſhipman, another Midſhipman, the old jolly Sail-maker and his aſſiſtant, the ſhip's Cook, the Corporal of the marines, two of the Carpenter's crew, and nine ſeamen. In all, the loſs amounted to three and twenty perſons, beſides the ſeven who died at Batavia (p). It is probable that theſe calamitous events, which could not fail of making a powerful impreſſion on the mind of Lieutenant Cook, might give occaſion to his turning his thoughts more zealouſly to thoſe methods of preſerving the health of ſeamen, which he afterwards purſued with ſuch remarkable ſucceſs. On Friday the fifteenth of March, the Endeavour arrived off the Cape of Good Hope; and as ſoon as ſhe was brought to an anchor, our Commander waited upon the Governor, from whom he received aſſurances that he ſhould be furniſhed with every ſupply which the country could afford. His firſt care was to provide a proper place for the ſick, whoſe number was not ſmall; and a houſe was ſpeedily found, where it was agreed that they ſhould be lodged and boarded at the rate of two ſhillings a day for each perſon. The run from Java Head to the Cape of Good Hope did not furniſh many ſubjects of remark that could be of any great uſe to future voyagers. Such obſervations, however, as occurred to him the Lieutenant has been careful to record, not being willing to omit the leaſt circumſtance that may contribute to the ſafety and facility of navigation. The Cape of Good Hope had been ſo often deſcribed before our people ſtopped there, that even if it had entered into my plan to give a particular account of the countries viſited by Mr. Cook, and of the manners of their inhabitants, I ſhould have omitted what Dr. Hawkeſworth hath related concerning the place. It is ſufficient, therefore, to ſay, that the Lieutenant, having lain at the Cape to recover the ſick, to procure ſtores, and to refit his veſſel, till the fourteenth of April, then ſtood out of the Bay, and proceeded in his voyage homeward. In the morning of the twenty-ninth, he croſſed his firſt meridian, having circumnavigated the globe in the direction from Eaſt to Weſt. The conſequence of this was, that he had loſt a day, an allowance for which had been made at Batavia. On the firſt of May he arrived at St. Helena, where he ſtaid till the fourth to refreſh; during which time Mr. Banks employed himſelf in making the complete circuit of the Iſland, and in viſiting the places moſt worthy of obſervation. The manner in which ſlaves are deſcribed as being treated in this Iſland muſt be mentioned with indignation. According to our Commander's repreſentation, while every kind of labour is performed by them, they are not furniſhed either with horſes or with any of the various machines which art has invented to facilitate their taſk. Carts might conveniently be uſed in ſome parts, and where the ground is too ſteep for them, wheelbarrows might be employed to great advantage; and yet there is not a wheelbarrow in the whole Iſland. Though every thing which is conveyed from place to place is done by ſlaves alone, they have not the ſimple convenience of a porter's knot, but carry their burden upon their heads. They appeared to be a miſerable race, worn out by the united operation of exceſſive labour and ill uſage; and Mr. Cook was ſorry to obſerve, and to ſay, that inſtances of wanton cruelty were much more frequent among his countrymen at St. Helena, than among the Dutch, who are generally reproached with want of humanity, both at Batavia and the Cape of Good Hope (q). It is impoſſible for a feeling mind to avoid being concerned that ſuch an account ſhould be given of the conduct of any who are entitled to the name of Britons. The Lieutenant's reproof, if juſt, hath, it may be hoped, long before this, reached the place, and produced ſome good effect [R]. If ſlavery, that the unwholeſome air of Batavia; for though he lived to quit that place, he died twelve days afterwards, of a dyſentery, on the 29th of January, 1771.

Mr. Green was tolerably well verſed in moſt branches of the mathematics, and had a tincture of various other ſciences. Metaphyſical enquiries were his favourite purſuits; and he was more fond of diſplaying his knowledge in this reſpect than was conducive to his advantage. Though he loved his friend much, he ſometimes ſhewed that he loved his jeſt better, by which he made himſelf enemies. He was a moſt excellent obſerver. Of this Dr. Maſkelyne was ſo well convinced, that, though they had diſagreed at Barbadoes, and were not afterwards on terms of friendſhip, the Doctor not only propoſed him to the Royal Society, as the moſt proper perſon to obſerve the tranſit of Venus, but ſupported his intereſt with great earneſtneſs, againſt ſome others of the Society, who wiſhed to ſend out a different perſon. The obſervations of Mr. Green which particularly related to the tranſit of Venus, were printed in conjunction with thoſe of Lieutenant Cook. His remaining ones, which are pretty numerous, are now preparing for publication, under the direction of the Commiſſioners of Longitude. Mr. Green was engaged for a time, in concert with Dr. Scott, the preſent Rector of Simonburn, Mr. Falconer, the author of the Shipwreck, and ſome other perſons, in writing a dictionary of arts and ſciences; but he did not continue his aſſiſtance through more than half the work. Mr. Green, as a reward for his going to Barbadoes, had been appointed Purſer of the Aurora frigate, which was afterwards made choice of to carry Mr. Vanſittart, and the other Superviſors, out to India. As Mr. Green was then abſent with Lieutenant Cook, his old colleague, Mr. Falconer, applied to the Commiſſioners of the Navy, for leave to exchange the Briſtol, to which he belonged, for the Aurora. In conſequence of this he was loſt with her; and, probably, at no great diſtance, either of time or ſpace, from where the body of her quondam purſer, Mr. Green, was committed to the deep (6).

[R] And produced ſome good effect.] Near the concluſion of Captain Cook's ſecond voyage, there is the following ſhort note. "In the account given of St. "Helena, in the narrative of my former voyage, I "find ſome miſtakes. Its inhabitants are far from "exerciſing a wanton cruelty over their ſlaves; and "they have had wheel-carriages and porter's knots "for many years." [vol. ii. p. 270.] This note I inſert with pleaſure. Nevertheleſs, I cannot think that the Lieutenant could have given ſo ſtrong a repreſentation of things, if, at the time in which it was written, it had been wholly without foundation.

diſgrace to religion, to humanity, and, I will add, to ſound policy, muſt ſtill be continued, every thing ought to be done which can tend to ſoften its horrors. When our Commander departed from St. Helena, on the fourth, it was in company with the Portland man of war, and twelve Indiamen. With this fleet he continued to ſail till the tenth, when perceiving that the Endeavour proceeded much more heavily than any of the other veſſels, and that ſhe was not likely to get home ſo ſoon as the reſt, he made a ſignal to ſpeak with the Portland. Upon this Captain Elliot himſelf came on board, and Mr. Cook delivered to him the common log-books of his ſhip, and the journals of ſome of the officers. The Endeavour, however, kept in company with the fleet till the morning of the twenty-third, at which time there was not a ſingle veſſel in ſight. On that day died Mr. Hicks, and in the evening his body was committed to the ſea, with the uſual ceremonies. Mr. Charles Clerke, a young man extremely well qualified for the ſtation, and whoſe name will hereafter frequently occur, received an order from Mr. Cook to act as Lieutenant in Mr. Hicks's room. The rigging and ſails of the ſhip were now become ſo bad, that ſomething was continually giving way. Nevertheleſs, our Commander purſued his courſe in ſafety; and on the tenth of June, land, which proved to be the Lizard, was diſcovered by Nicholas Young, the boy who had firſt ſeen New Zealand. On the eleventh, the Lieutenant ran up the channel. At ſix the next morning he paſſed Beachy Head; and in the afternoon of the ſame day he came to an anchor in the Downs, and went on ſhore at Deal (r). Thus ended Mr. Cook's firſt voyage round the world, in which he had gone through ſo many dangers, explored ſo many countries, and exhibited the ſtrongeſt proofs of his poſſeſſing an eminently ſagacious and active mind; a mind that was equal to every perilous enterprize, and to the boldeſt and moſt ſucceſsful efforts of navigation and diſcovery.

(r) Hawkeſworth, ubi ſupra, p. 798, 790.

The manner in which Lieutenant Cook had performed his circumnavigation of the globe, juſtly entitled him to the protection of Government, and the favour of his Sovereign. Accordingly, he was promoted to be a Commander in his Majeſty's navy, by commiſſion bearing date on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, 1771 (s). Mr. Cook, on this occaſion, from a certain conſciouſneſs of his own merit, wiſhed to have been appointed a Poſt Captain. But the Earl of Sandwich, who was now at the head of the Admiralty Board, though he had the greateſt regard for our Navigator, could not concede to his requeſt, becauſe a compliance with it would have been inconſiſtent with the order of the naval ſervice. The difference was in point of rank only, and not of advantage. A Commander has the ſame pay as a Poſt Captain, and his authority is the ſame when he is in actual employment. The diſtinction is a neceſſary ſtep in the progreſs to the higher honours of the profeſſion (t). It cannot be doubted, but that the Preſident and Council of the Royal Society were highly ſatisfied with the manner in which the tranſit of Venus had been obſerved. The papers of Mr. Cook and Mr. Green, relative to this ſubject, were put into the hands of the Aſtronomer Royal, to be by him digeſted, and that he might deduce from them the important conſequences to ſcience which reſulted from the obſervation. This was done by him with an accuracy and ability becoming his high knowledge and character. On the twenty-firſt of May, 1772, Captain Cook communicated to the Royal Society, in a letter addreſſed to Dr. Maſkelyne, an "account of the flowing of the tides in the South Sea, as "obſerved on board His Majeſty's bark, the Endeavour (u)." The reputation our Navigator had acquired by his late voyage was deſervedly great; and the deſire of the public to be acquainted with the new ſcenes and new objects which were now brought to light, was ardently excited. It is not ſurprizing, therefore, that different attempts were made to ſatisfy the general curioſity. There ſoon appeared a publication, entitled, "a Journal "of a Voyage round the World." This was the production of ſome perſon who had been upon the expedition; and, though his account was dry and imperfect, it ſerved, in a certain degree, to relieve the eagerneſs of enquiry. The Journal of Sydney Parkinſon, draughtſman to Sir Joſeph Banks, to whom it belonged by ample purchaſe, was likewiſe printed, from a copy ſurreptitiouſly obtained; but an injunction from the Court of Chancery for ſome time prevented it appearance. This work, though diſhoneſtly given to the world, was recommended by its plates. But it was Dr. Hawkeſworth's account of Lieutenant Cook's voyage which completely gratified the public curioſity. This account, which was written by authority, was drawn up from the journal of the Lieutenant, and the papers of Sir Joſeph Banks; and, beſides the merit of the compoſition, derived an extraordinary advantage from the number and excellence of its charts and engravings, which were furniſhed at the expence of Government. The large price given by the bookſellers for this work, and the avidity with which it was read, diſplayed, in the ſtrongeſt light, the anxiety of the nation to be fully informed in every thing that belonged to the late navigation and diſcoveries. Captain Cook, during his voyage, had ſailed over the Pacific Ocean in many of thoſe latitudes in which a ſouthern continent had been expected to lie. He had aſcertained that neither New Zealand nor New Holland were parts of ſuch a continent. But the general queſtion concerning its exiſtence had not been determined by him, nor did he go out for that purpoſe, though ſome of the reaſons on which the notion of it had been adopted were diſpelled in the courſe of his navigation. It is well known how fondly the idea of a Terra Auſtralis incognita had for nearly two centuries been entertained. Many plauſible philoſophical arguments had been urged in its ſupport, and many facts alleged in its favour. The writer of this narrative fully remembers how much his imagination was captivated, in the more early part of his life, with the hypotheſis of a ſouthern continent. He has often dwelt upon it with rapture, and been highly delighted with the authors who contended for its exiſtence, and diſplayed the mighty conſequences which would reſult from its being diſcovered. Though his knowledge was infinitely exceeded by that of ſome able men who had paid a particular attention to the ſubject, he did not come behind them in the ſanguineneſs of his hopes and expectations. Every thing, however, which relates to ſcience muſt be ſeparated from fancy, and brought to the teſt of experiment: and here was an experiment richly deſerving to be tried. The object, indeed, was of peculiar magnitude, and worthy to be purſued by a great Prince, and a great nation. Happily, the period was arrived in Britain for the execution of the moſt important ſcientific deſigns. A regard to matters of this kind, though ſo honourable to crowned heads, had heretofore been too much neglected even by ſome of the beſt of our Princes. Our preſent Sovereign had already diſtinguiſhed his reign by his patronage of ſcience and literature; but the beginnings which had hitherto been made were only the pledges of future munificence. With reſpect to the object now in view, the gracious diſpoſitions of His Majeſty were ardently ſeconded by the noble Lord who had been placed at the head of the Board of Admiralty. The Earl of Sandwich was poſſeſſed of a mind which was capable of comprehending and encouraging the moſt enlarged views and ſchemes with regard to navigation and diſcovery. Accordingly, it was by his particular recommendation that a reſolution was formed for the appointment of an expedition, finally to determine the queſtion concerning the exiſtence of a ſouthern continent [S]. Quiros ſeems to have been the firſt perſon who had any idea that ſuch a continent exiſted, and he was the firſt that was ſent out for the ſole purpoſe of aſcertaining the fact. He did not ſucceed in the attempt; and the attempts of various navigators, down to the preſent century, were equally unſucceſsful (x). When the deſign of accompliſhing this great object was reſolved upon, it did not admit of any heſitation by whom it was to be carried into execution. No perſon was eſteemed equally qualified with Captain Cook, for conducting an enterprize the view of which was to give the utmoſt poſſible extent to the geography of the globe, and the knowledge of navigation. For the greater advantage of the undertaking, it was determined that two ſhips ſhould be employed; and much attention was paid to the choice of them, and to their equipment for the ſervice. After mature deliberation by the Navy Board, during which particular regard was had to the Captain's wiſdom and experience, it was agreed, that no veſſels were ſo proper for diſcoveries in diſtant unknown parts, as thoſe which were conſtructed like the Endeavour. This opinion concurring with that of the Earl of Sandwich, the Admiralty came to a reſolution, that two ſhips ſhould be provided of a ſimilar conſtruction. Accordingly, two veſſels, both of which had been built at Whitby, by the ſame perſon who built the Endeavour, were purchaſed of Captain William Hammond, of Hull. They were about fourteen or ſixteen months old at the time when they were bought, and, in Captain Cook's judgment, were as well adapted to the intended ſervice as if they had been expreſsly conſtructed for that purpoſe. The largeſt of the two, which conſiſted of four hundred and ſixty-two tons burthen, was named the Reſolution. To the other, which was three hundred and thirty-ſix tons burthen, was given the name of the Adventure. On the twenty-eighth of November, 1771, Captain Cook was appointed to the command of the former; and, about the ſame time, Mr. Tobias Furneaux was promoted to the command of the latter. The complement of the Reſolution, including officers and men, was fixed at a hundred and twelve perſons; and that of the Adventure, at eighty-one. In the equipment of theſe ſhips, every circumſtance was attended to that could contribute to the comfort and ſucceſs of the voyage. They were fitted in the moſt complete manner, and ſupplied with every extraordinary article which was ſuggeſted to be neceſſary or uſeful. Lord Sandwich, whoſe zeal was indefatigable upon this occaſion, viſited the veſſels from time to time, to be aſſured that the whole equipment was agreeable to his wiſhes, and to the ſatisfaction of thoſe who were to engage in the expedition. Nor were the Navy and Victualling Boards wanting in procuring for the ſhips the very beſt of ſtores and proviſions, with ſome alterations in the ſpecies of them, that were adapted to the nature of the enterprize; beſides which, there was an ample ſupply of antiſcorbutic articles, ſuch as malt, ſour krout, ſalted cabbage, portable broth, ſaloup, muſtard, marmalade of carrots, and inſpiſſated juice of wort and beer. No leſs attention was paid to the cauſe of ſcience in general. The Admiralty engaged Mr. William Hodges, an excellent landſcape painter, to embark in the voyage, in order to make drawings and paintings of ſuch objects as could not ſo well be comprehended from written deſcriptions. Mr. John Reinhold Forſter and his ſon were fixed upon to explore and collect the natural history of the countries which might be visited, and an ample sum was granted by Parliament for the purpose. That nothing might be wanting to accomplish the scientific views of the expedition, the Board of Longitude agreed with Mr. William Wales and Mr. William Bayley, to make astronomical observations. Mr. Wales was stationed in the Resolution, and Mr. Bayley in the Adventure. By the same Board they were furnished with the best of instruments, and particularly with four time-pieces, three constructed by Mr. Arnold, and one by Mr. Kendal on Mr. Harrison's principles (y). Though Captain Cook had been appointed to the command of the Resolution on the twenty-eighth of November, 1771, such were the preparations necessary for so long and important a voyage, and the impediments which occasionally and unavoidably occurred, that the ship did not sail from Deptford till the ninth of April following, nor did she leave Long Reach till the tenth of May. In plying down the river, it was found necessary to put into Sheerness, in order to make some alterations in her upper works. These the officers of the yard were directed immediately to take in hand; and Lord Sandwich and Sir Hugh Palliser came down to see them executed in the most effectual manner. The ship being again completed for sea by the twenty-second of June, Captain Cook on that day sailed from Sheerness, and, on the third of July, joined the Adventure in Plymouth Sound. Lord Sandwich, in his return from a visit to the dock-yards, having met the Resolution on the preceding evening, his Lordship and Sir Hugh Palliser gave the last mark of their great attention to the object of the voyage, by coming on board, to assure themselves that every thing was done which was agreeable to our Commander's wishes, and that his vessel was equipped entirely to his satisfaction. At Plymouth Captain Cook received his instructions; with regard to which, without entering into a minute detail of them, it is sufficient to say, that he was sent out upon the most enlarged plan of discovery that is known in the history of navigation. He was instructed not only to circumnavigate the whole globe, but to circumnavigate it in high southern latitudes, making such traverses, from time to time, into every corner of the Pacific Ocean not before examined, as might finally and effectually resolve the much agitated question about the existence of a southern continent, in any part of the southern hemisphere to which access could be had by the efforts of the boldest and most skilful navigators (z).

(y) General Introduction, ubi supra, p. xxiii—xxxv.

(z) Cook's Voyage towards the South Pole, and round the World, p. 1, 2. Introduction to the Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, p. xix.

On the thirteenth of July, Captain Cook sailed from Plymouth, and on the twenty-ninth of the same month anchored in Funchiale Road, in the Island of Madeira. Having obtained a supply of water, wine, and other necessaries at that Island, he left it on the first of August, and sailed to the southward. As he proceeded in his voyage, he made three puncheons of beer of the inspissated juice of malt; and the liquor produced was very brisk and drinkable. The heat of the weather, and the agitation of the ship, had hitherto withstood all the endeavours of our people to prevent this juice from being in a high state of fermentation. If it could be kept from fermenting, it would be a most valuable article at sea. The Captain having found that his stock of water would not last to the Cape of Good Hope, without putting his men to a scanty allowance, resolved to stop at St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd Islands, for a supply. At Port Praya, in this Island, he anchored on the tenth of August, and by the fourteenth had completed his water, and procured some other refreshments; upon which he set sail, and prosecuted his course. He embraced the occasion, which his touching at St. Jago afforded him, of giving such a delineation and description of Port Praya, and of the supplies there to be obtained, as might be of service to future navigators. On the twentieth of the month, the rain poured down upon our Voyagers, not in drops, but in streams; and the wind, at the same time, being variable and rough, the people were obliged to attend so constantly upon the decks, that few of them escaped being completely soaked. This circumstance is mentioned to shew the method that was taken by Captain Cook to preserve his men from the evil consequences of the wet to which they had been exposed. He had every thing to fear from the rain, which is a great promoter of sickness in hot climates. But to guard against this effect, he pursued some hints that had been suggested to him by Sir Hugh Palliser and Captain Campbell, and took care that the ship should be aired and dried with fires made between the decks, and that the damp places of the vessel should be smoked; beside which, the people were ordered to air their bedding, and to wash and dry their clothes, whenever there was an opportunity. The result of these precautions was, that there was not one sick person on board the Resolution. Captain Cook, on the eighth of September, crossed the line in the longitude of 8° West, and proceeded, without meeting any thing remarkable, till the eleventh of October, when at $6^h\ 24^m\ 12^s$, by Mr. Kendal's watch, the moon rose about four digits eclipsed; soon after which the Gentlemen prepared to observe the end of the eclipse. The observers were, the Captain himself, and Mr. Forster, Mr. Wales, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Gilbert, and Mr. Harvey. Our Commander had been informed, before he left England, that he sailed at an improper season of the year, and that he should meet with much calm weather, near and under the line. But though such weather may happen in some years, it is not always, or even generally, to be expected. So far was it

it from being the caſe with Captain Cook, that he had a briſk South-weſt wind in thoſe very latitudes where the calms had been predicted: nor was he expoſed to any of the tornadoes, which are ſo much ſpoken of by other navigators. On the twenty-ninth of the month, between eight and nine o'clock at night, when our Voyagers were near the Cape of Good Hope, the whole ſea, within the compaſs of their ſight, became at once, as it were, illuminated. The Captain had been formerly convinced, by Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander, that ſuch appearances in the ocean were occaſioned by inſects. Mr. Forſter, however, ſeemed diſpoſed to adopt a different opinion. To determine the queſtion, our Commander ordered ſome buckets of water to be drawn up from along-ſide the ſhip, which were found full of an innumerable quantity of ſmall globular inſects, about the ſize of a common pin's head, and quite tranſparent. Though no life was perceived in them, there could be no doubt of their being living animals, when in their own proper element; and Mr. Forſter became now well ſatisfied that they were the cauſe of the ſea's illumination (a). On the thirtieth, the Reſolution and Adventure anchored in Table Bay; ſoon after which Captain Cook went on ſhore, and, accompanied by Captain Furneaux, and the two Mr. Forſters, waited on Baron Plettenberg, the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, who received the Gentlemen with great politeneſs, and promiſed them every aſſiſtance the place could afford. From him our Commander learned that two French ſhips from the Mauritius, about eight months before, had diſcovered land, in the latitude of 48° South, along which they ſailed forty miles, till they came to a bay, into which they were upon the point of entering, when they were driven off and ſeparated in a hard gale of wind. Previouſly to this misfortune, they had loſt ſome of their boats and people, that had been ſent to ſound the bay. Captain Cook was alſo informed by Baron Plettenberg, that in the month of March, two other French ſhips from the Iſland of Mauritius, had touched at the Cape in their way to the South Pacific Ocean; where they were going to make diſcoveries, under the command of M. Marion. From the healthy condition of the crews both of the Reſolution and Adventure, it was imagined by the Captain that his ſtay at the Cape would be very ſhort. But the neceſſity of waiting till the requiſite proviſions could be prepared and collected, kept him more than three weeks at this place; which time was improved by him in ordering both the ſhips to be caulked and painted, and in taking care that, in every reſpect, their condition ſhould be as good as when they left England. On the twenty-ſecond of November, our Commander ſailed from the Cape of Good Hope, and proceeded on his voyage, in ſearch of a ſouthern continent. Having gotten clear of the land, he directed his courſe for Cape Circumciſion; and judging that cold weather would ſoon approach, he ordered ſlops to be ſerved to ſuch of the people as were in want of them, and gave to each man the fearnought jacket and trowſers allowed by the Admiralty. On the twenty-ninth, the wind, which was Weſt-north-weſt, increaſed to a ſtorm, that continued, with ſome few intervals of moderate weather, till the ſixth of December (b). By this gale, which was attended with hail and rain, and which blew at times with ſuch violence that the ſhips could carry no ſails, our Voyagers were driven far to the eaſtward of their intended courſe, and no hopes were left to the Captain of reaching Cape Circumciſion. A ſtill greater misfortune was the loſs of the principal part of the live ſtock on board, conſiſting of ſheep, hogs, and geeſe. At the ſame time, the ſudden tranſition from warm, mild weather, to weather which was extremely cold and wet, was ſo ſeverely felt by our people, that it was neceſſary to make ſome addition to their allowance of ſpirits, by giving each of them a dram on particular occaſions. Our Navigators, on the tenth of December, began to meet with iſlands of ice (c). One of theſe iſlands was ſo much concealed from them by the hazineſs of the weather, accompanied with ſnow and ſleet, that they were ſteering directly towards it, and did not ſee it till it was at a leſs diſtance than that of a mile. Captain Cook judged it to be about fifty feet high, and half a mile in circuit. It was flat at the top, and its ſides roſe in a perpendicular direction, againſt which the ſea broke to a great height. The weather continuing to be hazy, the Captain, on account of the ice iſlands, was obliged to proceed with the utmoſt caution. Six of them were paſſed on the twelfth, ſome of which were nearly two miles in circuit, and ſixty feet high: nevertheleſs, ſuch were the force and height of the waves, that the ſea broke quite over them. Hence was exhibited a view that for a few moments was pleaſing to the eye; but the pleaſure was ſoon ſwallowed up in the horror which ſeized upon the mind, from the proſpect of danger. For if a ſhip ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to get on the weather ſide of one of theſe iſlands, ſhe would be daſhed to pieces in a moment. The veſſels, on the fourteenth, were ſtopped by an immenſe field of low ice, to which no end could be ſeen, either to the Eaſt, Weſt, or South. In different parts of this field, were iſlands or hills of ice, like thoſe which our Voyagers had found floating in the ſea, and twenty of which had preſented themſelves to view the day before. Some of the people on board imagined that they ſaw land over the ice, and Captain Cook himſelf at firſt entertained the ſame ſentiment. But upon more narrowly examining theſe ice hills, and the various appearances they made when ſeen through the haze, he was induced to change his opinion. On the eighteenth, though in the morning our Navigators had been quite imbayed, they were, notwithſtanding, at length enabled to get clear of the field

(a) Cook's Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 5—15. Forſter's Voyage round the World, vol. i. p. 54—57.

(b) The ſhips were now in the latitude of 48° 41′ South, and longitude 18° 24′ Eaſt.

(c) They were then in the latitude of 50° 40′ South, and longitude 2° 0′ Eaſt of the Cape of Good Hope.

field of ice. They were, however, at the ſame time, carried in among the ice iſlands, which perpetually ſucceeded one another; which were almoſt equally dangerous; and the avoiding of which was a matter of the greateſt difficulty. But perilous as it is to ſail in a thick fog, among theſe floating rocks, as our Commander properly called them; this is preferable to the being entangled with immenſe fields of ice under the ſame circumſtances. In this latter caſe the great danger to be apprehended, is the getting faſt in the ice; a ſituation which would be alarming in the higheſt degree (d). It had been a generally received opinion, that ſuch ice as hath now been deſcribed, is formed in bays and rivers. Agreeably to this ſuppoſition, our Voyagers were led to believe that land was not far diſtant, and that it lay to the ſouthward behind the ice. As, therefore, they had ſailed above thirty leagues along the edge of the ice, without finding a paſſage to the South, Captain Cook determined to run thirty or forty leagues to the Eaſt, and afterwards to endeavour to get to the ſouthward. If in this attempt he met with no land or other impediment, his deſign was to ſtretch behind the ice, and thus to bring the matter to a deciſion. The weather, at this time, affected the ſenſes with a feeling of cold much greater than that which was pointed out by the thermometer (e), ſo that the whole crew complained. In order the better to enable them to ſuſtain the ſeverity of the cold, the Captain directed the ſleeves of their jackets to be lengthened with baize; and had a cap made for each man of the ſame ſtuff, ſtrengthened with canvaſs. Theſe precautions greatly contributed to their comfort and advantage. It is worthy of obſervation, that although the weather was as ſharp, on the twenty-fifth of December, as might have been expected, in the ſame month of the year, in any part of England, this was the middle of ſummer with our Navigators. Some of the people now appearing to have ſymptoms of the ſcurvy, freſh wort was given them every day, prepared, under the direction of the Surgeons, from the malt which had been provided for the purpoſe. By the twenty-ninth, it became ſufficiently aſcertained, from the courſe our Commander had purſued, that the field of ice, along which the ſhips had ſailed, did not join to any land, as had been conjectured (f). At this time, Captain Cook came to a reſolution, provided he met with no impediment, to run as far Weſt as the meridian of Cape Circumciſion. While he was proſecuting this deſign, a gale aroſe, on the thirty-firſt, which brought with it ſuch a ſea as rendered it very dangerous for the veſſels to remain among the ice; and the danger was increaſed by diſcovering an immenſe field to the North, which extended farther than the eye could reach. As our Voyagers were not above two or three miles from this field, and were ſurrounded by looſe ice, there was no time to deliberate. They hauled to the South; and though they happily got clear, it was not till the ſhips had received ſeveral hard knocks from the looſe pieces, which were of the largeſt kind. On Friday the firſt of January, 1773, the gale abated; and, on the next day in the afternoon, our people had the felicity of enjoying the ſight of the moon, the face of which had been ſeen by them but once ſince they had departed from the Cape of Good Hope. Hence a judgment may be formed of the ſort of weather they had been expoſed to, from the time of their leaving that place. The preſent opportunity was eagerly ſeized, for making ſeveral obſervations of the ſun and moon (g). Captain Cook was now nearly in the ſame longitude which is aſſigned to Cape Circumciſion, and about ninety-five leagues to the South of the latitude in which it is ſaid to lie. At the ſame time, the weather was ſo clear, that land might have been ſeen at the diſtance of fourteen or fifteen leagues. He concluded it, therefore, to be very probable, that what Bouvet took for land was nothing but mountains of ice, ſurrounded by looſe or field ice. Our preſent Navigators had naturally been led into a ſimilar miſtake. The conjecture, that ſuch ice as had lately been ſeen was joined to land, was a very plauſible one, though not founded on fact. Upon the whole, there was good reaſon to believe, that no land was to be met with, under this meridian, between the latitude of fifty-five and fifty-nine, where ſome had been ſuppoſed to exiſt. Amidſt the obſtructions Captain Cook was expoſed to, from the ice iſlands which perpetually ſucceeded each other, he derived one advantage from them, and that was, a ſupply of freſh water. Though the melting and ſtowing away the ice takes up ſome time, and is, indeed, rather tedious, this method of watering is otherwiſe the moſt expeditious our Commander had ever known. The water produced was perfectly ſweet and well taſted. Upon the ice iſlands penguins, albatroſſes, and other birds were frequently ſeen. It had hitherto been the received opinion, that ſuch birds never go far from land, and that the ſight of them is a ſure indication of its vicinity. That this opinion is not well founded, at leaſt where ice iſlands exiſt, was now evinced by multiplied experience. By Sunday the ſeventeenth of January, Captain Cook reached the latitude of 67° 15′ South, when he could advance no farther. At this time the ice was entirely cloſed to the South, in the whole extent from Eaſt to Weſt-ſouth-weſt, without the leaſt appearance of any opening. The Captain, therefore, thought it no longer prudent to perſevere in ſailing ſouthward; eſpecially as the ſummer was already half ſpent, and there was little reaſon to hope that it would be found practicable to get round the ice. Having taken this reſolution, he determined to proceed directly in ſearch of the land which had lately been diſcovered by the French; and as, in purſuing his purpoſe, the weather was clear at intervals, he ſpread the ſhips abreaſt four miles from each other,

(d) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 15—27. Our people were now in latitude 55° 8′, and in longitude 24° 3′.

(e) It was from 30 to 34.

(f) Our people were now in the latitude of 59° 12′, and in longitude 19° 1′ Eaſt; which was three more to the Weſt than when they firſt fell in with the field ice.

(g) The longitude deduced from theſe obſervations was 9° 34′ 30″ Eaſt. The latitude was 58° 53′ 30″ South.

other, in order the better to inveſtigate any thing that might lie in their way. On the firſt of February, our Voyagers were in the latitude of 48° 30′ South, and in longitude 58° 7′ Eaſt, nearly in the meridian of the Iſland of St. Mauritius. This was the ſituation in which the land ſaid to have been diſcovered by the French was to be expected; but as no ſigns of it had appeared, our Commander bore away to the Eaſt. Captain Furneaux, on the ſame day, informed Captain Cook that he had juſt ſeen a large float of ſea or rock weed, and about it ſeveral of the birds called divers. Theſe were certain ſigns of the vicinity of land, though whether it lay to the Eaſt or Weſt could not poſſibly be known. Our Commander, therefore, formed the deſign of proceeding in his preſent latitude four or five degrees of longitude to the Weſt of the meridian he was now in, and then to purſue his reſearches eaſtward. The Weſt and North-weſt winds, which had continued for ſome days, prevented him from carrying this purpoſe into execution. However, he was convinced, from the perpetual high ſea he had lately met with, that there could be no great extent of land to the Weſt. While Captain Cook, on the next day, was ſteering eaſtward (b), Captain Furneaux told him that he thought the land was to the North-weſt of them; as he had, at one time, obſerved the ſea to be ſmooth when the wind blew in that direction. This obſervation was by no means conformable to the remarks which had been made by our Commander himſelf. Nevertheleſs, ſuch was his readineſs to attend to every ſuggeſtion, that he reſolved to clear up the point, if the wind would admit of his getting to the Weſt in any reaſonable time. The wind, by veering to the North, did admit of his purſuing the ſearch; and the reſult of it was, his conviction that if any land was near, it could only be an Iſland of no conſiderable extent. Captain Cook and his philoſophical friends, while they were traverſing this part of the ſouthern ocean, paid particular attention to the variation of the compaſs, which they found to be from 27° 50′, to 30° 26′ Weſt. Probably the mean of the two extremes, viz. 29° 4′, was the neareſt the truth, as it coincided with the variation obſerved on board the Adventure. One unaccountable circumſtance is worthy of notice, though it did not now occur for the firſt time. It is, that when the ſun was on the ſtarboard of the ſhip, the variation was the leaſt; and when on the larboard ſide, the greateſt. On the eighth, our Commander, in conſequence of no ſignals having been anſwered by the Adventure, had reaſon to apprehend that a ſeparation had taken place. After waiting two days, during which guns were kept diſcharging, and falſe fires were burnt in the night, the fact was confirmed; ſo that the Reſolution was obliged to proceed alone in her voyage. As ſhe purſued her courſe, penguins and other birds, from time to time, appeared in great numbers; the meeting with which gave our Navigators ſome hopes of finding land, and occaſioned various ſpeculations with regard to its ſituation. Experience, however, convinced them that no ſtreſs was to be laid on ſuch hopes. They were ſo often deceived, that they could no longer look upon any of the oceanic birds, which frequent high latitudes, as ſure ſigns of the vicinity of land. In the morning of the ſeventeenth, between midnight and three o'clock, lights were ſeen in the heavens, ſimilar to thoſe which are known in the northern hemiſphere, by the name of the Aurora Borealis. Captain Cook had never heard that an Aurora Auſtralis had been ſeen before. The officer of the watch obſerved that it ſometimes broke out in ſpiral rays, and in a circular form; at which time its light was very ſtrong, and its appearance beautiful. It was not perceived to have any particular direction. On the contrary, at various times, it was conſpicuous in different parts of the heavens, and diffuſed its light throughout the whole atmoſphere. On the twentieth, our Navigators imagined that they ſaw land to the South-weſt. Their conviction of its real exiſtence was ſo ſtrong, that they had no doubt of the matter; and accordingly they endeavoured to work up to it, in doing which the weather was favourable to their purpoſe. However, what had been taken for land proved only to be clouds, that in the evening entirely diſappeared, and left a clear horizon, in which nothing could be diſcerned but ice iſlands. At night the Aurora Auſtralis was again ſeen, and the appearance it aſſumed was very brilliant and luminous. It firſt diſcovered itſelf in the eaſt, and in a ſhort time ſpread over the whole heavens. In the night of the twenty-third, when the ſhip was in latitude 61° 52′ South, and longitude 95° 2′ Eaſt, the weather being exceedingly ſtormy, thick, and hazy, with ſleet and ſnow, our Voyagers were on every ſide ſurrounded with danger. In ſuch a ſituation, it was natural for them to wiſh for day-light: but day-light, when it came, ſerved only to encreaſe their apprehenſions, by exhibiting thoſe huge mountains of ice to their view, which the darkneſs had prevented them from ſeeing. Theſe unfavourable circumſtances, at ſo advanced a ſeaſon of the year, diſcouraged Captain Cook from putting in execution a reſolution he had formed of once more croſſing the antarctic circle. Accordingly, early in the morning of the twenty-fourth, he ſtood to the North, with a very hard gale, and a very high ſea, which made great deſtruction among the ice iſlands. But ſo far was this incident from being of any advantage to our Navigators, that it greatly encreaſed the number of pieces they had to avoid. The large pieces which broke from the ice iſlands, were found to be much more dangerous than the iſlands themſelves. While the latter roſe ſo high out of the water, that they could generally be ſeen, unleſs the weather was very thick and hazy, before our people nearly approached them, the others could not be diſcerned, in the night, till they were under the ſhip's bows. Theſe dangers, however, were now become ſo familiar to the Captain and his company, that the apprehenſions they cauſed were never of long duration; and a compenſation was, in ſome degree, made for them, by the ſeaſonable ſupplies of freſh water which the ice iſlands afforded, and by their very romantic appearance. The foaming and daſhing of the waves into the curious holes and caverns which were formed in many of them, greatly heightened the ſcene; and the whole exhibited a view that at once filled the mind with admiration and horror, and could only be deſcribed by the hand of an able painter. In ſailing from the twenty-fifth to the twenty-eighth, the wind was accompained with a large hollow ſea, which rendered Captain Cook certain that no land, of any conſiderable extent, could lie within a hundred or a hundred and fifty leagues from Eaſt to South-weſt. Though this was ſtill the ſummer ſeaſon in that part of the world, and the weather was becoming ſomewhat warmer than it had been before, yet ſuch were the effects of the cold, that a ſow having farrowed nine pigs in the morning, all of them, notwithſtanding the utmoſt care to prevent it, were killed before four o'clock in the afternoon. From the ſame cauſe, the Captain himſelf and ſeveral of his people had their fingers and toes chilblained. For ſome days afterward, the cold conſiderably abated; but ſtill it could not be ſaid that there was ſummer weather, according to our Commander's ideas of ſummer in the northern hemiſphere as far as ſixty degrees of latitude, which was nearly as far as he had then been. As he proceeded on his voyage, from the twenty-eighth of February to the eleventh of March, he had ample reaſon to conclude, from the ſwell of the ſea and other circumſtances, that there could be no land to the South, but what muſt lie at a great diſtance. The weather having been clear on the thirteenth and fourteenth, Mr. Wales had an opportunity of getting ſome obſervations of the ſun and moon; the reſults of which, reduced to noon, when the latitude was 58° 22′ South, gave 136° 22′ Eaſt longitude. Mr. Kendal's and Mr. Arnold's watches gave each of them 134° 42′; and this was the firſt and only time in which they had pointed out the ſame longitude ſince the ſhips had departed from England. The greateſt difference, however, between them, ſince our Voyagers had left the Cape, had not much exceeded two degrees. From the moderate, and what might almoſt be called pleaſant weather, which had occurred for two or three days, Captain Cook began to wiſh that he had been a few degrees of latitude farther South; and he was even tempted to incline his courſe that way. But he ſoon met with weather which convinced him that he had proceeded full far enough; and that the time was approaching when theſe ſeas could not be navigated without enduring intenſe cold. As he advanced in his courſe, he became perfectly aſſured, from repeated proofs, that he had left no land behind him in the direction of Weſt-ſouth-weſt; and that no land lay to the South on this ſide ſixty degrees of latitude. He came, therefore, to a reſolution, on the ſeventeenth (i), to quit the high ſouthern latitudes, and to proceed to New Zealand, with a view of looking for the Adventure, and of refreſhing his people. He had, alſo, ſome thoughts, and even a deſire of viſiting the Eaſt coaſt of Van Diemen's Land, in order to ſatisfy himſelf whether it joined the coaſt of New South Wales. The wind, however, not permitting him to execute this part of his deſign, he ſhaped his courſe for New Zealand, in ſight of which he arrived on the twenty-fifth, and where he came to anchor on the day following, in Duſky Bay. He had now been a hundred and ſeventeen days at ſea, during which time he had ſailed three thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty leagues, without once coming within ſight of land.

(i) The Reſolution was now in latitude 59° 7′ South, and longitude 146° 53′ Eaſt.

After ſo long a voyage, in a high ſouthern latitude, it might reaſonably have been expected that many of Captain Cook's people would be ill of the ſcurvy. This, however, was not the caſe. So ſalutary were the effects of the ſweet wort, and ſeveral articles of proviſion, and eſpecially of the frequent airing and ſweetening of the ſhip, that there was only one man on board who could be ſaid to be much afflicted with the diſeaſe; and even in that man, it was chiefly occaſioned by a bad habit of body, and a complication of other diſorders (k). As our commander did not like the place in which he had anchored, he ſent Lieutenant Pickerſgill over to the South-eaſt ſide of the bay, in ſearch of a better; and the Lieutenant ſucceeded in finding a harbour that was in every reſpect deſirable. In the mean while, the fiſhing-boat was very ſucceſsful; returning with fiſh ſufficient for the whole crew's ſupper; and in the morning of the next day, as many were caught as ſerved for dinner. Hence were derived certain hopes of being plentifully ſupplied with this article. Nor did the ſhores and woods appear leſs deſtitute of wild-fowl; ſo that our people had the proſpect of enjoying, with eaſe, what, in their ſituation, might be called the luxuries of life. Theſe agreeable circumſtances determined Captain Cook to ſtay ſome time in the bay, in order to examine it thoroughly; as no one had ever landed before on any of the ſouthern parts of New Zealand. On the twenty-ſeventh, the ſhip entered PICKERSGILL HARBOUR; for ſo it was called, from the name of the Gentleman by whom it had firſt been diſcovered. Here wood, for fuel and other purpoſes, was immediately at hand; and a fine ſtream of freſh-water was not above a hundred yards from the ſtern of the veſſel. Our voyagers, being thus advantageouſly ſituated, began vigorouſly to prepare for their neceſſary occupations, by clearing places in the woods, in order to ſet up the Aſtronomer's obſervatory, and the forge for the iron work, and to erect tents for the ſail-

(k) Cook's Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 28—68.

ſail-makers and coopers. They applied themſelves, alſo, to the brewing of beer from the branches or leaves of a tree which greatly reſembled the American black ſpruce. Captain Cook was perſuaded, from the knowledge which he had of this tree, and from the ſimilarity it bore to the ſpruce, that, with the addition of inſpiſſated juice of wort and melaſſes, it would make a very wholeſome liquor, and ſupply the want of vegetables, of which the country was deſtitute. It appeared, by the event, that he was not miſtaken in his judgment. Several of the natives were ſeen on the twenty-eighth, who took little notice of the Engliſh, and were very ſhy of acceſs; and the Captain did not chooſe to force an intercourſe with them, as he had been inſtructed, by former experience, that the beſt method of obtaining it was to leave the time and place to themſelves. While our Commander continued in his preſent ſituation, he took every opportunity of examining the bay. As he was proſecuting his ſurvey of it, on the ſixth of April, his attention was directed to the North ſide, where he diſcovered a fine capacious cove, in the bottom of which is a freſh-water river. On the Weſt ſide are ſeveral beautiful caſcades; and the ſhores are ſo ſteep, that water might directly be conveyed from them into the ſhip. Fourteen ducks, beſides other birds, having been ſhot in this place, he gave it the name of DUCK COVE. When he was returning in the evening, he met with three of the natives, one man and two women, whoſe fears he ſoon diſſipated, and whom he engaged in a converſation, that was little underſtood on either ſide. The youngeſt of the women had a volubility of tongue that could not be exceeded; and ſhe entertained Captain Cook, and the Gentlemen who accompanied him, with a dance. By degrees, our Commander obtained the good-will and confidence of the Indians. His preſents, however, were at firſt received with much indifference, hatchets and ſpike-nails excepted. At a viſit, on the twelfth, from a family of the natives, the Captain, perceiving that they approached the ſhip with great caution, met them in a boat, which he quitted when he came near them, and went into their canoe. After all, he could not prevail upon them to go on board the Reſolution; but at length they put on ſhore in a little creek, and ſeating themſelves abreaſt of the Engliſh veſſel, entered into familiar converſation with ſeveral of the officers and ſeamen; in which they paid a much greater regard to ſome, whom they probably miſtook for females, than to others. So well, indeed, were they now reconciled to our Voyagers, that they took up their quarters nearly within the diſtance of a hundred yards from the ſhip's watering-place. Captain Cook, in his interview with them, had cauſed the bag-pipes and fife to play, and the drum to beat. The two former they heard with apparent inſenſibility; but the latter excited in them a certain degree of attention. On the eighteenth, a Chief, with whom ſome connections had already been formed, was induced, together with his daughter, to come on board the Reſolution. Previouſly to his doing it, he preſented the Captain with a piece of cloth and a green talk hatchet. He gave alſo a piece of cloth to Mr. Forſter; and the girl gave another to Mr. Hodges. Though this cuſtom of making preſents, before any are received, is common with the natives of the South Sea Iſles, our Commander had never till now ſeen it practiſed in New Zealand. Another thing performed by the Chief before he went on board, was the taking of a ſmall green branch in his hand, with which he ſtruck the ſhip's ſide ſeveral times, repeating a ſpeech or prayer. This manner, as it were, of making peace, is likewiſe prevalent among all the nations of the South Seas. When the Chief was carried into the cabin, he viewed every part of it with ſome degree of ſurprize; but it was not poſſible to fix his attention to any one object for a ſingle moment. The works of art appeared to him in the ſame light as thoſe of nature, and were equally diſtant from his powers of comprehenſion. He and his daughter ſeemed to be the moſt ſtruck with the number of the decks, and other parts of the ſhip. As Captain Cook proceeded in examining Duſky Bay, he occaſionally met with ſome few more of the natives, with regard to whom he uſed every mode of conciliation. On the twentieth, the Chief and his family, who had been more intimate with our Navigators than any of the reſt of the Indians, went away, and never returned again. This was the more extraordinary, as in all his viſits he had been gratified with preſents. From different perſons, he had gotten nine or ten hatchets, and three or four times that number of large ſpike-nails, beſides a variety of other articles. So far as theſe things might be deemed riches in New Zealand, he was undoubtedly become by far the moſt wealthy man in the whole country. One employment of our Voyagers, while in Duſky Bay, conſiſted in ſeal-hunting, an animal which was found ſerviceable for three purpoſes. The ſkins were made uſe of for rigging, the fat afforded oil for the lamps, and the fleſh was eaten. On the twenty-fourth, the Captain, having five geeſe remaining of thoſe he had brought with him from the Cape of Good Hope, went and left them at a place to which he gave the name of GOOSE COVE. This place he fixed upon for two reaſons; firſt, becauſe there were no inhabitants to diſturb them; and ſecondly, becauſe here was the greateſt ſupply of proper food; ſo that he had no doubt of their breeding, and hoped that in time they might ſpread over the whole country, to its eminent advantage. Some days afterward, when every thing belonging to the ſhip had been removed from the ſhore, he ſet fire to the topwood, in order to dry a piece of ground, which he dug up, and ſowed with ſeveral ſorts of garden ſeeds. The ſoil, indeed, was not ſuch as to promiſe much ſucceſs to the planter; but it was the beſt

that

that could be diſcovered. The twenty-fifth of April was the eighth fair day our people had ſucceſſively enjoyed; and there was reaſon to believe that ſuch a circumſtance was very uncommon in the place where they now lay, and at that ſeaſon of the year. This favourable weather afforded them the opportunity of more ſpeedily completing their wood and water, and of putting the ſhip into a condition for ſea. On the evening of the twenty-fifth, it began to rain; and the weather was afterward extremely variable, being, at times, in a high degree, wet, cold, and ſtormy. Nothing, however, prevented Captain Cook from proſecuting, with his uſual ſagacity and diligence, his ſearch into every part of Duſky Bay; and, as there are few places in New Zealand where neceſſary refreſhments may be ſo plentifully obtained as in this bay, he hath taken care to give ſuch a deſcription of it, and of the adjacent country, as may be of ſervice tō ſucceeding navigators. Although this country lies far remote from what is now the trading part of the world, yet, as he juſtly obſerves, we can by no means tell what uſe future ages may derive from the diſcoveries made in the preſent. The various anchoring places are delineated on our Commander's chart, and the moſt convenient of them he has particularly deſcribed. Not only about Duſky Bay, but through all the ſouthern part of the weſtern coaſt of Tavai-poenammoo, the country is exceedingly mountainous. A proſpect more rude and craggy is rarely to be met with; for inland there are only to be ſeen the ſummits of mountains of a tremendous height, and conſiſting of rocks that are totally barren and naked, excepting where they are covered with ſnow. But the land which borders on the ſea coaſt is thickly clothed with wood, almoſt down to the water's edge; and this is the caſe with regard to all the adjoining Iſlands. The trees are of various kinds, and are fit for almoſt every poſſible uſe. Excepting in the river Thames, Captain Cook had not found finer timber in all New Zealand; the moſt conſiderable ſpecies of which is the ſpruce-tree; for that name he had given it from the ſimilarity of its foliage to the American ſpruce, though the wood is more ponderous, and bears a greater reſemblance to the pitch pine. Many of theſe trees are ſo large, that they would be able to furniſh main-maſts for fifty gun ſhips. Amidſt the variety of aromatic trees and ſhrubs which this part of New Zealand produced, there were none which bore fruit fit to be eaten. But for a farther account of the ſoils, vegetable productions, and animals of the coaſt, I muſt refer to the Captain's own narrative; only taking notice, that the country was not found ſo deſtitute of quadrupeds as was formerly imagined. As Duſky Bay preſented many advantages to our Navigators, ſo it was attended with ſome diſagreeable circumſtances. There were great numbers of ſmall black ſand flies, which were troubleſome to a degree that our Commander had never experienced before. Another evil aroſe from the continual quantity of rain that occurred in the bay. This might, indeed, in part proceed from the ſeaſon of the year: but it is probable that the country muſt at all times be ſubject to much wet weather, in conſequence of the vaſt height, and vicinity of the mountains. It was remarkable that the rain, though our people were perpetually expoſed to it, was not productive of any evil conſequences. On the contrary, ſuch of the men as were ſick and complaining when they entered the bay, recovered daily, and the whole crew ſoon became ſtrong and vigorous. So happy a circumſtance could only be attributed to the healthineſs of the place, and the freſh proviſions it afforded; among which, the beer was a very material article. The inhabitants of Duſky Bay are of the ſame race with the other natives of New Zealand, ſpeak the ſame language, and adhere nearly to the ſame cuſtoms. Their mode of life appears to be a wandering one; and though they are few in number, no traces were remarked of their families being connected together in any cloſe bonds of union or friendſhip. While the Reſolution lay in the bay, Mr. Wales made a variety of ſcientific obſervations, relative to latitude and longitude (l), the variation of the compaſs, and the diverſities of the tides; a ſhort account of which Captain Cook has given in his voyage, for the inſtruction and benefit of the public (m).

(l) The latitude of Mr. Wales's obſervatory at Pickerſgill harbour was 45° 47′ 26½″ South; and its longitude 166° 18′ Eaſt.
(m) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 69—102.

When Captain Cook left Duſky Bay, he directed his courſe for Queen Charlotte's Sound, where he expected to find the Adventure. This was on the eleventh of May, and nothing remarkable occurred till the ſeventeenth, when the wind at once flattened to a calm, the ſky became ſuddenly obſcured by dark denſe clouds, and there was every prognoſtication of a tempeſt. Soon after, ſix water-ſpouts were ſeen, four of which roſe and ſpent themſelves between the ſhip and the land; the fifth was at a conſiderable diſtance on the other ſide of the veſſel; and the ſixth, the progreſſive motion of which was not in a ſtraight, but in a crooked line, paſſed within fifty yards of the ſtern of the Reſolution, without producing any evil effect. As the Captain had been informed that the firing of a gun would diſſipate water-ſpouts, he was ſorry that he had not tried the experiment. But, though he was near enough, and had a gun ready for the purpoſe, his mind was ſo deeply engaged in viewing theſe extraordinary meteors, that he forgot to give the neceſſary directions. On the next day, the Reſolution came within ſight of Queen Charlotte's Sound, where Captain Cook had the ſatisfaction of diſcovering the Adventure; and both ſhips felt uncommon joy at thus meeting again, after an abſence of fourteen weeks. As the events which happened to Captain Furneaux, during the ſeparation of the two veſſels, do not fall within the immediate deſign of the preſent narrative, it may be ſufficient to obſerve, that he had an opportunity of examining, with ſomewhat more accuracy than had hitherto been done, Van Diemen's land; and his opinion was, that there are no ſtraights between this land and New Holland, but a very deep bay. He met, likewiſe, with farther proofs that the natives of New Zealand are eaters of human fleſh (n). The morning after Captain Cook's arrival in Queen Charlotte's Sound, he went himſelf, at day-break, to look for ſcurvy-graſs, celery, and other vegetables; and he had the good fortune to return with a boat-load, in a very ſhort ſpace of time. Having found that a ſufficient quantity of theſe articles might be obtained for the crews of both the ſhips, he gave orders that they ſhould be boiled, with wheat and portable broth, every day for breakfaſt; and with peaſe and broth for dinner. Experience had taught him that the vegetables now mentioned, when thus dreſſed, are extremely beneficial to ſeamen, in removing the various ſcorbutic complaints to which they are ſubject. Our Commander had entertained a deſire of viſiting Van Diemen's Land, in order to inform himſelf whether it made a part of New Holland. But as this point had been, in a great meaſure, cleared up by Captain Furneaux, he came to a reſolution to continue his reſearches to the Eaſt, between the latitudes of 41° and 46°; and he directed accordingly, that the ſhips ſhould be gotten ready for putting to ſea as ſoon as poſſible. On the twentieth, he ſent on ſhore the only ewe and ram that remained of thoſe which, with the intention of leaving them in this country, he had brought from the Cape of Good Hope. Soon after he viſited ſeveral gardens, that by order of Captain Furneaux had been made and planted with various articles; all of which were in ſuch a flouriſhing ſtate that, if duly attended to, they promiſed to be of great utility to the natives. The next day, Captain Cook himſelf ſet ſome men to work to form a garden on Long Iſland, which he ſtocked with different ſeeds, and particularly with the roots of turnips, carrots, parſnips, and potatoes. Theſe were the vegetables that would be of the moſt real uſe to the Indians, and of theſe it was eaſy to give them an idea, by comparing them with ſuch roots as they themſelves knew. On the twenty-ſecond, Captain Cook received the unpleaſant intelligence that the ewe and ram, which with ſo much care and trouble he had brought to this place, were both of them found dead. It was ſuppoſed that they had eaten ſome poiſonous plant; and by this accident all the Captain's hopes of ſtocking New Zealand with a breed of ſheep were inſtantly blaſted. The intercourſe which our great Navigator had with the inhabitants of the country, during this his ſecond viſit to Queen Charlotte's Sound, was of a friendly nature. Two or three families took up their abode near the ſhips, and employed themſelves daily in fiſhing, and in ſupplying the Engliſh with the fruits of their labour. No ſmall advantage hence accrued to our people, who were by no means ſuch expert fiſhers as the natives, nor were any of our methods of fiſhing equal to theirs. Thus in almoſt every ſtate of ſociety particular arts of life are carried to perfection; and there is ſomething which the moſt poliſhed nations may learn from the moſt barbarous. On the ſecond of June, when the Reſolution and Adventure were almoſt ready to put to ſea, Captain Cook ſent on ſhore, on the Eaſt ſide of the ſound, two goats, a male and a female; and Captain Furneaux left, near Cannibal Cove, a boar and two breeding ſows. The Gentlemen had little doubt but that the country would, in time, be ſtocked with theſe animals, provided they were not deſtroyed by the Indians before they became wild. Afterwards there would be no danger; and as the natives knew nothing of their being left behind, it was hoped that it might be ſome time before they would be diſcovered. It is remarkable that, during Captain Cook's ſecond viſit to Charlotte Sound, he was not able to recollect the face of any one perſon whom he had ſeen there three years before. Nor did it once appear, that even a ſingle Indian had the leaſt knowledge of our Commander, or of any of our people who had been with him in his laſt voyage. Hence he thought it highly probable, that the greateſt part of the natives who inhabited this ſound in the beginning of the year 1770, had either ſince been driven out of it, or had removed, of their own accord, to ſome other ſituation. Not one third of the inhabitants were there now, that had been ſeen at that time. Their ſtrong hold on the Point of Motuara was deſerted, and in every part of the ſound many forſaken habitations were diſcovered. In the Captain's opinion, there was not any reaſon to believe that the place had ever been very populous. From comparing the two voyages together, it may be collected, that the Indians of Eahei-nomauwe are in ſomewhat of a more improved ſtate of ſociety than thoſe of Tavai-poenammoo. Part of the fourth of June was employed by Captain Cook in viſiting a Chief and a whole tribe of the natives, conſiſting of between ninety and a hundred perſons, including men, women, and children. After the Captain had diſtributed ſome preſents among theſe people, and ſhewn to the Chief the gardens which had been made, he returned on board, and ſpent the remainder of the day in the celebration of his Royal Maſter's nativity. Captain Furneaux and all his officers were invited upon the occaſion; and the ſeamen were enabled, by a double allowance, to partake of the general joy. As ſome might think it an extraordinary ſtep in our Commander to proceed in diſcoveries ſo far South as forty-ſix degrees of latitude, in the very depth of winter, he has recorded his motives for this part of his conduct. Winter, he acknowledges, is by no means favourable for diſcoveries. Nevertheleſs, it appeared to him to be neceſſary that ſomething ſhould be done in that ſeaſon, in order to leſſen the work in which he was engaged; and leſt he ſhould not be able to finiſh the diſcovery of the ſouthern part of the South Pacific Ocean in the enſuing ſummer. Beſides, if he ſhould diſcover any land in his route to the Eaſt, he would be ready to begin to explore it, as ſoon as ever the ſeaſon ſhould be favourable. Independently of all theſe conſiderations, he had little to fear; having two good ſhips well provided, and both the crews being healthy. Where then could he better employ his time? If he did nothing more, he was at leaſt in hopes of being enabled to point out to poſterity, that theſe ſeas may be navigated, and that it is practicable to purſue diſcoveries, even in the depth of winter. Such was the ardour of our Navigator for proſecuting the ends of his voyage, in circumſtances which would have induced moſt men to act a more cautious part! During Captain Cook's ſtay in the Sound, he had obſerved that the ſecond viſit to this country had not mended the morals of the natives of either ſex. He had always looked upon the females of New Zealand as more chaſte than the generality of Indian women. Whatever favours a few of them might have granted to the people in the Endeavour, ſuch intercourſes uſually took place in a private manner, and did not appear to be encouraged by the men. But now the Captain was told that the male Indians were the chief promoters of a ſhameful traffic, and that, for a ſpikenail, or any other thing they valued, they would oblige the women to proſtitute themſelves, whether it were agreeable or contrary to their inclinations. At the ſame time, no regard was paid to the privacy which decency required. The account of this fact muſt be read with concern by every well wiſher to the good order and happineſs of ſociety, even without adverting to conſiderations of a higher nature (o).

he

(o) Cook's Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 121—130.

On the ſeventh of June, Captain Cook put to ſea from Queen Charlotte's Sound, with the Adventure in company. For the nautical part of the route from New Zealand to Otaheite, which continued till the fifteenth of Auguſt, I ſhall refer my readers to the Captain's voyage; and ſhall only ſelect ſuch circumſtances as are more immediately ſuitable to the deſign of the preſent narrative. It was found, on the twenty-ninth of July, that the crew of the Adventure were in a ſickly ſtate. Her Cook was dead, and about twenty of her beſt men were rendered incapable of duty by the ſcurvy and flux. At this time, no more than three men were on the ſick liſt on board the Reſolution; and only one of theſe was attacked with the ſcurvy. Some others, however, began to diſcover the ſymptoms of it; and accordingly, recourſe was had to wort, marmalade of carrots, and the rob of lemons and oranges, with the uſual ſucceſs. Captain Cook could not account for the prevalence of the ſcurvy being ſo much greater in the Adventure than in the Reſolution, unleſs it was owing to the crew of the former's being more ſcorbutic when they arrived in New Zealand than the crew of the latter, and to their eating few or no vegetables while they lay in Queen Charlotte's Sound. This aroſe partly from their want of knowing the right ſorts, and partly from the diſlike which ſeamen have to the introduction of a new diet. Their averſion to any unuſual change of food is ſo great, that it can only be overcome by the ſteady and perſevering example and authority of a commander. Many of Captain Cook's people, officers as well as common ſailors, diſliked the boiling of celery, ſcurvy-graſs, and other greens with the peas and wheat; and by ſome the proviſion, thus prepared, was refuſed to be eaten. But, as this had no effect on the Captain's conduct, their prejudice gradually ſubſided: they began to like their diet as much as the reſt of their companions; and, at length, there was hardly a man in the ſhip who did not attribute the freedom of the crew from the ſcurvy, to the beer and vegetables which had been made uſe of at New Zealand. Henceforward, whenever the ſeamen came to a place where vegetables could be obtained, our Commander ſeldom found it neceſſary to order them to be gathered; and, if they were ſcarce, happy was the perſon who could lay hold on them firſt. On the firſt of Auguſt, when the ſhips were in the latitude of 25° 1′, and the longitude of 134° 6′ Weſt, they were nearly in the ſame ſituation with that which is aſſigned by Captain Carteret for Pitcairn's Iſland, diſcovered by him in 1767. For this Iſland, therefore, our Voyagers diligently looked; but ſaw nothing. According to the longitude in which he had placed it, Captain Cook muſt have paſſed it fifteen leagues to the Weſt. But as this was uncertain, he did not think it prudent to loſe any time in ſearching for it, as the ſickly ſtate of the Adventure's people required as ſpeedy an arrival as poſſible at a place of refreſhment. A ſight of it, however, would have been of uſe in verifying, or correcting, not only the longitude of Pitcairn's Iſland, but of the others diſcovered by Captain Carteret in that neighbourhood. It is a diminution of the value of that Gentleman's voyage, that his longitude was not confirmed by aſtronomical obſervations, and that hence it was liable to errors, the correction of which was out of his power. As Captain Cook had now gotten to the northward of Captain Carteret's tracks, he no longer entertained any hopes of diſcovering a continent. Iſlands were all that he could expect to find, until he returned again to the South. In this and his former voyage, he had croſſed the ocean in the latitude of 40° and upwards, without meeting any thing which could, in the leaſt, induce him to believe that he ſhould attain the great object of his purſuit. Every circumſtance concurred to convince him that, between the meridian of America and New Zealand, there is no ſouthern continent; and that there is no continent farther to the South, unleſs in a very high latitude. This, however, was a point too important to be left to opinions and conjectures. It was to be determined by facts; and the aſcertainment of it was appointed, by our Commander, for the employment of the enſuing ſummer. It was the ſixth of Auguſt before the ſhips had the advantage of the trade wind (p). This they got at South-eaſt, being at that time in the latitude of 19° 36′ South, and the longitude of 131° 32′ Weſt. As Captain Cook had obtained the South-eaſt trade wind, he directed his courſe to the Weſt-north-weſt; not only with a view of keeping in with the ſtrength of the wind, but alſo to get to the North of the Iſlands diſcovered in his former voyage, that he might have a chance of meeting with any other Iſlands which might lie in the way. It was in the track which had been purſued by M. de Bougainville that our Commander now proceeded. He was ſorry that he could not ſpare time to ſail to the North of this track; but at preſent, on account of the ſickly ſtate of the Adventure's crew, the arriving at a place where refreſhments could be procured, was an object ſuperior to that of diſcovery. To four of the Iſlands which were paſſed by Captain Cook, he gave the names of Reſolution Iſland, Doubtful Iſland, Furneaux Iſland, and Adventure Iſland [T]. They are ſuppoſed to be the ſame that were ſeen by M. de Bougainville; and theſe with ſeveral others, which conſtitute a cluſter of low and half drowned iſles, that Gentleman diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Dangerous Archipelago. The ſmoothneſs of the ſea ſufficiently convinced our Navigators that they were ſurrounded by them, and that it was highly neceſſary to proceed with the utmoſt caution, eſpecially in the night (q).

(p) The not meeting with the South-eaſt trade wind ſooner is no new thing in this ſea.

(q) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 131—143.

Early in the morning, on the fifteenth of Auguſt, the ſhips came within ſight of Oſnaburg Iſland, or Maitea, which had been diſcovered by Captain Wallis. Soon after, Captain Cook acquainted Captain Furneaux that it was his intention to put into Oaiti-piha Bay, near the South-eaſt end of Otaheite, for the purpoſe of procuring what refreſhments he could from that part of the Iſland, before he went down to Matavai. At ſix in the evening the Iſland was ſeen bearing Weſt; and our people continued to advance towards it till midnight, when they brought to till four o'clock in the morning; after which they ſailed in for the land with a fine breeze at Eaſt. At day-break, they found themſelves within the diſtance of half a league from the reef; and, at the ſame time, the breeze began to fail them, and was at laſt ſucceeded by a calm. It now became neceſſary for the boats to be hoiſted out, in order to tow off the ſhips; but all the efforts of our Voyagers, to keep them from being carried near the reef, were inſufficient for the purpoſe. As the calm continued, the ſituation of the veſſels became ſtill more dangerous. Captain Cook, however, entertained hopes of getting round the weſtern point of the reef, and into the bay. But, about two o'clock in the afternoon, when he came before an opening or break of the reef, through which he had flattered himſelf that he might get with the ſhips, he found, on ſending to examine it, that there was not a ſufficient depth of water. Nevertheleſs, this opening cauſed ſuch an indraught of the tide of flood through it, as was very near proving fatal to the Reſolution; for as ſoon as the veſſels got into the ſtream, they were carried towards the reef with great impetuoſity. The moment the Captain perceived this, he ordered one of the warping machines, which was held in readineſs, to be carried out with about four hundred fathoms of rope; but it did not produce the leaſt effect; and our Navigators had now in proſpect the horrors of ſhipwreck. They were not more than two cables length from the breakers; and, though it was the only probable method which was left of ſaving the ſhips, they could find no bottom to anchor. An anchor, however, they did drop; but before it took hold, and brought them up, the Reſolution was in leſs than three fathom water, and ſtruck at every fall of the ſea, which broke cloſe under her ſtern in a dreadful ſurf, and threatened her crew every moment with deſtruction. Happily, the Adventure brought up without ſtriking. Preſently, the Reſolution's people carried out two kedge-anchors, with hawſers to each; and theſe found ground a little without the bower. By heaving upon them, and cutting away the bower anchor, the ſhip was gotten afloat, where Captain Cook and his men lay for ſome time in the greateſt anxiety, expecting every minute that either the kedges would come home, or the hawſers be cut in two by the rocks. At length, the tide ceaſed to act in the ſame direction; upon which the Captain ordered all the boats to try to tow off the veſſel. Having found this to be practicable, the two kedges were hoved up; and at that moment a light air came off from the land, by which the boats were ſo much aſſiſted, that the Reſolution ſoon got clear of all danger. Our Commander then ordered all the boats to aſſiſt the Adventure; but before they reached her, ſhe was under ſail with the land breeze, and in a little time joined her companion, leaving behind her three anchors, her coaſting cable, and two hawſers, which were never recovered. Thus were our Voyagers once more ſafe at ſea, after narrowly eſcaping being wrecked on the very Iſland at which, but a few days before, they had moſt ardently wiſhed to arrive. It was a peculiarly happy circumſtance, that the calm continued, after bringing the ſhips into ſo dangerous a ſtate. For if the ſea breeze, as is uſually the caſe, had ſet in, the Reſolution muſt inevitably have been loſt, and probably the Adventure

[T] And Adventure Iſland.] Reſolution Iſland is in latitude 17° 24′ South, and longitude 141° 39′ Weſt; Doubtful Iſland, latitude 17° 20′, longitude 141° 38′; Furneaux Iſland, latitude 17° 5′, longitude 143° 16′; and Adventure Iſland, latitude 17° 4′, longitude 144° 30′ Weſt.

likewiſe. During the time in which the Engliſh were in this critical ſituation, a number of the natives were either on board or near the veſſels in their canoes. Nevertheleſs, they ſeemed to be inſenſible of our people's danger, ſhewing not the leaſt ſurprize, joy, or fear, when the ſhips were ſtriking; and they went away a little before ſunſet, quite unconcerned. Though moſt of them knew Captain Cook again, and many enquired for Mr. Banks and others who had been with the Captain before, it was remarkable that not one of them aſked for Tupia. On the ſeventeenth, the Reſolution and Adventure anchored in Oaitipiha Bay, immediately upon which they were crowded with the inhabitants of the country, who brought with them cocoa-nuts, plaintains, bananoes, apples, yams, and other roots, which were exchanged for nails and beads. To ſome who called themſelves Chiefs, our Commander made preſents of ſhirts, axes, and ſeveral articles beſide, in return for which they promiſed to bring him hogs and fowls; a promiſe which they did not perform, and which, as might be judged from their conduct, they had never had the leaſt intention of performing. In the afternoon of the ſame day, Captain Cook landed in company with Captain Furneaux, for the purpoſe of viewing the watering-place, and of ſounding the diſpoſition of the natives. The article of water, which was now much wanted on board, he found might conveniently be obtained, and the inhabitants behaved with great civility. Notwithſtanding this civility, nothing was brought to market, the next day, but fruit and roots, though it was ſaid that many hogs were ſeen about the houſes in the neighbourhood. The cry was, that they belonged to Waheatoua the Earee de hi, or King; who had not yet appeared, nor, indeed, any other Chief of note. Among the Indians that came on board the Reſolution, and no ſmall number of whom did not ſcruple to call themſelves Earees, there was one of this ſort, who had been entertained in the cabin moſt of the day, and to all of whoſe friends Captain Cook had made preſents, as well as liberally to himſelf. At length, however, he was caught taking things which did not belong to him, and handing them out of the quarter gallery. Various complaints of the like nature being, at the ſame time, made againſt the natives who were on deck, our Commander turned them all out of the ſhip. His cabin gueſt was very rapid in his retreat; and the Captain was ſo exaſperated at his behaviour, that after the Earee had gotten to ſome diſtance from the Reſolution, he fired two muſquets over his head, by which he was ſo terrified, that he quitted his canoe, and took to the water. Captain Cook then ſent a boat to take the canoe; but when the boat approached the ſhore, the people on land began to pelt her with ſtones. The Captain, therefore, being in ſome pain for her ſafety, as ſhe was unarmed, went himſelf in another boat to protect her, and ordered a great gun, loaded with ball, to be fired along the coaſt, which made all the Indians retire from the ſhore, and he was ſuffered to bring away two canoes without the leaſt ſhew of oppoſition. In a few hours peace was reſtored, and the canoes were returned to the firſt perſon who came for them. It was not till the evening of this day that any one enquired after Tupia, and then the enquiry was made by only two or three of the natives. When they learned the cauſe of his death, they were perfectly ſatisfied; nor did it appear to our Commander that they would have felt a moment's uneaſineſs, if Tupia's deceaſe had proceeded from any other cauſe than ſickneſs. They were as little concerned about Aotourou, the man who had gone away with M. de Bougainville. But they were continually aſking for Mr. Banks, and for ſeveral others who had accompanied Captain Cook in his former voyage. Since that voyage, very conſiderable changes had happened in the country. Toutaha, the regent of the greater peninſula of Otaheite, had been killed in a battle which was fought between the two kingdoms about five months before the Reſolution's arrival; and Otoo was now the reigning Prince. Tubourai Tamaide, and ſeveral more of the principal friends to the Engliſh, had fallen in this battle, together with a large number of the common people. A peace ſubſiſted, at preſent, between the two grand diviſions of the Iſland. On the twentieth, one of the natives carried off a muſquet belonging to the guard on ſhore. Captain Cook, who was himſelf a witneſs of the tranſaction, ſent ſome of his people after him; but this would have been to very little purpoſe, if the thief had not been intercepted by ſeveral of his own countrymen, who purſued him voluntarily, knocked him down, and returned the muſquet to the Engliſh. This act of juſtice prevented our Commander from being placed in a diſagreeable ſituation. If the natives had not given their immediate aſſiſtance, it would ſcarcely have been in his power to have recovered the muſquet, by any gentle means whatever; and if he had been obliged to have recourſe to other methods, he was ſure of loſing more than ten times its value. The fraud of one who appeared as a Chief, is, perhaps, not unworthy of notice. This man, in a viſit to Captain Cook, preſented him with a quantity of fruit; among which were a number of cocoa-nuts that had already been exhauſted of their liquor by our people, and afterwards thrown overboard. Theſe the Chief had picked up, and tied ſo artfully in bundles, that at firſt the deception was not perceived. When he was informed of it, without betraying the leaſt emotion, and affecting a total ignorance of the matter, he opened two or three of the nuts himſelf, ſignified that he was ſatisfied of the fact, and then went on ſhore and ſent off a quantity of plantains and bananoes. The ingenuity and the impudence of fraud are not ſolely the productions of poliſhed ſociety. Captain Cook, on the twenty-third, had an interview with Waheatoua, the reſult of which was, that our Navigators obtained this day as much pork as furniſhed a meal to the crews of both the veſſels. In the Captain's laſt voyage, Waheatoua, who was then little more than a boy, was called Tearee; but having ſucceeded to his father's authority, he had aſſumed his father's name. The fruits which were procured at Oaiti-piha Bay contributed greatly to the recovery of the ſick people belonging to the Adventure. Many of them, who had been ſo ill as to be incapable of moving without aſſiſtance, were, in the compaſs of a few days, ſo far recovered that they were able to walk about of themſelves. When the Reſolution entered the bay, ſhe had but one ſcorbutic man on board. A Marine, who had long been ſick, and who died, the ſecond day after her arrival, of a complication of diſorders, had not the leaſt mixture of the ſcurvy.

On the twenty-fourth, the ſhips put to ſea, and arrived the next evening in Matavai Bay. Before they could come to an anchor, the decks were crowded with the natives, many of whom Captain Cook knew, and by moſt of whom he was well remembered. Among a large multitude of people, who were collected together upon the ſhore, was Otoo the King of the Iſland. Our Commander paid him a viſit on the following day, at Oparree, the place of his reſidence; and found him to be a fine, perſonable, well-made man, ſix feet high, and about thirty years of age. The qualities of his mind were not correſpondent to his external appearance: for when Captain Cook endeavoured to obtain from him the promiſe of a viſit on board, he acknowledged that he was afraid of the guns, and, indeed, manifeſted in all his actions that he was a prince of a timorous diſpoſition. Upon the Captain's return from Oparree, he found the tents, and the Aſtronomer's obſervatories, ſet up, on the ſame ſpot from which the tranſit of Venus had been obſerved in 1769. The ſick, being twenty in number from the Adventure, and one from the Reſolution, all of whom were ill of the ſcurvy, he ordered to be landed; and he appointed a guard of Marines on ſhore, under the command of Lieutenant Edgcumbe. On the twenty-ſeventh, Otoo was prevailed upon, with ſome degree of reluctance, to pay our Commander a viſit. He came attended with a numerous train, and brought with him fruits, a hog, two large fiſh, and a quantity of cloth; for which he and all his retinue were gratified with ſuitable preſents. When Captain Cook conveyed his gueſts to land, he was met by a venerable Lady, the mother of the late Toutaha, who ſeized him by both hands, and burſt into a flood of tears, ſaying Toutaha Tiyo no Toutee matty Toutaha; that is, "Toutaha, your friend, "or the friend of Cook, is dead." He was ſo much affected with her behaviour, that it would have been impoſſible for him to have refrained from mingling his tears with her's, had not Otoo, who was diſpleaſed with the interview, taken him from her. It was with difficulty that the Captain could obtain permiſſion to ſee her again, when he gave her an axe and ſome other articles. Captain Furneaux, at this time, preſented the King with two fine goats, which, if no accident befel them, might be expected to multiply. Several days had paſſed in a friendly intercourſe with the natives, and in procuring of proviſions, when, in the evening of the thirtieth, the Gentlemen on board the Reſolution were alarmed with the cry of murder, and with a great noiſe on ſhore, near the bottom of the bay, and at a diſtance from the Engliſh encampment. Upon this, Captain Cook, who ſuſpected that ſome of his own men were concerned in the affair, immediately diſpatched an armed boat, to know the cauſe of the diſturbance, and to bring off ſuch of his people as ſhould be found in the place. He ſent, alſo, to the Adventure, and to the poſt on ſhore, to learn who were miſſing; for none but thoſe who were upon duty were abſent from the Reſolution. The boats ſpeedily returned with three Marines and a Seaman. Some others, likewiſe, were taken, belonging to the Adventure; and all of them being put under confinement, our Commander, the next morning, ordered them to be puniſhed according to their deſerts. He did not find that any miſchief had been done, and the men would confeſs nothing. Some liberties which they had taken with the women had probably given occaſion to the diſturbance. To whatever cauſe it was owing, the natives were ſo much alarmed, that they fled from their habitations in the dead of night, and the alarm was ſpread many miles along the coaſt. In the morning, when Captain Cook went to viſit Otoo, by appointment, he found that he had removed, or rather fled, to a great diſtance from the uſual place of his abode. After arriving where he was, it was ſome hours before the Captain could be admitted to the ſight of him; and then he complained of the riot of the preceding evening. The ſick being nearly recovered, the water completed, and the neceſſary repairs of the ſhips finiſhed, Captain Cook determined to put to ſea without delay. Accordingly, on the firſt of September, he ordered every thing to be removed from the ſhore, and the veſſels to be unmoored, in which employment his people were engaged the greater part of the day. In the afternoon of the ſame day, Lieutenant Pickerſgill returned from Attahourou, to which place he had been ſent by the Captain, for the purpoſe of procuring ſome hogs that had been promiſed. In this expedition, the Lieutenant had ſeen the celebrated Oberea, who has been ſo much the object of poetical fancy. Her ſituation was very humble, compared with what it had formerly been. She was not only altered much for the worſe in her perſon, but appeared to be poor, and of little or no conſequence or authority in the Iſland. In the evening a favourable wind having ſprung up, our Commander put to ſea; on which occaſion he was obliged to diſmiſs his Otaheite friends ſooner than they wiſhed to depart; but well ſatisfied with his kind and liberal treatment (r).

From Matavai Bay Captain Cook directed his courſe for the Iſland Huaheine, where he intended to touch. This Iſland he reached the next day, and, early in the morning of the third of September, made ſail for the harbour of Owharre, in which he ſoon came to an anchor. The Adventure, not happening to turn into the harbour with equal facility, got aſhore on the North ſide of the channel; but, by the timely aſſiſtance which Capt. Cook had previouſly provided, in caſe ſuch an accident ſhould occur, ſhe was gotten off again, without receiving any damage. As ſoon as both the ſhips were in ſafety, our Commander, together with Captain Furneaux, landed upon the Iſland, and was received by the natives with the utmoſt cordiality. A trade immediately commenced; ſo that our Navigators had a fair proſpect of being plentifully ſupplied with freſh pork and fowls, which, to people in their ſituation, was a very deſirable circumſtance. On the fourth, Lieutenant Pickerſgill ſailed with the cutter, on a trading party, toward the ſouth end of the Iſle. Another trading party was alſo ſent on ſhore near the ſhips, which party Captain Cook attended himſelf, to ſee that the buſineſs was properly conducted at the firſt ſetting out, this being a point of no ſmall importance. Every thing being ſettled to his mind, he went, accompanied by Captain Furneaux and Mr. Forſter, to pay a viſit to his old friend Oree, the Chief of the Iſland. This viſit was preceded by many preparatory ceremonies. Among other things, the Chief ſent to our Commander the inſcription engraved on a ſmall piece of pewter, which he had left with him in July 1769. It was in the bag that Captain Cook had made for it, together with a piece of counterfeit Engliſh coin, and a few beads, which had been put in at the ſame time; whence it was evident what particular care had been taken of the whole. After the previous ceremonies had been diſcharged, the Captain wanted to go to the King, but he was informed that the King would come to him. Accordingly, Oree went up to our Commander, and fell on his neck, and embraced him; nor was it a ceremonious embrace, for the tears which trickled down the venerable old man's cheeks, ſufficiently beſpoke the language of his heart. The preſents which Captain Cook made to the Chief on this occaſion, conſiſted of the moſt valuable articles he had; for he regarded him as a father. Oree, in return, gave the Captain a hog, and a quantity of cloth, promiſing that all the wants of the Engliſh ſhould be ſupplied; and it was a promiſe to which he faithfully adhered. Indeed, he carried his kindneſs to Captain Cook ſo far, as not to fail ſending him every day, for his table, a plentiful ſupply of the very beſt of ready-dreſſed fruit and roots. Hitherto all things had gone on in the moſt agreeable manner; but on Monday the ſixth, ſeveral circumſtances occurred, which rendered it an unpleaſant and troubleſome day. When our Commander went to the trading-place he was informed that one of the inhabitants had behaved with remarkable inſolence. The man was completely equipped in the war habit, had a club in each hand, and ſeemed bent upon miſchief. Captain Cook took, therefore, the clubs from him, broke them before his eyes, and, with ſome difficulty, compelled him to retire. About the ſame time, Mr. Sparrman, who had imprudently gone out alone to botanize, was aſſaulted by two men, who ſtripped him of every thing which he had about him, excepting his trowſers, and ſtruck him again and again with his own hanger, though happily without doing him any harm. When they had accompliſhed their purpoſe, they made off; after which another of the natives brought a piece of cloth to cover him, and conducted him to the trading-place, where the inhabitants, in a large number, were aſſembled. The inſtant that Mr. Sparrman appeared in the condition now deſcribed, they all fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Captain Cook, having recalled a few of the Indians, and convinced them that he ſhould take no ſtep to injure thoſe who were innocent, went to Oree to complain of the outrage. When the Chief had heard the whole affair related, he wept aloud, and many other of the inhabitants did the ſame. After the firſt tranſports of his grief had ſubſided, he began to expoſtulate with his people, telling them (for ſo his language was underſtood by the Engliſh) how well Captain Cook had treated them, both in this and his former voyage, and how baſe it was in them to commit ſuch actions. He then took a minute account of the things of which Mr. Sparrman had been robbed, and, after having promiſed to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for the recovery of them, deſired to go into the Captain's boat. At this, the natives, apprehenſive doubtleſs for the ſafety of their Prince, expreſſed the utmoſt alarm, and uſed every argument to diſſuade him from ſo raſh a meaſure. All their remonſtrances, however, were in vain. He haſtened into the boat; and as ſoon as they ſaw that their beloved Chief was wholly in our Commander's power, they ſet up a great outcry. Indeed, their grief was inexpreſſible: they prayed, entreated, nay, attempted to pull him out of the boat; and every face was bedewed with tears. Even Captain Cook himſelf was ſo moved by their diſtreſs, that he united his entreaties with theirs, but all to no purpoſe. Oree inſiſted upon the Captain's coming into the boat, which was no ſooner done than he ordered it to be put off. His ſiſter was the only perſon among the Indians who behaved with a becoming magnanimity on this occaſion; for, with a ſpirit equal to that of her royal brother, ſhe alone did not oppoſe his going. It was his deſign, in coming into the boat of the the Engliſh, to proceed with them in ſearch of the robbers. Accordingly, he went with Captain Cook, as far as it was convenient, by water, when they landed, entered the country, and travelled ſome miles inland; in doing which the Chief led the way, and enquired after the criminals of every perſon whom he ſaw. In this ſearch he would have gone to the very extremity of the Iſland, if our Commander, who did not think the object worthy of ſo laborious a purſuit, had not refuſed to proceed any farther. Beſides, as he intended to ſail the next morning, and all manner of trade was ſtopped in conſequence of the alarm of the natives, it became the more neceſſary for him to return, that he might reſtore things to their former ſtate. It was with great reluctance that Oree was prevailed upon to diſcontinue the ſearch, and to content himſelf with ſending, at Captain Cook's requeſt, ſome of his people for the things which had been carried off. When he and the Captain had gotten back to the boat, they found there the Chief's ſiſter, and ſeveral other perſons, who had travelled by land to the place. The Engliſh Gentlemen immediately ſtepped into their boat, in order to return on board, without ſo much as aſking Oree to accompany them; notwithſtanding which, he inſiſted upon doing it; nor could the oppoſition and entreaties of thoſe who were about him induce him to deſiſt from his purpoſe. His ſiſter followed his example, uninfluenced, on this occaſion, by the ſupplications and tears of her daughter. Captain Cook amply rewarded the Chief and his ſiſter for the confidence they had placed in him; and, after dinner, conveyed them both on ſhore, where ſome hundreds of people waited to receive them, many of whom embraced Oree with tears of joy. All was now peace and gladneſs: the inhabitants crowded in from every part, with ſuch a plentiful ſupply of hogs, fowls, and vegetable productions, that the Engliſh preſently filled two boats; and the Chief himſelf preſented the Captain with a large hog and a quantity of fruit. Mr. Sparrman's hanger, the only thing of value which he had loſt, was brought back, together with part of his coat; and our Navigators were told, that the remaining articles ſhould be reſtored the next day. Some things which had been ſtolen from a party of officers, who had gone out a ſhooting, were returned in like manner. The tranſactions of this day have been the more particularly related, as they ſhew the high opinion which the Chief had formed of our Commander, and the unreſerved confidence that he placed in his integrity and honour. Oree had entered into a ſolemn friendſhip with Captain Cook, according to all the forms which were cuſtomary in the country; and he ſeemed to think that this friendſhip could not be broken by the act of any other perſons. It is juſtly obſerved by the Captain, that another Chief may never be found, who, under ſimilar circumſtances, will act in the ſame manner. Oree, indeed, had nothing to fear: for it was not our Commander's intention to hurt a hair of his head, or to detain him a moment longer than was agreeable to his own deſire. But of this how could he and his people be aſſured? They were not ignorant, that when he was once in Captain Cook's power, the whole force of the Iſland would not be ſufficient to recover him, and that they muſt have complied with any demands, however great, for his ranſom. The apprehenſions, therefore, of the inhabitants, for their Chief's and their own ſafety, had a reaſonable foundation. Early on the ſeventh, while the ſhips were unmooring, the Captain went to pay his farewel viſit to Oree, and took with him ſuch preſents as had not only a fancied value, but a real utility. He left, alſo, with the Chief the inſcription plate that had before been in his poſſeſſion, and another ſmall copper plate, on which were engraved theſe words: "An-" chored here, his Britannic Majeſty's ſhips, Reſolution and Adventure, September, " 1773." Theſe plates, together with ſome medals, were put up in a bag; of which Oree promiſed to take care, and to produce them to the firſt ſhip or ſhips that ſhould arrive at the Iſland. Having, in return, given a hog to Captain Cook, and loaded his boat with fruit, they took leave of each other, when the good old Chief embraced our Commander with tears in his eyes. Nothing was mentioned, at this interview, concerning the remainder of Mr. Sparrman's property. As it was early in the morning, the Captain judged that it had not been brought in, and he was not willing to ſpeak of it to Oree, leſt he ſhould give him pain about things which there had not been time to recover. The robbers having ſoon afterwards been taken, Oree came on board again, to requeſt that our Commander would go on ſhore, either to puniſh them, or to be preſent at their puniſhment; but this not being convenient to him, he left them to the correction of their own Chief. It was from the Iſland of Huaheine that Captain Furneaux received into his ſhip a young man named Omai, a native of Ulietea, of whom ſo much hath ſince been known and written. This choice Captain Cook at firſt diſapproved, as thinking that the youth was not a proper ſample of the inhabitants of the Society Iſlands; being inferior to many of them in birth and acquired rank, and not having any peculiar advantage in point of ſhape, figure, or complexion. The Captain afterwards found reaſon to be better ſatisfied with Omai's having accompanied our Navigators to England. During the ſhort ſtay of the veſſels at Huaheine, our people were very ſucceſsful in obtaining ſupplies of proviſions. No leſs than three hundred hogs, beſides fowls and fruit, were procured; and had the ſhips continued longer at the place, the quantity might have been greatly increaſed. Such was the fertility of this ſmall Iſland, that none of theſe articles of refreſhment were ſeemingly diminiſhed, but appeared to be as plentiful as ever (s).

From

From Huaheine our Navigators ſailed for Ulietea, where trade was carried on in the uſual manner, and a moſt friendly intercourſe renewed between Captain Cook and Oreo, the Chief of the Iſland. Here Tupia was enquired after with particular eagerneſs, and the enquirers were perfectly ſatisfied with the account which was given of the occaſion of that Indian's deceaſe. On the morning of the fifteenth, the Engliſh were ſurprized at finding that none of the inhabitants of Ulietea came off to the ſhips, as had hitherto been cuſtomary. As two men belonging to the Adventure had ſtayed on ſhore all night, contrary to orders, Captain Cook's firſt conjectures were, that the natives had ſtripped them, and were afraid of the revenge which would be taken of the inſult. This, however, was not the caſe. The men had been treated with great civility, and could aſſign no cauſe for the precipitate flight of the Indians. All that the Captain could learn was, that ſeveral were killed, and others wounded, by the guns of the Engliſh. This information alarmed him for the ſafety of ſome of our people, who had been ſent out in two boats to the Iſland of Otaha. He determined, therefore, if poſſible, to ſee the Chief himſelf. When he came up to him, Oreo threw his arms around our Commander's neck, and burſt into tears; in which he was accompanied by all the women, and ſome of the men; ſo that the lamentation became general. Aſtoniſhment alone kept Captain Cook from joining in their grief. At laſt, the whole which he could collect from his enquiries was, that the natives had been alarmed on account of the abſence of the Engliſh boats, and imagined that the Captain, upon the ſuppoſition of the deſertion of his men, would uſe violent means for the recovery of his loſs. When the matter was explained, it was acknowledged that not a ſingle inhabitant, or a ſingle Engliſhman, had been hurt. This groundleſs conſternation diſplayed in a ſtrong light the timorous diſpoſition of the people of the Society Iſlands. Our Navigators were as ſucceſsful in procuring proviſions at Ulietea as they had been at Huaheine. Captain Cook judged, that the number of hogs obtained amounted to four hundred, or upwards: many of them, indeed, were only roaſters, while others exceeded a hundred pounds in weight; but the general run was from forty to ſixty. A larger quantity was offered than the ſhips could contain; ſo that our countrymen were enabled to proceed on their voyage with no ſmall degree of comfort and advantage (t). Our Commander, by his ſecond viſit to the Society Iſlands, gained a farther knowledge of their general ſtate, and of the cuſtoms of the inhabitants. It appeared that a Spaniſh ſhip had been lately at Otaheite, and the natives complained that a diſeaſe had been communicated to them by the people of this veſſel, which, according to their account, affected the head, the throat, and the ſtomach, and at length ended in death. With regard to a certain diſorder, the effects of which have ſo fatally been felt in the later ages of the world, Captain Cook's enquiries could not abſolutely determine whether it was known to the Iſlanders before they were viſited by the Europeans. If it was of recent origin, the introduction of it was, without a diſſentient voice, aſcribed to the voyage of M. de Bougainville. One thing which our Commander was ſolicitous to aſcertain, was, whether human ſacrifices conſtituted a part of the religious cuſtoms of theſe people. The man of whom he made his enquiries, and ſeveral other natives, took ſome pains to explain the matter; but, from our people's ignorance of the language of the country, their explications could not be underſtood. Captain Cook afterwards learned from Omai, that the inhabitants of the Society Iſlands offer human ſacrifices to the Supreme Being. What relates to funeral ceremonies excepted, all the knowledge he could obtain concerning their religion was very imperfect and defective. The Captain had an opportunity, in this voyage, of rectifying the great injuſtice which had been done to the women of Otaheite and the neighbouring Iſles. They had been repreſented as ready, without exception, to grant the laſt favour to any man who would come up to their price: but our Commander found that this was by no means the caſe. The favours both of the married women and of the unmarried, of the better ſort, were as difficult to be obtained in the Society Iſlands as in any other country whatever. Even with reſpect to the unmarried females of the lower claſs, the charge was not indiſcriminately true. There were many of theſe who would not admit of indecent familiarities. The ſetting this ſubject in a proper light, a ſubject upon which Dr. Hawkeſworth had enlarged more than wiſdom ſeemed to require, muſt be conſidered as one of the agreeable effects of Captain Cook's ſecond voyage. Every enlightened mind will rejoice at what conduces to the honour of human nature in general, and of the female ſex in particular. Chaſtity is ſo eminently the glory of that ſex, and, indeed, is ſo eſſentially connected with the good order of ſociety, that it muſt be a ſatisfaction to reflect, that there is no country, however ignorant or barbarous, in which this virtue is not regarded as an object of moral obligation. This voyage enabled our Commander to gain ſome farther knowledge concerning the geography of the Society Iſles; and he found it highly probable, that Otaheite is of greater extent than he had computed it in his former eſtimation (u). The Aſtronomers did not neglect to ſet up their obſervatories, and to make obſervations ſuited to their purpoſe.

On the ſeventeenth of September, Captain Cook ſailed from Ulietea, directing his courſe to the Weſt, with an inclination to the South. Land was diſcovered on the twenty-third of the month, to which he gave the name of Harvey's Iſland (w). On the firſt of October,

October, he reached the Iſland of Middleburg. While he was looking about for a landing-place, two canoes, each of them conducted by two or three men, came boldly alongſide the ſhip, and ſome of the people entered it without heſitation. This mark of confidence inſpired our Commander with ſo good an opinion of the inhabitants, that he determined, if poſſible, to pay them a viſit, which he did the next day. Scarcely had the veſſels gotten to an anchor before they were ſurrounded by a great number of canoes, full of the natives, who brought with them cloth, and various curioſities, which they exchanged for nails, and ſuch other articles as were adapted to their fancy. Among thoſe who came on board, was a Chief, named Tioony, whoſe friendſhip Captain Cook immediately gained by proper preſents, conſiſting principally of a hatchet and ſome ſpike-nails. A party of our Navigators, with the Captain at the head of them, having embarked in two boats, proceeded to ſhore, where they found an immenſe croud of people, who welcomed them to the Iſland with loud acclamations. There was not ſo much as a ſtick, or any other weapon, in the hands of a ſingle native, ſo pacific were their diſpoſitions and intentions. They ſeemed to be more deſirous of giving than receiving; and many of them, who could not approach near to the boats, threw into them, over the heads of others, whole bales of cloth, and then retired, without either aſking or waiting for any thing in return. The whole day was ſpent by our Navigators in the moſt agreeable manner. When they returned on board in the evening, every one expreſſed how much he was delighted with the country, and the very obliging behaviour of the inhabitants, who ſeemed to vie with each other in their endeavours to give pleaſure to our people. All this conduct appeared to be the reſult of the moſt pure good-nature, perhaps without being accompanied with much ſentiment or feeling; for when Captain Cook ſignified to the Chief his intention of quitting the Iſland, he did not ſeem to be in the leaſt moved. Among other articles preſented by the Captain to Tioony, he left him an aſſortment of garden-ſeeds, which, if properly uſed, might be of great future benefit to the country. From Middleburg the ſhips ſailed down to Amſterdam, the natives of which Iſland were equally ready with thoſe of the former place to maintain a friendly intercourſe with the Engliſh. Like the people of Middleburg, they brought nothing with them but cloth, matting, and ſuch other articles as could be of little ſervice; and for theſe our ſeamen were ſo ſimple as to barter away their clothes. To put a ſtop, therefore, to ſo injurious a traffic, and to obtain the neceſſary refreſhments, the Captain gave orders that no ſort of curioſities ſhould be purchaſed by any perſon whatever. This injunction produced the deſired effect. When the inhabitants ſaw that the Engliſh would deal with them for nothing but eatables, they brought off bananoes and cocoa-nuts in abundance, together with ſome fowls and pigs; all of which they exchanged for ſmall nails and pieces of cloth. Even a few old rags were ſufficient for the purchaſe of a pig or a fowl. The method of carrying on trade being ſettled, and proper officers having been appointed to prevent diſputes, our Commander's next object was to obtain as complete a knowledge as poſſible of the Iſland of Amſterdam. In this he was much facilitated by a friendſhip which he had formed with Attago, one of the Chiefs of the country. Captain Cook was ſtruck with admiration, when he ſurveyed the beauty and cultivation of the Iſland. He thought himſelf tranſported into the moſt fertile plains of Europe. There was not an inch of waſte ground. The roads occupied no larger a ſpace than was abſolutely neceſſary, and the fences did not take up above four inches each. Even ſuch a ſmall portion of ground was not wholly loſt; for many of the fences themſelves contained uſeful trees or plants. The ſcene was every where the ſame; and nature, aſſiſted by a little art, no where aſſumes a more ſplendid appearance than in this Iſland. Friendly as were the natives of Amſterdam, they were not entirely free from the thieviſh diſpoſition which hath ſo often been remarked in the Iſlanders of the Southern Ocean. The inſtances, however, of this kind, which occurred, were not of ſuch a nature as to produce any extraordinary degree of trouble, or to involve our people in a quarrel with the inhabitants. Captain Cook's introduction to the King of the Iſland afforded a ſcene ſomewhat remarkable. His Majeſty was ſeated with ſo much ſullen and ſtupid gravity, that the Captain took him for an idiot, whom the Indians, from ſome ſuperſtitious reaſons, were ready to worſhip. When our Commander ſaluted and ſpoke to him, he neither anſwered, nor took the leaſt notice of him; nor did he alter a ſingle feature of his countenance. Even the preſents which were made to him could not induce him to reſign a bit of his gravity, or to ſpeak one word, or to turn his head either to the right hand or to the left. As he was in the prime of life, it is poſſible that a falſe ſenſe of dignity might engage him to aſſume ſo ſolemn a ſtupidity of appearance. In the hiſtory of mankind, inſtances might probably be found which would confirm this ſuppoſition (x).

For a general deſcription of the two Iſlands of Middleburg and Amſterdam, and an account of the cultivation, cuſtoms, and manners of the inhabitants, recourſe muſt be had to Capt. Cook's Voyage. In ſlightly touching upon a few particulars, I ſhall hope to obtain the forgiveneſs of ſome of my readers. It is obſervable, that theſe two Iſlands are guarded from the ſea by a reef of coral rocks, which extend out from the ſhore about one hundred fathoms. On this reef the force of the ſea is ſpent before it reaches the land. The ſame, indeed, is, in a great meaſure, the ſituation of all the tropical Iſles which our Commander had ſeen in that part of the globe; and hence ariſes an evidence of the wiſdom and goodneſs of Providence; as by ſuch a proviſion, nature has effectually ſecured them from the encroachments of the ſea, though many of them are mere points, when compared with the vaſt ocean by which they are ſurrounded (y). In Amſterdam, Mr. Forſter not only found the ſame plants that are at Otaheite and the neighbouring Iſlands, but ſeveral others which are not to be met with in thoſe places. Captain Cook took care, by a proper aſſortment of garden-ſeeds and pulſe, to increaſe the vegetable ſtock of the inhabitants. Hogs and fowls were the only domeſtic animals that were ſeen in theſe Iſlands. The former are of the ſame ſort with thoſe which had been met with in other parts of the Southern Ocean; but the latter are far ſuperior, being as large as any in Europe, and equal, if not preferable, with reſpect to the goodneſs of their fleſh. Both the men and women are of a common ſize with Europeans. Their colour is that of a lightiſh copper, and with a greater uniformity than occurs among the natives of Otaheite and the Society Iſles. Some of the Engliſh Gentlemen were of opinion, that the inhabitants of Middleburg and Amſterdam were a much handſomer race; while others, with whom Captain Cook concurred, maintained a contrary ſentiment. However this may be, their ſhape is good, their features regular, and they are active, briſk, and lively. The women, in particular, are the merrieſt creatures our Commander had ever met with; and, provided any perſon ſeemed pleaſed with them, they would keep chattering by his ſide, without the leaſt invitation, or conſidering whether they were underſtood. They appeared in general to be modeſt, though there were ſeveral amongſt them of a different character. As there were yet on board ſome complaints of a certain diſorder, the Captain took all poſſible care to prevent its communication. Our Navigators were frequently entertained by the women with ſongs, and this in a manner which was by no means diſagreeable. They had a method of keeping time, by ſnapping their fingers. Their muſic was harmonious as well as their voices, and there was a conſiderable degree of compaſs in their notes. A ſingular cuſtom was found to prevail in theſe Iſlands. The greater part of the people were obſerved to have loſt one or both of their little fingers; and this was not peculiar to rank, age, or ſex; nor was the amputation reſtricted to any ſpecific period of life. Our Navigators endeavoured in vain to diſcover the reaſon of ſo extraordinary a practice. A very extenſive knowledge of the language of Middleburg and Amſterdam could not be obtained during the ſhort ſtay which was made there by the Engliſh. However, the more they enquired into it, the more they found that it was, in general, the ſame with that which is ſpoken at Otaheite and the Society Iſles. The difference is not greater than what frequently occurs betwixt the moſt northern and weſtern parts of England (z).

(y) The Iſlands of Middleburg and Amſterdam are ſituated between the latitude of 21° 25′ and 21° 3′ South, and between the longitude of 174° 40′ and 175° 15′ Weſt, deduced from obſervations made on the ſpot.

On the ſeventh of October, Captain Cook proceeded on his voyage. His intention was to ſail directly to Queen Charlotte's Sound in New Zealand, for the purpoſe of taking in wood and water, after which he was to purſue his diſcoveries to the South and the Eaſt. The day after he quitted Amſterdam, he paſſed the Iſland of Pilſtart; an Iſland which had been diſcovered by Taſman (a). On the twenty-firſt, he made the land of New Zealand, at the diſtance of eight or ten leagues from Table Cape. As our Commander was very deſirous of leaving in the country ſuch an aſſortment of animals and vegetables as might greatly contribute to the future benefit of the inhabitants, one of the firſt things which he did was to give to a Chief, who had come off in a canoe, two boars, two ſows, four hens, and two cocks, together with a quantity of ſeeds. The ſeeds were of the moſt uſeful kind; ſuch as wheat, french and kidney beans, peaſe, cabbage, turnips, onions, carrots, parſnips, and yams. The man to whom theſe ſeveral articles were preſented, though he was much more enraptured with a ſpike-nail half the length of his arm, promiſed, however, to take care of them, and, in particular, not to kill any of the animals. If he adhered to his promiſe, they would be ſufficient, in a due courſe of time, to ſtock the whole Iſland. It was the third of November before Captain Cook brought the Reſolution into Ship Cove, in Queen Charlotte's Sound. He had been beating about the Iſland from the twenty-firſt of October, during which time his veſſel was expoſed to a variety of tempeſtuous weather. In one inſtance he had been driven off the land by a furious ſtorm, which laſted two days, and which would have been dangerous in the higheſt degree, had it not fortunately happened that it was fair overhead, and that there was no reaſon to be apprehenſive of a lee-ſhore. In the courſe of the bad weather which ſucceeded this ſtorm, the Adventure was ſeparated from the Reſolution, and was never ſeen or heard of through the whole remainder of the voyage. The firſt object of our Commander's attention, after his arrival in Queen Charlotte's Sound, was to provide for the repair of his ſhip, which had ſuffered in various reſpects, and eſpecially in her ſails and rigging. Another matter which called for his notice, was the ſtate of the bread belonging to the veſſel; and he had the mortification of finding that a large quantity of it was damaged. To repair this loſs in the beſt manner he was able, he ordered all the caſks to be opened, the bread to be picked, and ſuch parcels of it to be baked, in the copper oven, as could by that means be recovered. Notwithſtanding this care, four thouſand two hundred and ninety-two pounds were found totally unfit for uſe; and about three thouſand pounds more could only be eaten by people in the ſituation of our Navigators. Captain Cook was early in his enquiries concerning the animals which had been left at New Zealand, in the former part of his voyage. He ſaw the youngeſt of the two ſows that Captain Furneaux had put on ſhore in Cannibal Cove. She was in good condition, and very tame. The boar and other ſow, if our Commander was rightly informed, were taken away and ſeparated, but not killed. He was told that the two goats, which he had landed up the Sound, had been deſtroyed by a raſcally native, of the name of Goubiah; ſo that the Captain had the grief of diſcovering that all his benevolent endeavours to ſtock the country with uſeful animals were likely to be fruſtrated by the very people whom he was anxious to ſerve. The gardens had met with a better fate. Every thing in them, excepting potatoes, the inhabitants had left entirely to nature, who had ſo well performed her part, that moſt of the articles were in a flouriſhing condition. Notwithſtanding the inattention and folly of the New Zealanders, Captain Cook ſtill continued his zeal for their benefit. To the inhabitants who reſided at the Cove, he gave a boar, a young ſow, two cocks, and two hens, which had been brought from the Society Iſlands. At the bottom of the Weſt Bay, he ordered to be landed, without the knowledge of the Indians, four hogs, being three ſows and one boar, together with two cocks and two hens. They were carried a little way into the woods, and as much food was left them as would ſerve them for ten or twelve days; which was done to prevent their coming down to the ſhore in ſearch of ſuſtenance, and by that means being diſcovered by the natives. The Captain was deſirous of replacing the two goats which Goubiah was underſtood to have killed, by leaving behind him the only two that yet remained in his poſſeſſion. But he had the misfortune, ſoon after his arrival at Queen Charlotte's Sound, to loſe the ram; and this in a manner for which it was not eaſy to aſſign the cauſe. Whether it was owing to any thing he had eaten, or to his being ſtung with nettles, which were very plentiful in the place, he was ſeized with fits that bordered upon madneſs. In one of theſe fits, he was ſuppoſed to have run into the ſea, and to have been drowned: and thus every method, which our Commander had taken to ſtock the country with ſheep and goats, proved ineffectual. He hoped to be more ſucceſsful with reſpect to the boars and ſows, and the cocks and hens, which he left in the Iſland. While the boatſwain, one day, and a party of men were employed in cutting broom, ſome of them ſtole ſeveral things from a private hut of the natives, in which was depoſited moſt of the treaſure they had received from the Engliſh, as well as property of their own. Complaint being made by the Indians to Captain Cook, and a particular man of the boatſwain's party having been pointed out to the Captain as the perſon who had committed the theft, he ordered him to be puniſhed in their preſence. With this they went away ſeemingly ſatisfied, although they did not recover any of the articles which they had loſt. It was always a maxim with our Commander, to puniſh the leaſt crimes which any of his people were guilty of with regard to uncivilized nations. Their robbing us with impunity he by no means conſidered as a reaſon for our treating them in the ſame manner. Addicted as the New Zealanders were, in a certain degree, to ſtealing, a diſpoſition which muſt have been very much encreaſed by the novelty and allurement of the objects preſented to their view; they had, nevertheleſs, when injured themſelves, ſuch a ſenſe of juſtice, as to apply to Captain Cook for redreſs. The beſt method, in his opinion, of preſerving a good underſtanding with the inhabitants of countries in this ſtate of ſociety, is, firſt, to convince them of the ſuperiority we have over them in conſequence of our fire-arms, and then to be always upon our guard. Such a conduct, united with ſtrict honeſty and gentle treatment, will convince them that it is their intereſt not to diſturb us, and prevent them from forming any general plan of attack. In this ſecond viſit of our Navigators to New Zealand, they met with indubitable evidence that the natives were eaters of human fleſh. The proofs of this fact had a moſt powerful influence on the mind of Oedidee, a youth of Bolabola, whom Captain Cook had brought in the Reſolution from Ulietea. He was ſo affected that he became perfectly motionleſs, and exhibited ſuch a picture of horror, that it would have been impoſſible for art to deſcribe that paſſion with half the force with which it appeared in his countenance. When he was rouzed from this ſtate by ſome of the Engliſh, he burſt into tears; continued to weep and ſcold by turns; told the New Zealanders that they were vile men; and aſſured them that he would not be any longer their friend. He would not ſo much as permit them to come near him; and he refuſed to accept, or even to touch the knife by which ſome human fleſh had been cut off. Such was Oedidee's indignation againſt the abominable cuſtom; and our Commander has juſtly remarked, that it was an indignation worthy to be imitated by every rational being. The conduct of this young man upon the preſent occaſion, ſtrongly points out the difference which had taken place, in the progreſs of civilization, between the inhabitants of the Society Iſlands and thoſe of New Zealand. It was our Commander's firm opinion, that the only human fleſh which was eaten by theſe people was that of their enemies who had been ſlain in battle. During the ſtay of our Voyagers in Queen Charlotte's Sound, they were plentifully ſupplied with fiſh, procured from the natives at a very eaſy rate; and, beſides the vegetables afforded by their own gardens, they every where found plenty of ſcurvy-graſs and celery. Theſe Captain Cook ordered to be dreſſed every day for all his hands. By the attention which he paid to his men in the article of proviſions, they had for three months lived principally on a freſh diet, and, at this time, there was not a ſick or ſcorbutic perſon on board. The morning before the Captain ſailed, he wrote a memorandum, contain ſuch information as he thought neceſſary for Captain Furneaux, in caſe he ſhould put into the Sound. This memorandum was buried in a bottle under the root of a tree in the garden; and in ſuch a manner that it could not avoid being diſcovered, if either Captain Furneaux or any other European ſhould chance to arrive at the Cove. Our Commander did not leave New Zealand without making ſuch remarks on the coaſt between Cape Teerawhitte and Cape Palliſer as may be of ſervice to future navigators. It being now the unanimous opinion, that the Adventure was no where upon the Iſland, Captain Cook gave up all expectations of ſeeing her any more during the voyage. This circumſtance, however, did not diſcourage him from fully exploring the ſouthern parts of the Pacific Ocean, in the doing of which he intended to employ the whole of the enſuing ſeaſon. When he quitted the coaſt, he had the ſatisfaction to find that not a man of the crew was dejected, or thought that the dangers they had yet to go through, were in the leaſt augmented by their being alone. Such was the confidence they placed in their Commander, that they were as ready to proceed chearfully to the South, or wherever he might lead them, as if the Adventure, or even a larger number of ſhips had been in company (b).

(a) Pilſtart is ſituated in the latitude of 22° 26′ South, and in the longitude of 175° 59′ Weſt. It is diſtant thirty-two leagues from the South end of Middleburg.

(b) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 225—250.

On the twenty-ſixth of November, Captain Cook ſailed from New Zealand in ſearch of a continent, and ſteered to the South, inclining to the Eaſt. Some days after this, our Navigators reckoned themſelves to be antipodes to their friends in London, and conſequently were at as great a diſtance from them as poſſible. The firſt ice Iſland was ſeen on the twelfth of December (c), farther South than the firſt ice which had been met with after leaving the Cape of Good Hope in the preceding year. In the progreſs of the voyage, ice iſlands continually occurred, and the navigation became more and more difficult and dangerous. When our people were in the latitude of 67° 5′ South, they all at once got within ſuch a cluſter of theſe iſlands, together with a large quantity of looſe pieces, that to keep clear of them was a matter of the utmoſt difficulty. On the twenty-ſecond of the month, the Reſolution was in the higheſt latitude ſhe had yet reached (d); and circumſtances now became ſo unfavourable, that our Commander thought of returning more to the North. Here there was no probability of finding any land, or a poſſibility of getting farther South. To have proceeded, therefore, to the Eaſt in this latitude, muſt have been improper, not only on account of the ice, but becauſe a vaſt ſpace of ſea to the North muſt have been left unexplored, in which there might lie a large tract of country. It was only by viſiting thoſe parts that it could be determined whether ſuch a ſuppoſition was well founded. As our Navigators advanced to the North-eaſt on the twenty-fourth, the ice iſlands encreaſed ſo faſt upon them, that, at noon, they could ſee nearly a hundred around them, beſides an immenſe number of ſmall pieces. In this ſituation they ſpent Chriſtmas-day, much in the ſame manner as they had done in the former year. Happily our people had continual day-light, and clear weather; for had it been as foggy as it was on ſome preceding days, nothing leſs than a miracle could have ſaved them from being daſhed to pieces. While the Reſolution was in the high latitudes, many of her company were attacked with a ſlight fever, occaſioned by colds. The diſorder, however, yielded to the ſimpleſt remedies, and was generally removed in a few days. On the fifth of January, 1774, the ſhip not being then in much more than fifty degrees of latitude, there were only one or two perſons on the ſick liſt. After Captain Cook, agreeably to his late reſolution, had traverſed a large extent of ocean without diſcovering land, he again directed his courſe to the ſouthward. By the thirtieth of the month, through obſtructions and difficulties, which, from their ſimilar nature to thoſe already mentioned, it would be tedious to repeat, he reached to the ſeventy-firſt degree of latitude (e). Thus far had he gone; but to have proceeded farther would have been the height of folly and madneſs. It would have been expoſing himſelf, his men, and his ſhip to the utmoſt danger, and perhaps to deſtruction, without the leaſt proſpect of advantage. The Captain was of opinion, as indeed were moſt of the Gentlemen on board, that the ice now in ſight extended quite to the pole, or might join to ſome land, to which it might be fixed from the earlieſt time. If, however, there be ſuch land, it can afford no better retreat for birds, or any other animals, than the ice itſelf, with which it muſt be wholly covered. Though our Commander had not only the ambition of going farther than any one had done before, but of proceeding as far as it was poſſible for man to go, he was the leſs diſſatisfied with the interruption he now met with, as it ſhortened the dangers and hardſhips inſeparable from the navigation of the ſouthern polar regions. In fact, he was impelled by inevitable neceſſity to tack, and ſtand back to the North. The determination which Captain Cook now formed was to ſpend the enſuing winter within the tropic, if he met with no employment before he came there. He was well ſatisfied that no continent was to be found in this ocean but what muſt lie ſo far to the South as to be wholly inacceſſible on account of ice. If there exiſted a continent in the Southern Atlantic Ocean, he was ſenſible that he could not explore it without having the whole ſummer before him. Upon a ſuppoſition, on the other hand, that there is no land there, he might undoubtedly have reached the Cape of Good Hope by April. In that caſe, he would have put an end to the finding of a continent; which was indeed the firſt object of the voyage.

(c) This was in the latitude of 62° 10′ South, and longitude 172° Weſt.

(d) This was 67° 31′. The longitude was 142° 54′ Weſt.

(e) The exact latitude at this time was 71° 10′ South; and the longitude 106° 54′ Weſt.

But this could not ſatisfy the extenſive and magnanimous mind of our Commander. He had a good ſhip, expreſsly ſent out on diſcoveries, a healthy crew, and was not in want either of ſtores or of proviſions. In ſuch circumſtances, to have quitted this Southern Pacific Ocean, would, he thought, have been betraying not only a want of perſeverance, but of judgment, in ſuppoſing it to have been ſo well explored, that nothing farther could be done. Although he had proved that there was no continent but what muſt lie far to the South, there remained, nevertheleſs, room for very large Iſlands in places wholly unexamined. Many, likewiſe, of thoſe which had formerly been diſcovered had been but imperfectly explored, and their ſituations were as imperfectly known. He was alſo perſuaded, that his continuing ſome time longer in this ſea would be productive of improvements in navigation and geography, as well as in other ſciences. In conſequence of theſe views, it was Captain Cook's intention firſt to go in ſearch of the land ſaid to have been diſcovered by Juan Fernandez, in the laſt century (f). If he ſhould fail in finding this land, he propoſed to direct his courſe in queſt of Eaſter Iſland or Davis's Land, the ſituation of which was known with ſo little certainty, that none of the attempts lately made for its diſcovery had been ſucceſsful. He next intended to get within the tropic, and then to proceed to the Weſt, touching at, and ſettling the ſituations of ſuch Iſlands as he might meet with till he arrived at Otaheite, where it was neceſſary for him to ſtop, to look for the Adventure. It was alſo in his contemplation to run as far Weſt as the Tierra Auſtral del Eſpiritu Santo, which was diſcovered by Quiros, and to which M. de Bougainville has given the name of the Great Cyclades. From this land it was the Captain's plan to ſteer to the South, and ſo back to the Eaſt, between the latitudes of fifty and ſixty. In the execution of this plan, it was his purpoſe, if poſſible, to attain the length of Cape Horn in the enſuing November, when he ſhould have the beſt part of the ſummer before him, to explore the ſouthern part of the Atlantic Ocean. Great as was this deſign, our Commander thought it capable of being carried into execution; and when he communicated it to his officers, he had the ſatisfaction of finding that it received their zealous and chearful concurrence. They diſplayed the utmoſt readineſs for executing, in the moſt effectual manner, every meaſure he thought proper to adopt. With ſuch good examples to direct them, the ſeamen were always obedient and alert; and on the preſent occaſion, ſo far were they from wiſhing the voyage to be concluded, that they rejoiced at the proſpect of its being prolonged another year, and of ſoon enjoying the benefits of a milder climate (g).

In purſuing his courſe to the North, Captain Cook became well aſſured that the diſcovery of Juan Fernandez, if any ſuch was ever made, could be nothing more than a ſmall Iſland. At this time, the Captain was attacked by a bilious colic, the violence of which confined him to his bed. The management of the ſhip, upon this occaſion, was left to Mr. Cooper, the firſt officer, who conducted her entirely to his Commander's ſatisfaction. It was ſeveral days before the moſt dangerous ſymptoms of Captain Cook's diſorder were removed; during which time, Mr. Patten the Surgeon, in attending upon him, manifeſted not only the ſkilfulneſs of a Phyſician, but the tenderneſs of a nurſe. When the Captain began to recover, a favourite dog, belonging to Mr. Forſter, fell a ſacrifice to his tender ſtomach. There was no other freſh meat whatever on board, and he could eat not only of the broth which was made of it, but of the fleſh itſelf, when there was nothing elſe that he was capable of taſting. Thus did he derive nouriſhment and ſtrength from food which to moſt people in Europe would have been in the higheſt degree diſguſting, and productive of ſickneſs. The neceſſity of the caſe overcame every feeling of diſlike. On the eleventh of March, our Navigators came within ſight of Eaſter Iſland, or Davis's Land (b); their tranſactions at which place were of too little moment to deſerve a particular recital. The inhabitants are, in general, a ſlender race. In colour, features, and language, they bear ſuch an affinity to the people of the more weſtern Iſles, that there can be no doubt of their having been deſcended from one common original. It is indeed extraordinary that the ſame nation ſhould have ſpread themſelves to ſo wide an extent, as to take in almoſt a fourth part of the circumference of the globe. With regard to the diſpoſition of the natives of Eaſter Iſland, it is friendly and hoſpitable; but they are as much addicted to ſtealing as any of their neighbours. The Iſland itſelf hath ſo little to recommend it, that no nation need to contend for the honour of its diſcovery. So ſparing has nature been of her favours to this ſpot, that there is in it no ſafe anchorage, no wood for fuel, no freſh water worth taking on board. The moſt remarkable objects in the country are ſome ſurprizing gigantic ſtatues, which were firſt ſeen by Roggewein, and of which Captain Cook has given a particular deſcription (i). It was with pleaſure that our Commander quitted a place which could afford ſuch ſlender accommodations to voyagers, and directed his courſe for the Marqueſas Iſlands. He had not been long at ſea, before he was again attacked by his bilious diſorder. The attack, however, was not ſo violent as the former one had been. He had reaſon to believe, that the return of his diſeaſe was owing to his having expoſed and fatigued himſelf too much at Eaſter Iſland. On the ſixth and ſeventh of April, our Navigators came within ſight of four Iſlands, which they knew to be the Marqueſas. To one of them, which was a new diſcovery, Captain Cook gave the name of HOOD'S ISLAND, after that of the young Gentleman by whom it was firſt ſeen. As ſoon as the ſhip was brought to an anchor in Madre de Dios, or Reſolution Bay, in the Iſland of St. Chriſtina, a traffic commenced, in the courſe of which the natives would frequently keep our goods, without making any return. At laſt the Captain was obliged to fire a muſquet-ball over one man who had ſeveral times treated the Engliſh in this manner. This produced only a temporary effect. Too many of the Indians having come on board, our Commander, who was going in a boat, to find a convenient place for mooring the ſhip, ſaid to the officers, "You muſt look well after theſe people, or they will certainly carry off ſomething or "other." Scarcely had he gotten into the boat, when he was informed that they had ſtolen an iron ſtanchion from the oppoſite gangway, and were carrying it off. Upon this he ordered his men to fire over the canoe till he could get round in the boat, but not to kill any one. Such, however, was the noiſe made by the natives, that the order was not heard; and the unhappy thief was killed at the firſt ſhot. All the Indians having retired with precipitation, in conſequence of this unfortunate accident, Captain Cook followed them into the bay, prevailed upon ſome of them to come alongſide his boat, and, by ſuitable preſents, ſo far conciliated their minds, that their fears ſeemed to be in a great meaſure allayed. The death of their countryman did not cure them of their thieviſh diſpoſition; but, at length, it was ſomewhat reſtrained by their conviction that no diſtance ſecured them from the reach of our muſquets. Several ſmaller inſtances of their talent at ſtealing, the Captain thought proper to overlook. The proviſions obtained at St. Chriſtina were yams, plantains, bread-fruit, a few cocoa nuts, fowls, and ſmall pigs. For a time, the trade was carried on upon reaſonable terms; but the market was at laſt ruined by the indiſcretion of ſome young Gentlemen, who gave away in exchange various articles which the inhabitants had not ſeen before, and which captivated their fancy above nails, or more uſeful iron tools. One of the Gentlemen had given for a pig a very large quantity of red feathers, which he had gotten at Amſterdam. The effect of this was particularly fatal. It was not poſſible to ſupport the trade, in the manner in which it was now begun, even for a ſingle day. When, therefore, our Commander found that he was not likely to be ſupplied, on any conditions, with ſufficient refreſhments, and that the Iſland was neither very convenient for taking in wood and water, nor for affording the neceſſary repairs of the ſhip, he determined to proceed immediately to ſome other place, where the wants of his people could be effectually relieved. After having been nineteen weeks at ſea, and having lived all that time upon ſalt diet, a change in their food could not avoid being peculiarly deſirable: and yet, on their arrival at St. Chriſtina, it could ſcarcely be aſſerted that a ſingle man was ſick; and there were but a few who had the leaſt complaint of any kind. "This," ſays Captain Cook, in the narrative of his voyage, "was undoubtedly "owing to the many antiſcorbutic articles we had on board, and to the great attention of "the Surgeon, who was remarkably careful to apply them in time (k)." It may juſtly be added, that this was likewiſe owing to the ſingular care of the Captain himſelf, and to the exertions of his authority, in enforcing the excellent regulations which his wiſdom and humanity had adopted. The chief reaſon for our Commander's touching at the Marqueſas Iſlands, was to fix their ſituation; that being the only circumſtance in which the nautical account of them, given in Mr. Dalrymple's collection, is deficient. It was farther deſirable to ſettle this point, as it would lead to a more accurate knowledge of Mendana's other diſcoveries. Accordingly, Captain Cook has marked the ſituation of the Marqueſas with his uſual correctneſs [U]. He has alſo taken care to deſcribe the particular cove in Reſolution Bay, in the Iſland of St. Chriſtina, which is moſt convenient for obtaining wood and water. It is remarkable, with reſpect to the inhabitants of the Marqueſas Iſlands, that, collectively taken, they are without exception the fineſt race of people in this ſea. Perhaps they ſurpaſs all other nations in ſymmetry of form, and regularity of features. It is plain, however, from the affinity of their language to that of Otaheite and the Society Iſles, that they are of the ſame origin. Of this affinity the Engliſh were fully ſenſible, though they could not converſe with them; but Oedidee was capable of doing it tolerably well (l).

From the Marqueſas Captain Cook ſteered for Otaheite, with a view of falling in with ſome of the Iſlands diſcovered by former navigators, and eſpecially by the Dutch, the ſituation of which had not been accurately determined. In the courſe of the voyage, he paſſed a number of low iſlots, connected together by reefs of coral rocks. One of the Iſlands, on which Lieutenant Cooper went aſhore, with two boats well armed, was called by the natives Tiookea (m). It had been diſcovered and viſited by Captain Byron. The inhabitants of Tiookea are of a much darker colour than thoſe of the higher Iſlands, and appeared to be more fierce in their diſpoſitions. This may be owing to their manner of (m) Tiookea is ſituated in the latitude of 14° 27′ 30″ South, and the longitude of 144° 56′ Weſt.

[U] Captain Cook has marked the ſituation of the Marqueſas with his uſual correctneſs.] The Marqueſas Iſlands, four of which were firſt diſcovered by Mendana, a Spaniard, are five in number, viz. La Magdalena, St. Pedro, La Dominica, Santa Chriſtina, and Hood's Iſland, which is the northernmoſt. La Dominica is the largeſt of them, being about fifteen or ſixteen leagues in circuit. Theſe Iſlands occupy one degree of latitude, and nearly half a degree in longitude. Their latitude is from 9 to 10, and their longitude from 138° 47′ to 139° 13′ Weſt.

gaining their ſubſiſtence, which is chiefly from the ſea, and to their being much expoſed to the ſun and the weather. Our Voyagers obſerved that they were ſtout, well-made men, and that they had marked on their bodies the figure of a fiſh, which was a good emblem of their profeſſion. Beſides paſſing by St. George's Iſlands, which had been ſo named by Captain Byron, our Commander made the diſcovery of four others (n). Theſe he called PALLISER'S ISLES, in honour of his particular friend, Sir Hugh Palliſer. The inhabitants ſeemed to be the ſame ſort of people as thoſe of Tiookea, and, like them, were armed with long pikes. Captain Cook could not determine, with any degree of certainty, whether the group of Iſles he had lately ſeen were, or were not, any of thoſe that had been diſcovered by the Dutch navigators. This was owing to the neglect of recording, with ſufficient accuracy, the ſituation of their diſcoveries. Our Commander hath, in general, obſerved, with regard to this part of the ocean, that, from the latitude of twenty down to fourteen or twelve, and from the meridian of a hundred and thirty-eight to a hundred and forty-eight or a hundred and fifty Weſt, it is ſo ſtrewed with low iſles, that a navigator cannot proceed with too much caution. On the twenty-ſecond of April, Captain Cook reached the Iſland of Otaheite, and anchored in Matavai Bay. As his chief reaſon for putting in at this place was to give Mr. Wales an opportunity of aſcertaining the error of the watch by the known longitude, and to determine anew her rate of going, the firſt object was to land the inſtruments, and to erect tents for the reception of a guard, and ſuch other people as it was neceſſary to have on ſhore. Sick there were none; for the refreſhments which had been obtained at the Marqueſas had removed every complaint of that kind. From the quantity of proviſions, which, contrary to expectation, our Commander now found at Otaheite, he determined to make a longer ſtay in the Iſland than he had at firſt intended. Accordingly, he took meaſures for the repairs of the ſhip, which the high ſouthern latitudes had rendered indiſpenſably neceſſary. During Captain Cook's ſtay at Otaheite, he maintained a moſt friendly connection with the inhabitants; and a continual interchange of viſits was preſerved between him and Otoo, Towha, and other Chiefs of the country. His traffic with them was greatly facilitated by his having fortunately brought with him ſome red parrot feathers from the Iſland of Amſterdam. Theſe were jewels of high value in the eyes of the Otaheitans. The Captain's ſtock in trade was by this time greatly exhauſted; ſo that, if it had not been for the feathers, he would have found it difficult to have ſupplied the ſhip with the neceſſary refreſhments. Among other entertainments which our Commander and the reſt of the Engliſh Gentlemen met with at Otaheite, one was a grand naval review. The veſſels of war conſiſted of a hundred and ſixty large double canoes, well equipped, manned, and armed. They were decorated with flags and ſtreamers; and the Chiefs, together with all thoſe who were on the fighting ſtages, were dreſſed in their war habits. The whole fleet made a noble appearance; ſuch as our Voyagers had never ſeen before in this ſea, or could ever have expected. Beſides the veſſels of war, there were a hundred and ſeventy ſail of ſmaller double canoes, which ſeemed to be deſigned for tranſports and victuallers. Upon each of them was a little houſe; and they were rigged with maſt and ſail, which was not the caſe with the war canoes. Captain Cook gueſſed that there were no leſs than ſeven thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty men in the whole fleet. He was not able to obtain full information concerning the deſign of this armament. Notwithſtanding the agreeable intercourſe that was, in general, maintained between our Commander and the people of Otaheite, circumſtances occaſionally happened, which called for peculiar exertions of his prudence and reſolution. One of the natives who had attempted to ſteal a water-caſk from the watering-place, was caught in the fact, ſent on board, and put in irons. In this ſituation, he was ſeen by King Otoo, and other Chiefs. Captain Cook having made known to them the crime of their countryman, Otoo entreated that he might be ſet at liberty. This the Captain however refuſed, alleging, that ſince he puniſhed his own people, when they committed the leaſt offence againſt Otoo's, it was but juſt that this man ſhould alſo be puniſhed. As Captain Cook knew that Otoo would not puniſh him, he reſolved to do it himſelf. Accordingly, he directed the criminal to be carried on ſhore to the tents, and having himſelf followed, with the Chiefs and other Otaheitans, he ordered the guard out, under arms, and commanded the man to be tied up to a poſt. Otoo again ſolicited the culprit's releaſe, and in this he was ſeconded by his ſiſter, but in vain. The Captain expoſtulated with him on the conduct of the man, and of the Indians in general; telling him, that neither he, nor any of the ſhip's company, took the ſmalleſt matter of property from them without firſt paying for it; enumerating the articles which the Engliſh had given in exchange for ſuch and ſuch things; and urging that it was wrong in them to ſteal from thoſe who were their friends. He added, that the puniſhing of the guilty perſon would be the means of ſaving the lives of ſeveral of Otoo's people, by deterring them from committing crimes of the like nature, and thus preventing them from the danger of being ſhot to death, which would certainly happen, at one time or other, if they perſiſted in their robberies. With theſe arguments the King appeared to be ſatisfied, and only deſired that the man might not be killed. Captain Cook then directed that the croud, which was very great, ſhould be kept at a proper diſtance, and, in the preſence of them all, ordered the fellow two dozen of laſhes with a cat-

cat-of-nine-tails. This puniſhment the man ſuſtained with great firmneſs, after which he was ſet at liberty. When the natives were going away, Towha called them back, and, with much gracefulneſs of action, addreſſed them in a ſpeech of nearly half an hour in length, the deſign of which was to condemn their preſent conduct, and to recommend a different one for the future. To make a farther impreſſion upon the minds of the inhabitants, our Commander ordered his Marines to go through their exerciſes, and to load and fire in vollies with ball. As they were very quick in their manœuvres, it is more eaſy to conceive than to deſcribe the amazement which poſſeſſed the Indians during the whole time, and eſpecially thoſe of them who had not ſeen any thing of the kind before. The judicious will diſcern, with regard to this narrative, that it throws peculiar light on Captain Cook's character. Nor is it an uncurious circumſtance in the hiſtory of human ſociety, that a ſtranger ſhould thus exerciſe juriſdiction over the natives of a country, in the preſence of the Prince of that country, without his authority, and even contrary to his ſolicitations. Another diſagreeable altercation with the inhabitants of Otaheite, aroſe from the negligence of one of the Engliſh centinels on ſhore. Having either ſlept or quitted his poſt, an Indian ſeized the opportunity of carrying off his muſquet. When any extraordinary theft was committed, it immediately excited ſuch an alarm among the natives in general, from their fear of Captain Cook's reſentment, that they fled from their habitations, and a ſtop was put to the traffic for proviſions. On the preſent occaſion, the Captain had no ſmall degree of trouble; but, by his prudent conduct, the muſquet was recovered, peace reſtored, and commerce again opened. In the differences which happened with the ſeveral people he met with in his voyages, it was a rule with him, never to touch the leaſt article of their property, any farther than to detain their canoes for a while, when it became abſolutely neceſſary. He always choſe the moſt mild and equitable methods of bringing them to reaſon; and in this he not only ſucceeded, but frequently put things upon a better footing than if no contention had taken place. During this viſit to Otaheite, fruit and other refreſhments were obtained in great plenty. The relief ariſing from them was the more agreeable and ſalutary, as the bread of the ſhip was in a bad condition. Though the biſcuit had been aired and picked at New Zealand, it was now in ſuch a ſtate of decay, that it was neceſſary for it to undergo another airing and cleaning, in which much of it was found wholly rotten, and unfit to be eaten. This decay was judged to be owing to the ice our Navigators had frequently taken in when to the ſouthward, which made the hold of the veſſel cold and damp, and to the great heat that ſucceeded when they came to the North. Whatever was the cauſe, the loſs was ſo conſiderable, that the men were put to a ſcanty allowance in this article, with the additional mortification of the bread's being bad that could be uſed. Two goats, that had been given by Captain Furneaux to Otoo, in the former part of the voyage, ſeemed to promiſe fair for anſwering the purpoſes for which they were left upon the Iſland. The ewe, ſoon after, had two female kids, which were now ſo far grown as to be almoſt ready to propagate. At the ſame time, the old ewe was again with kid. The people were very fond of them, and they were in excellent condition. From theſe circumſtances, Captain Cook entertained a hope that, in a courſe of years, they would multiply ſo much as to be extended over all the Iſles of the Southern Ocean. The like ſucceſs did not attend the ſheep which had been left in the country. Theſe ſpeedily died, one excepted, which was ſaid to be yet alive. Our Navigators alſo furniſhed the natives with cats, having given away no leſs than twenty at Otaheite, beſides ſome which had been made preſents of at Ulietea and Huaheine. With regard to the number of the inhabitants of Otaheite, our Commander collected, from comparing ſeveral facts together, that, including women and children, there could not be leſs, in the whole Iſland, than two hundred and four thouſand. This number, at firſt ſight, exceeded his belief. But when he came to reflect on the vaſt ſwarms of people that appeared wherever he went, he was convinced that the eſtimate was agreeable to truth. Such was the friendly treatment which our Voyagers met with at Otaheite, that one of the gunner's mates was induced to form a plan for remaining in the country. As he knew that he could not execute his ſcheme with ſucceſs while the Reſolution continued in Matavai Bay, he took the opportunity, when ſhe was ready to quit it, and the ſails were ſet for that purpoſe, to ſlip overboard. Being a good ſwimmer, he had no doubt of getting ſafe to a canoe, which was at ſome diſtance ready to receive him; for his deſign was concerted with the natives, and had even been encouraged by Otoo. However, he was diſcovered before he had gotten clear of the ſhip, and a boat being preſently hoiſted out, he was taken up, and brought back to the veſſel. When our Commander reflected on this man's ſituation, he did not think him very culpable, or his deſire of ſtaying in the Iſland ſo extraordinary as might at firſt view be imagined. He was a native of Ireland, and had ſailed in the Dutch ſervice. Captain Cook, on his return from his former voyage, had picked him up at Batavia, and had kept him in his employment ever ſince. It did not appear that he had either friends or connections which could bind him to any particular part of the world. All nations being alike to him, where could he be more happy than at Otaheite? Here, in one of the fineſt climates of the globe, he could enjoy not only the neceſſaries, but the luxuries of life, in eaſe and plenty. The Captain ſeems to think, that if the man had applied to him in time, he might have given his conſent to his remaining in the country.

On the fifteenth of May, Captain Cook anchored in O'Wharre Harbour, in the Iſland of Huaheine. He was immediately viſited by his friend Oree, and the ſame agreeable intercourſe ſubſiſted between the Captain and this good old Chief which had formerly taken place. Red feathers were not here in ſuch eſtimation as they had been at Otaheite; the natives of Huaheine having the good ſenſe to give a preference to the more uſeful articles of nails and axes. During the ſtay of our Voyagers in the Iſland, ſome alarms were occaſioned by the thieviſh diſpoſition of ſeveral of the inhabitants; but matters ſubſided without any material conſequences. A ſolemn march, which our Commander made through part of the country, at the head of forty-eight men, tended to impreſs the Indians with a ſenſe of his power and authority. In fact, their attempts at ſtealing had been too much invited by the indiſcretion of ſome of the Engliſh, who unguardedly ſeparated themſelves in the woods, for the purpoſe of killing birds; and who managed their muſquets ſo unſkilfully, as to render them leſs formidable in the eyes of the natives. I cannot perſuade myſelf to omit a dramatic entertainment, at which ſeveral of the Gentlemen belonging to the Reſolution attended one evening. The piece repreſented a girl as running away with our Navigators from Otaheite; and the ſtory was partly founded in truth; for a young woman had taken a paſſage in the ſhip, down to Ulietea. She happened to be preſent at the repreſentation of her own adventures; which had ſuch an effect upon her, that it was with great difficulty that ſhe could be prevailed upon by the Engliſh Gentlemen to ſee the play out, or to refrain from tears while it was acting. The piece concluded with the reception which ſhe was ſuppoſed to meet with from her friends at her return; and it was a reception that was by no means favourable. As theſe people, when they ſee occaſion, can add little extempore pieces to their entertainments, it is reaſonable to imagine that the repreſentation now deſcribed was intended as a ſatire againſt the girl, and to diſcourage others from following her ſteps. Such is the ſenſe which they entertain of the propriety of female decorum. During Captain Cook's ſtay at Huaheine, bread-fruit, cocoa-nuts, and other vegetable productions were procured in abundance, but not a ſufficiency of hogs to ſupply the daily expence of the ſhip. This was partly owing to a want of proper articles for traffic. The Captain was obliged, therefore, to ſet the Smiths at work, to make different ſorts of nails, iron tools, and inſtruments, in order to enable him to obtain refreſhments at the Iſlands he was yet to viſit, and to ſupport his credit and influence among the natives. When our Commander was ready to ſail from Huaheine, Oree was the laſt man that went out of the veſſel. At parting, Captain Cook told him that they ſhould meet each other no more; at which he wept, and ſaid, "Let your ſons come, we "will treat them well."

At Ulietea, to which the Captain next directed his courſe, the events that occurred were nearly ſimilar to thoſe which have already been related. He had always been received by the people of this Iſland in the moſt hoſpitable manner, and they were juſtly entitled to every thing which it was in his power to grant. They expreſſed the deepeſt concern at his departure, and were continually importuning him to return. Oreo the Chief, and his wife and daughter, but eſpecially the two latter, ſcarcely ever ceaſed weeping. Their grief was ſo exceſſive, that it might perhaps be doubted whether it was entirely ſincere and unaffected; but our Commander was of opinion that it was real. At length, when he was ready to ſail, they took a moſt affectionate leave. Oreo's laſt requeſt to Captain Cook was that he would return; and when he could not obtain a promiſe to that effect, he aſked the name of his burying-place. To this ſtrange queſtion the Captain anſwered, without heſitation, that it was Stepney; that being the pariſh in which he lived when in London. Mr. Forſter, to whom the ſame queſtion was propoſed, replied, with greater wiſdom and recollection, that no man, who uſed the ſea, could ſay where he ſhould be buried. As our Commander could not promiſe, or even then ſuppoſe, that more Engliſh ſhips would be ſent to the ſouthern iſles, Oedidee, who for ſo many months had been the faithful companion of our Navigators, choſe to remain in his native country. But he left them with a regret fully demonſtrative of his eſteem and affection, nor could any thing have torn him from them, but the fear of never returning. When Oreo preſſed ſo ardently Captain Cook's return, he ſometimes gave ſuch anſwers as left room for hope. At theſe anſwers Oedidee would eagerly catch, take him on one ſide, and aſk him over again. The Captain declares, that he had not words to deſcribe the anguiſh which appeared in this young man's breaſt, when he went away. "He looked up at the ſhip, burſt into tears, and then ſunk down into the canoe." Oedidee was a youth of good parts, and of a docile, gentle, and humane diſpoſition; but as he was almoſt wholly ignorant of the religion, government, manners, cuſtoms, and traditions of his countrymen, and the neighbouring Iſlands, no material knowledge could have been collected from him, had our Commander brought him away. He would, however, in every reſpect, have been a better ſpecimen of the nation than Omai. When Captain Cook firſt came to theſe Iſlands, he had ſome thoughts of viſiting Tupia's famous Bolabola. But having obtained a plentiful ſupply of refreſhments, and the route he had in view allowing him no time to ſpare, he laid this deſign aſide, and directed his courſe to the Weſt. Thus did he take his leave, as he then thought, for ever, of theſe happy iſles, on which benevolent nature has ſpread her luxuriant ſweets with a laviſh hand; and in which the natives, copying the bounty of Providence, are equally liberal; being ready to contribute plentifully and chearfully to the wants of navigators (o).

(o) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 312—378. From Mr. Wales's obſervations it appeared, that, during five months, in which the watch had paſſed through the extremes of heat and cold, it went better in the cold than in the hot climates.

On the ſixth of June, the day after our Voyagers left Ulietea, they ſaw land, which they found to be a low reef Iſland, about four leagues in compaſs, and of a circular form. This was Howe Iſland, which had been diſcovered by Captain Wallis (p). Nothing remarkable occurred from this day to the fixteenth, when land was again ſeen. It was another reef Iſland; and being a new diſcovery, Captain Cook gave it the name of PALMERSTON ISLAND, in honour of Lord Palmerſton (q). On the twentieth, freſh land appeared, which was perceived to be inhabited. This induced our Commander to go on ſhore with a party of Gentlemen; but the natives were found to be fierce and untractable. All endeavours to bring them to a parley were to no purpoſe; for they came on with the ferocity of wild boars, and inſtantly threw their darts. Two or three muſquets diſcharged in the air, did not prevent one of them from advancing ſtill farther, and throwing another dart, or rather a ſpear, which paſſed cloſe over Captain Cook's ſhoulder. The courage of this man had nearly coſt him his life. When he threw his ſpear, he was not five paces from the Captain, who had reſolved to ſhoot him for his own preſervation. It happened, however, that his muſquet miſſed fire; a circumſtance on which he afterwards reflected with pleaſure. When he joined his party, and tried his muſquet in the air, it went off perfectly well. This Iſland, from the diſpoſition and behaviour of the natives, with whom no intercourſe could be eſtabliſhed, and from whom no benefit could be received, was called by our Commander SAVAGE ISLAND (r). It is about eleven leagues in circuit; is of a round form, and good height; and has deep waters cloſe to its ſhores. Among its other diſadvantages, it is not furniſhed with a harbour. In purſuing his courſe to the Weſt-ſouth-weſt, Captain Cook paſſed by a number of ſmall Iſlands, and, on the twenty-ſixth, anchored on the North ſide of Anamocka, or Rotterdam. A traffic immediately commenced with the natives, who brought what proviſions they had, being chiefly yams and ſhaddocks, which they exchanged for nails, beads, and other ſmall articles. Here, as in many former caſes, the Captain was put to ſome trouble on account of the thieviſh diſpoſition of the inhabitants. As they had gotten poſſeſſion of an adze and two muſquets, he found it neceſſary to exert himſelf with peculiar vigour, in order to oblige them to make reſtitution. For this purpoſe he commanded all the Marines to be armed, and ſent on ſhore; and the reſult of this meaſure was, that the things which had been ſtolen were reſtored. In the conteſt, Captain Cook was under a neceſſity of firing ſome ſmall ſhot at a native who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his reſiſtance. His countrymen afterwards reported that he was dead; but he was only wounded, and that not in a dangerous manner. Though his ſufferings were the effects of his own miſbehaviour, the Captain endeavoured to ſoften them, by making him a preſent, and directing his wounds to be dreſſed by the Surgeon of the ſhip. The firſt time that our Commander landed at Anamocka, an old Lady preſented him with a girl, and gave him to underſtand that ſhe was at his ſervice. Miſs, who had previouſly been inſtructed, wanted a ſpike-nail, or a ſhirt, neither of which he had to give her; and he flattered himſelf that, by making the two women ſenſible of his poverty, he ſhould eaſily get clear of their importunities. In this, however, he was miſtaken. The favours of the young Lady were offered upon credit; and on his declining the propoſal, the old woman began to argue with him, and then to abuſe him. As far as he could collect from her countenance and her actions, the deſign of her ſpeech was both to ridicule and reproach him, for refuſing to entertain ſo fine a young woman. Indeed, the girl was by no means deſtitute of beauty; but Captain Cook found it more eaſy to withſtand her allurements than the abuſes of the ancient matron, and therefore haſtened into his boat. While the Captain was on ſhore at Anamocka, he got the names of twenty Iſlands, which lie between the North-weſt and the North-eaſt. Some of them were in ſight; and two of them, which are moſt to the Weſt, are remarkable on account of their great height. Theſe are Amattafoa and Oghao. From a continual column of ſmoke which was ſeen daily aſcending from the middle of Amattafoa, it was judged that there was a volcano in that Iſland. Anamocka was firſt diſcovered by Taſman, and by him was named Rotterdam (s). It is of a triangular form, and each ſide extends about three and a half or four miles. From the North-weſt to the South of the Iſland, round by the Eaſt and North, it is encompaſſed by a number of ſmall iſles, ſand-banks, and breakers. An end could not be ſeen to their extent to the North, and they may poſſibly reach as far to the South as Amſterdam, or Tongataboo. Together with Middleburg, or Eaoowe, and Pilſtart, theſe form a group, containing about three degrees of latitude, and two of longitude. To this group Captain Cook had given the name of the Friendly Iſles, or Archipelago, from the firm alliance and friendſhip which ſeemed to ſubſiſt among their inhabitants, and from their courteous behaviour to ſtrangers. The ſame group may perhaps be extended much farther, even down to Boſcawen and Keppel's Iſles, which were diſcovered by Captain Wallis, and lie nearly in the ſame meridian (t). Whilſt our Commander mander was at Anamocka, he was particularly aſſiduous to prevent the introduction of a certain diſorder. As ſome of his people brought with them the remains of this diſeaſe from the Society Iſles, he prohibited them from having any female intercourſe; and he had reaſon to believe that his endeavours were ſucceſsful. The productions of Rotterdam, and the perſons, manners, and cuſtoms of its inhabitants, are ſimilar to thoſe of Amſterdam. It is not, however, equally plentiful in its fruits, nor is every part of it in ſo high a ſtate of cultivation. Neither hath it ariſen to the ſame degree of wealth, with regard to cloth, matting, ornaments, and other articles, which conſtitute the chief riches of the Iſlanders of the Southern Ocean (u).

(u) Capt. Cook's Voyage towards the South Pole, and round the World, vol. ii. p. 1—21.

Purſuing their courſe to the Weſt, our Navigators diſcovered land on the firſt of July; and, upon a nearer approach, found it to be a ſmall Iſland, to which, on account of the number of turtle that were ſeen upon the coaſt, Captain Cook gave the name of TURTLE ISLE (w). On the ſixteenth, high land was ſeen bearing South-weſt, which no one doubted to be the Auſtralis del Eſpiritu Santo of Quiros, and which is called by M. de Bougainville the Great Cyclades. After exploring the coaſt for ſome days, the Captain came to an anchor, in a harbour in the Iſland of Mallicollo. One of his firſt objects was to commence a friendly intercourſe with the natives; but, while he was thus employed, an accident occurred which threw all into confuſion, though in the end it was rather advantageous than hurtful to the Engliſh. A fellow in a canoe, having been refuſed admittance into one of our boats, bent his bow to ſhoot a poiſoned arrow at the boat-keeper. Some of his countrymen having prevented his doing it at that inſtant, time was given to acquaint our Commander with the tranſaction, who immediately ran upon deck. At this minute, the Indian had directed his bow to the boat-keeper; but upon being called to by Captain Cook, he pointed it at him. Happily, the Captain had a muſquet in his hand loaded with ſmall ſhot, and gave him the contents. By this, however, he was only ſtaggered for a moment; for he ſtill held his bow in the attitude of ſhooting. A ſecond diſcharge of the ſame nature made him drop it, and obliged him, together with the other natives who were in the canoe, to paddle off with all poſſible celerity. At this time, ſome of the inhabitants began to ſhoot arrows from another quarter. A muſquet diſcharged in the air had no effect upon them; but no ſooner was a four-pound ball ſhot over their heads than they fled in the utmoſt confuſion. A few hours after theſe tranſactions, the Engliſh put off in two boats, and landed in the face of four or five hundred people, who were aſſembled on the ſhore; and who, though they were all armed with bows and arrows, clubs and ſpears, made not the leaſt oppoſition. On the contrary, when they ſaw Captain Cook advance with nothing but a green branch in his hand, one of them, who appeared to be a Chief, giving his bow and arrows to another, met the Captain in the water, bearing alſo a green branch. Theſe being mutually exchanged in token of friendſhip, the Chief led our Commander to the crowd, to whom he immediately diſtributed preſents. The Marines, in the mean time, were drawn up on the beach. Captain Cook then acquainted the Indians, by ſigns, that he wanted wood; and in the ſame manner permiſſion was granted him to cut down the trees. Much traffic could not be carried on with theſe people, becauſe they ſet no value on nails, or iron tools, or, indeed, on any of the articles which our Navigators could furniſh. In ſuch exchanges as they did make, and which were principally of arrows for pieces of cloth, they diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their honeſty. When the ſhip had begun to ſail from the Iſland, and they might eaſily, in conſequence of their canoes dropping aſtern, have avoided delivering the things they had been paid for, they uſed their utmoſt efforts to get up with her, that they might diſcharge their obligations. One man, in particular, followed the Reſolution a conſiderable time, and did not reach her till the object which brought him was forgotten. As ſoon as he came alongſide the veſſel, he held up the thing which had been purchaſed; and though ſeveral of the crew offered to buy it, he inſiſted upon delivering it to the perſon to whom it had been ſold. That perſon, not knowing him again, would have given ſomething in return; but this he refuſed, and ſhewed him what he had before received. There was only a ſingle inſtance in which the natives took, or even attempted to take, any thing from our Voyagers, by any means whatever; and in that caſe reſtitution was immediately made, without trouble and without altercation. The inhabitants of Mallicollo, in general, are the moſt ugly and ill-proportioned people that Captain Cook had ever ſeen, and are in every reſpect different from all the nations which had been met with in the Southern Ocean. They are a very dark-coloured, and rather a diminutive race, with long heads, flat faces, and countenances which have ſome reſemblance to that of the monkey. Their hair, which is moſtly black or brown, is ſhort and curly; but not altogether ſo ſoft and woolly as that of a negro. The difference of this people from any whom our Commander had yet viſited, appeared not only in their perſons but their language. Of about eighty words which were collected by Mr. Forſter, ſcarcely one was found to bear any affinity to the language ſpoken in any country or Iſland hitherto deſcribed. It was obſerved by Captain Cook, that the natives could pronounce moſt of the Engliſh words with great eaſe. They had not ſo much as a name for a dog, and knew nothing of that animal; for which reaſon the Captain left them a dog and a bitch; and as they were very fond of them, it was highly probable that the breed breed would be foſtered and encreaſed, To the harbour, in which our Commander anchored, while he lay at Mallicollo, he gave the name of PORT SANDWICH (x). It has many advantages, with regard to the depth of water, ſhelter from winds, and lying ſo near the ſhore as to be a cover to thoſe of a ſhip's company who may be carrying on any neceſſary operations at land (y).

Soon after our Navigators had gotten to ſea, which was on the twenty-third of July, they diſcovered three or four ſmall Iſlands, that before had appeared to be connected. At this time the Reſolution was not far from the Iſle of Ambrym, the Iſle of Paoom, and the Iſle of Apee. On the next morning, ſeveral more Iſlands were diſcovered, lying off the South-eaſt point of Apee, and conſtituting a group which Captain Cook called SHEPHERD'S ISLES, in honour of his learned and valuable friend, Dr. Shepherd, Plumian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy at Cambridge. The ſhip was this day in ſome danger. It ſuddenly fell calm, and our Voyagers were left to the mercy of the current, cloſe by the Iſles, where no ſoundings could be found with a line of a hundred and eighty fathoms. The lands or Iſlands, which lay around the veſſel in every direction, were ſo numerous that they could not be counted. At this criſis a breeze ſprung up, which happily relieved the Captain and his company from the anxiety the calm had occaſioned. Amidſt the number of Iſlands, that were continually ſeen by our Navigators, there was only one on which no inhabitants were diſcerned. This conſiſted chiefly of a remarkable peaked rock, which was only acceſſible to birds, and which obtained the name of the MONUMENT. In the farther courſe of the ſhip to the ſouthward, our Navigators drew near to certain Iſlands, which they found to conſiſt of one large Iſland, the ſouthern and weſtern extremities of which extended beyond their ſight. Three or four ſmaller ones lay off its North ſide. To the two principal of theſe Captain Cook gave the name of MONTAGU and HINCHINBROOK; and the large Iſland he named SANDWICH, in honour of his noble patron the Earl of Sandwich. This Iſland, which was ſpotted with woods and lawns, agreeably diverſified over the whole ſurface, and which had a gentle ſlope from the hills down to the ſea-coaſt, exhibited a moſt beautiful and delightful proſpect. The examination of it was not, however, ſo much an object with our Commander, as to proceed to the South, in order to find the ſouthern extremity of the Archipelago. Purſuing his diſcoveries, Captain Cook came in ſight of an Iſland, which was afterwards known to be called by the natives Erromango. After coaſting it for three days, he brought his veſſel to anchor in a bay there, on the third of Auguſt. The next day, he went with two boats to examine the coaſt, and to look for a proper landing-place, that he might obtain a ſupply of wood and water. At this time, the inhabitants began to aſſemble on the ſhore, and by ſigns to invite our people to land. Their behaviour was apparently ſo friendly, that the Captain was charmed with it; and the only thing which could give him the leaſt ſuſpicion was, that moſt of them were armed with clubs, ſpears, darts, and bows and arrows. He did not, therefore, remit his vigilance; but kept his eye continually upon the Chief, watching his looks, as well as his actions. It ſoon was evident that the intentions of the Indians were totally hoſtile. They made a violent attempt to ſeize upon one of the boats; and though, on our Commander's pointing a muſquet at them, they in ſome meaſure deſiſted, yet they returned in an inſtant, ſeemingly determined to carry their deſign into execution. At the head of the party was the Chief; while others, who could not come at the boat, ſtood behind with darts, ſtones, and bows and arrows in hand, ready to ſupport their countrymen. As ſigns and threats had no effect, the ſafety of Captain Cook and his people became the only object of conſideration; and yet he was unwilling to fire on the multitude. He reſolved, therefore, to make the Chief alone the victim of his own treachery, and accordingly, aimed his muſquet at him; but at this critical moment it miſſed fire. This circumſtance encouraged the natives to deſpiſe our weapons, and to ſhow the ſuperiority of their own, by throwing ſtones and darts, and by ſhooting arrows. Hence it became abſolutely neceſſary for the Captain to give orders to his men to fire upon the aſſailants. The firſt diſcharge threw them into confuſion; but a ſecond was ſcarcely ſufficient to drive them off the beach. In conſequence of this ſkirmiſh, four of the Indians lay, to all appearance, dead on the ſhore. However, two of them were afterwards perceived to crawl into the buſhes; and it was happy for theſe people that not half of the muſquets of the Engliſh would go off, ſince otherwiſe many more muſt have fallen. The inhabitants were, at length, ſo terrified as to make no farther appearance; and two oars, which had been loſt in the conflict, were left ſtanding up againſt the buſhes. It was obſerved of theſe Iſlanders, that they ſeemed of a different race from thoſe of Mallicollo, and that they ſpoke a different language. They are of a middle ſize, with a good ſhape, and tolerable features. Their colour is very dark; and their aſpect is not mended by a cuſtom they have of painting their faces, ſome with a black, and others with a red pigment. As to their hair, it is curly and criſp, and ſomewhat woolly. The few women who were ſeen, and who appeared to be ugly, wore a kind of petticoat, made either of palm leaves or of a plant ſimilar in its nature; but the men, like thoſe of Mallicollo, were almoſt entirely naked. On account of the treacherous behaviour of the inhabitants of Erromango, Captain Cook called a promontory, or peninſula, near which the ſkirmiſh happened, TRAITOR'S HEAD (z).

From

From this place the Captain ſailed for an Iſland which had been diſcovered before, at a diſtance, and at which, on account of his wanting a large quantity of wood and water, he was reſolved to make ſome ſtay. At firſt the natives were diſpoſed to be very hoſtile; but our Commander, with equal wiſdom and humanity, contrived to terrify them, without danger to their lives. This was principally effected by firing a few great guns, at which they were ſo much alarmed, as afterwards to be brought to tolerable order. Among theſe Iſlanders, many were inclined to be on friendly terms with our Navigators, and eſpecially the old people; whilſt moſt of the younger were daring and inſolent, and obliged the Engliſh to keep to their arms. It was natural enough that age ſhould be prudent and cautious, and youth bold and impetuous; and yet this diſtinction, with regard to the behaviour of the various nations which had been viſited by Captain Cook, had not occurred before. The Iſland where the Captain now ſtayed, was found, upon enquiry, to be called, by the inhabitants, Tanna; and three others in its neighbourhood, and which could be ſeen from it, were diſtinguiſhed by the names of Immer, Erronan or Footoona, and Annatom. From ſuch information of the natives as our commander could ſee no reaſon to doubt, it appeared that circumciſion was practiſed among them, and that they were eaters of human fleſh. Concerning the latter ſubject, he ſhould never have thought of aſking them a ſingle queſtion, if they had not introduced it themſelves, by enquiring whether the Engliſh had the ſame cuſtom. It hath been argued, that neceſſity alone could be the origin of this horrid practice. But as the people of Tanna are poſſeſſed of fine pork and fowls, together with an abundance of roots and fruits, the plea of neceſſity cannot be urged in their behalf. In fact, no inſtance was ſeen of their eating human fleſh; and, therefore, there might, perhaps, be ſome reaſon to heſitate, in pronouncing them to be cannibals. By degrees the inhabitants grew ſo courteous and civil, as to permit the Engliſh Gentlemen to ramble about in the ſkirts of the woods, and to ſhoot in them, without affording them the leaſt moleſtation, or ſhewing any diſlike. One day, ſome boys of the Iſland having gotten behind thickets, and thrown two or three ſtones at our people who were cutting wood, they were fired at by the petty officers on duty. Captain Cook, who was then on ſhore, was alarmed at the report of the muſquets; and, when he was informed of the cauſe, was much diſpleaſed that ſo wanton an uſe ſhould be made of our fire-arms. Proper meaſures were taken by him to prevent ſuch conduct for the future. In the Iſland of Tanna was a volcano, which ſometimes made a dreadful noiſe, and, at each exploſion, which happened every three or four minutes, threw up fire and ſmoke in prodigious columns. At one time, great ſtones were ſeen high in the air. At the foot of the hill were ſeveral hot ſprings; and on the ſide of it Mr. Forſter found ſome places whence ſmoke of a ſulphureous ſmell iſſued, through cracks or fiſſures of the earth. A thermometer, that was placed in a little hole made in one of them, and which in the open air ſtood only at eighty, roſe to a hundred and ſeventy. In another inſtance, the mercury roſe to hundred and ninety-one. Our Commander being deſirous of getting a near and good view of the volcano, ſet out with a party for that purpoſe. But the Gentlemen met with ſo many obſtructions from the inhabitants, who were jealous of their penetrating far into the country, that they thought proper to return. For this jealouſy of the Iſlanders Captain Cook, in his narrative, has made a very judicious and candid apology. It is obſervable, with reſpect to the volcano of Tanna, that it is not on the ridge of the hill to which it belongs, but on its ſide. Nor is that hill the higheſt in the country; for there are others near it of more than double its height. It was in moiſt and wet weather that the volcano was moſt violent. When our Commander was ready to ſail from Tanna, an event happened, which gave him much concern. Juſt as our people were getting ſome logs into the boat, four or five of the natives ſtepped forward to ſee what they were doing. In conſequence of the Indians not being allowed to come within certain limits, the centinel ordered them back, upon which they readily complied. At this time, Captain Cook, who had his eyes fixed upon them, obſerved the centry preſent his piece to the men. The Captain was going to reprove him for this action, when, to his inexpreſſible aſtoniſhment, the centry fired. An attack ſo cauſeleſs and extraordinary naturally threw the natives into great confuſion. Moſt of them fled, and it was with difficulty that our Commander could prevail upon a few of them to remain. As they ran off, he perceived one of them to fall, who was immediately lifted up by two others, who took him into the water, waſhed his wound, and then led him off. The wounded perſon not being carried far, Captain Cook ſent for the Surgeon of the ſhip, and accompanied him to the man, whom they found expiring. The raſcal that had fired pretended that an Indian had laid an arrow acroſs his bow, and was going to ſhoot at him; ſo that he apprehended himſelf to be in danger. This, however, was no more than what the Iſlanders had always done, to ſhew that they were armed as well as our Voyagers. What rendered the preſent incident the more unfortunate was, that it was not the man who bent the bow, but one who ſtood near him, that was ſhot by the centry. The harbour where the Captain anchored, during his ſtay at Tanna, was called by him PORT RESOLUTION, after the name of the ſhip, ſhe being the firſt veſſel by which it was ever entered. It is no more than a little creek, three quarters of a mile in length, and about half that ſpace in breadth (a). No place can exceed it in its convenience for taking in wood and water, which are both close to the shore. The inhabitant of the Island, with whom our Commander had the most frequent and friendly connections, was named Paowang. Very little trade could be carried on with the people of Tanna. They had not the least knowledge of iron; and consequently nails, tools, and other articles made of that metal, and which are so greedily sought for in the more eastern isles, were here of no consideration. Cloth could be of no service to persons who go naked. Among the productions of the Island, there is reason to believe that the nutmeg-tree might be mentioned. This is collected from the circumstance of Mr. Forster's having shot a pigeon, in the craw of which a wild nutmeg was discovered. However, though he took some pains to find the tree, his endeavours were not attended with success. It was at first thought by our Navigators, that the inhabitants of Tanna were a race between the natives of the Friendly Islands, and those of Mallicollo; but by a short acquaintance with them they were convinced that they had little or no affinity to either, excepting in their hair. Some few men, women, and children were seen, whose hair resembled that of the English. With regard, however, to these persons it was obvious, that they were of another nation; and it was understood that they came from Erronan. Two languages were found to be spoken in Tanna. One of them, which appeared to have been introduced from Erronan, is nearly, if not exactly, the same with that of the Friendly Islands. The other, which is the proper language of the country, and which is judged to be peculiar to Tanna, Erromango, and Annatom, is different from any that had hitherto been met with by our Voyagers. The people of Tanna are of the middle size, and for the most part slender. There are few tall or stout men among them. In general, they have good features and agreeable countenances. Like all the tropical race, they are active and nimble; and seem to excel in the use of arms, but not to be fond of labour. With respect to the management of their weapons, Mr. Wales hath made an observation so honourable to Homer, that were I to omit it, I should not be forgiven by my classical readers. "I must confess," says Mr. Wales, "I have often been led to "think the feats which Homer represents his heroes as performing with their spears, "a little too much of the marvellous to be admitted into an heroic poem; I mean when "confined within the strait stays of Aristotle. Nay, even so great an advocate for him "as Mr. Pope, acknowledges them to be surprizing. But since I have seen what these "people can do with their wooden spears, and them badly pointed, and not of a hard "nature, I have not the least exception to any one passage in that great poet on this account. But if I see fewer exceptions, I can find infinitely more beauties in him; as he "has, I think, scarcely an action, circumstance, or description of any kind whatever, relating to a spear, which I have not seen and recognized among these people; as, their "whirling motion, and whistling noise, as they fly; their quivering motion, as they stick "in the ground when they fall; their meditating their aim, when they are going to "throw; and their shaking them in their hand as they go along (b)." On the twentieth of August Captain Cook sailed from Tanna, and employed all the remainder of the month in a farther examination of the Islands around him. He had now finished his survey of the whole Archipelago, and had gained a knowledge of it infinitely superior to what had ever been attained before. The northern Islands of this Archipelago were first discovered in 1606, by that eminent navigator Quiros, who considered them as part of the southern continent, which, at that time, and till very lately, was supposed to exist. M. de Bougainville was the next person by whom they were visited, in 1768. This Gentleman, however, besides landing in the Isle of Lepers, only made the discovery that the country was not connected, but composed of Islands, which he called the Great Cyclades. Captain Cook, besides ascertaining the situation and extent of these Islands, added to them several new ones which had hitherto been unknown, and explored the whole. He thought, therefore, that he had obtained a right to name them; and accordingly he bestowed upon them the appellation of the NEW HEBRIDES [W]. His title to this honour will not be disputed in any part of Europe, and certainly not by so enlightened and liberal a people as the French nation.

(b) Cook's Voyage, ubi supra, p. 38—84.

The season of the year now rendered it necessary for our Commander to return to the South, while he had yet some time to explore any land he might meet with between the New Hebrides and New Zealand; at which last place he intended to touch, that he might refresh his people, and renew his stock of wood and water for another southern course. With this view, he sailed on the first of September, and on the fourth land was discovered; in a harbour belonging to which the Resolution came to an anchor the next day. The design of Captain Cook was not only to visit the country, but to have an op-

The principal Islands of the New Hebrides, for an account of which the reader is referred to Captain Cook's Voyage, are, the Peak of the Etoile, Tierra del Espiritu Santo, Mallicollo, St. Bartholomew, the Isle of Lepers, Aurora, Whitsuntide Isle, Ambrym, Paoom, Apee, Three Hills, Sandwich, Erromango, Tanna, Immer, and Annatom.

portunity of obſerving an eclipſe of the ſun, which was ſoon to happen. An intercourſe immediately commenced with the inhabitants, who, during the whole of the Captain's ſtay, behaved in a very civil and friendly manner. In return, he was ſolicitous to render them every ſervice in his power. To Teabooma the Chief, he ſent, among other articles, a dog and a bitch, both young, but nearly full grown. It was ſome time before Teabooma could believe that the two animals were intended for him; but when he was convinced of it, he was loſt in an exceſs of joy. Another, and ſtill more valuable preſent, was that of a young boar and ſow; which, on account of the abſence of the Chief when they were brought to land, were received with great heſitation and ceremony. The laſt time that our Commander went on ſhore at this place, he ordered an inſcription to be cut on a large tree, ſetting forth the name of the ſhip, the date of the year, and other circumſtances, which teſtified that the Engliſh were the firſt diſcoverers of the country. This he had before done, wherever ſuch a ceremony ſeemed neceſſary. How the Iſland was called by the natives, our Voyagers could never learn; and, therefore, Captain Cook gave it the name of NEW CALEDONIA. The inhabitants are ſtrong, robuſt, active, and well made. With regard to the origin of the nation, the Captain judged them to be a race between the people of Tanna and the Friendly Iſles; or between thoſe of Tanna and the New Zealanders; or all three. Their language is in ſome reſpects a mixture of them all (c). In their diſpoſition they are courteous and obliging; and they are not in the leaſt addicted to pilfering, which is more than can be aſſerted concerning any other nation in this ſea. The women of New Caledonia, and thoſe likewiſe of Tanna, were found to be much chaſter than the females of the more eaſtern Iſlands. Our Commander never heard that the leaſt favour was obtained from them by any one of his company. Sometimes, indeed, the women would exerciſe a little coquetry, but they went no farther. The Botaniſts of the ſhip did not here complain for want of employment. They were diligent in their reſearches, and their labours were amply rewarded. Every day brought ſome acceſſion to botanical knowledge, or that of other branches of natural hiſtory (d). Every thing being ready to put to ſea, Captain Cook weighed anchor on the thirteenth of September, with the purpoſe of examining the coaſt of New Caledonia. In purſuing this object, by which he was enabled to add greatly to nautical and geographical knowledge, the Reſolution was more than once in danger of being loſt; and particularly, in the night of the twenty-eighth of the month, ſhe had a narrow eſcape. Our Navigators, on this occaſion, were much alarmed; and day-light ſhewed that their fears had not been ill founded. Indeed, breakers had been continually under their lee, and at a ſmall diſtance from them; ſo that they were in the moſt imminent danger. "We owed our ſafety," ſays the Captain, "to the interpoſition of Providence, a good look-out, and the very briſk manner in "which the ſhip was managed." Our Commander now began to be tired of a coaſt which he could no longer explore but at the riſque of loſing the veſſel, and ruining the whole voyage. He determined, however, not to leave it, till he knew of what kind ſome groves of trees were, which, by their uncommon appearance, had occaſioned much ſpeculation, and had been miſtaken, by ſeveral of the Gentlemen, for biſaltes. Captain Cook was the more ſolicitous to aſcertain the point, as theſe trees appeared to be of a ſort which might be uſeful to ſhipping, and had not been ſeen any where but in the ſouthern parts of New Caledonia. They proved to be a ſpecies of ſpruce pine, very proper for ſpars, which were then wanted. The diſcovery was valuable, as, excepting New Zealand, there was not an Iſland known, in the South Pacific Ocean, where a ſhip could ſupply herſelf with a maſt or yard, to whatever diſtreſs ſhe might be reduced. It was the opinion of the Carpenter of the Reſolution, who was a maſt-maker as well as a ſhipwright, that very good maſts might be made from the trees in queſtion. The wood of them, which is white, cloſe-grained, tough, and light, is well adapted to that purpoſe. One of the ſmall Iſlands where the trees were found, was called by the Captain the ISLE OF PINES. To another, on account of its affording ſufficient employment to the Botaniſts, during the little time they ſtayed upon it, he gave the name of BOTANY ISLE.

(c) Mr. Forſter is of opinion that the language of the NewCaledonians is totally different from that of any other nation which had yet been ſeen in the voyage.

(d) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 85—127.

Captain Cook now took into ſerious conſideration what was farther to be done. He had pretty well determined the extent of the South-weſt coaſt of New Caledonia, and would gladly have proceeded to a more accurate ſurvey of the whole, had he not been deterred, not only by the dangers he muſt encounter, but by the time required for the undertaking, and which he could not poſſibly ſpare. Indeed, when he conſidered the vaſt ocean he had to explore to the South; the ſtate and condition of the ſhip; the near approach of Summer; and that any material accident might detain him in this ſea even for another year, he did not think it adviſeable to make New Caledonia any longer the object of his attention. But though he was thus obliged, by neceſſity, for the firſt time, to leave a coaſt which he had diſcovered, before it was fully ſurveyed, he did not quit it till he had aſcertained the extent of the country, and proved, that, excepting New Zealand, it is perhaps the largeſt Iſland in the South Pacific Ocean [X]. As the Reſolution purſued her [X] It is perhaps the largeſt Iſland in the South Pacific Ocean.] New Caledonia extends from the latitude of 19° 37′ to 22° 30′ South, and from the longitude of 163° 37′ to 167° 14′ Eaſt. It lies nearly North-weſt ½ Weſt, and South-eaſt ½ Eaſt, and is about eighty-ſeven leagues long in that direction. Its breadth does not any where exceed ten leagues.

courſe from New Caledonia, land was diſcovered, which, on a nearer approach, was found to be an Iſland of good height and five leagues in circuit. Captain Cook named it NORFOLK ISLE, in honour of the noble family of Howard (e). It was uninhabited; and the firſt perſons that ever ſet foot on it were unqueſtionably our Engliſh Navigators. Various trees and plants were obſerved that are common at New Zealand; and, in particular, the flax plant, which is rather more luxuriant here than in any part of that country. The chief produce of the Iſland is a kind of ſpruce pine, exceedingly ſtraight and tall, which grows in great abundance. Such is the ſize of many of the trees, that, breaſt high, they are as thick as two men can fathom. Among the vegetables of the place, the palm-cabbage afforded both a wholeſome and palatable refreſhment; and, indeed, proved the moſt agreeable repaſt that our people had for a conſiderable time enjoyed. In addition to this gratification, they had the pleaſure of procuring ſome excellent fiſh.

(e) It is ſituated in the latitude of 29° 2′ 30″ South, and in the longitude of 168° 16′ Eaſt.

From Norfolk Iſle, our Commander ſteered for New Zealand, it being his intention to touch at Queen Charlotte's Sound, that he might refreſh his crew, and put the ſhip in a condition to encounter the ſouthern latitudes. On the eighteenth of October, he anchored before Ship Cove in that ſound; and the firſt thing he did, after landing, was to look for the bottle he had left on the ſhore, in which was a memorandum. It was taken away; and it ſoon appeared, from indubitable circumſtances, that the Adventure had been in the cove after it was quitted by the Reſolution. Upon viſiting the gardens which had been formed at Motuara, they were found almoſt in a ſtate of nature, having been wholly neglected by the inhabitants. Many, however, of the articles were in a flouriſhing condition, and ſhewed how well they liked the ſoil in which they were planted. It was ſeveral days before any of the natives made their appearance; but when they did ſo, and recogniſed Captain Cook and his friends, joy ſucceeded to fear. They hurried in numbers out of the woods, and embraced the Engliſh over and over again, leaping and ſkipping about like madmen. Amidſt all this extravagance of joy, they were careful to preſerve the honour of their females; for they would not permit ſome women, who were ſeen at a diſtance, to come near our people. The Captain's whole intercourſe with the New Zealanders, during this his third viſit to Queen Charlotte's Sound, was peaceable and friendly; and one of them, a man apparently of conſequence, whoſe name was Pedero, preſented him with a ſtaff of honour, ſuch as the Chiefs generally carry. In return, our Commander dreſſed Pedero, who had a fine perſon, and a good preſence, in a ſuit of old clothes, of which he was not a little proud. Captain Cook ſtill continued his ſolicitude to ſtock the Iſland with uſeful animals; and accordingly, in addition to what he had formerly done, he ordered two pigs, a boar and ſow, to be put on ſhore. There was reaſon to believe that ſome of the cocks and hens which had formerly been left here ſtill exiſted. None of them, indeed, were ſeen; but an hen's egg was found, which had not long been laid. Mr. Wales had now an opportunity of completing his obſervations with regard to Queen Charlotte's Sound, ſo as to aſcertain its latitude and longitude with the utmoſt accuracy (f). In the Captain's former voyage there had been an error in this reſpect. Such were Mr. Wales's abilities and aſſiduity, that the ſame correctneſs was maintained by him, in determining the ſituations of all the other places which were viſited by our Navigators (g).

(f) The longitude of Queen Charlotte's Sound, at the bottom of Ship Cove, is 174° 25′ 7″½ Eaſt, and its latitude 41° 5′ 56″½ South.

(g) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 128—162.

On the tenth of November, Captain Cook took his departure from New Zealand, in farther purſuit of his great object, the determination of the queſtion concerning the exiſtence of a ſouthern continent. Having ſailed till the twenty-ſeventh, in different degrees of latitude, extending from 43 to 55° 48′ South, he gave up all hopes of finding any more land in this ocean (h). He came, therefore, to the reſolution of ſteering directly for the Weſt entrance of the Straits of Magalhaens, with a view of coaſting the South ſide of Terra del Fuego, round Cape Horn, to the Strait Le Maire. As the world had hitherto obtained but a very imperfect knowledge of this ſhore, the Captain thought that the full ſurvey of it would be more advantageous, both to navigation and geography, than any thing he could expect to find in a higher latitude. In the proſecution of his voyage, our Commander, on the ſeventeenth of December, reached the Weſt coaſt of Terra del Fuego; and having continued to range it till the twentieth, he came to an anchor in a place to which he afterwards gave the name of CHRISTMAS SOUND. Through the whole courſe of his various navigations, he had never ſeen ſo deſolate a coaſt. It ſeems to be entirely compoſed of rocky mountains, without the leaſt appearance of vegetation. Theſe mountains terminate in horrible precipices, the craggy ſummits of which ſpire up to a vaſt height; ſo that ſcarcely any thing in nature can appear with a more barren and ſavage aſpect, than the whole of the country. The run which Captain Cook had made directly acroſs this ocean, in a high ſouthern latitude, was believed by him to be the firſt of the kind that had ever been carried into execution (i). He was, therefore, ſomewhat particular in remarking every circumſtance which ſeemed to be in the leaſt material. However, he could not but obſerve, that he had never made a paſſage any where, of ſuch length, or even of a much ſhorter extent, in which ſo few things occurred that were of an intereſting nature. Excepting the variation of the compaſs, he knew of nothing elſe that was worthy of notice. The Captain had now done with the Southern Pacific Ocean; and he had explored it in ſuch a manner, that it would be impoſſible for any one to think that more could be per-

(h) The ſhip, on the twenty-ſeventh, was in longitude 138° 56′ Weſt.

(i) He could not poſſibly know, at this time, that the Adventure had made the paſſage before him.

performed, in a ſingle voyage, towards obtaining that end, than had actually been accompliſhed (k). Barren and dreary as the land is about Chriſtmas Sound, it was not wholly deſtitute of ſome accommodations, which could not fail of being agreeable to our Navigators. Near every harbour they found freſh water, and wood for fuel. The country abounds likewiſe with wild fowl, and particularly with geeſe; which afforded a refreſhment to the whole crew, that was the more acceptable on account of the approaching feſtival. Had not Providence thus happily provided for them, their Chriſtmas cheer muſt have been ſalt beef and pork. Some Madeira wine, the only article of proviſion that was mended by keeping, was ſtill left. This, in conjunction with the geeſe, which were cooked in every variety of method, enabled our people to celebrate Chriſtmas as chearfully, as perhaps was done by their friends in England. The inhabitants of Terra del Fuego, Captain Cook found to be of the ſame nation that he had formerly ſeen in Succeſs Bay; and the ſame whom M. de Bougainville has diſtinguiſhed by the name of Pecharas. They are a little, ugly, half-ſtarved, beardleſs race, and go almoſt naked. It is their own fault that they are not better clothed, nature having furniſhed them with ample materials for that purpoſe. By lining their ſeal-ſkin cloaks with the ſkins and feathers of aquatic birds; by making the cloaks themſelves larger; and by applying the ſame materials to different parts of clothing, they might render their dreſs much more warm and comfortable. But while they are doomed to exiſt in one of the moſt inhoſpitable climates in the globe, they have not ſagacity enough to avail themſelves of thoſe means of adding to the conveniencies of life, which Providence has put into their power. In ſhort, the Captain, after having been a witneſs to ſo many varieties of the human race, hath pronounced, that of all the nations he had ſeen, the Pecharas are the moſt wretched (l). Notwithſtanding the barrenneſs of the country, it abounds with a variety of unknown plants, and gave ſufficient employment to the Botaniſts of the Reſolution. "Almoſt every plant," ſays Mr. Forſter, "which we gathered" on the rocks, "was new to us, and ſome ſpecies "were remarkable for the beauty of their flowers, or their ſmell (m)." On the twenty-eighth of December, our Commander ſailed from Chriſtmas Sound, and proceeded on his voyage, round Cape Horn, through Strait le Maire, to Staten Land. This famous Cape was paſſed by him on the next day, when he entered the Southern Atlantic Ocean. In ſome charts, Cape Horn is laid down as belonging to a ſmall Iſland; but this was neither confirmed, nor could it be contradicted by our Navigators; for ſeveral breakers appeared in the coaſt, both to the Eaſt and Weſt of it, and the hazy weather rendered every object indiſtinct. Though the ſummits of ſome of the hills were rocky, the ſides and valleys ſeemed covered with a green turf, and wooded in tufts (n). In ranging Staten Iſland a good part was found ſituated three leagues to the weſtward of St. John, and in a northern direction. Upon account of the day on which the diſcovery of this port was made, (being the firſt of January) Captain Cook gave it the name of NEW YEAR'S HARBOUR. The knowledge of it may be of ſervice to future Navigators. Indeed, it would be more convenient for ſhips bound to the Weſt, or round Cape Horn, if its ſituation would permit them to put to ſea with an eaſterly and northerly wind. But this inconvenience is not of great conſequence, ſince theſe winds are ſeldom known to be of long duration. The Captain, however, has declared, that if he were on a voyage round Cape Horn to the Weſt, and not in want of wood or water, or any other thing which might make it neceſſary to put into port, he would not approach the land at all. By keeping out at ſea the currents would be avoided, which, he was ſatisfied, would loſe their force at ten or twelve leagues from land, and be totally without influence at a greater diſtance. The extent of Terra del Fuego, and conſequently that of the Straits of Magalhaens, our Commander aſcertained to be leſs than has been laid down by the generality of navigators. Nor was the coaſt, upon the whole, found to be ſo dangerous as has often been repreſented. The weather, at the ſame time, was remarkably temperate. In one of the little Iſles near Staten Land, and which had been called by Captain Cook New Year's Iſles, there was obſerved a harmony between the different animals of the place, which is too curious to be omitted. It ſeemed as if they had entered into a league not to diſturb each other's tranquillity. The greater part of the ſea-coaſt is occupied by the ſea-lions; the ſea-bears take up their abode in the Iſle; the ſhags are poſted in the higheſt cliffs; the penguins fix their quarters where there is the moſt eaſy communication to and from the ſea; and the reſt of the birds chuſe more retired places. All theſe animals were occaſionally ſeen to mix together, like domeſtic cattle and poultry in a farm-yard, without one attempting to moleſt the other. Nay, the Captain had often obſerved the eagles and vultures ſitting on the hills among the ſhags, while none of the latter, whether old or young, appeared to be in the leaſt diſturbed at their preſence. It may be aſked, then, how do theſe birds of prey live? This queſtion our Commander hath anſwered, by ſuppoſing that they feed on the carcaſes of ſeals and birds which die by various cauſes. It is probable, from the immenſe quantity of animals with which the Iſle abounds, that ſuch carcaſes exiſt in great numbers (o).

From Staten Iſland Captain Cook ſailed, on the fourth of January, with a view, in the firſt place, of diſcovering that extenſive coaſt, laid down by Mr. Dalrymple in his chart, in which is the gulph of St. Sebaſtian. In order to have all other parts before him, the Captain deſigned to make the weſtern point of that gulph. As he had ſome doubt of the exiſtence of ſuch a coaſt, this appeared to him the beſt route for determining the matter, and for exploring the ſouthern part of this ocean. When he came to the ſituations aſſigned to the different points of the gulph of St. Sebaſtian, neither land nor any unequivocal ſigns of land were diſcovered. On the contrary, it was evident that there could not be any extenſive tract of country in the direction which had been ſuppoſed. Proceeding in his voyage, land was ſeen on the fourteenth, which was at firſt miſtaken for an Iſland of ice. It was in a manner wholly covered with ſnow. From the perſon by whom it was firſt diſcovered, it obtained the name of WILLIS's ISLAND (p). It is a high rock, of no great extent, near to which are ſome rocky iſlots. Another Iſland, of a larger compaſs, on account of the vaſt number of birds which were upon it, was called BIRD ISLE. A more extenſive range of country had been ſeen for ſome time, which Captain Cook reached on the ſeventeenth, and where he landed, on the ſame day, in three different places. The head of the bay, in which he came to ſhore, was terminated by particular ice-cliffs, of conſiderable height. Pieces were continually breaking off, and floating out to ſea; and while our Navigators were in the bay, a great fall happened, which made a noiſe like a cannon. No leſs ſavage and horrible were the inner parts of the country. "The wild rocks raiſed their ſummits, till they were loſt in the clouds, and the valleys lay "covered with everlaſting ſnow." There was not a tree to be ſeen, or a ſhrub found that was even big enough to make a tooth-pick. The only vegetation that was met with, was a coarſe ſtrong-bladed graſs, growing in tufts, wild burnet, and a plant like moſs, which ſprang from the rocks. When our Commander landed in the bay, he diſplayed the Engliſh colours; and, under a diſcharge of ſmall arms, took poſſeſſion of the country in his Majeſty's name. It was not, however, a diſcovery which was ever likely to be productive of any conſiderable benefit. In his return to the ſhip, Captain Cook brought with him a quantity of ſeals and penguins, which were an acceptable preſent to the crew; not from the want of proviſions, which were plentiful in every kind, but from a change of diet. Any ſort of freſh meat was preferred by moſt on board to ſalt. The Captain himſelf was now, for the firſt time, tired of the ſalted meats of the ſhip; and though the fleſh of the penguins could ſcarcely vie with bullock's liver, its freſhneſs was ſufficient to render it comparatively agreeable to the palate. To the bay in which he had been, he gave the name of POSSESION BAY (q). The land in which this bay lies, was at firſt judged by our Navigators to be part of a great continent. But, upon coaſting round the whole country, it was proved to a demonſtration that it was only an Iſland of ſeventy leagues in circuit. In honour of his Majeſty, Captain Cook called it the ISLE OF GEORGIA (r). It could ſcarcely have been thought that an Iſland of no greater extent than this, ſituated between the latitude of fifty-four and fifty-five, ſhould, in a manner, be wholly covered, many fathoms deep, with frozen ſnow, in the height of ſummer. The ſides and ſummits of the lofty mountains were caſed with ſnow and ice; and an incredible quantity lay in the valleys. So immenſe was the quantity, that our Commander did not think that it could be the produce of the Iſland. Some land, therefore, which he had ſeen at a diſtance, induced him to believe that it might belong to an extenſive tract; and gave him hopes of diſcovering a continent. In this reſpect, however, he was diſappointed; but the diſappointment did not ſit heavy upon him; ſince to judge of the bulk by the apprehended ſample, it would not have been worth the diſcovery. It was remarkable that our Voyagers did not ſee a river, or a ſtream of freſh water, on the whole coaſt of the Iſle of Georgia. Captain Cook judged it to be highly probable that there are no perennial ſprings in the country; and that the interior parts, in conſequence of their being much elevated, never enjoy heat enough to melt the ſnow in ſufficient quantities to produce a river or ſtream of water. In ſailing round the Iſland, our Navigators were almoſt continually involved in a thick miſt; ſo that, for any thing they knew to the contrary, they might be ſurrounded with dangerous rocks.

(p) It is ſituated in the latitude of 54° South, and the longitude of 38° 23′ Weſt.

(q) It is ſituated in latitude 54° 5′ South, and longitude of 37° 18′ Weſt.

(r) It is ſituated between the latitudes of 53° 57′ and 54° 57′ South, and between 38° 15′ and 35° 34′ Weſt longitude.

The Captain, on the twenty-fifth of the month, ſteered from the Iſle of Georgia, and, on the twenty-ſeventh, computed that he was in latitude ſixty, South. Farther than this he did not intend to go, unleſs ſome certain ſigns of ſoon meeting with land ſhould be diſcovered. There was now a long hollow ſwell from the Weſt, which was a ſtrong indication that no land was to be met with in that direction; and hence aroſe an additional proof of what has already been remarked, that the extenſive coaſt, laid down in Mr. Dalrymple's chart of the ocean between Africa and America, and the Gulph of St. Sebaſtian, doth not exiſt. Not to mention the various Iſlands which were ſeen in the proſecution of the voyage, and the names that were given to them, I ſhall only advert to a few of the more material circumſtances. On an elevated coaſt, which appeared in ſight upon the thirty-firſt, our Commander beſtowed the appellation of the SOUTHERN THULE. The reaſon of his giving it this name was, that it is the moſt ſouthern land that had ever yet been diſcovered (s). It is every where covered with ſnow, and diſplays a ſurface of vaſt height. On this day, our Voyagers were in no ſmall danger from a great weſterly ſwell, which ſet right upon the ſhore, and threatened to carry them on the moſt horrible coaſt in the world. Happily, the diſcovery of a point to the North, beyond which no land could be ſeen, relieved them from their apprehenſions. To the more diſtinguiſhed tracts of country, which were diſcovered from the thirty-firſt of January to the ſixth of February, Captain Cook gave the names of CAPE BRISTOL, CAPE MONTAGU, SAUNDERS's ISLE, CANDLEMAS ISLES, and SANDWICH's LAND. The laſt is either a group of Iſlands, or elſe a point of the continent. For that there is a tract of land near the pole, which is the ſource of moſt of the ice that is ſpread over this vaſt Southern Ocean, was the Captain's firm opinion. He alſo thought it probable, that this land muſt extend fartheſt to the North where it is oppoſite to the Southern Atlantic and Indian Oceans. Ice had always been found by him farther to the North in theſe oceans than any where elſe, and this he judged could not be the caſe, if there were not land of conſiderable extent to the South. However, the greateſt part of this ſouthern continent, if it actually exiſts, muſt lie within the polar circle, where the ſea is ſo encumbered with ice, that the land is rendered inacceſſible. So great is the riſque which is run, in examining a coaſt in theſe unknown and icy ſeas, that our Commander, with a modeſt and well-grounded boldneſs, could aſſert, that no man would ever venture farther than he had done; and that the lands which may lie to the South will never be explored. Thick fogs, ſnow ſtorms, intenſe cold, and every thing beſide that can render navigation dangerous, muſt be encountered; all which difficulties are greatly heightened by the inexpreſſibly horrid aſpect of the country. It is a country doomed by nature never once to feel the warmth of the ſun's rays, but to lie buried in everlaſting ſnow and ice. Whatever ports there may be on the coaſt, they are almoſt entirely covered with frozen ſnow of a vaſt thickneſs. If, however, any one of them ſhould be ſo far open as to invite a ſhip into it, ſhe would run the riſque of being fixed there for ever, or of coming out in an ice iſland. To this it may be added, that the Iſlands and floats on the coaſt, the great falls from the ice cliffs in the port, or a heavy ſnow ſtorm, attended with a ſharp froſt, might be equally fatal. Nothing could exceed the inclination of Captain Cook, if it had been practicable, to penetrate farther to the South: but difficulties like theſe were not to be ſurmounted. If he had riſqued all that had been done during the voyage, for the ſake of diſcovering and exploring a coaſt, which, when diſcovered and explored, would have anſwered no end whatever, or have been of the leaſt uſe either to navigation or geography, or indeed to any other ſcience, he would juſtly have been charged with inexcuſable temerity. He determined, therefore, to alter his courſe to the eaſt, and to ſail in queſt of Bouvet's Land, the exiſtence of which was yet to be ſettled. Accordingly, this was the principal object of his purſuit, from the ſixth to the twenty-ſecond of the month. By that day he had run down thirteen degrees of longitude, in the very latitude aſſigned for Bouvet's Land. No ſuch land, however, was diſcovered; nor did any proofs occur of the exiſtence of Cape Circumciſion. Our Commander was at this time no more than two degrees of longitude from the route he had taken to the South, when he left the Cape of Good Hope. It would, therefore, have been to no purpoſe to proceed any farther to the Eaſt in this parallel. But being deſirous of determining the queſtion concerning ſome land that was ſuppoſed to have been ſeen more to the South, he directed his courſe for the ſituation in which the diſcovery of it might be expected. Two days were ſpent by him in this purſuit, to no effectual purpoſe. After having run over the place where the land was imagined to lie, without meeting with the leaſt ſigns of any, it became certain that the ice iſlands had deceived our Navigators as well as Mr. Bouvet (t). Captain Cook had now made the circuit of the ſouthern ocean in a high latitude, and traverſed it in ſuch a manner as to leave not the leaſt room for the poſſibility of there being a continent, unleſs near the pole, and out of the reach of navigation. By twice viſiting the tropical ſea, he had not only ſettled the ſituation of ſome old diſcoveries, but made many new ones; and, indeed, even in that part, had left little more to be accompliſhed. The intention of the voyage had, in every reſpect, been fully anſwered, and the ſouthern hemiſphere ſufficiently explored. A final end was hereby put to the ſearching after a ſouthern continent, which, for nearly two centuries paſt, had occaſionally engroſſed the attention of ſome of the maritime powers, and had been urged with great ardour by philoſophers and geographers in different ages.

(s) Its latitude is 59° 15′ 30″ South, and its longitude 27° 48′ Weſt.

The great purpoſe of his navigation round the globe being thus completed, the Captain began to direct his views towards England. He had, indeed, ſome thoughts of protracting his courſe a little longer, for the ſake of reviſiting the place where the French diſcovery is ſaid to be ſituated. But, upon mature deliberation, he determined to lay aſide his intention. He conſidered that, if this diſcovery had really been made, the end would be as fully anſwered as if it had been done by himſelf. It could only be an Iſland; and if a judgment might be formed from the degree of cold which our Voyagers had experienced in that latitude, it could not be a fertile one. Beſides, our Commander would hereby have been kept two months longer at ſea, and that in a tempeſtuous latitude, with which the ſhip was not in a condition to ſtruggle. Her ſails and rigging were ſo much worn, that ſomething was giving way every hour; and there was nothing left, either to repair or to replace them. The proviſions of the veſſel were in ſuch a ſtate of decay, that they afforded little nouriſhment, and the company had been long without refreſhments. Indeed, the crew were were yet healthy, and would chearfully have gone wherever the Captain judged it proper to lead them; but he was fearful leſt the ſcurvy ſhould lay hold of them, at a time when none of the remedies were left by which it could be removed. He thought, likewiſe, that it would have been cruel in him to have continued the fatigues and hardſhips they were perpetually expoſed to, longer than was abſolutely neceſſary. Throughout the whole voyage, they had merited by their behaviour every indulgence which it was in his power to beſtow. Animated by the conduct of the officers, they had ſhewn that no difficulties or dangers which came in their way were incapable of being ſurmounted; nor had their activity, courage, and chearfulneſs been in the leaſt abated by the ſeparation from them of their conſort the Adventure. From all theſe conſiderations, which were evidently the dictates of wiſdom and humanity, Captain Cook was induced to ſpend no longer time in ſearching for the French diſcoveries, and to ſteer for the Cape of Good Hope. He determined, however, to direct his courſe in ſuch a manner as to look for the Iſles of Denia and Marſeveen, which are laid down in Dr. Halley's variation chart (u). After ſailing in the proper latitudes, from the twenty-fifth of February to the thirteenth of March, no ſuch Iſlands were diſcovered. Nothing, indeed, had been ſeen that could encourage our Voyagers to perſevere in a ſearch after them; and much time could not now be ſpared, either for the purpoſe of finding them, or of proving their non-exiſtence. Every one on board was for good reaſons impatient to get into port. The Captain, therefore, could no longer avoid yielding to the general wiſhes, and reſolving to proceed to the Cape, without farther delay (w). Soon after our Commander had come to this determination, he demanded of the officers and petty officers, in purſuance of his inſtructions, the log-books and journals they had kept; which were delivered to him accordingly, and ſealed up for the inſpection of the Admiralty. He enjoined them alſo, and the whole crew, not to divulge where they had been, till they were permitted to do ſo by their Lordſhips; an injunction, a compliance with which might probably be rendered ſomewhat difficult, from the natural tendency there is in men to relate the extraordinary enterpriſes and adventures wherein they have been concerned. As the Reſolution approached towards the Cape of Good Hope, ſhe fell in firſt with a Dutch Eaſt Indiaman from Bengal, commanded by Captain Boſch, and next with an Engliſh Indiaman, being the True Briton, from China, of which Captain Broadly was the Commander. Mr. Boſch very obligingly offered to our Navigators ſugar, arrack, and whatever he had to ſpare; and Captain Broadly, with the moſt ready generoſity, ſent them freſh proviſions, tea, and various articles which could not fail of being peculiarly acceptable to people in their ſituation. Even a parcel of old news-papers furniſhed no ſlight gratification to perſons who had ſo long been deprived of obtaining any intelligence concerning their country and the ſtate of Europe. From theſe veſſels Captain Cook received ſome information with regard to what had happened to the Adventure, after her ſeparation from the Reſolution. On Wedneſday the twenty-ſecond of March (x), he anchored in Table Bay; where he found ſeveral Dutch ſhips, ſome French, and the Ceres, an Engliſh Eaſt Indiaman, bound directly for England, under the command of Captain Newte. By this Gentleman he ſent a copy of the preceding part of his journal, ſome charts, and other drawings, to the Admiralty (y). During the circum-navigation of the globe, from the period of our Commander's leaving the Cape of Good Hope to his return to it again, he had ſailed no leſs than twenty thouſand leagues. This was an extent of voyage nearly equal to three times the equatorial circumference of the earth, and which had never been accompliſhed before, by any ſhip, in the ſame compaſs of duration. In ſuch a caſe, it could not be a matter of ſurpriſe, that the rigging and ſails of the Reſolution ſhould be eſſentially damaged, and even worn out: and yet, in all this great run, which had been made in every latitude between nine and ſeventy-one, ſhe did not ſpring either low-maſt, top-maſt, lower or top-ſail yard; nor did ſhe ſo much as break a lower or top-maſt ſhroud. Theſe happy circumſtances were owing to the good properties of the veſſel, and the ſingular care and abilities of her officers (z).

(u) They are laid down in the latitude of 41° 2′ South, and about 4° of longitude to the Eaſt of the meridian of the Cape of Good Hope.

(w) He was at this time in the latitude of 38° 38′ South, and longitude of 23° 37′ Eaſt.

(x) With our Navigators, who had ſailed round the world, it was Wedneſday the twenty-ſecond of March; but at the Cape of Good Hope it was Tueſday the twenty-firſt.

On the remainder of the voyage it is not neceſſary to enlarge. Though it was conducted with the ſame attention to navigation and geography, and with the ſame ſagacity in marking whatever was worthy of obſervation, nevertheleſs, as it was not employed in traverſing unknown ſeas, or in diſcovering countries that had not been heard of before, it may be ſufficient briefly to mention the places at which Captain Cook touched, before his arrival in England. The repairs of the ſhip having been completed, and the neceſſary ſtores gotten on board, together with a freſh ſupply of proviſions and water, he left the Cape of Good Hope on the twenty-ſeventh of April, and reached the Iſland of St. Helena on the fifteenth of May. Here he ſtaid till the twenty-firſt, when he ſailed for the Iſland of Aſcenſion, where he anchored on the twenty-eighth. From this place he directed his courſe, on the thirty-firſt, for the Iſland of Fernando de Noronha, at which he arrived on the ninth of June. In the progreſs of the voyage, our Commander made an experiment upon the ſtill for procuring freſh water; and the reſult of the trial was, that the invention is uſeful upon the whole, but that to truſt entirely to it would by no means be adviſable. Indeed, provided there is not a ſcarcity of fuel, and the coppers are good, as much water may be obtained as will ſupport life; but no efforts will be able to procure a quantity ſufficient for the preſervation of health, eſpecially in hot climates. Captain Cook was convinced, by experience, that nothing contributes more to the health of ſeamen, than having plenty of water. On the fourteenth of July, the Captain came to an anchor in the Bay of Fayal, one of the Azores Iſlands. His ſole deſign in ſtopping here, was to give Mr. Wales an opportunity of finding the rate of the watch, that hereby he might be enabled to fix the longitude of theſe Iſlands with the greater degree of certainty. No ſooner, therefore, had our Commander anchored, than he ſent an officer to wait on the Engliſh conſul, and to acquaint the Governor with the arrival of our Navigators, requeſting his permiſſion for Mr. Wales to make obſervations on ſhore, for the purpoſe now mentioned. Mr. Dent, who then acted as conſul, not only obtained this permiſſion, but accommodated Mr. Wales with a convenient place in his garden, to ſet up his inſtruments. This object being accompliſhed, Captain Cook proceeded, on the nineteenth, with all expedition for England. On the thirtieth of the ſame month, he anchored at Spithead, and landed at Portſmouth, having been abſent from Great Britain three years and eighteen days, in which time, and under all changes of climate, he had loſt but four men, and only one of them by ſickneſs (a).

(a) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 268—289.

The able manner in which Captain Cook had conducted the preceding voyage, the diſcoveries he had made, and his complete determination of the grand point he had been ſent to aſcertain, juſtly and powerfully recommended him to the protection and encouragement of all thoſe who had patronized the undertaking. No alteration had occurred, during his abſence, in the Preſidency of the Admiralty department. The noble Lord, whoſe extenſive views had taken ſuch a lead in the plans of navigation and diſcovery, ſtill continued at the head of that board; and it could not be otherwiſe than a high ſatisfaction to him that ſo extraordinary a degree of ſucceſs had attended his deſigns for the enlargement of ſcience. His Lordſhip loſt no time in repreſenting Captain Cook's merits to the King: nor did his Majeſty ſtand in need of ſolicitations to ſhew favour to a man who had ſo eminently fulfilled his royal and munificent intentions. Accordingly, our Navigator, on the ninth of Auguſt, was raiſed to the rank of a Poſt Captain. Three days afterwards, he received a more diſtinguiſhed and ſubſtantial mark of the approbation of Government; for he was then appointed a Captain in Greenwich Hoſpital; a ſituation which was intended to afford him a pleaſing and honourable reward for his illuſtrious labours and ſervices (b).

(b) From the books of the Admiralty.

It will eaſily be ſuppoſed that the lovers of ſcience would, in general, be peculiarly attentive to the effects reſulting from Captain Cook's diſcoveries. The additions he had made to the knowledge of geography, navigation, and aſtronomy, and the new views he had opened of the diverſified ſtate of human life and manners, could not avoid commanding their eſteem, and exciting their admiration. With many perſons of philoſophic literature he was in the habits of intimacy and friendſhip; and he was particularly acquainted with Sir John Pringle, at that time Preſident of the Royal Society. It was natural, therefore, that his ſcientific friends ſhould wiſh him to become a Member of this learned body; the conſequence of which was, that, in the latter end of the year 1775, he was propoſed as a candidate for election. On the twenty-ninth of February, 1776, he was unanimouſly choſen; and he was admitted on the ſeventh of March (c). That ſame evening, a paper was read, which he had addreſſed to Sir John Pringle, containing an account of the method he had taken to preſerve the health of the crew of his Majeſty's ſhip the Reſolution, during her voyage round the world (d). Another paper, at the requeſt of the Preſident, was communicated by him, on the eighteenth of April, relative to the tides in the South Seas. The tides particularly conſidered were thoſe in the Endeavour River, on the Eaſt coaſt of New Holland (e). A ſtill greater honour was in reſerve for Captain Cook than the election of him to be a common Member of the Royal Society. It was reſolved by Sir John Pringle, and the Council of the Society, to beſtow upon him the eſtimable prize of the gold medal, for the beſt experimental paper of the year; and no determination could be founded in greater wiſdom and juſtice. If Captain Cook had made no important diſcoveries, if he had not determined the queſtion concerning a ſouthern continent, his name would have been entitled to immortality, on account of his humane attention to, and his unparalleled ſucceſs in preſerving the lives and health of his ſeamen. He had good reaſon, upon this head, to aſſume the pleaſurable, but modeſt language, with which he has concluded his narrative of his ſecond navigation round the globe: "Whatever," ſays he, "may be the public "judgment about other matters, it is with real ſatisfaction, and without claiming any "merit but that of attention to my duty, that I can conclude this account with an obſer- "vation, which facts enable me to make, that our having diſcovered the poſſibility of "preſerving health among a numerous ſhip's company, for ſuch a length of time, in ſuch "varieties of climate, and amidſt ſuch continued hardſhips and fatigues, will make this "voyage remarkable, in the opinion of every benevolent perſon, when the diſputes about "the Southern Continent ſhall have ceaſed to engage the attention, and to divide the "judgment of Philoſophers (f)." It was the cuſtom of Sir John Pringle, at the delivery of Sir Godfrey Copley's annual medal, to give an elaborate diſcourſe, containing the hiſtory of that part of ſcience for the improvement of which the medal was conferred. the preſent occaſion, the Preſident had a ſubject to enlarge upon, which was perfectly congenial to his diſpoſition and ſtudies. His own life had been much employed in pointing out the means which tended not only to cure, but to prevent, the diſeaſes of mankind; and, therefore, it was with peculiar pleaſure and affection that he celebrated the conduct of his friend, who, by precautions equally wiſe and ſimple, had rendered the circumnavigation of the globe, ſo far as health is concerned, quite a harmleſs undertaking (g). Towards the beginning of his diſcourſe, Sir John juſtly aſks, "What enquiry can be ſo "uſeful as that, which hath for its object, the ſaving the lives of men? and when ſhall we "find one more ſucceſsful than that before us? Here," adds the Preſident, "are no "vain boaſtings of the empiric, nor ingenious and deluſive theories of the dogmatiſt; but "a conciſe and artleſs, and an incontеſted relation of the means, by which, under Divine "favour, Captain Cook, with a company of a hundred and eighteen men, performed a "voyage of three years and eighteen days, throughout all the climates, from fifty-two de-"grees North to ſeventy-one degrees South, with the loſs of only one man by ſickneſs [Y]. "—I would now enquire," proceeds Sir John Pringle, "of the moſt converſant in the "ſtudy of bills of mortality, whether, in the moſt healthful climate, and in the beſt con-"dition of life, they have ever found ſo ſmall a number of deaths, within that ſpace of "time? How great and agreeable then muſt our ſurprize be, after peruſing the hiſtories "of long navigations in former days, when ſo many periſhed by Marine diſeaſes, to find "the air of the ſea acquitted of all malignity, and, in fine, that a voyage round the world "may be undertaken with leſs danger, perhaps, to health, than a common tour in "Europe!" In the progreſs of his diſcourſe, the Preſident recounted the dreadful calamities and deſtruction the ſcurvy had heretofore brought upon Mariners in voyages of great length; after which he pointed out at large, and illuſtrated with his own obſervations, the methods purſued by Captain Cook for preſerving the health of his men. In concluſion, Sir John remarked, that the Royal Society never more cordially or more meritoriouſly beſtowed the gold medal, that faithful ſymbol of their eſteem and affection. "For if," ſays he, "Rome decreed the civic crown to him who ſaved the life of a ſingle "citizen, what wreaths are due to that man, who having himſelf ſaved many, perpetuates "in your Tranſactions the means by which Britain may now, on the moſt diſtant voyages, "preſerve numbers of her intrepid ſons, her mariners; who, braving every danger, have "ſo liberally contributed to the fame, to the opulence, and to the maritime empire, of "their country (h) [Z]!" One circumſtance alone was wanting to complete the pleaſure and [Y] With the loſs of only one man by ſickneſs.] Mr. Patten, Surgeon to the Reſolution, informed Sir John Pringle, that this one man, who died of a conſumption terminating in a dropſy, began ſo early to complain of a cough and other conſumptive ſymptoms, which had never left him, that his lungs muſt have been affected before he came on board.

[Z] And to the maritime empire, of their country.] It cannot but be acceptable to inſert here, from the concluſion of Captain Cook's ſecond voyage, his enumeration of the ſeveral cauſes, to which, under the care of Providence, the uncommon good ſtate of health, experienced by his people, was owing. "In "the Introduction," ſays he, "mention has been "made of the extraordinary attention paid by the "Admiralty, in cauſing ſuch articles to be put on "board, as either from experience or ſuggeſtion it "was judged would tend to preſerve the health of "the ſeamen. I ſhall not treſpaſs upon the reader's "time in mentioning them all, but confine myſelf to "ſuch as were found the moſt uſeful.

"We were furniſhed with a quantity of malt, of "which was made Sweet Wort. To ſuch of the men "as ſhewed the leaſt ſymptoms of the ſcurvy; and "alſo to ſuch as were thought to be threatened with "that diſorder, this was given, from one to two or "three pints a day each man; or in ſuch proportion "as the Surgeon found neceſſary, which ſometimes "amounted to three quarts. This is, without doubt, "one of the beſt antiſcorbutic ſea-medicines yet diſ-"covered; and, if uſed in time, will, with proper "attention to other things, I am perſuaded, prevent "the ſcurvy from making any great progreſs for a "conſiderable while. But I am not altogether of "opinion that it will cure it at ſea.

"Sour Krout, of which we had a large quantity, is "not only a wholeſome vegetable food, but, in my "judgment, highly antiſcorbutic; and it ſpoils not "by keeping. A pound of this was ſerved to each "man, when at ſea, twice a week, or oftener, as was "thought neceſſary.

"Portable Broth was another great article, of which "we had a large ſupply. An ounce of this to each "man, or ſuch other proportion as circumſtances "pointed out, was boiled in their peaſe, three days "in the week; and when we were in places where "vegetables were to be got, it was boiled with them, "and wheat or oatmeal, every morning for breakfaſt; "and alſo with peaſe and vegetables for dinner. It "enabled us to make ſeveral nouriſhing and whole-"ſome meſſes, and was the means of making the "people eat a greater quantity of vegetables than "they would otherwiſe have done.

"Rob of Lemon and Orange, is an antiſcorbutic we "were not without. The Surgeon made uſe of it in "many caſes, with great ſucceſs.

"Amongſt the articles of victualling, we were "ſupplied with Sugar in the room of Oil, and with "Wheat for a part of our Oatmeal; and were certainly "gainers by the exchange. Sugar, I apprehend, is "a very good antiſcorbutic; whereas oil (ſuch as the "navy is uſually ſupplied with), I am of opinion has "the contrary effect.

"But the introduction of the moſt ſalutary articles, "either as proviſions or medicines, will generally "prove unſucceſsful, unleſs ſupported by certain "regulations. On this principle, many years ex-"perience, together with ſome hints I had from Sir "Hugh Palliſer, Captains Campbell, Wallis, and "other intelligent officers, enabled me to lay a plan "whereby all was to be governed.

"The crew were at three watches, except upon "ſome extraordinary occaſions. By this means they "were not ſo much expoſed to the weather as if they "had been at watch and watch; and had generally "dry cloaths to ſhift themſelves, when they happened "to get wet. Care was alſo taken to expoſe them "as little to wet weather as poſſible.

"Proper methods were uſed to keep their perſons, "hammocks, bedding, cloaths, &c. conſtantly clean "and dry. Equal care was taken to keep the ſhip "clean and dry betwixt decks. Once or twice a and celebrity arising from the aſſignment of Sir Godfrey Copley's medal. Captain Cook was not himſelf preſent, to hear the diſcourſe of the Preſident, and to receive the honour conferred upon him. Some months before the anniverſary of St. Andrew's day, he had ſailed on his laſt expedition. The medal, therefore, was delivered into the hands of Mrs. Cook, whoſe ſatisfaction at being entruſted with ſo valuable a pledge of her huſband's reputation cannot be queſtioned. Neither can it be doubted, but that the Captain, before his departure from England, was fully apprized of the mark of diſtinction which was intended for him by the Royal Society.

Captain Cook, after the concluſion of his ſecond voyage, was called upon to appear in the world in the character of an author. In the account that was publiſhed, by authority, of his former circum-navigation of the globe, as well as of thoſe which had been performed by the Captains Byron, Carteret, and Wallis, it was thought requiſite to procure the aſſiſtance of a profeſſed literary man, whoſe buſineſs it ſhould be to draw up a narrative from the ſeveral journals of theſe Commanders. Accordingly, Dr. Hawkeſworth, as is univerſally known, was employed for the purpoſe. In the preſent caſe, it was not eſteemed neceſſary to have recourſe to ſuch an expedient. Captain Cook was juſtly regarded as ſufficiently qualified to relate his own ſtory. His journal only required to be divided into chapters, and perhaps to be amended by a few verbal corrections. It is not ſpeaking extravagantly to ſay, that, in point of compoſition, his hiſtory of his voyage reflects upon him no ſmall degree of credit. His ſtile is natural, clear, and manly; being well adapted to the ſubject and to his own character: and it is poſſible that a pen of more ſtudied elegance would not have given any additional advantage to the narration. It was not till ſome time after Captain Cook's leaving England that the work was publiſhed; but, in the mean while, the ſuperintendence of it was undertaken by his learned and valuable friend, Dr. Douglas, whoſe late promotion to the mitre hath afforded pleaſure to every literary man, of every denomination. When the Voyage appeared, it came recommended by the accuracy and excellence of its charts, and by a great variety of engravings, from the curious and beautiful drawings of Mr. Hodges. This work was followed by the publication of the original aſtronomical obſervations, which had been made by Mr. Wales in the Reſolution, and by Mr. Bayley in the Adventure. It was at the expence of the Commiſſioners of Longitude that theſe obſervations were made, and it was by their order that they were printed. The book of Mr. Wales and Mr. Bayley diſplays, in the ſtrongeſt light, the ſcientific uſe and value of Captain Cook's voyage [AA]. Some of the circumſtances which have now been mentioned, have deſignedly been brought forward more early in point of time than ſhould otherwiſe have been done, in order to prevent any interruption in the courſe of the ſubſequent narrative.

" week ſhe was aired with fires; and when this could " not be done, ſhe was ſmoked with gunpowder, " mixed with vinegar or water. I had alſo, fre- " quently, a fire made in an iron pot, at the bottom " of the well, which was of great uſe in purifying " the air in the lower parts of the ſhip. To this, " and to cleanlineſs, as well in the ſhip as amongſt " the people, too great attention cannot be paid: the " leaſt neglect occaſions a putrid and diſagreeable " ſmell below, which nothing but fires will remove.

" Proper attention was paid to the ſhip's coppers, " ſo that they were kept conſtantly clean.

" The fat, which boiled out of the ſalt beef and " pork, I never ſuffered to be given to the people; " being of opinion that it promotes the ſcurvy.

" I was careful to take in water wherever it was to " be got, even though we did not want it. Becauſe " I look upon freſh water from the ſhore, to be more " wholeſome than that which had been kept ſome " time on board a ſhip. Of this eſſential article we " were never at an allowance, but had always plenty " for every neceſſary purpoſe. Navigators in gene- " ral cannot, indeed, expect, nor would they wiſh " to meet with ſuch advantages in this reſpect, as fell " to my lot. The nature of our voyage carried us " into very high latitudes. But the hardſhips and " dangers inſeparable from that ſituation, were in " ſome degree compenſated by the ſingular felicity " we enjoyed, of extracting inexhauſtible ſupplies of " freſh water from an ocean ſtrewed with ice.

" We came to few places, where either the art of " man, or the bounty of nature, had not provided " ſome ſort of refreſhment or other, either in the " animal or vegetable way. It was my firſt care to " procure whatever of any kind could be met with, " by every means in my power; and to oblige our " people to make uſe thereof, both by my example " and authority; but the benefits ariſing from re- " freſhments of any kind ſoon became ſo obvious, " that I had little occaſion to recommend the one, or " to exert the other (7)." (7) Vol. ii. p. 289—292.

In a letter which Captain Cook wrote to Sir John Pringle, juſt before he embarked on his laſt voyage, dated Plymouth Sound, July 7, 1776, he expreſſed himſelf as follows: " I entirely agree with you, that the " dearneſs of the rob of lemons and of oranges will " hinder them from being furniſhed in large quan- " tities. But I do not think this ſo neceſſary; for, " though they may aſſiſt other things, I have no " great opinion of them alone. Nor have I a higher " opinion of vinegar. My people had it very ſpar- " ingly during the late voyage, and, towards the " latter part, none at all; and yet we experienced " no ill effect from the want of it. The cuſtom of " waſhing the inſide of the ſhip with vinegar, I ſel- " dom obſerved; thinking that fire and ſmoke an- " ſwered the purpoſe much better (8)."

[AA] The ſcientific uſe and value of Captain Cook's Voyage.] Beſide the works which came from authority, Mr. George Forſter publiſhed, in two volumes, quarto, " A Voyage round the World, in his Bri- " tannic Majeſty's ſloop, Reſolution." This appeared in 1777. The next year, Dr. John Reinhold Forſter communicated to the public, in one volume, quarto, " Obſervations made during a Voyage round " the World, on Phyſical Geography, Natural " Hiſtory, and Ethic Philoſophy." It need not be ſaid, that theſe works contain much curious and uſeful information. Mr. George Forſter having been thought to be guilty of ſome miſrepreſentations with regard to certain facts, Mr. Wales wrote remarks upon his book, to which Mr. Forſter replied. As to one or two haſty and premature attempts to gratify the public curioſity, they are not worthy to be noticed.

Though Captain Cook was expected to ſit down in repoſe, after his toils and labours, the deſign of farther diſcoveries was not laid aſide. The illuſion, indeed, of a terra Auſtralis incognita, to any purpoſes of commerce, colonization, and utility, had been diſpelled: but there was another grand queſtion which remained to be determined; and that was the practicability of a northern paſſage to the Pacific Ocean. It had long been a favourite object with navigators, and particularly with the Engliſh, to diſcover a ſhorter, a more commodious, and a more profitable courſe of ſailing to Japan and China, and, indeed, to the Eaſt Indies in general, than by making the tedious circuit of the Cape of Good Hope. To find a weſtern paſſage round North America, had been attempted by ſeveral bold adventurers, from Frobiſher's firſt voyage, in 1576, to thoſe of James and of Fox, in 1631. By theſe expeditions a large addition was made to the knowledge of the northern extent of America, and Hudſon's and Baffin's Bays were diſcovered. But the wiſhed-for paſſage, on that ſide, into the Pacific Ocean, was ſtill unattained. Nor were the various attempts of our countrymen, and of the Dutch, to find ſuch a paſſage, by ſailing round the North of Aſia, in an eaſtern direction, attended with better ſucceſs. Wood's failure, in 1676, appears to have concluded the long liſt of unfortunate expeditions in that century. The diſcovery, if not abſolutely deſpaired of, had been unſucceſsful in ſuch a number of inſtances, that it ceaſed, for many years, to be an object of purſuit (i). The queſtion was again revived in the preſent century. Mr. Dobbs, a warm advocate for the probability of a North-weſt paſſage through Hudſon's Bay, once more recalled the attention of this country to that undertaking. In conſequence of the ſpirit by him excited, Captain Middleton was ſent out by Government in 1741, and Captains Smith and Moore in 1746. But, though an act of Parliament had been paſſed, which ſecured a reward of twenty thouſand pounds to the diſcovery of a paſſage, the accompliſhment of this favourite object continued at as great a diſtance as ever (k). To aſcertain a matter of ſuch importance and magnitude in navigation, was reſerved to be another glory of his preſent Majeſty's reign. The idea was peculiarly ſuited to the enlightened mind of the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty, and he adopted it with ardour. Preparatory to the execution of the deſign, Lord Mulgrave ſailed with two ſhips, to determine how far navigation was practicable towards the North Pole. In this expedition, his Lordſhip met with the ſame inſuperable difficulties which had been experienced by former voyagers. Nevertheleſs, the expectation of opening a communication between the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, by a northerly courſe, was not abandoned; and it was reſolved that a voyage ſhould be undertaken for that purpoſe (l). For the conduct of an enterprize, the operations of which were intended to be ſo new, ſo extenſive, and ſo various, it was evident that great ability, ſkill, and experience were indiſpenſably neceſſary (m). That Captain Cook was of all men the beſt qualified for carrying it into execution, was a matter that could not be called in queſtion. But, however ardently it might be wiſhed that he would take upon him the command of the ſervice, no one (not even his friend and patron, Lord Sandwich himſelf) preſumed to ſolicit him upon the ſubject. The benefits he had already conferred on ſcience and navigation, and the labours and dangers he had gone through, were ſo many and great, that it was not deemed reaſonable to aſk him to engage in freſh perils. At the ſame time, nothing could be more natural than to conſult him upon every thing relative to the buſineſs; and his advice was particularly requeſted with regard to the propereſt perſon for conducting the voyage. To determine this point, the Captain, Sir Hugh Palliſer, and Mr. Stephens were invited to Lord Sandwich's to dinner. Here, beſides taking into conſideration what officer ſhould be recommended to his Majeſty for accompliſhing the purpoſes in view, many things were ſaid concerning the nature of the deſign. Its grandeur and dignity, the conſequences of it to navigation and ſcience, and the completion it would give to the whole ſyſtem of diſcoveries, were enlarged upon in the courſe of the converſation. Captain Cook was ſo fired with the contemplation and repreſentation of the object, that he ſtarted up, and declared, that he himſelf would undertake the direction of the enterprize. It is eaſy to ſuppoſe, with what pleaſure the noble Lord, and the other Gentlemen, received a propoſal which was ſo agreeable to their ſecret wiſhes, and which they thought of the higheſt importance towards attaining the ends of the voyage (n). No time was loſt by the Earl of Sandwich, in laying the matter before the King; and Captain Cook was appointed to the command of the expedition, on the tenth of February, 1776 (o). At the ſame time, it was agreed, that, on his return to England, he ſhould be reſtored to his ſituation at Greenwich; and, if no vacancy occurred during the interval, the officer who ſucceeded him was to reſign in his favour (p).

The command and the direction of the enterprize being thus happily ſettled, it became an object of great importance to determine what might be the beſt courſe that could be given to the voyage. All former navigators round the globe had returned to Europe by the Cape of Good Hope. But to Captain Cook the arduous taſk was now aſſigned of attempting it by reaching the high northern latitudes between Aſia and America; and the adoption of this reſolution was, I believe, the reſult of his own reflections upon the ſubject. The uſual plan, therefore, of diſcovery was reverſed; ſo that inſtead of a paſſage from the Atlantic to the Pacific, one from the latter into the former was to be tried. Whatever openings or inlets there might be on the Eaſt ſide of America, that lie in a direction which could afford any hopes of a paſſage, it was wiſely foreſeen that the ultimate ſucceſs of the expedition would depend upon there being an open ſea between the Weſt ſide of that continent and the extremities of Aſia. Accordingly Captain Cook was ordered to proceed into the Pacific Ocean, through the chain of the new Iſlands which had been viſited by him in the ſouthern tropic. After having croſſed the equator into the northern parts of that ocean, he was then to hold ſuch a courſe as might probably fix many intereſting points in geography, and produce intermediate diſcoveries, in his progreſs northward to the principal ſcene of his operations (q). With regard to his grand object, it was determined, for the wiſeſt reaſons, and after the moſt mature deliberation and enquiry, that upon his arrival on the coaſt of New Albion, he ſhould proceed northward as far as the latitude of 65°, and not loſe any time in exploring rivers or inlets, or upon any other account, until he had gotten into that latitude [BB]. To give every poſſible encouragement to the proſecution of the great deſign in view, the motives of intereſt were added to the obligations of duty. In the act of Parliament which paſſed in 1745, the reward of twenty thouſand pounds had been only held out to the ſhips belonging to any of his Majeſty's ſubjects, while his Majeſty's own ſhips were excluded. Another, and more capital defect of this act was, that it confined the reward to ſuch ſhips alone as ſhould diſcover a paſſage through Hudſon's Bay. By a new law, which paſſed in 1776, both theſe deficiencies were effectually remedied. It was now enacted, "That if any ſhip belonging to any of his "Majeſty's ſubjects, or to his Majeſty, ſhall find out, and ſail through, any paſſage by ſea, "between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, in any direction, or parallel of the northern "hemiſphere, to the northward of the 52° of northern latitude, the owners of ſuch ſhips, "if belonging to any of his Majeſty's ſubjects, or the commander, officers, and ſeamen of "ſuch ſhip belonging to his Majeſty, ſhall receive, as a reward for ſuch diſcovery, the ſum "of twenty thouſand pounds (r)." That every thing might be done which could facilitate the ſucceſs of the grand expedition, Lieutenant Pickerſgill was ſent out, in 1776, with directions to explore the coaſts of Baffin's Bay; and, in the next year, Lieutenant Young was commiſſioned not only to examine the weſtern parts of that bay, but to endeavour to find a paſſage, on that ſide, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. Nothing was performed by either of theſe Gentlemen that promoted the purpoſes of Captain Cook's voyage (s). Two veſſels were fixed upon by Government for the intended ſervice; the Reſolution, and the Diſcovery. The command of the former was given to Captain Cook, and of the other to Captain Clerke. To the Reſolution was aſſigned the ſame complement of officers and men which ſhe had during her preceding voyage; and the only difference in the eſtabliſhment of the Diſcovery from that of the Adventure, was in the ſingle inſtance of her having no marine officer on board.

From the time of the two ſhips being put into commiſſion, the greateſt degree of attention and zeal was exerted by the Earl of Sandwich, and the reſt of the Board of Admiralty, to have them equipped in the moſt complete manner. Both the veſſels were ſupplied with as much of every neceſſary article as could conveniently be ſtowed, and with the beſt of each kind that could be procured. Whatever, likewiſe, the experience of the former voyages had ſhewn to be of any utility in preſerving the health of ſeamen, was provided in a large abundance. That ſome permanent benefit might be conveyed to the inhabitants of Otaheite, and of the other Iſlands of the Pacific Ocean, whom our Navigators might happen to viſit, it was graciouſly commanded by his Majeſty that an aſſortment of uſeful animals ſhould be carried out to thoſe countries. Accordingly, a bull, two cows with their calves, and ſeveral ſheep, with hay and corn for their ſubſiſtence, were taken on board; and it was intended to add other ſerviceable animals to theſe, when Captain Cook ſhould arrive at the Cape of Good Hope. With the ſame benevolent purpoſes, the Captain was furniſhed with a ſufficient quantity of ſuch of our European garden ſeeds, as could not fail of being a valuable preſent to the newly-diſcovered Iſlands, by adding freſh ſupplies of food to their own vegetable productions. By order of the Board of Admiralty, many articles beſides were delivered to our Commander, which were calculated, in various ways, to improve the condition of the natives of the other hemiſphere. Still farther to promote a friendly intercourſe with them, and to carry on a traffic that might be profitable on both ſides, an ample aſſortment was provided of iron tools and trinkets. An attention no leſs humane was extended to the wants of our own people. Some additional clothing, adapted to a cold climate, was ordered for the crews of the two ſhips; and nothing was denied to our Navigators that could be ſuppoſed to be in the leaſt conducive to their health, or even to their convenience. It was not to theſe things only that the extraordinary care of Lord Sandwich, and of the other Gentlemen at the head of the naval department, was confined. They were equally ſolicitous to afford every aſſiſtance that was calculated to render the expedition of publie utility. Several aſtronomical and nautical inſtruments were intruſted, by the Board of Longitude, to Captain Cook, and Mr. King his ſecond Lieutenant; who had undertaken to make the neceſſary obſervations, during the voyage, for the improvement of aſtronomy and navigation. It was originally intended that a profeſſed obſervator ſhould be ſent out in the Reſolution; but the ſcientific abilities of the Captain and his Lieutenant rendered the appointment of ſuch a perſon abſolutely unneceſſary. The caſe was ſomewhat different with regard to the Diſcovery. Mr. W. Bayley, who had already given ſatisfactory proofs of his ſkill and diligence as an Obſervator, while he was employed in Captain Furneaux's ſhip, during the late voyage, was engaged a ſecond time, in that capacity, and appointed to ſail on board Captain Clerke's veſſel. The department of natural hiſtory was aſſigned to Mr. Anderſon, the Surgeon of the Reſolution, who was as willing as he was well qualified, to deſcribe every thing in that branch of ſcience which ſhould occur worthy of notice. From the remarks of this Gentleman, Captain Cook had derived conſiderable aſſiſtance in his laſt navigation; eſpecially with regard to the very copious vocabulary of the language of Otaheite, and the comparative ſpecimen of the languages of the other Iſlands which had then been viſited. There were ſeveral young men among our Commander's ſea officers, who, under his direction could be uſefully employed in conſtructing charts, in taking views of the coaſts and headlands near which our Voyagers might paſs, and in drawing plans of the bays and harbours in which they ſhould anchor. Without a conſtant attention to this object, the Captain was ſenſible that his diſcoveries could not be rendered profitable to future navigators. That he might go out with every help which could ſerve to make the reſult of the voyage entertaining to the generality of readers, as well as inſtructive to the ſailor and the ſcholar, Mr. Webber was fixed upon, and engaged to embark in the Reſolution, for the expreſs purpoſe of ſupplying the unavoidable imperfections of written accounts, by enabling our people to preſerve, and to bring home, ſuch drawings of the moſt memorable ſcenes of their tranſactions, as could only be executed by a profeſſed and ſkilful artiſt. As the laſt mark of the extraordinary attention which the Earl of Sandwich, Sir Hugh Palliſer, and others of the Board of Admiralty had uniformly ſhewn to the preparations for the expedition, they went down to Long Reach, and paid a viſit to the ſhips, on the eighth of June, to examine whether every thing was completed conformably to their intentions and orders, and to the ſatisfaction of all who were to embark in the voyage. His Lordſhip and the reſt of the Admiralty Board, together with ſeveral Noblemen and Gentlemen of their acquaintance, honoured Captain Cook, on that day, with their company at dinner. Both upon their coming on board and their going aſhore, they were ſaluted with ſeventeen guns, and with three cheers. As the ſhips were to touch at Otaheite and the Society Iſlands, it had been determined not to omit the only opportunity which might ever offer of carrying Omai back to his native country. Accordingly, he left London, on the twenty-fourth of June, in company with Captain Cook; and it was with a mixture of regret and ſatisfaction that he took his departure. When England, and thoſe who, during his ſtay, had honoured him with their protection or friendſhip were ſpoken of, his ſpirits were ſenſibly affected, and it was with difficulty that he could refrain from tears. But his eyes began to ſparkle with joy, as ſoon as ever the converſation was turned to his own Iſlands. The good treatment he received in England had made a deep impreſſion upon his mind; and he entertained the higheſt ideas of the country and of the people. Nevertheleſs, the pleaſing proſpect he now had before him of returning home, loaded with what, he well knew, would there be eſteemed invaluable treaſures, and the flattering hope which the poſſeſſion of theſe afforded him of attaining to a diſtinguiſhed ſuperiority among his countrymen, were conſiderations which operated, by degrees, to ſuppreſs every uneaſy ſenſation. By the time he had gotten on board the ſhip, he appeared to be quite happy. His Majeſty had furniſhed Omai with an ample proviſion of every article which our Engliſh Navigators, during their former intercourſe with Otaheite and the Society Iſlands, had obſerved to be in any eſtimation there, either as uſeful or ornamental. Many preſents, likewiſe, of the ſame nature, had been made him by Lord Sandwich, Sir Joſeph Banks, and ſeveral other Gentlemen and Ladies of his acquaintance. In ſhort, both during his reſidence in England, and at his departure from it, no method had been neglected, which could be calculated to render him the inſtrument of conveying to the inhabitants of the Iſlands of the Pacific Ocean, the moſt exalted ideas of the greatneſs and generoſity of the Britiſh nation (t).

(t) Cook's Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, vol. i. p. 2—7.

Every preparation for the voyage being completed, Captain Cook received an order to proceed to Plymouth, and to take the Diſcovery under his command. Having, accordingly, given the proper directions to Captain Clerke, he ſailed from the Nore to the Downs, on the twenty-fifth of June. On the thirtieth of the ſame month, he anchored in Plymouth Sound, where the Diſcovery was already arrived. It was the eighth of July before our Commander received his inſtructions for the voyage; and, at the ſame time, he was ordered to proceed, with the Reſolution, to the Cape of Good Hope. Captain Clerke, who was detained in London by ſome unavoidable circumſtances, was to follow, as ſoon as he ſhould join his ſhip. In the evening of the twelfth, Captain Cook ſtood out of Plymouth Sound,

Sound, and purſued his courſe down the channel. It was very early that he began his judicious operations for preſerving the health of his crew; for, on the ſeventeenth, the ſhip was ſmoked between the decks with gunpowder, and the ſpare ſails were well aired. On the thirtieth, the moon being totally eclipſed, the Captain obſerved it with a night teleſcope. He had not, on this occaſion, an opportunity of making many obſervations. The reaſon was, that the moon was hidden behind the clouds the greater part of the time; and this was particularly the caſe, when the beginning and the end of total darkneſs, and the end of the eclipſe, happened. It being found that there was not hay and corn ſufficient for the ſubſiſtence of the ſtock of animals on board, till the arrival of our people at the Cape of Good Hope, Captain Cook determined to touch at Teneriffe. This Iſland he thought better adapted to the purpoſes of procuring theſe articles, and other refreſhments, than Madeira. On the firſt of Auguſt, he anchored in the road of Santa Cruz, and immediately diſpatched an officer to the Governor, who, with the utmoſt politeneſs, granted every thing which our Commander requeſted. Were a judgment to be formed from the appearance of the country in the neighbourhood of Santa Cruz, it might be concluded that Teneriffe is ſo barren a ſpot, as to be inſufficient for the maintenance even of its own inhabitants. It was proved, however, by the ample ſupplies which our Navigators received, that the Iſlanders had enough to ſpare for viſiters. The neceſſary articles of refreſhment were procured at ſuch moderate prices, as to confirm Captain Cook in his opinion, that Teneriffe is a more eligible place than Madeira, for ſhips to touch at which are bound on long voyages. Indeed, the wine of the latter Iſland is far ſuperior to that of the former; but then it can only be purchaſed by a ſum of money proportionally larger. During the ſhort ſtay which the Captain made at Teneriffe, he continued with great aſſiduity his aſtronomical obſervations; and Mr. Anderſon has not a little contributed to the farther knowledge of the country, by his remarks on its general ſtate, its natural appearances, its productions, and its inhabitants. He learned from a ſenſible and well-informed Gentleman, who reſided in the Iſland, that a ſhrub is common there, which agrees exactly with the deſcription given by Tournefort and Linnæus, of the tea-ſhrub, as growing in China and Japan. It is reckoned a weed, and every year is rooted out in large quantities from the vineyards. The Spaniards, however, ſometimes uſe it as tea, and aſcribe to it all the qualities of that which is imported from China. They give it alſo the name of tea, and ſay that it was found in the country when the Iſlands were firſt diſcovered. Another botanical curioſity is called the impregnated lemon; which is a perfect and diſtinct lemon, encloſed within another, and differing from the outer one only in being a little more globular. The air and climate of Teneriffe are, in general, remarkably healthful, and particularly adapted to give relief in pulmonary complaints. This the Gentleman before-mentioned endeavoured to account for from its being always in a perſon's power to procure a different temperature of the air, by reſiding at different heights in the Iſland. He expreſſed, therefore, his ſurprize that the phyſicians of England ſhould never have thought of ſending their conſumptive patients to Teneriffe, inſtead of Nice or Liſbon. Although it is not underſtood that there is any great ſimilarity between the manners of the Engliſh and thoſe of the Spaniards, it was obſervable, that the difference between them was very little perceived by Omai. He only ſaid, that the Spaniards did not appear to be ſo friendly as the Engliſh; and that, in their perſons, they approached to ſome reſemblance of his own countrymen (u). On the fourth, Captain Cook ſailed from Teneriffe, and proceeded on his voyage. Such was his attention, both to the diſcipline and the health of his company, that twice in the ſpace of five days, he exerciſed them at great guns and ſmall arms, and cleared and ſmoaked the ſhip below decks. On the evening of the tenth, when the Reſolution was at a ſmall diſtance from the Iſland of Bonaviſta, ſhe ran ſo cloſe upon a number of ſunken rocks, that ſhe did but juſt weather the breakers. The ſituation of our Voyagers, for a few minutes, was very alarming. In this ſituation the Captain, with the intrepid coolneſs which diſtinguiſhed his character, did not chooſe to ſound, as that, without any poſſibility of leſſening, might have heightened the danger. While our Commander was near the Cape de Verde Iſlands, he had an opportunity of correcting an aſſertion of Mr. Nichelſon's, with regard to the manner of ſailing by thoſe Iſlands, which, if implicitly truſted to, might prove of dangerous conſequence. On the thirteenth, our Navigators arrived before Port Praya, in the Iſland of St. Jago; but as the Diſcovery was not there, and little water had been expended in the paſſage from Teneriffe, Captain Cook did not think proper to go in; but ſtood to the ſouthward. In the courſe of the voyage, between the latitudes of 12° and 7° North, the weather was generally dark and gloomy. The rains were frequent, and accompanied with that cloſe and ſultry weather which too often brings on ſickneſs, in this paſſage. At ſuch a time the worſt conſequences are to be apprehended; and commanders of ſhips cannot be too much upon their guard. It is neceſſary for them to purify the air between decks with fires and ſmoke, and to oblige their people to dry their clothes at every opportunity. The conſtant obſervance of theſe precautions on board the Reſolution, was attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that the Captain had now fewer ſick men than on either of his former voyages. This was the more remarkable, as, in conſequence of the ſeams of the veſſel having opened ſo wide as to admit the rain

when it fell, there was ſcarcely a man who could lie dry in his bed; and the officers in the gun-room were all driven out of their cabbins by the water that came through the ſides. When ſettled weather returned, the caulkers were employed in repairing theſe defects, by caulking the decks and inſide weather-works of the ſhip; for the humanity of our Commander would not truſt the workmen over the ſides, while the Reſolution was at ſea. On the firſt of September, our Navigators croſſed the equator (w). While, on the eighth, Captain Cook was near the eaſtern coaſt of Brazil, he was at conſiderable pains to ſettle its longitude, which, till ſome better aſtronomical obſervations are made on ſhore in that country, he concluded to be thirty-five degrees and a half, or thirty-ſix degrees Weſt, at moſt. As our people proceeded on their voyage, they frequently ſaw, in the night, thoſe luminous marine animals which have formerly been mentioned and deſcribed. Some of them appeared to be conſiderably larger than any which the Captain had met with before; and ſometimes they were ſo numerous, that hundreds of them were viſible at the ſame moment.

(w) This was in the longitude of 27° 38′ Weſt.

On the eighteenth of October, the Reſolution came to an anchor in Table Bay, at the Cape of Good Hope; and the uſual compliments having been paid to Baron Plettenberg the Governor, Captain Cook immediately applied himſelf to his cuſtomary operations. Nothing remarkable occurred till the evening of the thirty-firſt, when a tempeſt aroſe from the South-eaſt, which laſted three days, and which was ſo violent, that the Reſolution was the only ſhip in the bay that rode out the gale without dragging her anchors. The effects of the ſtorm were ſenſibly felt by our people on ſhore; for their tents and obſervatory were torn to pieces, and their aſtronomical quadrant narrowly eſcaped irreparable damage. On the third of November, the tempeſt ceaſed, and the next day the Engliſh were enabled to reſume their different employments. It was not till the tenth of the month that Captain Cook had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the Diſcovery arrive in the bay, and effect her junction with the Reſolution. She had ſailed from England on the firſt of Auguſt, and would have reached the Cape of Good Hope a week ſooner, if ſhe had not been driven from the coaſt by the late ſtorm. Every aſſiſtance was immediately given to put her into a proper condition for proceeding on the voyage. While the neceſſary preparations for the future navigation were completing, a diſaſter happened with regard to the cattle which had been carried out in the Reſolution. They had been conveyed on ſhore for the purpoſe of grazing. The bull, and two cows, with their calves, had been ſent to graze along with ſome other cattle; but Captain Cook was adviſed to keep the ſheep, which were ſixteen in number, cloſe to the tents, where they were penned up every evening. During the night preceding the fourteenth, ſome dogs having gotten in among them, forced them out of the pen, killed four, and diſperſed the reſt. Six of them were recovered the next day; but the two rams, and two of the fineſt ewes in the whole flock, were amongſt thoſe which were miſſing. Baron Plettenberg being at this time in the country, our Commander applied to Mr. Hemmy, the Lieutenant Governor, and to the fiſcal, for redreſs; and both theſe Gentlemen promiſed to uſe their endeavours for the recovery of the loſt ſheep. It is the boaſt of the Dutch, that the Police at the Cape is ſo carefully executed, that it is ſcarcely poſſible for a ſlave, with all his cunning and knowledge of the country, to effectuate his eſcape. Nevertheleſs, Captain Cook's ſheep evaded all the vigilance of the fiſcal's officers and people. At length, after much trouble and expence, by employing ſome of the meaneſt and loweſt ſcoundrels in the place, he recovered all but the two ewes, of which he never could hear the leaſt tidings. The character given of the fellows to whom the Captain was obliged to have recourſe, by the perſon who recommended their being applied to, was, that for a ducatoon they would cut their Maſter's throat, burn the houſe over his head, and bury him and the whole family in the aſhes. During the ſtay of our Voyagers at the Cape, ſome of the officers, accompanied by Mr. Anderſon, made a ſhort excurſion into the neighbouring country. This Gentleman, as uſual, was very diligent in recording every thing which appeared to him worthy of obſervation. His remarks, however, in the preſent caſe, will be deemed of little conſequence, compared with the full, accurate, and curious account of the Cape of Good Hope, with which Dr. Sparrman hath lately favoured the literary world. With reſpect to Captain Cook, beſides the unavoidable care which lay upon him, in providing his ſhips with whatever was requiſite for the commodious and ſucceſsful proſecution of the voyage, his attention was eminently directed to ſcientific objects. He was anxious to aſcertain the currents, the variations of the compaſs, and the latitude and longitude of the places to which he came. The obſervations which he collected, and recorded in his journal, while he was at the Cape of Good Hope, will be eſteemed of the greateſt importance by judicious navigators (x). After the diſaſter which had happened to the ſheep, it may well be ſuppoſed that our Commander did not long truſt on ſhore thoſe which remained. Accordingly, he gave orders to have them, and the other cattle, conveyed on board as faſt as poſſible. He made an addition, alſo, to the original ſtock, by the purchaſe of two young bulls, two heifers, two young ſtone-horſes, two mares, two rams, ſeveral ewes and goats, and ſome rabbits and poultry. All theſe animals were intended for New Zealand, Otaheite, and the neighbouring Iſlands; and, indeed, for any other places, in the courſe of the voyage, where the leaving of any of them might be of ſervice ſervice to poſterity. In the ſupplies which were provided at the Cape, Captain Cook paid a particular regard to the nature and extent of his undertaking. As it was impoſſible to tell when, or where, he might meet with a place which could ſo amply contribute to his neceſſities, he thought proper to lay in ſuch a ſtore of proviſions for both ſhips, as would be ſufficient to laſt them for two years and upwards.

(x) Cook's Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 29—50.

Our Commander having given a copy of his inſtructions to Captain Clerke, and an order directing him how to proceed in caſe of a ſeparation, weighed from Table Bay on the thirtieth of November, though it was not till the third of December that he got clear of the land. On the ſixth, the ſhips paſſed through ſeveral ſpots of water, nearly of a red colour. When ſome of this was taken up, it was found to contain a large quantity of ſmall animals, of a reddiſh hue, and which the microſcope diſcovered to reſemble a cray-fiſh. As our Navigators purſued their courſe to the South-eaſt, a very ſtrong gale, which they had from the weſtward, was followed by a mountainous ſea, in conſequence of which the Reſolution rolled and tumbled ſo much, that the cattle on board were preſerved with the utmoſt difficulty. Soon after, ſeveral of the goats, eſpecially the males, together with ſome ſheep, died, notwithſtanding all the care to prevent it that was exerciſed by our people. This misfortune was chiefly owing to the coldneſs of the weather, which now began to be felt in the moſt ſenſible manner. On the twelfth, land was ſeen, which, upon a nearer approach, was found to conſiſt of two Iſlands. That which lies moſt to the South, and is the largeſt, was judged by Captain Cook to be about fifteen leagues in circuit. The northerly one is about nine leagues in circuit; and the two Iſlands are at the diſtance of five leagues from each other (y). As the ſhips paſſed through the channel between them, our Voyagers could not diſcover, with the aſſiſtance of their beſt glaſſes, either tree or ſhrub on either of them. They ſeemed to have a rocky and bold ſhore, and their ſurface is for the moſt part compoſed of barren mountains, the ſummits and ſides of which were covered with ſnow. Theſe two Iſlands, together with four others, which lie from nine to twelve degrees of longitude more to the Eaſt, and nearly in the ſame latitude, had been diſcovered by Captains Marion du Freſne, and Crozet, French navigators, in January 1772, on their paſſage, in two ſhips, from the Cape of Good Hope to the Philippine Iſlands. As no names had been aſſigned to them in a chart of the Southern Ocean, which Captain Crozet communicated to Captain Cook in 1775, our Commander diſtinguiſhed the two larger ones by calling them PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLANDS, after his Majeſty's fourth ſon. To the other four, with a view of commemorating the diſcoverers, he gave name of MARION'S and CROZET'S ISLANDS. Though it was now the middle of ſummer in this hemiſphere, the weather was not leſs ſevere than what is generally met with in England in the very depth of winter. Inſtead, however, of being diſcouraged by this circumſtance, the Captain ſhaped his courſe in ſuch a manner as to paſs to the ſouthward of Marion's and Crozet's Iſlands, that he might get into the latitude of land which had been diſcovered by Monſieur de Kerguelen, another French navigator. It was part of our Commander's inſtructions to examine whether a good harbour might not here be found. As our Voyagers, on the twenty-fourth, were ſteering to the eaſtward, a fog clearing up a little, which had involved them for ſome time, and which had rendered their navigation both tedious and dangerous, land was ſeen, bearing South-ſouth-eaſt. Upon a nearer approach, it was found to be an Iſland of conſiderable height, and about three leagues in circuit. Another Iſland, of the ſame magnitude, was ſoon after diſcovered, and in a ſhort ſpace a third, beſides ſome ſmaller ones. At times, as the fog broke away, there was the appearance of land over the ſmall Iſlands, and Captain Cook entertained thoughts of ſteering for it, by running in between them. But, on drawing nearer, he found that, ſo long as the weather continued foggy, this would be a perilous attempt. For if there ſhould be no paſſage, or if our people ſhould meet with any ſudden danger, there was ſuch a prodigious ſea, breaking on all the ſhores in a frightful ſurf, that it would have been impoſſible for the veſſels to be gotten off. At the ſame time, the Captain ſaw another Iſland; and, as he did not know how many more might ſucceed, he judged it prudent, in order to avoid getting entangled among unknown lands in a thick fog, to wait for clearer weather. The Iſland laſt mentioned is a high round rock, which was named BLIGH'S CAP (z). Our Commander had received ſome very ſlight information concerning it at Teneriffe, and his ſagacity in tracing it was ſuch as immediately led him to determine that it was the ſame that Monſieur de Kerguelen had called the Iſle of Rendezvous. His reaſon for giving it that name is not very apparent; for nothing can rendezvous upon it but fowls of the air, it being certainly inacceſſible to every other animal. The weather beginning to clear up, Captain Cook ſteered in for the land, of which a faint view had been obtained in the morning. This was Kerguelen's Land. No ſooner had our Navigators gotten off Cape François, than they obſerved the coaſt, to the ſouthward, to be much indented by projecting points and bays; from which circumſtance they were ſure of finding a good harbour. Accordingly, ſuch a harbour was ſpeedily diſcovered, in which the ſhips came to an anchor on the twenty-fifth, being Chriſtmas Day. Upon landing, our Commander found the ſhore almoſt entirely covered with penguins and other birds, and with ſeals. The latter, which were not numerous, having been unaccuſtomed to viſiters, were ſo inſenſible of (y) The largeſt Iſland lies in latitude 46° 53′ South, and in longitude 37° 46′ Eaſt; and the ſmaller one in latitude 46° 4′ South, and in 38° 8′ Eaſt longitude.

(z) The latitude of Bligh's Cap is 48° 29′ South, and its longitude 68° 40′ Eaſt.

fear, that as many as were wanted, for the purpoſe of making uſe of their fat or blubber, were killed without difficulty. Freſh water was ſo plentiful, that every gully afforded a large ſtream; but not a ſingle tree or ſhrub, or the leaſt ſign of it, could be met with, and but very little herbage of any ſort. Before Captain Cook returned to his ſhip, he aſcended the firſt ridge of rocks, that riſe in a kind of amphitheatre, above one another, in hopes of obtaining a view of the country; in which, however, he was diſappointed; for, previouſly to his reaching the top, there came on ſo thick a fog, that he could ſcarcely find his way down again. In the evening, the ſeine was hauled at the head of the harbour, but only half a dozen ſmall fiſh were caught. As no better ſucceſs attended a trial which was made the next day with hook and line, the only reſource for freſh proviſion was in birds, the ſtore of which was inexhauſtible. The people having wrought hard for two days, and nearly completed their water, the Captain allowed them the twenty-ſeventh, as a day of reſt, to celebrate Chriſtmas. Many of them, in conſequence of this indulgence, went on ſhore, and made excurſions, in different directions, into the country, which they found barren and deſolate in the higheſt degree. One of them, in his ramble, diſcovered, and brought to our Commander, in the evening, a quart bottle, faſtened with ſome wire to a projecting rock on the North ſide of the harbour. This bottle contained a piece of parchment, on which was written the following inſcription:

Ludovico XV. Galliarum rege et d. (a) de Boynes regi a Secretis ad Res maritimas annis 1772 et 1773.

(a) The (d) is doubtleſs a contraction for the word Dominus. Monſieur de Boynes was then the Secretary of the French Marine.

It was clear, from this inſcription, that our Engliſh Navigators were not the firſt who had been in the place. As a memorial of our people's having touched at the ſame harbour, Captain Cook wrote, as follows, on the other ſide of the parchment:

Naves Reſolution et Diſcovery
de Rege Magnæ Britanniæ, Decembris 1776.

He then put it again into a bottle, together with a ſilver two-penny piece of 1772. Having covered the mouth of the bottle with a leaden cap, he placed it, the next morning, in a pile of ſtones erected for the purpoſe, upon a little eminence on the North ſhore of the harbour, and near to the place where it was firſt found. In this poſition it cannot eſcape the notice of any European, whom accident or deſign may bring into the port. Here the Captain diſplayed the Britiſh flag, and named the place CHRISTMAS HARBOUR, from our Voyagers having arrived in it on that feſtival. After our Commander had finiſhed the buſineſs of the inſcription, he went in his boat round the harbour, to examine what the ſhore afforded. His more particular object was to look for drift-wood; but he did not find a ſingle piece throughout the whole extent of the place. On the ſame day, accompanied by Mr. King, his ſecond Lieutenant, he went upon Cape François, with the hope, that, from this elevation, he might obtain a view of the ſea-coaſt, and of the adjoining Iſlands. But when he had gotten up, he found that every diſtant object below him was obſcured in a thick fog. The land on the ſame plain, or of a greater height, was ſufficiently viſible, and appeared naked and deſolate in the higheſt degree; ſome hills to the ſouthward excepted, which were covered with ſnow. On the twenty-ninth, Captain Cook departed from Chriſtmas Harbour, and proceeded to range along the coaſt, with a view of diſcovering its poſition and extent. In purſuing his courſe, he met with ſeveral promontories and bays, together with a peninſula, all of which he has deſcribed and named, chiefly in honour of his various friends. Such was the danger of the navigation, that the ſhips had more than once a very narrow eſcape. On the ſame day, another harbour was diſcovered, in which the veſſels came to an anchor for one night. Here the Captain, Mr. Gore, and Mr. Bayley went on ſhore, to examine the country, which they found, if poſſible, more barren and deſolate than the land that lies about Chriſtmas harbour: and yet, if the leaſt fertility were any where to be expected, it ought to have exiſted in this place, which is completely ſheltered from the bleak and predominating ſoutherly and weſterly winds. Our Commander obſerved, with regret, that there was neither food nor covering for cattle of any ſort; and that, if he left any, they muſt inevitably periſh. Finding no encouragement to continue his reſearches, he weighed anchor and put to ſea on the thirtieth, having given to the harbour the name of PORT PALLISER (b). On the ſame day he came to a point, which proved to be the very eaſtern extremity of Kerguelen's Land (c). In a large bay, near this point, there was a prodigious quantity of ſea-weed, ſome of which is of a moſt extraordinary length. It ſeemed to be ſame kind of vegetable production that Sir Joſeph Banks had formerly diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of Fucus Giganteus. Although the ſtem is

(b) It is ſituated in the latitude of 49° 3′ South, and the longitude of 69° 37′ Eaſt.

(c) This point, which Captain Cook called Cape Digby, is ſituated in the latitude of 49° 23′ South, and the longitude of 70° 34′ Eaſt.

is not much thicker than a man's hand, Capt. Cook thought himſelf well warranted to ſay, that the length of part of it grows to ſixty fathoms and upward. The reſult of the examination of Kerguelen's Land was, that the quantity of latitude which it occupies doth not much exceed one degree and a quarter. Its extent, from Eaſt to Weſt, ſtill remains undecided. At its firſt diſcovery, it was probably ſuppoſed to belong to a ſouthern continent; but, in fact, it is an Iſland, and that of no great extent (d). If our Commander had not been unwilling to deprive Monſieur Kerguelen of the honour of its bearing his name, he would have been diſpoſed, from its ſterility, to call it the Iſland of Deſolation. It ſhould here be mentioned, that Monſieur de Kerguelen made two viſits to the coaſt of this country; one in 1772, and another in 1773. With the firſt of theſe voyages Captain Cook had only a very ſlight acquaintance, and to the ſecond he was totally a ſtranger; ſo that he ſcarcely had any opportunity of comparing his own diſcoveries with thoſe of the French Navigator. Monſieur de Kerguelen was peculiarly unfortunate, in having done but little to complete what he had begun; for though he diſcovered a new land, he could not, in two expeditions to it, once bring his ſhips to an anchor upon any part of its coaſts. Captain Cook had either fewer difficulties to ſtruggle with, or was more ſucceſsful in ſurmounting them. During the ſhort time in which our Voyagers lay in Chriſtmas Harbour, Mr. Anderſon loſt no opportunity of ſearching the country in every direction. Perhaps no place, hitherto diſcovered, under the ſame parallel of latitude, affords ſo ſcanty a field for a natural hiſtorian. All that could be known in the ſpace of time allotted him, and probably all that will ever be worthy to be known, was collected by this Gentleman. A verdure, which had been ſeen at a little diſtance from the ſhore, gave our people the flattering expectation of meeting with a variety of herbage: but in this they were greatly deceived. On landing, it was perceived that the lively colour which had impoſed upon them, was occaſioned only by one ſmall plant, not unlike ſome ſorts of Saxifrage. It grows in large ſpreading tufts, a conſiderable way up the hills. The whole catalogue of plants does not exceed ſixteen or eighteen, including ſeveral kinds of moſs, and a beautiful ſpecies of lichen, which riſes higher up from the rocks than the reſt of the vegetable productions. There is not the appearance of a ſhrub in the whole country. Nature has been ſomewhat more bountiful in furniſhing it with animals; though, ſtrictly ſpeaking, they are not inhabitants of the place, being all of the marine kind. In general, the land is only uſed by them for breeding, and as a reſting-place. Of theſe animals the moſt conſiderable are ſeals; being of that ſort which is called the Urſine Seal. The birds, which have already been mentioned as very numerous, chiefly conſiſt of penguins, ducks, petrels, albatroſſes, ſhags, gulls and ſea ſwallows. Penguins, which are far ſuperior in number to the reſt, are of three kinds, one of which had never been ſeen by any of our Voyagers before. The rocks, or foundations of the hills, are principally compoſed of that dark blue, and very hard ſtone, which ſeems to be one of the moſt univerſal productions of nature. Nothing was diſcovered that had the leaſt appearance of ore or metal (e).

(d) Kerguelen, who was acquainted with nearly fourſcore leagues of its coaſt, ſays, that he has reaſon to believe that it is about two hundred leagues in circuit.

From this deſolate coaſt Captain Cook took his departure on the thirty-firſt, intending, agreeably to his inſtructions, to touch next at New Zealand; that he might obtain a recruit of water, take in wood, and make hay for the cattle. Their number was now conſiderably diminiſhed; for two young bulls, one of the heifers, two rams, and ſeveral of the goats, had died while our Navigators were employed in exploring Kerguelen's Land. For ſome time they had freſh gales, and tolerably clear weather. But on the third of January, 1777, the wind veered to the North, where it continued eight days, and was attended with ſo thick a fog, that the ſhips ran above three hundred leagues in the dark. Occaſionally the weather would clear up, and give our people a ſight of the ſun; but this happened very ſeldom, and was always of ſhort continuance. However, amidſt all the darkneſs produced by the fog, the veſſels, though they ſeldom ſaw each other, were ſo fortunate, in conſequence of frequently firing guns as ſignals, that they did not loſe company. On the twelfth, the northerly winds ended in a calm (f). This was ſucceeded, in a little time, by a wind from the ſouthward, which brought on a rain, that continued for twenty-four hours. At the end of the rain, the wind freſhened, and veering to the Weſt and North-weſt, was followed by fair and clear weather. Nothing very remarkable occurred to our Voyagers till the twenty-fourth, when they diſcovered the coaſt of Van Diemen's Land; and, on the twenty-ſixth, the ſhips came to an anchor in Adventure Bay. Captain Cook, as ſoon as he had anchored, ordered the boats to be hoiſted out; in one of which he went himſelf, to look for the moſt commodious place for obtaining the neceſſary ſupplies. Wood and water were found in abundance, and in places ſufficiently convenient; but graſs, which was moſt wanted, was ſcarce, and, at the ſame time, very coarſe. Neceſſity, however, obliged our people to take up with ſuch as could be procured. On the twenty-eighth, the Engliſh who were employed in cutting wood were agreeably ſurprized with a viſit from ſome of the natives. They conſiſted of eight men and a boy, who approached our Voyagers not only without fear, but with the moſt perfect confidence and freedom. There was only a ſingle perſon among them who had any thing which bore the leaſt appearance of a weapon, and that was no more than a ſtick about two feet long, and pointed at one end. Theſe people were quite naked, and wore no kind of ornaments; unleſs unleſs ſome large punctures or ridges raiſed in different parts of their bodies, either in ſtrait or curved lines, may be conſidered in that light. Moſt of them had their hair and beards ſmeared with a red ointment; and the faces of ſome of them were painted with the ſame compoſition. Every preſent which Captain Cook made them they received without the leaſt appearance of ſatisfaction. Of bread and elephant fiſh, which were offered them, they refuſed to taſte, but ſhewed that they were fond of birds as an article of food. Two pigs, which the Captain had brought on ſhore, having come within their reach, they ſeized them by the ears, as a dog would have done, and would have carried them off immediately, apparently with no other intention than to kill them. Our Commander being deſirous of knowing the uſe of the ſtick which one of the Indians had in his hands, he ſignified, by ſigns, his wiſhes to that purpoſe. His intimations ſo far ſucceeded, that one of them ſet up a piece of wood as a mark, and threw at it, at the diſtance of about twenty yards. There was but little reaſon to commend his dexterity; for, after repeated trials, he was ſtill very wide from his object. Omai, to convince the natives how much our weapons were ſuperior to theirs, then fired his muſquet at the mark, by which they were ſo greatly terrified, that, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the Engliſh to quiet their minds, they ran inſtantly into the woods. After the retreat of the Indians, Captain Cook, judging that their fears would prevent their remaining near enough to obſerve what paſſed, ordered the two pigs, being a boar and a ſow, to be carried about a mile within the head of the bay, and ſaw them left there, by the ſide of a freſh-water brook. It was, at firſt, his benevolent intention to make an additional preſent to Van Diemen's Land, of a young bull and cow, together with ſome ſheep and goats. But, upon reflection, he laid aſide this deſign; being perſuaded that the natives would deſtroy them, from their incapacity of entering into his views with regard to the improvement of their country. As pigs are animals which ſoon become wild, and are fond of the thickeſt cover of the woods, there was the greater probability of their being preſerved. For the accommodation of the other cattle an open place muſt have been choſen; in which ſituation they could not poſſibly have been concealed many days. On the twenty-ninth, about twenty of the inhabitants, men and boys, joined Captain Cook and ſuch of his people as had landed with him, without manifeſting the leaſt ſign of fear or diſtruſt. It was remarkable, that one of the Indians was conſpicuouſly deformed; nor was he more diſtinguiſhed by the hump upon his back, than by the drollery of his geſtures, and the humour of his ſpeeches, which had the appearance of being intended for the entertainment of our Voyagers. Unfortunately, the language in which he ſpake to them was wholly unintelligible. To each of the preſent group the Captain gave a ſtring of beads and a medal, which they ſeemed to receive with ſome ſatisfaction. On iron, and on iron tools, they appeared to ſet no value. There was reaſon to believe that they were even ignorant of fiſh-hooks; and yet it is difficult to ſuppoſe that a people who inhabit a ſea-coaſt, and who were not obſerved to derive any part of their ſuſtenance from the productions of the ground, ſhould be unacquainted with ſome mode of catching fiſh. However, they were never ſeen to be thus employed; nor was any canoe or veſſel diſcovered by which they could go upon the water. Though they had rejected the kind of fiſh which had been offered them, it was evident that ſhell-fiſh made a part of their food. After Captain Cook had left the ſhore, ſeveral women and children made their appearance, and were introduced to Lieutenant King by ſome of the men that attended them. Theſe females (a Kangooroo ſkin excepted, which was tied over their ſhoulders, and ſeemed to be intended to ſupport their infants) were as naked and as black as the men, and had their bodies marked with ſcars in the ſame manner. Many of the children had fine features, and were thought to be pretty; but a leſs favourable report was made of the women, and eſpecially of thoſe who were advanced in years. Some of the Gentlemen, however, belonging to the Diſcovery, as our Commander was informed, paid their addreſſes, and made liberal offers of preſents, which were rejected with great diſdain. It is certain that this gallantry was not very agreeable to the men: for an elderly man, as ſoon as he obſerved it, ordered the women to retire. The order was obeyed; but, on the part of ſome of the females, with the appearance of a little reluctance. On the preſent occaſion, Captain Cook made ſome proper and pertinent reflections, which I ſhall deliver in his own words. "This conduct," ſays he, "of Europeans among Savages, to their "women, is highly blameable; as it creates a jealouſy in their men, that may be attended "with conſequences fatal to the ſucceſs of the common enterprize, and to the whole body "of adventurers, without advancing the private purpoſe of the individual, or enabling "him to gain the object of his wiſhes. I believe it has generally been found, amongſt "uncivilized people, that where the women are eaſy of acceſs, the men are the firſt to "offer them to ſtrangers; and that, where this is not the caſe, neither the allurement of "preſents, nor the opportunity of privacy, will be likely to have the deſired effect. This "obſervation, I am ſure, will hold good throughout all the parts of the South Sea where "I have been. Why then ſhould men act ſo abſurd a part, as to riſk their own ſafety, "and that of all their companions, in purſuit of a gratification which they have no proba-"bility of obtaining?" While our Navigators were at Van Diemen's Land, they were ſucceſsful in obtaining a plentiful crop of graſs for their cattle, and ſuch as was far more excellent than what they had met with at their firſt going on ſhore. The quantity collected was judged by the Captain to be ſufficient to laſt till his arrival in New Zealand. Van Diemen's Land had been viſited twice before. That name had been given it by Taſman, who diſcovered it in 1642; from which time it had eſcaped all notice of European Navigators, till Captain Furneaux touched at it in 1773. It is well known, that it is the ſouthern point of New Holland, which is by far the largeſt Iſland in the world; indeed, ſo large an Iſland as almoſt to deſerve the appellation of a continent. While Captain Cook was at this country, he neglected nothing which could promote the knowledge of ſcience and navigation. Here, as every where elſe, he ſettled the latitude and longitude of places (g); marked the variations of the compaſs, and recorded the nature of the tides. He corrected, likewiſe, an error of Captain Furneaux, with reſpect to the ſituation of Maria's Iſlands; on which ſubject he hath candidly remarked, that his own idea is not the reſult of a more faithful, but merely of a ſecond examination. Mr. Anderſon, during the few days in which the ſhips remained in Adventure Bay, exerted his uſual diligence in collecting as full an account as could be obtained, in ſo ſhort a period of time, of the natural productions and the inhabitants of the country. Little can be ſaid concerning either the perſonal activity or genius of the natives. The firſt they do not ſeem to poſſeſs in any remarkable degree; and, to all appearance, they have leſs of the laſt than even the half-animated inhabitants of Terra del Fuego. Their not expreſſing that ſurprize which might have been expected, from their ſeeing men ſo much unlike themſelves, and things to which they had hitherto been utter ſtrangers; their indifference for the preſents of our people; and their general inattention; were ſufficient teſtimonies that they were not endued with any acuteneſs of underſtanding. What the ancient poets tell us of Fauns and Satyrs living in hollow trees, is realized at Van Diemen's Land. Some wretched conſtructions of ſticks covered with bark, and which did not deſerve the name of huts, were indeed found near the ſhore; but theſe ſeemed only to have been erected for temporary purpoſes. The moſt comfortable habitations of the natives were afforded by the largeſt trees. Theſe had their trunks hollowed out by fire, to the height of ſix or ſeven feet; and there was room enough in them for three or four perſons to ſit round a hearth, made of clay. At the ſame time, theſe places of ſhelter are durable; for the people take care to leave one ſide of the tree ſound, which is ſufficient to keep it in luxuriant growth. The inhabitants of Van Diemen's Land are undoubtedly from the ſame ſtock with thoſe of the northern parts of New Holland. Their language, indeed, appeared to be different; but how far the difference extended, our Voyagers could not have an opportunity of determining. With regard to the New Hollanders in general, there is reaſon to ſuppoſe, that they originally came from the ſame place with all the Indians of the South Sea (h).

(g) Adventure Bay is in the latitude of 43° 21′ 20″ South, and in the longitude of 147° 29′ Eaſt.

(h) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 91—116.

On the thirtieth of January, 1777, Captain Cook ſailed from Adventure Bay, and on the twelfth of February came to an anchor at his old ſtation of Queen Charlotte's Sound, in New Zealand. Being unwilling to loſe any time, he commenced his operations that very afternoon. By his order, ſeveral of the empty water caſks were immediately landed, and a place was begun to be cleared for ſetting up the two obſervatories, and the erection of tents to accommodate a guard, and the reſt of the company, whoſe buſineſs might require them to remain on ſhore. Our Navigators had not long been at anchor, before a number of canoes, filled with natives, came alongſide of the ſhips. However, very few of them would venture on board; which appeared the more extraordinary, as the Captain was well known to them all, and they could not be inſenſible how liberally he had behaved to them on former occaſions. There was one man in particular, whom he had treated with remarkable kindneſs, during the whole of his laſt ſtay in this place; and yet, neither profeſſions of friendſhip, nor preſents, could prevail upon him to enter the Reſolution. There was a real cauſe for this ſhyneſs on the part of the New Zealanders. A dreadful event had happened to ſome of Captain Furneaux's crew, while he lay in Queen Charlotte's Sound, after he had finally ſeparated from Captain Cook, in the former voyage. Ten men, who had been ſent out in the large cutter to gather wild greens for the ſhip's company, were killed in a ſkirmiſh with the natives. What was the cauſe of the quarrel could not be aſcertained, as not one of the company ſurvived to relate the ſtory. Lieutenant Burney, who was ordered to go in ſearch of them, found only ſome fragments of their bodies, from which it appeared, that they had been converted into the food of the inhabitants. It was the remembrance of this event, and the fear of its being revenged, which now rendered the New Zealanders ſo fearful of entering the Engliſh veſſels. From the converſation of Omai, who was on board the Adventure when the melancholy affair happened, they knew that it could not be unknown to Captain Cook. The Captain, therefore, judged it neceſſary, to uſe every endeavour to aſſure them of the continuance of his friendſhip, and that he ſhould not diſturb them on account of the cataſtrophe. It was moſt probably in conſequence of this aſſurance, that they ſoon laid aſide all manner of reſtraint and diſtruſt. In the mean while, the operations for refitting the ſhips, and for obtaining proviſions, were carried on with great vigour. For the protection of the party on ſhore, our Commander appointed a guard of ten marines, and ordered arms for all the workmen; with whom Mr. King, and two or three petty officers, conſtantly remained. A boat was never ſent to a conſiderable diſtance without being armed, or without being under the direction of ſuch officers as might be depended upon, and who were well acquainted with the natives. In Captain Cook's former viſits to this country, he had never made uſe of ſuch precautions; nor was he now convinced of their abſolute neceſſity. But, after the tragical fate of the crew of the Adventure's boat in this ſound, and of Captain Marion du Freſne, and ſome of his people, in the Bay of Iſlands (in 1772), it was impoſſible to free our Navigators from all apprehenſions of experiencing a ſimilar calamity. Whatever ſuſpicions the inhabitants might at firſt entertain, that their acts of barbarity would be revenged, they very ſpeedily became ſo perfectly eaſy upon the ſubject, as to take up their reſidence cloſe to our Voyagers; and the advantage of their coming to live with the Engliſh was not inconſiderable. Every day, when the weather would permit, ſome of them went out to catch fiſh, and our people generally obtained, by exchanges, a good ſhare of the produce of their labours, in addition to the ſupply which was afforded by our own nets and lines. Nor was there a deficiency of vegetable refreſhments; to which was united ſpruce-beer for drink; ſo that if the ſeeds of the ſcurvy had been contracted by any of the crew, they would ſpeedily have been removed by ſuch a regimen. The fact, however, was, that there were only two invalids upon the ſick liſts in both ſhips. Curioſities, fiſh, and women were the articles of commerce ſupplied by the New Zealanders. The two firſt always came to a good market; but the latter did not happen, at this time, to be an acceptable commodity. Our ſeamen had conceived a diſlike to theſe people, and were either unwilling or afraid to aſſociate with them; the good effect of which was, that our Commander knew no inſtance of a man's quitting his ſtation, to go to the habitations of the Indians. A connection with women it was out of Captain Cook's power to prevent; but he never encouraged it, and always was fearful of its conſequences. Many, indeed, are of opinion, that ſuch an intercourſe is a great ſecurity among ſavages. But if this ſhould ever be the caſe with thoſe who remain and ſettle among them, it is generally otherwiſe with reſpect to travellers and tranſient viſiters. In ſuch a ſituation as was that of our Navigators, a connection with the women of the natives betrays more men than it ſaves. "What elſe," ſays the Captain, "can reaſonably be expected, ſince all their views are ſelfiſh, without the leaſt "mixture of regard or attachment? My own experience, at leaſt, which hath been pretty "extenſive, hath not pointed out to me one inſtance to the contrary." Amongſt the perſons who occaſionally viſited the Engliſh, was a Chief of the name of Kahoora, who, as Captain Cook was informed, had headed the party that cut off Captain Furneaux's people, and had himſelf killed Mr. Rowe, the officer who commanded. This man our Commander was ſtrongly ſolicited to put to death, even by ſome of the natives; and Omai was particularly eager and violent upon the ſubject. To theſe ſolicitations the Captain paid not the leaſt degree of attention. He even admired Kahoora's courage, and was not a little pleaſed with the confidence with which he had put himſelf into his power. Kahoora had placed his whole ſafety in the declarations that Captain Cook had uniformly made to the New Zealanders; which were, that he had always been a friend to them all, and would continue to be ſo, unleſs they gave him cauſe to act otherwiſe; that as to their inhuman treatment of our people, he ſhould think no more of it, the tranſaction having happened long ago, and when he was not preſent; but that, if ever they made a ſecond attempt of the ſame kind, they might reſt aſſured of feeling the weight of his reſentment. While our Commander, on the ſixteenth, was making an excurſion for the purpoſe of collecting food for his cattle, he embraced the opportunity to enquire, as accurately as poſſible, into the circumſtances which had attended the melancholy fate of our countrymen. Omai was his interpreter on this occaſion. The reſult of the enquiry was, that the quarrel firſt took its riſe from ſome thefts, in the commiſſion of which the natives were detected; that there was no premeditated plan of bloodſhed; and that if theſe thefts had not, unfortunately, been too haſtily reſented, no miſchief would have happened. Kahoora's greateſt enemies, and even the very men that had moſt earneſtly ſolicited his deſtruction, confeſſed, at the ſame time, that he had no intention of quarrelling with Captain Furneaux's people, and much leſs of killing any of them, till the fray had actually commenced. Captain Cook continued, in this his laſt viſit to New Zealand, the ſolicitude he had formerly ſhewn to be of ſome eſſential future ſervice to the country. To one Chief he gave two goats, a male and female, with a kid; and to another two pigs, a boar and a ſow. Although he obtained a promiſe from both theſe Chiefs, that they would not kill the animals which had been preſented to them, he could not venture to place any great reliance upon their aſſurances. It was his full intention, on his preſent arrival in Queen Charlotte's Sound, to have left not only goats and hogs, but ſheep, together with a young bull and two heifers. The accompliſhment, however, of this reſolution depended either upon his finding a Chief who was powerful enough to protect and keep the cattle, or upon his meeting with a place where there might be a probability of their being concealed from thoſe who would ignorantly attempt to deſtroy them. Neither of theſe circumſtances happened to be conformable to his wiſhes. At different times he had left in New Zealand ten or a dozen hogs, beſides thoſe which had been put on ſhore by Captain Furneaux. It will, therefore, be a little extraordinary, if this race of animals ſhould not increaſe and be preſerved either in a wild or a domeſtic ſtate, or in both. Our Commander was informed, that Tiratou, a popular Chief among the natives, had a number of cocks and hens, and one ſow, in his ſeparate poſſeſſion. With regard to the gardens which had formerly been planted, though they had almoſt entirely been neglected, and ſome of them deſtroyed, they were not wholly unproductive. They were found to contain cabbages, onions, leeks, purſlain, radiſhes, muſtard, and a few potatoes. The potatoes, which had firſt been brought from the Cape of Good Hope, were greatly meliorated by change of ſoil; and, with proper cultivation, would be ſuperior to thoſe produced in moſt other countries. A great addition of knowledge was obtained, during this voyage, with reſpect to the productions of New Zealand, and the manners and cuſtoms of its inhabitants. The zeal of Captain Cook upon the ſubject was admirably ſeconded by the ſedulous diligence of Mr. Anderſon, who omitted no opportunity of collecting every kind and degree of information. I ſhall only ſo far treſpaſs on the patience of my readers, as to mention a few circumſtances tending to delineate the character of the natives. They ſeem to be a people perfectly ſatisfied with the little they already poſſeſs; nor are they remarkably curious either in their obſervations or their enquiries. New objects are ſo far from ſtriking them with ſuch a degree of ſurprize as might naturally be expected, that they ſcarcely fix their attention even for a moment. In the arts with which they are acquainted, they ſhew as much ingenuity, both in invention and execution, as any uncivilized nations under ſimilar circumſtances. Without the leaſt uſe of thoſe tools which are formed of metal, they make every thing that is neceſſary to procure their ſubſiſtence, clothing, and military weapons; and all this is done by them with a neatneſs, a ſtrength, and a convenience that are well adapted to the accompliſhment of the ſeveral purpoſes they have in view. No people can have a quicker ſenſe of an injury done to them than the New Zealanders, or be more ready to reſent it: and yet they want one characteriſtic of true bravery; for they will take an opportunity of being inſolent when they think that there is no danger of their being puniſhed. From the number of their weapons, and their dexterity in uſing them, it appears that war is their principal profeſſion. Indeed, their public contentions are ſo frequent, or rather ſo perpetual, that they muſt live under continual apprehenſions of being deſtroyed by each other. From their horrid cuſtom of eating the fleſh of their enemies, not only without reluctance, but with peculiar ſatisfaction, it would be natural to ſuppoſe that they muſt be deſtitute of every humane feeling, even with regard to their own party. This, however, is not the caſe: for they lament the loſs of their friends with a violence of expreſſion which argues the moſt tender remembrance of them. At a very early age, the children are initiated into all the practices, whether good or bad, of their fathers; ſo that a boy or girl, when only nine or ten years old, can perform the motions, and imitate the frightful geſtures, by which the more aged are accuſtomed to inſpire their enemies with terror. They can keep, likewiſe, the ſtricteſt time in their ſong; and it is with ſome degree of melody that they ſing the traditions of their forefathers, their actions in war, and other ſubjects. The military atchievements of their anceſtors the New Zealanders celebrate with the higheſt pleaſure, and ſpend much of their time in diverſions of this ſort, and in playing upon a muſical inſtrument, which partakes of the nature of a flute. With reſpect to their language, it is far from being harſh or diſagreeable, though the pronunciation of it is frequently guttural; nor, if we may judge from the melody of ſome kinds of their ſongs, is it deſtitute of thoſe qualities which fit it to be aſſociated with muſic. Of its identity with the languages of the other Iſlands throughout the South Sea freſh proofs were exhibited during the preſent voyage. At the requeſt of Omai, Captain Cook conſented to take with him two youths from New Zealand. That they might not quit their native country under any deluding ideas of viſiting it again, the Captain took care to inform their parents, in the ſtrongeſt terms, that they would never return. This declaration ſeemed, however, to make no kind of impreſſion. The father of the youngeſt lad reſigned him with an indifference which he would ſcarcely have ſhewn at parting with his dog, and even ſtripped the boy of the little clothing he poſſeſſed, delivering him quite naked into the hands of our voyagers. This was not the caſe with the mother of the other youth. She took her leave of him with all the marks of tender affection that might be expected between a parent and a child on ſuch an occaſion; but ſhe ſoon reſumed her chearfulneſs, and went away wholly unconcerned (i).

(i) Cook's Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 118—163.

On the twenty-fifth of the month, Captain Cook ſtood out of Queen Charlotte's Sound, and by the twenty-ſeventh got clear of New Zealand. No ſooner had the ſhips loſt ſight of the land, than the two young adventurers from that country, one of whom was nearly eighteen years of age, and the other about ten, began deeply to repent of the ſtep they had taken. It was the experience of the ſea-ſickneſs which gave this turn to their reflections; and all the ſoothing encouragement the Engliſh could think of, was but of little avail. They wept, both in public and in private, and made their lamentation in a kind of ſong, that ſeemed to be expreſſive of the praiſes of their country and people, from which they were to be ſeparated for ever. In this diſpoſition they continued for many days: but as their ſea-ſickneſs wore off, and the tumult of their minds ſubſided, the fits of lamentation became leſs and leſs frequent, and at length entirely ceaſed. By degrees, their native country country and their friends were forgotten, and they appeared to be as firmly attached to our Navigators as if they had been born in England. In the profecution of the voyage, Captain Cook met with unfavourable winds; and it was not till the twenty-ninth of March that land was difcovered. It was found to be an inhabited Iſland, the name of which, as was learned from two of the natives, who came off in a canoe, is Mangeea. Our Commander examined the coaſt with his boats, and had a ſhort intercourſe with ſome of the inhabitants. Not being able to find a proper harbour for bringing the ſhips to an anchorage, he was obliged to leave the country unviſited, though it ſeemed capable of ſupplying all the wants of our Voyagers. The Iſland of Mangeea is full five leagues in circuit, and of a moderate and pretty equal height (k). It has, upon the whole, a pleaſing aſpect, and might be made a beautiful ſpot by cultivation. The inhabitants, who appeared to be both numerous and well fed, ſeemed to reſemble thoſe of Otaheite and the Marqueſas in the beauty of their perſons; and the reſemblance, as far as could be judged in ſo ſhort a compaſs of time, takes place with reſpect to their general diſpoſition and character. From the coaſt of Mangeea our Commander ſailed in the afternoon of the thirtieth, and on the next day land was again ſeen, within four leagues of which the ſhips arrived on the firſt of April. Our people could then pronounce it to be an Iſland, nearly of the ſame appearance and extent with that which had ſo lately been left. Some of the natives ſpeedily put off in their canoes, and three of them were perſuaded to come on board the Reſolution; on which occaſion, their whole behaviour marked that they were quite at their eaſe, and felt no kind of apprehenſion that they ſhould be detained, or ill uſed. In a viſit from ſeveral others of the inhabitants, they manifeſted a dread of approaching near the cows and horſes; nor could they form the leaſt conception of their nature. But the ſheep and goats did not, in their opinion, ſurpaſs the limits of their ideas; for they gave our Navigators to underſtand that they knew them to be birds. As there is not the moſt diſtant reſemblance between a ſheep or goat, and any winged animal, this may be thought to be almoſt an incredible example of human ignorance. But it ſhould be remembered, that, excepting hogs, dogs, and birds, theſe people were ſtrangers to the exiſtence of any other land animals. In a farther intercourſe with the natives, who had brought a hog, together with ſome plantains and cocoa-nuts, they demanded a dog from our Voyagers, and refuſed every thing beſides which was offered in exchange. One of the Gentlemen on board happened to have a dog and a bitch, which were great nuiſances in the ſhip; and theſe he might now have diſpoſed of in a manner that would have been of real future utility to the Iſland. But he had no ſuch views in making them the companions of his voyage. Omai, however, with a good-nature that reflects honour upon him, parted with a favourite dog which he had brought from England; and with this acquiſition the people departed highly ſatisfied. On the third of April, Captain Cook diſpatched Mr. Gore, with three boats, to endeavour to get upon the Iſland. Mr. Gore himſelf, Omai, Mr. Anderſon, and Mr. Burney, were the only perſons that landed. The tranſactions of the day, of which Mr. Anderſon drew up an ingenious and entertaining account, added to the ſtock of knowledge gained by our Navigators, but did not accompliſh Captain Cook's principal object. Nothing was procured by the Gentlemen, from the Iſland, that ſupplied the wants of the ſhips. In this expedition, Omai diſplayed that turn for exaggeration, with which travellers have ſo frequently been charged. Being aſked by the natives concerning the Engliſh, their ſhips, their country, and the arms they made uſe of, his anſwers were not a little marvellous. He told theſe people that our country had ſhips as large as their Iſland; on board of which were inſtruments of war (deſcribing our guns) of ſuch dimenſions, that ſeveral perſons might ſit within them. At the ſame time, he aſſured the inhabitants that one of theſe guns was ſufficient to cruſh their whole Iſland at a ſingle ſhot. Though he was obliged to acknowledge that the guns on board the veſſels upon their coaſt were but ſmall, he contrived, by an exploſion of gunpowder, to inſpire them with a formidable idea of their nature and effect. It is probable that this repreſentation of things contributed to the preſervation of the Gentlemen, in their enterprize on ſhore; for a ſtrong diſpoſition to retain them had been ſhewn by the natives. It ſeemed deſtined that this day ſhould give Omai more occaſions than one of bearing a principal part in its tranſactions. The Iſland, though never viſited by Europeans before, happened to have other ſtrangers reſiding in it; and it was entirely owing to Omai's having attended on the expedition, that a circumſtance ſo curious came to the knowledge of the Engliſh. Scarcely had he been landed upon the beach, when he found, among the crowd which had aſſembled there, three of his own countrymen, natives of the Society Iſlands. That at the diſtance of about two hundred leagues from thoſe Iſlands, an immenſe, unknown ocean intervening, with the wretched boats their inhabitants are known to make uſe of, and fit only for a paſſage where ſight of land is ſcarcely ever loſt, ſuch a meeting, at ſuch a place, ſo accidentally viſited, ſhould occur, may well be regarded as one of thoſe unexpected ſituations, with which the writers of feigned adventures love to ſurprize their readers. When events of this kind really happen in common life, they deſerve to be recorded for their ſingularity. It may eaſily be ſuppoſed with what mutual ſurprize and ſatisfaction this interview of Omai with his countrymen was attended. Twelve years before, about twenty perſons in number, of both ſexes, had had embarked on board a canoe at Otaheite, to croſs over to the neighbouring Iſland of Ulietea. A violent ſtorm having ariſen, which drove them out of their courſe, and their proviſions being very ſcanty, they ſuffered incredible hardſhips, and the greateſt part of them periſhed by famine and fatigue. Four men only ſurvived, when the boat overſet, and then the deſtruction of this ſmall remnant appeared to be inevitable. However, they kept hanging by the ſide of the veſſel, which they continued to do for ſome days, when they were providentially brought within ſight of the people of this Iſland, who immediately ſent out canoes, and brought them on ſhore. The three men who now ſurvived, expreſſed a ſtrong ſenſe of the kind treatment they had received; and ſo well ſatisfied were they with their preſent ſituation, that they refuſed an offer which was made them of being conveyed to their native country. A very important inſtruction may be derived from the preceding narrative. It will ſerve to explain, better than a thouſand conjectures of ſpeculative reaſoners, how the detached parts of the earth, and, in particular, how the Iſlands of the South Sea though lying remote from any inhabited continent, or from each other, may have originally been peopled. Similar adventures have occurred in the hiſtory of navigation and ſhipwrecks. The Iſland on which Meſſieurs Gore, Anderſon, Burney, and Omai, had landed, is called Wateeoo by the natives, and is a beautiful ſpot, having a ſurface compoſed of hills and plains, which are covered with a verdure rendered extremely pleaſant by the diverſity of its hues (l). Its inhabitants are very numerous; and many of the young men were perfect models in ſhape; beſides which, they had complexions as delicate as thoſe of the women, and appeared to be equally amiable in their diſpoſitions. In their manners, their general habits of life, and their religious ceremonies and opinions, theſe Iſlanders have a near reſemblance to the people of Otaheite and its neighbouring iſles; and their language was well underſtood, both by Omai and the two New Zealanders. The next place viſited by Captain Cook was a ſmall Iſland, called Wennooa ette, or Otakootaia (m), to which Mr. Gore was ſent, at the head of a party, who procured about a hundred cocoa-nuts for each ſhip, and ſome graſs, together with a quantity of the leaves and branches of young trees, for the cattle. Though, at this time, no inhabitants were found in Wennooa-ette, yet, as there remained indubitable marks of its being, at leaſt, occaſionally frequented, Mr. Gore left a hatchet, and ſeveral nails, to the full value of what had been taken away. On the fifth, our Commander directed his courſe for Harvey's Iſland, which was only at the diſtance of fifteen leagues, and where he hoped to procure ſome refreſhments. This Iſland had been diſcovered by him, in 1773, during his laſt voyage, when no traces were diſcerned of its having any inhabitants. It was now experienced to be well peopled, and by a race of men who appeared to differ much, both in perſon and diſpoſition, from the natives of Wateeoo. Their behaviour was diſorderly and clamorous; their colour was of a deeper caſt; and ſeveral of them had a fierce and rugged aſpect. It was remarkable, that not one of them had adopted the practice, ſo generally prevalent among the people of the Southern Ocean, of puncturing or tatooing their bodies. But, notwithſtanding this ſingularity, the moſt unequivocal proofs were exhibited of their having the ſame common origin; and their language, in particular, approached ſtill nearer to the dialect of Otaheite, than that of Wateeoo, or Mangeea. No anchorage for the ſhips being found in Harvey's Iſland, Captain Cook quitted it without delay.

The Captain being thus diſappointed at all the Iſlands he had met with, ſince his leaving New Zealand, and his progreſs having unavoidably been retarded by unfavourable winds, and other unforeſeen circumſtances, it became impoſſible to think of doing any thing this year in the high latitudes of the northern hemiſphere, from which he was ſtill at ſo great a diſtance, though the ſeaſon for his operations there was already begun. In this ſituation, it was abſolutely neceſſary, in the firſt place, to purſue ſuch meaſures as were moſt likely to preſerve the cattle that were on board. A ſtill more capital object was to ſave the ſtores and proviſions of the ſhips, that he might the better be enabled to proſecute his diſcoveries to the North, which could not now be commenced till a year later than was originally intended. If he had been ſo fortunate as to have procured a ſupply of water, and of graſs, at any of the Iſlands he had lately viſited, it was his purpoſe to have ſtood back to the South, till he had met with a weſterly wind. But the certain conſequence of doing this, without ſuch a ſupply, would have been the loſs of all the cattle; while, at the ſame time, not a ſingle advantage would have been gained with regard to the grand ends of the voyage. He determined, therefore, to bear away for the Friendly Iſlands, where he was ſure of being abundantly provided. In purſuing his courſe, agreeably to this reſolution, our Commander, on the fourteenth, reached Palmerſton Iſland, where, and at a neighbouring Iſlot, both of which were uninhabited, ſome little relief was obtained. The boats ſoon procured a load of ſcurvy-graſs and young cocoa-nut trees, which was a feaſt for the cattle; and the ſame feaſt, with the addition of palm-cabbage, and the tender branches of the Wharra tree, was continued for ſeveral days. On the ſixteenth, Omai, being on ſhore with the Captain, caught, with a ſcoop-net, in a very ſhort time, as much fiſh as ſerved the whole party for dinner, beſides ſending a quantity to both the ſhips. Birds, too, and particularly men-of-war and tropic birds, were plentifully obtained; ſo that our Navigators had ſumptuous entertainment. Omai acted as cook upon the occaſion. The fiſh and the birds he dreſſed with heated ſtones, after the manner of his country; and performed the operation with a dexterity and good humour which were greatly to his credit. From the Iſlot before mentioned, twelve hundred cocoa-nuts were procured, which, being equally divided among the crew, were of great uſe to them, both on account of the juice and the kernel. There is no water in the Iſlots which are comprehended under the name of Palmerſton Iſland. If that article could be obtained, and good anchorage could be accompliſhed within the reef, Captain Cook would prefer this Iſland to any of the uninhabited ones, for the mere purpoſe of refreſhment. The quantity of fiſh that might be caught, would be ſufficient; and a ſhip's company could roam about, unmoleſted by the petulance of the inhabitants. Different opinions have been entertained concerning the formation of the low Iſlands in the great ocean. From the obſervations which our Commander now made, he was convinced that ſuch Iſlands are formed from ſhoals, or coral banks, and, conſequently, that they are always increaſing. His reaſons for embracing this hypotheſis, are related by him, in his Voyage, with his uſual good ſenſe and ſagacity.

After leaving Palmerſton's Iſland, Captain Cook ſteered to the Weſt, with a view of making the beſt of his way to Annamooka. During his courſe, the ſhowers were ſo copious, that our Navigators ſaved a conſiderable quantity of water. Finding that a greater ſupply could be obtained by the rain, in one hour, than could be gotten by diſtillation in a month, the Captain laid aſide the ſtill, as a thing which was attended with more trouble than profit. At this time, the united heat and moiſture of the weather, in addition to the impoſſibility of keeping the ſhips dry, threatened to be noxious to the health of our people. It was, however, remarkable, that neither the conſtant uſe of ſalt food, nor the viciſſitudes of climate, were productive of any evil effects. Though the only material refreſhment our Voyagers had received, ſince their leaving the Cape of Good Hope, was that which they had procured at New Zealand, there was not, as yet, a ſingle ſick perſon on board. This happy ſituation of things was undoubtedly owing to the unremitting attention of our Commander, in ſeeing that no circumſtance was neglected which could contribute to the preſervation of the health of his company (n). On the twenty-eighth of April, Captain Cook touched at the Iſland of Komango; and, on the firſt of May, he arrived at Annamooka. The ſtation he took was the very ſame which he had occupied when he viſited the country three years before; and it was probably, almoſt in the ſame place where Taſman, the firſt diſcoverer of this and ſome of the neighbouring Iſlands, anchored in 1643. A friendly intercourſe was immediately opened with the natives, and every thing was ſettled to the Captain's ſatisfaction. He received the greateſt civilities from Toobou, the Chief of Annamooka; and Taipa, a Chief from the Iſland of Komango, attached himſelf to the Engliſh in ſo extraordinary a manner, that, in order to be near them in the night, as well as in the day, he had a houſe brought on men's ſhoulders, a full quarter of a mile, and placed cloſe to the ſhed which was occupied by our party on ſhore. On the ſixth, our Commander was viſited by a great Chief from Tongataboo, whoſe name was Feenou, and who was falſely repreſented, by Tapia, to be the King of all the Friendly Iſles. The only interruption to the harmony which ſubſiſted between our people and the natives of Annamooka, aroſe from the thieviſh diſpoſition of many of the inhabitants. They afforded frequent opportunities of remarking how expert they were in the buſineſs of ſtealing. Even ſome of the Chiefs did not think the profeſſion unbecoming their dignity. One of them was detected in carrying a bolt out of the ſhip, concealed under his clothes; for which Captain Cook ſentenced him to receive a dozen laſhes, and kept him confined till he had paid a hog for his liberty. After this act of juſtice, our Navigators were no longer troubled with thieves of rank: but their ſervants, or ſlaves, were ſtill employed in the dirty work; and upon them a flogging ſeemed to make no greater impreſſion than it would have done upon the main-maſt. When any of them happened to be caught in the act, ſo far were their maſters from interceding in their favour, that they often adviſed our Gentlemen to kill them. This, however, being a puniſhment too ſevere to be inflicted, they generally eſcaped without being puniſhed at all; for of the ſhame, as well as of the pain of corporal chaſtiſement, they appeared to be equally inſenſible. At length, Captain Clerke invented a mode of treatment, which was thought to be productive of ſome good effect. He put the thieves into the hands of the barber, and completely ſhaved their heads. In conſequence of this operation, they became objects of ridicule to their own countrymen; and our people, by keeping them at a diſtance, were enabled to deprive them of future opportunities for a repetition of their rogueries.

The Iſland of Annamooka being exhauſted of its articles of food, Captain Cook propoſed, on the eleventh, to proceed directly for Tongataboo. From this reſolution, however, he was diverted, at the inſtance of Feenou, who warmly recommended, in preference to it, an Iſland, or rather a group of Iſlands, called Hapaee, lying to the North-eaſt. There, he aſſured our Voyagers, they could be plentifully ſupplied with every refreſhment, in the eaſieſt manner; and he enforced his advice by engaging to attend them thither in perſon. Accordingly, Hapaee was made choice of for the next ſtation; and the examination of it became an object with the Captain, as it had never been viſited by any European ſhips. On the ſeventeenth, our Commander arrived at Hapaee, where he met with a moſt friendly reception from the inhabitants, and from Earoupa, the Chief of the Iſland. During the whole ſtay of our Navigators, the time was ſpent in a reciprocation of preſents, civilities, and ſolemnities. On the part of the natives were diſplayed ſingle combats with clubs, wreſtling and boxing matches, female combatants, dances performed by men, and night entertainments of ſinging and dancing. The Engliſh, on the other hand, gave pleaſure to the Indians by exerciſing the Marines, and excited their aſtoniſhment by the exhibition of fire works. After curioſity had, on both ſides, been ſufficiently gratified, Captain Cook applied himſelf to the examination of Hapaee, Lefooga, and other neighbouring Iſlands. As the ſhips were returning, on the thirty-firſt, from theſe Iſlands to Annamooka, the Reſolution was very near running full upon a low ſandy Iſle, called Pootoo Pootooa, ſurrounded with breakers. It fortunately happened, that the men had juſt been ordered upon deck to put the veſſel about, and were moſt of them at their ſtations; ſo that the neceſſary movements were executed not only with judgment, but alſo with alertneſs. This alone ſaved the ſhip and her company from deſtruction. "Such hazardous ſituations," ſays the Captain, "are the unavoidable companions of the man who goes upon a voyage of "diſcovery." During our Commander's expedition to Hapaee, he was introduced to Poulaho, the real King of the Friendly Iſles; in whoſe preſence it inſtantly appeared how groundleſs had been Feenou's pretenſions to that character. Feenou, however, was a Chief of great note and influence. By Poulaho Captain Cook was invited to paſs over to Tongataboo, which requeſt he complied with, after he had touched, for two or three days, at Annamooka. In the paſſage, the Reſolution was inſenſibly drawn upon a large flat, on which lay innumerable coral rocks, of different depths, below the ſurface of the water. Notwithſtanding all the care and attention of our people to keep her clear of them, they could not prevent her from ſtriking on one of theſe rocks. The ſame event happened to the Diſcovery; but fortunately, neither of the ſhips ſtuck faſt, or received any damage. On the tenth of June, Captain Cook arrived at Tongataboo, where the King was waiting for him upon the beach, and immediately conducted him to a ſmall, but neat houſe, which, he was told, was at his ſervice, during his ſtay in the Iſland. The houſe was ſituated a little within the ſkirts of the woods, and had a fine large area before it; ſo that a more agreeable ſpot could not have been provided. Our Commander's arrival at Tongataboo was followed by a ſucceſſion of entertainments, ſimilar to thoſe which had occurred at Hapaee, though ſomewhat diverſified in circumſtances, and exhibited with additional ſplendour. The pleaſure, however, of the viſit was occaſionally interrupted by the thieveries of many of the inhabitants. Nothing could prevent their plundering our Voyagers, in every quarter; and they did it in the moſt daring and inſolent manner. There was ſcarcely any thing which they did not attempt to ſteal; and yet, as the crowd was always great, the Captain would not permit the centinels to fire, leſt the innocent ſhould ſuffer with the guilty. Captain Cook, on the nineteenth, made a diſtribution of the animals which he had ſelected as preſents for the principal men of the Iſland. To Poulaho, the King, he gave a young Engliſh bull and cow, together with three goats; to Mareewagee, a Chief of conſequence, a Cape ram and two ewes [CC]; and to Feenou a horſe and a mare. Omai, at the ſame time, was inſtructed to repreſent the importance of theſe animals, and to explain, as far as he was capable of doing it, the manner in which they ſhould be preſerved and treated. Even the generoſity of the Captain was not without its inconveniences. It ſoon appeared that ſome were diſſatisfied with the allotment of the animals; for, next morning, two kids and two turkey-cocks were miſſing. As our Commander could not ſuppoſe that this was an accidental loſs, he determined to have them again. The firſt ſtep he took was to ſeize on three canoes that happened to be alongſide the ſhips; after which, he went on ſhore, and having found the King, his brother, Feenou, and ſome other Chiefs, he immediately put a guard over them, and gave them to underſtand, that they muſt remain under reſtraint till not only the kid and the turkeys, but the reſt of the things which, at different times, had been ſtolen from our Voyagers, ſhould be reſtored. This bold ſtep of Captain Cook was attended with a very good effect. Some of the articles which had been loſt were inſtantly brought back, and ſuch good aſſurances were given with regard to the remainder, that, in the afternoon, the Chiefs were releaſed. It was a happy circumſtance, with reſpect to this tranſaction, that it did not abate the future confidence of Poulaho and his friends in the Captain's kind and generous treatment. On the fifth of July was an eclipſe of the ſun, which, however, in conſequence of unfavourable weather, was very imperfectly obſerved. Happily, the diſappointment was of little conſequence, as the longitude was more than ſufficiently determined by lunar obſervations (o). Captain Cook ſailed from Tongataboo on the tenth, and, two days after, came to an anchor at the Iſland of Middleburgh, or Eooa, as it is called by the inhabitants. Here he was immediately viſited by Taoofa, the Chief,

(o) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 225—328.

[CC] A Cape ram and two ewes.] As none of the natives took the leaſt notice or care of the three ſheep allotted to Mareewagee, Captain Cook afterwards ordered them to be carried back to the ſhips. Beſides the animals above-mentioned, he left in the Iſland a young boar, and three young ſows, of the Engliſh breed; and two rabbits, a buck and a doe.

with

with whom he had formerly been acquainted. The intercourſe now renewed was friendly in the higheſt degree, both with Taoofa and the reſt of the natives; and our Commander endeavoured to meliorate their condition by planting a pine-apple, and ſowing the ſeeds of melons, and other vegetables, in the Chief's plantation. To this he was encouraged by a proof that his paſt endeavours had not been wholly unſucceſsful. He had, one day, ſerved up to him at his dinner, a diſh of turnips, being the produce of the ſeeds which he had left at Eooa in his laſt voyage.

The ſtay which Captain Cook made at the Friendly Iſlands was between two and three months; during which time, ſome accidental differences excepted, there ſubſiſted the utmoſt cordiality between the Engliſh and the natives. Theſe differences were never attended with any fatal conſequences; which happy circumſtance was principally owing to the unremitting attention of the Captain, who directed all his meaſures with a view to the prevention of ſuch quarrels as would be injurious either to the inhabitants or to his own people. So long as our Navigators ſtayed at the Iſlands, they expended very little of their ſea proviſions, ſubſiſting, in general, upon the produce of the country, and carrying away with them a quantity of refreſhments ſufficient to laſt till their arrival at another ſtation, where they could depend upon a freſh ſupply. It was a ſingular pleaſure to our Commander, that he poſſeſſed an opportunity of adding to the happineſs of theſe good Indians, by the uſeful animals which he left among them. Upon the whole, the advantages of having touched at the Friendly Iſlands were very great; and Captain Cook reflected upon it with peculiar ſatisfaction, that theſe advantages were obtained without retarding, for a ſingle moment, the proſecution of the great object of his voyage; the ſeaſon for proceeding to the North having been previouſly loſt. Beſides the immediate benefits which both the natives and the Engliſh derived from their mutual intercourſe on the preſent occaſion, ſuch a large addition was now made to the geographical knowledge of this part of the Pacific Ocean, as may render no ſmall ſervice to future navigators. Under the denomination of the Friendly Iſlands, muſt be included not only the group at Hapaee, but all thoſe Iſlands that have been diſcovered nearly under the ſame meridian, to the North, as well as ſome others, which, though they have never hitherto been ſeen by any European voyagers, are under the dominion of Tongataboo. From the information which our Commander received, it appears that this Archipelago is very extenſive. Above one hundred and fifty Iſlands were reckoned up by the natives, who made uſe of bits of leaves to aſcertain their number; and Mr. Anderſon, with his uſual diligence, procured all their names. Fifteen of them are ſaid to be high or hilly, and thirty-five of them large. Concerning the ſize of the thirty-two which were unexplored, it can only be mentioned, that they muſt be larger than Annamooka, which was ranked amongſt the ſmaller Iſles. Several, indeed, of thoſe which belong to this latter denomination, are mere ſpots, without inhabitants. Sixty-one of theſe Iſles have their proper places and names marked upon the chart of the Friendly Iſlands, and the ſketch of the harbour of Tongabatoo, which are given in the Voyage. Captain Cook had not the leaſt doubt but that Prince William's Iſlands, diſcovered and ſo named by Taſman, were comprehended in the liſt furniſhed by the natives. He had alſo good authority for believing, that Keppel's and Boſcawen's Iſlands, two of Captain Wallis's diſcoveries in 1765, were included in the ſame liſt; and that they were under the ſovereignty of Tongataboo, which is the grand ſeat of government. It muſt be left to future navigators to extend the geography of this part of the South Pacific Ocean, by aſcertaining the exact ſituation and ſize of nearly a hundred Iſlands, in the neighbourhood, which our Commander had no opportunity of exploring. During the preſent viſit to the Friendly Iſlands, large additions were made to the knowledge which was obtained, in the laſt voyage, of the natural hiſtory and productions of the country, and the manners and cuſtoms of its inhabitants. Though it does not fall within the plan of this narrative to enter into a detail of the particulars recorded, I cannot help taking notice of the explanation which Captain Cook has given of the thieviſh diſpoſition of the natives. It is an explanation which reflects honour upon his ſagacity, humanity, and candour; and therefore I ſhall relate it in his own words: "The only defect," ſays he, "ſullying their "character, that we know of, is a propenſity to thieving; to which we found thoſe of all "ages, and both ſexes, addicted; and to an uncommon degree. It ſhould, however, be "conſidered, that this exceptionable part of their conduct ſeemed to exiſt merely with "reſpect to us; for, in their general intercourſe with one another, I had reaſon to be of "opinion, that thefts do not happen more frequently (perhaps leſs ſo) than in other "countries, the diſhoneſt practices of whoſe worthleſs individuals are not ſuppoſed to "authorize any indiſcriminate cenſure on the whole body of the people. Great allowances "ſhould be made for the foibles of theſe poor natives of the Pacific Ocean, whoſe minds "we overpowered with the glare of objects, equally new to them as they were captivating. "Stealing, among the civilized nations of the world, may well be conſidered as denoting "a character deeply ſtained with moral turpitude, with avarice unreſtrained by the known "rules of right, and with profligacy producing extreme indigence, and neglecting the "means of relieving it. But at the Friendly and other Iſlands which we viſited, the thefts, "ſo frequently committed by the natives, of what we had brought along with us, may " be fairly traced to leſs culpable motives. They ſeemed to ariſe ſolely from an intenſe " curioſity or deſire to poſſeſs ſomething which they had not been accuſtomed to before, " and belonging to a ſort of people ſo different from themſelves. And, perhaps, if it were " poſſible, that a ſet of beings, ſeemingly as ſuperior in our judgment, as we are in theirs, " ſhould appear amongſt us, it might be doubted, whether our natural regard to juſtice " would be able to reſtrain many from falling into the ſame error. That I have aſſigned " the true motive for their propenſity to this practice, appears from their ſtealing every " thing indiſcriminately at firſt ſight, before they could have the leaſt conception of " converting their prize to any one uſeful purpoſe. But, I believe, with us, no perſon " would forfeit his reputation, or expoſe himſelf to puniſhment, without knowing, before " hand, how to employ the ſtolen goods. Upon the whole, the pilfering diſpoſition of " theſe Iſlanders, though certainly diſagreeable and troubleſome to ſtrangers, was the " means of affording us ſome information as to the quickneſs of their intellects." With reſpect to the religion of theſe Indians, Mr. Anderſon maintains, that they have very proper ſentiments concerning the immateriality and immortality of the ſoul; and thinks himſelf ſufficiently authorized to aſſert, that they do not worſhip any thing which is the work of their own hands, or any viſible part of the creation. The language of the Friendly Iſlands has the greateſt imaginable conformity with that of New Zealand, of Wateeoo, and Mangeea. Several hundreds of the words of it were collected by Mr. Anderſon; and, amongſt theſe, are terms that expreſs numbers reaching to a hundred thouſand. Beyond this limit they never went, and probably were not able to go farther; for it was obſerved, that when they had gotten thus far, they commonly uſed a word which expreſſes an indefinite number. It is ſcarcely neceſſary to add, that Captain Cook, during his whole ſtay at the Friendly Iſlands, neglected nothing which could be the ſubject of aſtronomical and nautical obſervation. Hence the latitude and longitude of the different places he touched at, the variations of the needle, and the ſtate of the tides, are recorded for the improvement of ſcience, and the benefit of future navigators (p).

On the ſeventeenth of July, our Commander took his final leave of the Friendly Iſlands, and reſumed his voyage. An eclipſe was obſerved in the night between the twentieth and the twenty-firſt; and on the eighth of Auguſt, land was diſcovered. Some of the inhabitants, who came off in canoes, ſeemed earneſtly to invite our people to go on ſhore; but Captain Cook did not think proper to run the riſk of loſing the advantage of a fair wind, for the ſake of examining an Iſland which appeared to be of little conſequence. Its name, as was learned from the natives, who ſpake the Otaheite language, is Toobouai (q). Purſuing his courſe, the Captain reached Otaheite on the twelfth, and ſteered for Oheitepeha Bay, with an intention to anchor there, in order to draw what refreſhments he could from the South-eaſt part of the Iſland, before he went down to Matavai. Omai's firſt reception amongſt his countrymen was not entirely of a flattering nature. Though ſeveral perſons came on board who knew him, and one of them was his brother-in-law, there was nothing remarkably tender or ſtriking in their meeting. An interview which Omai had, on the thirteenth, with his ſiſter, was agreeable to the feelings of nature; for their meeting was marked with expreſſions of tender affection, more eaſy to be conceived than deſcribed. In a viſit, likewiſe, which he received from an aunt, the old Lady threw herſelf at his feet, and plentifully bedewed them with tears of joy. Captain Cook was informed by the natives, that, ſince he was laſt at the Iſland, in 1774, two ſhips had been twice in Oheitepeha Bay, and had left animals in the country. Theſe, on farther enquiry, were found to be hogs, dogs, goats, one bull, and a ram. That the veſſels which had viſited Otaheite were Spaniſh, was plain from an inſcription that was cut upon a wooden croſs, ſtanding at ſome diſtance from the front of a houſe which had been occupied by the ſtrangers. On the tranſverſe part of the croſs was inſcribed, (q) Toobouai is ſituated in the latitude of 23° 25' South, and in the longitude of 210° 37' Eaſt. Its greateſt extent is not above five or ſix miles.

Chriſtus vincit.

And on the perpendicular part,

Carolus III. imperat. 1774.

Our Commander took this occaſion to preſerve the memory of the prior viſits of the Engliſh, by inſcribing, on the other ſide of the poſt,

Georgius tertius Rex,
Annis 1767,
1769, 1773, 1774, & 1777.

Whatever might be the intentions of the Spaniards in their viſits to the Iſland, it ought to be remembered to their honour, that they had behaved ſo well to the inhabitants, as always to be ſpoken of in the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of eſteem and veneration.

Captain Cook had at this time an important affair to ſettle. As he knew that he could now be furniſhed with a plentiful ſupply of cocoa-nuts, the liquor of which is an excellent and wholeſome beverage, he was deſirous of prevailing upon his people to conſent to their being abridged, during their ſtay at Otaheite and the neighbouring Iſlands, of their ſtated allowance of ſpirits to mix with water. But as this ſtoppage of a favourite article, without aſſigning ſome reaſon for it, might occaſion a general murmur, he thought it moſt prudent to aſſemble the ſhip's company, and to make known to them the deſign of the voyage, and the extent of the future operations. To animate them in undertaking with chearfulneſs and perſeverance what lay before them, he took notice of the rewards offered by Parliament, to ſuch of his Majeſty's ſubjects as ſhould firſt diſcover a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, in any direction whatever, in the northern hemiſphere; and alſo to ſuch as ſhould firſt penetrate beyond the eighty-ninth degree of northern latitude. The Captain made no doubt, he told them, that he ſhould find them willing to co-operate with him in attempting, as far as might be poſſible, to become entitled to one or both of theſe rewards; but that to give the beſt chance of ſucceſs, it would be neceſſary to obſerve the utmoſt œconomy in the expenditure of the ſtores and proviſions, particularly the latter, as there was no probability of getting a ſupply, any where, after leaving theſe Iſlands. He ſtrengthened his argument by reminding them, that, in conſequence of the opportunity's having been loſt of getting to the North this ſummer, the voyage muſt laſt at leaſt a year longer than had originally been ſuppoſed. He entreated them to conſider the various obſtructions and difficulties they might ſtill meet with, and the aggravated hardſhips they would endure, if it ſhould be found neceſſary to put them to ſhort allowance, of any ſpecies of proviſions, in a cold climate. For theſe very ſubſtantial reaſons, he ſubmitted to them, whether it would not be better to be prudent in time, and, rather than to incur the hazard of having no ſpirits left, when ſuch a cordial would moſt be wanted, to conſent to give up their grog now, when ſo excellent a liquor as that of cocoa-nuts could be ſubſtituted in its place. In concluſion, our Commander left the determination of the matter entirely to their own choice. This ſpeech, which certainly partook much of the nature of true eloquence, if a diſcourſe admirably calculated for perſuaſion be entitled to that character, produced its full effect on the generous minds of Engliſh ſeamen. Captain Cook had the ſatisfaction of finding, that his propoſal did not remain a ſingle moment under conſideration; being unanimouſly and immediately approved of, without the leaſt objection. By our Commander's order, Captain Clerke made the ſame propoſal to his people; to which they, likewiſe, agreed. Accordingly, grog was no longer ſerved, excepting on Saturday nights; when the companies of both ſhips had a full allowance of it, that they might drink the healths of their friends in England.

On the twenty-fourth, Captain Cook quitted the South-eaſt part of Otaheite, and reſumed his old ſtation in Matavai Bay. Immediately upon his arrival, he was viſited by Otoo, the King of the whole Iſland, and their former friendſhip was renewed; a friendſhip which was continued without interruption, and cemented by a perpetual ſucceſſion of civilities, good offices, and entertainments. One of our Commander's firſt objects was to diſpoſe of all the European animals which were in the ſhips. Accordingly, he conveyed to Oparre, Otoo's place of reſidence, a peacock and hen; a turkey cock and hen; one gander, and three geeſe; a drake, and four ducks. The geeſe and ducks began to breed before our Navigators left their preſent ſtation. There were already at Otoo's, ſeveral goats, and the Spaniſh bull; which was one of the fineſt animals of the kind that was ever ſeen. To the bull Captain Cook ſent the three cows he had on board, together with a bull of his own; to all which were added the horſe and mare, and the ſheep that had ſtill remained in the veſſels. The Captain found himſelf lightened of a very heavy burthen, in having diſpoſed of theſe paſſengers. It is not eaſy to conceive the trouble and vexation which had attended the conveyance of this living cargo, through ſuch various hazards, and to ſo immenſe a diſtance. But the ſatisfaction which our Commander felt, in having been ſo fortunate as to fulfil his Majeſty's humane deſigns, in ſending ſuch valuable animals, to ſupply the wants of two worthy nations, afforded him an ample recompence for the many anxious hours he had paſſed, before this ſubordinate object of his voyage could be carried into execution. At this time a war was on the point of breaking out, between the inhabitants of Eimeo and thoſe of Otaheite; and by the latter Captain Cook was requeſted to take a part in their favour. With this requeſt, however, though enforced by frequent and urgent ſolicitations, the Captain, according to his uſual wiſdom, refuſed to comply. He alledged, that, as he was not thoroughly acquainted with the diſpute, and the people of Eimeo had never offended him, he could not think himſelf at liberty to engage in hoſtilities againſt them. With theſe reaſons Otoo and moſt of the Chiefs appeared to be ſatisfied; but one of them, Towha, was ſo highly diſpleaſed, that our Commander never afterward recovered his friendſhip. Upon the preſent occaſion Captain Cook had full and undeniable proof that the offering of human ſacrifices forms a part of the religious inſtitutions of Otaheite. Indeed, he was a witneſs to a ſolemnity of this kind; the proceſs of which he has particularly deſcribed, and has related it with the juſt ſentiments of indignation and abhorrence. The unhappy victim, who was now offered to the object of worſhip, ſeemed to be a middle-aged man, and was ſaid to be one of the loweſt claſs of the people. But the Captain could not learn, after all his enquiries, whether the wretch had been fixed upon, on account of his having committed any crime which was ſuppoſed to be deſerving of death. It is certain that a choice is generally made either of ſuch guilty perſons for the ſacrifices, or of common, low fellows, who ſtroll about, from place to place, without any viſible methods of obtaining an honeſt ſubſiſtence. Thoſe who are devoted to ſuffer, are never apprized of their fate till the blow is given that puts an end to their being. Whenever, upon any particular emergency, one of the great Chiefs conſiders a human ſacrifice to be neceſſary, he pitches upon the victim, and then orders him to be ſuddenly fallen upon and killed, either with clubs or ſtones. Although it ſhould be ſuppoſed, that no more than one perſon is ever devoted to deſtruction on any ſingle occaſion, at Otaheite, it will ſtill be found that theſe occurrences are ſo frequent, as to cauſe a ſhocking waſte of the human race; for our Commander counted no leſs than forty-nine ſkulls of former victims, lying before the Morai where he had ſeen another added to the number. It was apparent, from the freſhneſs of theſe ſkulls, that no great length of time had elapſed, ſince the wretches to whom they belonged had been offered upon the altar of blood. There is reaſon to fear, that this cuſtom is as extenſive as it is horrid. It is highly probable that it prevails throughout the widely-diffuſed Iſlands of the Pacific Ocean; and Captain Cook had particular evidence of its ſubſiſting at the Friendly Iſlands. To what an extent the practice of human ſacrifices was carried in the ancient world, is not unknown to the learned. Scarcely any nation was free from it in a certain ſtate of ſociety; and, as religious reformation is one of the laſt efforts of the human mind, the practice may be continued, even when the manners are otherwiſe far removed from ſavage life. It may have been a long time before civilization has made ſuch a progreſs as to deprive ſuperſtition of its cruelty, and to divert it from barbarous rites to ceremonies, which, though fooliſh enough, are comparatively mild, gentle, and innocent. On the fifth of September, an accident happened, which, though ſlight in itſelf, was of ſome conſequence from the ſituation of things. A young ram of the Cape breed, which had been lambed and brought up with great care on board the ſhip, was killed by a dog. Deſirous as Captain Cook was of propagating ſo uſeful a race, among the Society Iſlands, the loſs of a ram was a ſerious misfortune. It was the only one he had of that breed; and of the Engliſh breed a ſingle ram was all that remained. Captain Cook and Captain Clerke, on the fourteenth, mounted on horſeback, and took a ride round the plain of Matavai, to the great ſurprize of a large number of the natives, who attended upon the occaſion, and gazed upon the Gentlemen with as much aſtoniſhment as if they had been Centaurs. What the two Captains had begun, was afterwards repeated every day, by one and another of our people; notwithſtanding which, the curioſity of the Otaheitans ſtill continued unabated. They were exceedingly delighted with theſe animals, after they had ſeen the uſe which was made of them. Not all the novelties, put together, which European viſiters had carried amongſt the inhabitants, inſpired them with ſo high an idea of the greatneſs of diſtant nations. Though Captain Cook would not take a part in the quarrels between the Iſlands, he was ready to protect his particular friends, when in danger of being injured. Towha, who commanded the expedition againſt Eimeo, had been obliged to ſubmit to a diſgraceful accommodation. Being full of reſentment on account of his not having been properly ſupported, he was ſaid to have threatened, that, as ſoon as the Captain ſhould leave the Iſland, he would join his forces to thoſe of Tiaraboo, and attack Otoo at Matavai or Oparre. This induced our Commander to declare, in the moſt public manner, that he was determined to eſpouſe the intereſt of his friend, againſt any ſuch combination; and that whoever preſumed to aſſault him, ſhould feel the weight of his heavy diſpleaſure, when he returned again to Otaheite. Captain Cook's declaration had probably the deſired effect; for, if Towha had formed hoſtile intentions, no more was heard of the matter.

The manner in which our Commander was freed from a rheumatic complaint, that conſiſted of a pain extending from the hip to the foot, deſerves to be recorded. Otoo's mother, his three ſiſters, and eight other women, went on board for the expreſs purpoſe of undertaking the cure of his diſorder. He accepted of their friendly offer, had a bed ſpread for them on the cabbin floor, and ſubmitted himſelf to their directions. Being deſired to lay himſelf down amongſt them, then, as many of them as could get round him began to ſqueeze him with both hands, from head to foot, but more particularly in the part where the pain was lodged, till they made his bones crack, and his fleſh became a perfect mummy. After undergoing this diſcipline about a quarter of an hour, he was glad to be releaſed from the women. The operation, however, gave him immediate relief; ſo that he was encouraged to ſubmit to another rubbing-down before he went to bed; the conſequence of which was, that he was tolerably eaſy all the ſucceeding night. His female phyſicians repeated their preſcription the next morning, and again in the evening; after which his pains were entirely removed, and the cure was perfected. This operation, which is called Romee, is univerſally practiſed among theſe Iſlanders; being ſometimes performed by the men, but more generally by the women. Captain Cook, who now had come to the reſolution of departing ſoon from Otaheite, accompanied, on the twenty-

ſeventh, Otoo to Oparre, and examined the cattle and poultry, which he had conſigned to his friend's care at that place. Every thing was in a promiſing way, and properly attended. The Captain procured from Otoo four goats; two of which he deſigned to leave at Ulietea, where none had yet been introduced; and the other two he propoſed to reſerve for the uſe of any Iſlands he might chance to meet with in his paſſage to the North. On the next day, Otoo came on board, and informed our Commander, that he had gotten a canoe, which he deſired him to carry home, as a preſent to the Earee rahie no Pretane. This, he ſaid, was the only thing he could ſend which was worthy of his Majeſty's acceptance. Captain Cook was not a little pleaſed with Otoo, for this mark of his gratitude; and the more, as the thought was entirely his own. Not one of our people had given him the leaſt hint concerning it; and it ſhewed that he was fully ſenſible to whom he ſtood indebted for the moſt valuable preſents that he had received. As the canoe was too large to be taken on board, the Captain could only thank him for his good intentions; but it would have given him a much greater ſatisfaction if his preſent could have been accepted. During this viſit of our Voyagers to Otaheite, ſuch a cordial friendſhip and confidence ſubſiſted between them and the natives, as never once to be interrupted by any untoward accident. Our Commander had made the Chiefs fully ſenſible, that it was their intereſt to treat with him on fair and equitable terms, and to keep their people from plundering or ſtealing. So great was Otoo's attachment to the Engliſh, that he ſeemed pleaſed with the idea of their having a permanent ſettlement at Matavai; not conſidering that from that time he would be deprived of his kingdom, and the inhabitants of their liberties. Captain Cook had too much gratitude and regard for theſe Iſlanders, to wiſh that ſuch an event ſhould ever take place. Though our occaſional viſits may, in ſome reſpects, have been of advantage to the natives, he was afraid that a durable eſtabliſhment among them, conducted as moſt European eſtabliſhments amongſt Indian nations have unfortunately been, would give them juſt cauſe to lament that they had been diſcovered by our Navigators. It is not, indeed, likely that a meaſure of this kind ſhould at any time ſeriouſly be adopted, becauſe it cannot ſerve either the purpoſes of public ambition, or private avarice; and, without ſuch inducements, the Captain has ventured to pronounce that it will never be undertaken.

From Otaheite our Voyagers ſailed, on the thirtieth, to Eimeo, where they came to an anchor, on the ſame day. At this Iſland, the tranſactions which happened were, for the moſt part, very unpleaſant. A goat, which was ſtolen, was recovered without any extraordinary difficulty, and one of the thieves was, at the ſame time, ſurrendered; being the firſt inſtance of the kind that our Commander had met with in his connections with the Society Iſlands. The ſtealing of another goat was attended with an uncommon degree of perplexity and trouble. As the recovery of it was a matter of no ſmall importance, Captain Cook was determined to effect this at any rate; and accordingly he made an expedition croſs the Iſland, in the courſe of which he ſet fire to ſix or eight houſes, and burnt a number of war canoes. At laſt, in conſequence of a peremptory meſſage to Maheine, the Chief of Eimeo, that not a ſingle canoe ſhould be left in the country, or an end be put to the conteſt, unleſs the animal in his poſſeſſion ſhould be reſtored, the goat was brought back. This quarrel was as much regretted on the part of the Captain, as it could be on that of the natives. It grieved him to reflect, that, after refuſing the preſſing ſolicitations of his friends at Otaheite to favour their invaſion of this Iſland, he ſhould find himſelf ſo ſpeedily reduced to the neceſſity of engaging in hoſtilities againſt its inhabitants; and in ſuch hoſtilities as, perhaps, had been more injurious to them than Towha's expedition. On the eleventh of October, the ſhips departed from Eimeo, and the next day arrived at Owharre harbour, on the Weſt ſide of Huaheine. The grand buſineſs of our Commander at this Iſland was the ſettlement of Omai. In order to obtain the conſent of the Chiefs of the Iſland, the affair was conducted with great ſolemnity. Omai dreſſed himſelf very properly on the occaſion; brought with him a ſuitable aſſortment of preſents; went through a variety of religious ceremonies; and made a ſpeech, the topics of which had been dictated to him by our Commander. The reſult of the negociation was, that a ſpot of ground was aſſigned him, the extent of which, along the ſhore of the harbour, was about two hundred yards; and its depth, to the foot of the hill, ſomewhat more. A proportionable part of the hill was included in the grant. This buſineſs having been adjuſted in a ſatisfactory manner, the Carpenters of both ſhips were employed in building a ſmall houſe for Omai, in which he might ſecure his European commodities. At the ſame time, ſome of the Engliſh made a garden for his uſe, in which they planted ſhaddocks, vines, pine-apples, melons, and the ſeeds of ſeveral other vegetable articles. All of theſe Captain Cook had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing in a flouriſhing ſtate before he left the Iſland. At Huaheine Omai found a brother, a ſiſter, and a brother-in law, by whom he was received with great regard and tenderneſs. But though theſe people were faithful and affectionate in their attachment to him, the Captain diſcovered, with concern, that they were of too little conſequence in the Iſland to be capable of rendering him any poſitive ſervice. They had not either authority or influence to protect his perſon or property; and, in ſuch a ſituation, there was reaſon to apprehend, that he might be in danger of being ſtripped of all his poſſeſſions, as ſoon as he ſhould ceaſe to be ſupported by the power of the Engliſh. To prevent this evil, if poſſible, our Commander adviſed him to conciliate the favour and engage the patronage and protection of two or three of the principal Chiefs, by a proper diſtribution of ſome of his moveables; with which advice he prudently complied. Captain Cook, however, did not entirely truſt to the operations of gratitude, but had recourſe to the more forcible motive of intimidation. With this view, he took every opportunity of ſignifying to the inhabitants, that it was his intention to return to the Iſland again, after being abſent the uſual time; and that, if he did not find Omai in the ſame ſtate of ſecurity in which he left him, all thoſe whom he ſhould then diſcover to have been his enemies ſhould feel the weight of his reſentment. As the natives had now formed an opinion that their country would be viſited by the ſhips of England at ſtated periods, there was ground to hope that this threatening declaration would produce no inconſiderable effect. When Omai's houſe was nearly finiſhed, and many of his moveables were carried aſhore, a box of toys excited the admiration of the multitude in a much higher degree than articles of a more uſeful nature. With regard to his pots, kettles, diſhes, plates, drinking-mugs, glaſſes, and the whole train of domeſtic accommodations, which in our eſtimation are ſo neceſſary and important, ſcarcely any one of his countrymen would condeſcend to look upon them. Omai himſelf, being ſenſible that theſe pieces of Engliſh furniture would be of no great conſequence in his preſent ſituation, wiſely ſold a number of them, among the people of the ſhips, for hatchets, and other iron tools, which had a more intrinſic value in this part of the world, and would give him a more diſtinguiſhed ſuperiority over thoſe with whom he was to paſs the remainder of his days. Omai's family, when he ſettled at Huaheine, conſiſted of eight or ten perſons; if that can be called a family, to which a ſingle female did not as yet belong, nor was likely to belong, unleſs its maſter ſhould become leſs volatile. There was nothing in his preſent temper which ſeemed likely to diſpoſe him to look out for a wife; and, perhaps, it is to be apprehended, that his reſidence in England had not contributed to improve his taſte for the ſober felicity of a domeſtic union with ſome woman of his own country. The European weapons of Omai conſiſted of a muſquet, bayonet, and cartouch-box; a fowling-piece; two pair of piſtols; and two or three ſwords or cutlaſſes. With the poſſeſſion of theſe warlike implements, he was highly delighted; and it was only to gratify his eager deſire for them, that Captain Cook was induced to make him ſuch preſents. The Captain would otherwiſe have thought it happier for him to be without fire-arms, or any European weapons, leſt an imprudent uſe of them (and prudence was not his moſt diſtinguiſhed talent) ſhould rather encreaſe his dangers than eſtabliſh his ſuperiority. Though it was no ſmall ſatisfaction to our Commander to reflect, that he had brought Omai ſafe back to the very ſpot from which he had been taken, this ſatisfaction was, nevertheleſs, ſomewhat diminiſhed by the conſideration, that his ſituation might now be leſs deſirable than it was before his connection with the Engliſh. It was to be feared, that the advantages which he had derived from his viſit to England would place him in a more hazardous ſtate with reſpect to his perſonal ſafety. Whatever faults belonged to Omai's character, they were overbalanced by his good-nature and his gratitude. He had a tolerable ſhare of underſtanding, but it was not accompanied with application and perſeverance; ſo that his knowledge of things was very general, and in moſt inſtances imperfect; nor was he a man of much obſervation. He would not, therefore, be able to introduce many of the arts and cuſtoms of England among his countrymen, or greatly to improve thoſe to which they have long been habituated. Captain Cook, however, was confident that he would endeavour to bring to perfection the fruits and vegetables which had been planted in the garden. This of itſelf would be no ſmall acquiſition to the natives. But the greateſt benefit which theſe Iſlands are likely to receive from Omai's travels, will be in the animals that are left upon them; and which, had it not been for his coming to England, they might probably never have obtained. When theſe multiply, of which Captain Cook thought there was little reaſon to doubt, Otaheite, and the Society Iſlands, will equal, if not exceed, any country in the known world, for plenty of proviſions. Before our Commander ſailed from Huaheine, he had the following inſcription cut on the outſide of Omai's houſe:

Georgius Tertius, Rex, 2 Novembris, 1777.
Naves { Reſolution, Jac. Cook, Pr.
{ Diſcovery, Car. Clerke, Pr.

On the ſame day, Omai took his final leave of our Navigators, in doing which he bade farewel to all the officers in a very affectionate manner. He ſuſtained himſelf with a manly reſolution till he came to Captain Cook, when his utmoſt efforts to conceal his tears failed; and he continued to weep all the time that the boat was conveying him to ſhore. Not again to reſume the ſubject, I ſhall here mention, that when the Captain was at Ulietea, a fortnight after this event, Omai ſent two men with the ſatisfactory intelligence, that he remained undiſturbed by the people of Huaheine, and that every thing ſucceeded well with him, excepting in the loſs of his goat, which had died in kidding. This intelligence was accompanied with a requeſt that another goat might be given him, together with two axes.

Our Commander eſteeming himſelf happy in having an additional opportunity of ſerving him, diſpatched the meſſengers back with the axes, and a couple of kids, male and female, which were ſpared for him out of the Diſcovery. The fate of the two youths who had been brought from New Zealand muſt not be forgotten. As they were extremely deſirous of continuing with our people, Captain Cook would have carried them to England with him, if there had appeared the moſt diſtant probability of their ever being reſtored to their own country. Tiarooa, the eldeſt of them, was a very well-diſpoſed young man, with ſtrong natural ſenſe, and a capacity of receiving any inſtruction. He ſeemed to be fully convinced of the inferiority of New Zealand to theſe Iſlands, and reſigned himſelf, though not without ſome degree of reluctance, to end his days, in eaſe and plenty, in Huaheine. The other had formed ſo ſtrong an attachment to our Navigators, that it was neceſſary to take him out of the ſhip, and carry him aſhore by force. This neceſſity was the more painful, as he was a witty, ſmart boy; and, on that account, a great favourite on board. Both theſe youths became a part of Omai's family.

Whilſt our Voyagers were at Huaheine, the atrocious conduct of one particular thief occaſioned ſo much trouble, that the Captain puniſhed him more ſeverely than he had ever done any culprit before. Beſides having his head and beared ſhaved, he ordered both his ears to be cut off, and then diſmiſſed him. It can ſcarcely be reflected upon without regret, that our Commander ſhould have been compelled to ſuch an act of ſeverity. On the third of November, the ſhips came to an anchor in the harbour of Ohamaneno, in the Iſland of Ulietea. The obſervatories being ſet up on the ſixth, and the neceſſary inſtruments having been carried on ſhore, the two following days were employed in making aſtronomical obſervations. In the night between the twelfth and thirteenth, John Harriſon, a Marine, who was ſentinel at the obſervatory, deſerted, taking with him his arms and accoutrements. Captain Cook exerted himſelf, on this occaſion, with his uſual vigour. He went himſelf in purſuit of the deſerter, who, after ſome evaſion on the part of the inhabitants, was ſurrendered. He was found ſitting between two women, with the muſquet lying before him; and all the defence he was able to make was, that he had been enticed away by the natives. As this account was probably the truth, and as it appeared beſides, that he had remained upon his poſt till within ten minutes of the time when he was to have been relieved, the puniſhment which the Captain inflicted upon him was not very ſevere. Some days after, a ſtill more troubleſome affair happened, of the ſame nature. On the morning of the twenty-fourth, the Captain was informed that a midſhipman, and a ſeaman, both belonging to the Diſcovery, were miſſing; and it ſoon appeared that they had gone away in a canoe, in the preceding evening, and had now reached the other end of the Iſland. As the midſhipman was known to have expreſſed a deſire of remaining at theſe Iſlands, it was evident that he and his companion had gone off with that intention. Though Captain Clerke immediately ſet out in queſt of them, with two armed boats, and a party of marines, his expedition proved fruitleſs, the natives having amuſed him the whole day with falſe intelligence. The next morning an account was brought that the deſerters were at Otaha. As they were not the only perſons in the ſhips who wiſhed to ſpend their days at theſe favourite Iſlands, it became neceſſary, for the purpoſe of preventing any farther deſertion, to recover them at all events. Captain Cook, therefore, in order to convince the inhabitants that he was in earneſt, reſolved to go after the fugitives himſelf; to which meaſure he was determined, from having obſerved, in repeated inſtances, that the natives had ſeldom offered to deceive him with falſe information. Agreeably to this reſolution, the Captain ſet out, the next morning, with two armed boats, being accompanied by Oreo, the Chief of Ulietea, and proceeded immediately to Otaha. But when he had gotten to the place where the deſerters were expected to be found, he was acquainted that they were gone over to Bolabola. Thither our Commander did not think proper to follow them, having determined to purſue another meaſure, which he judged would more effectually anſwer his purpoſe. This meaſure was, to put the Chief's ſon, daughter, and ſon-in-law, into confinement, and to detain them till the fugitives ſhould be reſtored. As to Oreo, he was informed, that he was at liberty to leave the ſhip whenever he pleaſed, and to take ſuch methods as he eſteemed beſt calculated to get our two men back; that, if he ſucceeded, his friends ſhould be releaſed; if not, that Captain Cook was reſolved to carry them away with him. The Captain added, that the Chief's own conduct, as well as that of many of his people, in aſſiſting the runaways to eſcape, and in enticing others to follow them, would juſtify any ſtep that could be taken to put a ſtop to ſuch proceedings. In conſequence of this explanation of our Commander's views and intentions, Oreo zealouſly exerted himſelf to recover the deſerters; for which purpoſe he diſpatched a canoe to Bolabola, with a meſſage to Opoony, the Sovereign of that Iſland, acquainting him with what had happened, and requeſting him to ſeize the two fugitives, and ſend them back. The meſſenger, who was no leſs a perſon than the father of Pootoe, Oreo's ſon-in-law, came, before he ſet out, to Captain Cook, to receive his commands; which were, not to return without the runaways, and to inform Opoony, that, if they had left Bolabola, he muſt diſpatch canoes in purſuit of them, till they ſhould finally be reſtored. Theſe vigorous meaſures were, at length, ſucceſsful. On the twenty-eighth, the deſerters were brought back; and, as ſoon as they were on board, the three priſoners were releaſed. Our Commander would not have acted ſo reſolutely on the preſent occaſion, had he not been peculiarly ſolicitous to ſave the ſon of a brother officer from being loſt to his country. While this affair was in ſuſpence, ſome of the natives, from their anxiety on account of the confinement of the Chief's relations, had formed a deſign of a very ſerious nature; which was no leſs than to ſeize upon the perſons of Captain Clerke and Captain Cook. With regard to Captain Clerke, they made no ſecret of ſpeaking of their ſcheme, the day after it was diſcovered. But their firſt and grand plan of operations was to lay hold of Captain Cook. It was his cuſtom to bathe, every evening, in freſh water; in doing which he frequently went alone, and always without arms. As the inhabitants expected him to go, as uſual, on the evening of the twenty-ſixth, they had determined at that time to make him a priſoner. But he had thought it prudent, after confining Oreo's family, to avoid putting himſelf in their power; and had cautioned Captain Clerke, and the officers, not to venture themſelves far from the ſhips. In the courſe of the afternoon, the Chief aſked Captain Cook, three ſeveral times, if he would not go to the bathing-place; and when he found, at laſt, that the Captain could not be prevailed upon, he went off, with all his people. He was apprehenſive, without doubt, that the deſign was diſcovered; though no ſuſpicion of it was then entertained by our Commander, who imagined that the natives were ſeized with ſome ſudden fright, from which, as uſual, they would quickly recover. On one occaſion, Captain Clerke and Mr. Gore were in particular danger. A party of the inhabitants, armed with clubs, advanced againſt them; and their ſafety was principally owing to Captain Clerke's walking with a piſtol in his hand, which he once fired. The diſcovery of the conſpiracy, eſpecially ſo far as reſpected Captain Clerke and Mr. Gore, was made by a girl, whom one of the officers had brought from Huaheine. On this account, thoſe who were charged with the execution of the deſign were ſo greatly offended with her, that they threatened to take away her life, as ſoon as our Navigators ſhould leave the Iſland: but proper methods were purſued for her ſecurity. It was a happy circumſtance that the affair was brought to light; ſince ſuch a ſcheme could not have been carried into effect, without being, in its conſequences, productive of much diſtreſs and calamity to the natives. Whilſt Captain Cook was at Ulietea, he was viſited by his old friend Oree, who, in the former voyages, was Chief, or rather Regent, of Huaheine. Notwithſtanding his now being, in ſome degree, reduced to the rank of a private perſon, he ſtill preſerved his conſequence; never appeared without a numerous body of attendants; and was always provided with ſuch preſents as indicated his wealth, and were highly acceptable.

The laſt of the Society Iſlands to which our Commander ſailed, was Bolabola, where he arrived on the eighth of December. His chief view in paſſing over to this Iſland was to procure from its Monarch, Opoony, an anchor which Monſ. de Bougainville had loſt at Otaheite, and which had been conveyed to Bolabola. It was not from a want of anchors that Captain Cook was deſirous of making the purchaſe, but to convert the iron of which it conſiſted into a freſh aſſortment of trading articles, theſe being now very much exhauſted. The Captain ſucceeded in his negociation, and amply rewarded Opoony for giving up the anchor. Whilſt our Commander was at Bolabola, he received an account of thoſe military expeditions of the people of this country, which he had heard much of in each of his three voyages, and which had ended in the complete conqueſt of Ulietea and Otaha. The Bolabola men, in conſequence of theſe enterprizes, were in the higheſt reputation for their valour; and, indeed, were deemed ſo invincible as to be objects of terror to all the neighbouring Iſlands. It was an addition to their fame that their country was of ſuch ſmall extent; being not more than eight leagues in compaſs, and not half ſo large as Ulietea. Captain Cook continued to the laſt his zeal for furniſhing the natives of the South Sea with uſeful animals. At Bolabola, where there was already a ram, which had originally been left by the Spaniards at Otaheite, he carried aſhore an ewe, that had been brought from the Cape of Good Hope; and he rejoiced in the proſpect of laying a foundation, by this preſent, for a breed of ſheep in the Iſland. He left alſo at Ulietea, under the care of Oreo, an Engliſh boar and ſow, and two goats. It may, therefore, be regarded as certain, that not only Otaheite, but all the neighbouring Iſlands, will, in a few years, have their race of hogs conſiderably improved; and it is probable, that they will be ſtocked with all the valuable animals, which have been tranſported thither by their European viſiters. When this ſhall be accompliſhed, no part of the world will equal theſe Iſlands, in the variety and abundance of the refreſhments which they will be able to afford to Navigators; nor did the Captain know any place that excelled them, even in their preſent ſtate.

It is an obſervation of great importance, that the future felicity of the inhabitants of Otaheite, and the Society Iſlands, will not a little depend on their continuing to be viſited from Europe. Our Commander could not avoid expreſſing it as his real opinion, that it would have been far better for theſe poor people, never to have known our ſuperiority in the accommodations and arts which render life comfortable, than, after once knowing it, to be again left and abandoned to their original incapacity of improvement. If the intercourſe between them and us ſhould wholly be diſcontinued, they cannot be reſtored to that happy mediocrity in which they lived before they were firſt diſcovered. It ſeemed to Captain tain Cook that it was become, in a manner, incumbent upon the Europeans to viſit theſe Iſlands once in three or four years, in order to ſupply the natives with thoſe conveniences which we have introduced among them, and for which we have given them a predilection. Perhaps they may heavily feel the want of ſuch occaſional ſupplies, when it may be too late to go back to their old and leſs perfect contrivances; contrivances which they now deſpiſe, and which they have diſcontinued ſince the introduction of ours. It is, indeed, to be apprehended, that by the time that the iron tools, of which they had become poſſeſſed, are worn out, they will have almoſt loſt the knowledge of their own. In this laſt voyage of our Commander, a ſtone hatchet was as rare a thing among the inhabitants as an iron one was eight years before; and a chiſſel of bone or ſtone was not to be ſeen. Spike-nails had ſucceeded in their place; and of ſpike-nails the natives were weak enough to imagine that they had gotten an inexhauſtible ſtore. Of all our commodities, axes and hatchets remained the moſt unrivalled; and they muſt ever be held in the higheſt eſtimation through the whole of the Iſlands. Iron tools are ſo ſtrikingly uſeful, and are now become ſo neceſſary to the comfortable exiſtence of the inhabitants, that, ſhould they ceaſe to receive ſupplies of them, their ſituation, in conſequence of their neither poſſeſſing the materials, nor being trained up to the art of fabricating them, would be rendered completely miſerable. It is impoſſible to reflect upon this repreſentation of things without ſtrong feelings of ſympathy and concern. Sincerely is it to be wiſhed, that ſuch may be the order of events, and ſuch the intercourſe carried on with the ſouthern Iſlanders, that, inſtead of finally ſuffering by their acquaintance with us, they may riſe to a higher ſtate of civilization, and permanently enjoy bleſſings far ſuperior to what they had heretofore known.

Amidſt the various ſubordinate employments which engaged the attention of Captain Cook and his aſſociates, the great objects of their duty were never forgotten. No opportunity was loſt of making aſtronomical and nautical obſervations; the conſequence of which was, that the latitude and longitude of the places where the ſhips anchored, the variations of the compaſs, the dips of the needle, and the ſtate of the tides, were aſcertained with an accuracy that forms a valuable addition to philoſophical ſcience, and will be of eminent ſervice to future navigators. Our Commander was now going to take his final departure from Otaheite and the Society Iſlands. Frequently as they had been viſited, it might have been imagined that their religious, political, and domeſtic regulations, manners, and cuſtoms, muſt, by this time, be thoroughly underſtood. A great acceſſion of knowledge was undoubtedly gained in the preſent voyage; and yet it was confeſſed, both by Captain Cook and Mr. Anderſon, that their accounts of things were ſtill imperfect in various reſpects; and that they continued ſtrangers to many of the moſt important inſtitutions which prevail among the natives. There was one part of the character of ſeveral of theſe people, on which the well-regulated mind of the Captain would not permit him to enlarge. "Too much," ſays he, "ſeems to have been already known, and publiſhed in our former "relations, about ſome of the modes of life, that made Otaheite ſo agreeable an abode "to many on board our ſhips; and if I could now add any finiſhing ſtrokes to a picture, "the outlines of which have been already drawn with ſufficient accuracy, I ſhould ſtill "have heſitated to make this journal the place for exhibiting a view of licentious man-"ners, which could only ſerve to diſguſt thoſe for whoſe information I write (r)." From Mr. Anderſon's account of the Otaheitans, it appears, that their religious ſyſtem is extenſive, and, in various inſtances, ſingular. They do not ſeem to pay reſpect to one God as poſſeſſing pre-eminence, but believe in a plurality of divinities, all of whom are ſuppoſed to be very powerful. In different parts of the Iſland, and in the neighbouring Iſlands, the inhabitants chooſe thoſe deities for the objects of their worſhip, who, they think, are moſt likely to protect them, and to ſupply all their wants. If, however, they are diſappointed in their expectations, they eſteem it no impiety to change their divinity, by having recourſe to another, whom they hope to find more propitious and ſucceſsful. In general, their notions concerning Deity are extravagantly abſurd. With regard to the ſoul, they believe it, according to Mr. Anderſon, to be both immaterial and immortal; but he acknowledges, that they are far from entertaining thoſe ſublime expectations of future happineſs which the Chriſtian Revelation affords, and which even reaſon alone, duly exerciſed, might teach us to expect (s). Although ſeventeen months had elapſed ſince Captain Cook's departure from England, during which time he had not, upon the whole, been unprofitably employed, he was ſenſible that, with reſpect to the principal object of his inſtructions, it was now only the commencement of his voyage; and that, therefore, his attention was to be called anew, to every circumſtance which might contribute towards the ſafety of his people, and the ultimate ſucceſs of the expedition. Accordingly, he had examined into the ſtate of the proviſions, whilſt he was at the Society Iſlands; and, as ſoon as he had left them, and had gotten beyond the extent of his former diſcoveries, he ordered a ſurvey to be taken of all the Boatſwain's and Carpenter's ſtores which were in the ſhips, that he might be fully informed of their quantity and condition; and, by that means, know how to uſe them to the greateſt advantage. It was on the eighth of December, the very day on which he had touched there, that our Commander ſailed from Bolabola. In the night between the twenty-ſecond and twenty-third, he croſſed the line, in the longitude of 203° 15′ Eaſt;

and on the twenty-fourth, land was diſcovered, which was found to be one of thoſe low uninhabited Iſlands that are ſo frequent in this ocean. Here our Voyagers were ſucceſsful in catching a large quantity of turtle, which ſupplied them with an agreeable refreſhment; and here, on the twenty-eighth, an eclipſe of the ſun was obſerved by Mr. Bayly, Mr. King, and Captain Cook. On account of the ſeaſon of the year, the Captain called the land where he now was, and which he judged to be about fifteen or twenty leagues in circumference, CHRISTMAS ISLAND (t). By his order, ſeveral cocoa-nuts and yams were planted, and ſome melon-ſeeds ſown, in proper places; and a bottle was left, containing this inſcription:

(t) The Weſt ſide of it, on which the eclipſe was obſerved, lies in the latitude of 1° 59′ North, and in the longitude of 202° 30′ Eaſt.

On the Second of January, 1778, the ſhips reſumed their courſe to the northward, and though ſeveral evidences occurred of the vicinity of land, none was diſcovered till the eighteenth, when an Iſland made its appearance, bearing North-eaſt by Eaſt. Soon after, more land was ſeen, lying towards the North, and entirely detached from the former. The ſucceeding day was diſtinguiſhed by the diſcovery of a third Iſland, in the direction of Weſt-north-weſt, and as far diſtant as the eye could reach. In ſteering towards the ſecond Iſland, our Voyagers had ſome doubt whether the land before them was inhabited; but this matter was ſpeedily cleared up, by the putting off of ſome canoes from the ſhore, containing from three to ſix men each. Upon their approach, the Engliſh were agreeably ſurpriſed to find, that they ſpoke the language of Otaheite, and of the other countries which had lately been viſited. Theſe people were at firſt fearful of going on board; but when, on the twentieth, ſome of them took courage, and ventured to do it, they expreſſed an aſtoniſhment, on entering the ſhip, which Captain Cook had never experienced in the natives of any place, during the whole courſe of his ſeveral voyages. Their eyes continually flew from object to object; and, by the wildneſs of their looks and geſtures, they fully manifeſted their entire ignorance with relation to every thing they ſaw, and ſtrongly marked to our Navigators, that, till this time, they had never been viſited by Europeans, or been acquainted with any of our commodities, excepting iron. Even with reſpect to iron, it was evident that they had only heard of it, or, at moſt, had known it in ſome ſmall quantity, brought to them at a diſtant period; for all they underſtood concerning it was, that it was a ſubſtance much better adapted to the purpoſes of cutting, or the boring of holes, than any thing their own country produced. Their ceremonies on entering the ſhip, their geſtures and motions, and their manner of ſinging, were ſimilar to thoſe which our Voyagers had been accuſtomed to ſee in the places lately viſited. There was, likewiſe, a farther circumſtance in which theſe people perfectly reſembled the other Iſlanders; and that was, in their endeavouring to ſteal whatever came within their reach; or rather to take it openly, as what would either not be reſented, or not hindered. The Engliſh ſoon convinced them of their miſtake, by keeping ſuch a watchful eye over them, that they afterwards were obliged to be leſs active in appropriating to themſelves every object that ſtruck upon their fancy, and excited the deſire of poſſeſſion. One order given by Captain Cook at this Iſland was, that none of the boats crews ſhould be permitted to go on ſhore; the reaſon of which was, that he might do every thing in his power to prevent the importation of a fatal diſeaſe, which, unhappily, had already been communicated in other places. With the ſame view, he directed that all female viſiters ſhould be excluded from the ſhips. Another neceſſary precaution, taken by the Captain, was a ſtrict injunction, that no perſon, known to be capable of propagating diſorder, ſhould be ſent upon duty out of the veſſels. Thus zealous was the humanity of our Commander, to prevent an irreparable injury from being done to the natives. There are men who glory in their ſhame, and who do not care how much evil they communicate. Of this there was an inſtance at Tongataboo, in the Gunner of the Diſcovery, who had been ſtationed on ſhore to manage the trade for that ſhip; and who, though he was well acquainted with his own ſituation, continued to have connections with different women. His companions expoſtulated with him without effect, till Captain Clerke, hearing of the dangerous irregularity of his conduct, ordered him on board. If I knew the raſcal's name, I would hang it up, as far as lies in my power, to everlaſting infamy.

Mr. Williamſon being ſent with the boats to ſearch for water, and attempting to land, the inhabitants came down in ſuch numbers, and were ſo violent in their endeavours to ſeize upon the oars, muſquets and, in ſhort, every thing they could lay hold of, that he was obliged to fire, by which one man was killed. This unhappy circumſtance was not known to Captain Cook till after he had left the Iſland; ſo that all his meaſures were directed as if nothing of the kind had happened. When the ſhips were brought to an anchor, our Commander went on ſhore; and at the very inſtant of his doing it, the collected body of the natives all fell flat upon their faces, and continued in that humble poſture, till, by expreſſive ſigns, he prevailed upon them to riſe. Other ceremonies followed; and the next day a trade was ſet on foot for hogs and potatoes, which the people of the Iſland gave in exchange for nails and pieces of iron, formed into ſomething like chiſſels. So far was any obſtruction from being met with in watering, that, on the contrary, the inhabitants aſſiſted our men in rolling the caſks to and from the pool; and readily performed whatever was required. Affairs thus going on to the Captain's ſatisfaction, he made an excurſion into the country, accompanied by Mr. Anderſon and Mr. Webber, the former of whom was as well qualified to deſcribe with the pen, as the latter was to repreſent with his pencil, whatever might occur worthy of obſervation. In this excurſion, the Gentlemen, among other objects that called for their attention, found a Morai, a particular deſcription of which, together with drawings of it, are given in the Voyage. On the return of our Commander, he had the pleaſure of finding that a briſk trade for pigs, fowls, and roots was carrying on with the greateſt good order, and without any attempt to cheat, or ſteal, on the part of the natives. The rapacious diſpoſition they at firſt diſplayed, was entirely corrected by their conviction that it could not be exerciſed with impunity. Among the articles which they brought to barter, the moſt remarkable was a particular ſort of cloak and cap, that might be reckoned elegant, even in countries where dreſs is eminently the object of attention. The cloak was richly adorned with red and yellow feathers, which in themſelves were highly beautiful, and the newneſs and freſhneſs of which added not a little to their beauty. On the twenty-ſecond, a circumſtance occurred, which gave the Engliſh room to ſuſpect that the people of the Iſland are eaters of human fleſh. Not, however, to reſt the belief of the exiſtence of ſo horrid a practice on the foundation of ſuſpicion only, Captain Cook was anxious to enquire into the truth of the fact, the reſult of which was its being fully confirmed. An old man, in particular, who was aſked upon the ſubject, anſwered in the affirmative, and ſeemed to laugh at the ſimplicity of ſuch a queſtion. His anſwer was equally affirmative on a repetition of the enquiry; and he added that the fleſh of men was excellent food, or, as he expreſſed it, "ſavoury eating." It is underſtood that enemies ſlain in battle are the ſole objects of this abominable cuſtom. The Iſland at which our Voyagers had now touched, was called Atooi by the natives. Near it was another Iſland, named Oneeheow, where our Commander came to an anchor on the twenty-ninth of the month. The inhabitants were found to reſemble thoſe of Atooi in their diſpoſitions, manners, and cuſtoms; and proofs, too convincing, appeared that the horrid banquet of human fleſh is here as much reliſhed, amidſt plenty, as it is at New Zealand. From a deſire of benefiting theſe people, by furniſhing them with additional articles of food, the Captain left with them a ram-goat and two ewes, a boar and ſow pig of the Engliſh breed, and the ſeeds of melons, pumkins, and onions. Theſe benevolent preſents would have been made to Atooi, the larger Iſland, had not our Navigators been unexpectedly driven from it by ſtreſs of weather. Though the ſoil of Oneeheow ſeemed, in general, poor, it was obſervable, that the ground was covered with ſhrubs and plants, ſome of which perfumed the air with a more delicious fragrancy than what Captain Cook had met with at any other of the countries that had been viſited by him in this part of the world.

It is a curious circumſtance, with regard to the Iſlands in the Pacific Ocean which the late European voyages have added to the geography of the globe, that they have generally been found to lie in groups, or cluſters. The ſingle intermediate Iſlands, which have as yet been diſcovered, are few in proportion to the others; though there are probably many more of them that are ſtill unknown, and may ſerve as ſteps, by which the ſeveral cluſters are, in ſome degree, connected together. Of the Archipelago now firſt viſited, there were five only with which our Commander became at this time acquainted. The names of theſe, as given by the natives, were Woahoo, Atooi, Oneeheow, Oreehoua, and Tahoora. To the whole group Captain Cook gave the appellation of SANDWICH ISLANDS, in honour of his great friend and patron, the Earl of Sandwich [DD]. Concerning the Iſland of Atooi, which is the largeſt of the five, and which was the principal ſcene of the Captain's operations, he collected, in conjunction with Mr. Anderſon, a conſiderable degree of information. The land, as to its general appearance, does not in the leaſt reſemble any of the Iſlands that our Voyagers had hitherto viſited within the tropic, on the South ſide of the equator; excepting ſo far as regards its hills near the centre, which ſlope gently towards the ſea. Hogs, dogs, and fowls, were the only tame or domeſtic animals that were here found; and theſe were of the ſame kind with thoſe which exiſt in the countries of the South Pacific Ocean. Among the inhabitants (who are of a middle ſtature, and firmly made), there is a more remarkable equality in the ſize, colour, and figure of both ſexes, than our Commander had obſerved in moſt other places. They appeared to be bleſt with a frank and chearful diſpoſition; and, in Captain Cook's opinion, they are equally free from the fickle levity which diſtinguiſhes the natives of Otaheite, and the ſedate caſt diſcernible amongſt many of thoſe of Tongataboo. It is a very pleaſing circumſtance in their character, that they pay a particular attention to their women, and readily lend aſſiſtance to their wives, in the tender offices of maternal duty. On all occaſions, they ſeemed to be [DD] The Earl of Sandwich.] The Iſlands that were ſeen by Captain Cook, are ſituated in the latitude of 21° 30′ and 22° 15′ North, and between the longitude of 199° 20′ and 201° 30′ Eaſt. It was in conſequence of ſeventy-two ſets of lunar obſervations that the longitude was determined.

deeply

deeply impreſſed with a conſciouſneſs of their own inferiority; being alike ſtrangers to the prepoſterous pride of the more poliſhed Japoneſe, and of the ruder Greenlander. Contrary to the general practice of the countries that had hitherto been diſcovered in the Pacific Ocean, the people of the Sandwich Iſlands have not their ears perforated; nor have they the leaſt idea of wearing ornaments in them, though, in other reſpects, they are ſufficiently fond of adorning their perſons. In every thing manufactured by them there is an uncommon degree of neatneſs and ingenuity; and the elegant form and poliſh of ſome of their fiſhing-hooks could not be exceeded by any European artiſt, even if he ſhould add all his knowledge in deſign to the number and convenience of his tools. From what was ſeen of their agriculture, ſufficient proofs were afforded that they are not novices in that art; and that the quantity and goodneſs of their vegetable productions may as much be attributed to ſkilful culture, as to natural fertility of ſoil. Amidſt all the reſemblances between the natives of Atooi, and thoſe of Otaheite, the coincidence of their languages was the moſt ſtriking; being, almoſt word for word, the ſame. Had the Sandwich Iſlands been diſcovered by the Spaniards, at an early period, they would undoubtedly have taken advantage of ſo excellent a ſituation, and have made uſe of them as refreſhing places to their ſhips, which ſail annually from Acapulco for Manilla. Happy, too, would it have been for Lord Anſon, if he had known that there exiſted a group of Iſlands, half way between America and Tinian, where all his wants could effectually have been ſupplied, and the different hardſhips to which he was expoſed have been avoided (w).

(w) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 179—252.

On the ſecond of February, our Navigators purſued their courſe to the northward, in doing which the incidents they met with were almoſt entirely of a nautical kind. The long-looked for coaſt of New Albion was ſeen on the ſeventh of March, the ſhips being then in the latitude of 44° 33′ North, and in the longitude of 235° 20′ Eaſt. As the veſſels ranged along the Weſt ſide of America, Captain Cook gave names to ſeveral capes and head-lands which appeared in ſight. At length, on the twenty-ninth, the Captain came to an anchor at an inlet where the appearance of the country differed much from what had been ſeen before; being full of mountains, the ſummits of which were covered with ſnow; while the valleys between them, and the grounds on the ſea-coaſt, high as well as low, were covered, to a conſiderable breadth, with high, ſtraight trees, which formed a beautiful proſpect, as of one vaſt foreſt (x). It was immediately found that the coaſt was inhabited; and there ſoon came off to the Reſolution three canoes, containing eighteen of the natives; who could not, however, be prevailed upon to venture themſelves on board. Notwithſtanding this, they diſplayed a peaceable diſpoſition; ſhewed great readineſs to part with any thing they had, in exchange for what was offered them; and expreſſed a ſtronger deſire for iron than for any other of our commercial articles, appearing to be perfectly acquainted with the uſe of that metal. From theſe favourable circumſtances, our Voyagers had reaſon to hope that they ſhould find this a comfortable ſtation to ſupply all their wants, and to make them forget the hardſhips and delays which they had experienced during a conſtant ſucceſſion of adverſe winds, and boiſterous weather, almoſt ever ſince their arrival upon the coaſt of America (y). The ſhips having happily found an excellent inlet, the coaſts of which appeared to be inhabited by a race of people who were diſpoſed to maintain a friendly intercourſe with ſtrangers, Captain Cook's firſt object was to ſearch for a commodious harbour; and he had little trouble in diſcovering what he wanted. A trade having immediately commenced, the articles which the inhabitants offered to ſale were the ſkins of various animals, ſuch as bears, wolves, foxes, deer, rackoons, polecats, martins; and, in particular, of the ſea-otters. To theſe were added, beſides the ſkins in their native ſhape, garments made of them; another ſort of clothing, formed from the bark of a tree; and various different pieces of workmanſhip. But of all the articles brought to market, the moſt extraordinary were human ſkulls, and hands not yet quite ſtripped of their fleſh; ſome of which had evident marks of their having been upon the fire. The things which the natives took in exchange for their commodities, were knives, chiſſels, pieces of iron and tin, nails, looking-glaſſes, buttons, or any kind of metal. Glaſs beads did not ſtrike their imaginations; and cloth of every ſort they rejected. Though commerce, in general, was carried on with mutual honeſty, there were ſome among theſe people who were as much inclined to thievery as the Iſlanders in the Southern Ocean. They were, at the ſame time, far more dangerous thieves; for, poſſeſſing ſharp iron inſtruments, they could cut a hook from a tackle, or any other piece of iron from a rope, the moment that the backs of the Engliſh were turned. The dexterity with which they conducted their operations of this nature, frequently eluded the moſt cautious vigilance. Some ſlighter inſtances of deception, in the way of traffic, Captain Cook thought it better to bear with than to make them the foundation of a quarrel; and to this he was the rather determined, as the Engliſh articles were now reduced to objects of a trifling nature. In the progreſs of the commerce, the natives would deal for nothing but metal; and, at length, braſs was ſo eagerly ſought for, in preference to iron, that, before our Navigators quitted the place, ſcarcely a bit of it was left in the ſhips, excepting what belonged to the neceſſary inſtruments. Whole ſuits of clothes were ſtripped of every button; bureaus were deprived of their furniture; copper kettles, tin canniſters, candleſticks, and whatever of the

the like kind could be found, all went to wreck; ſo that theſe Americans became poſſeſſors of a greater medley and variety of things from our people, than any other nation that had been viſited in the courſe of the voyage. Of all the uncivilized tribes which our Commander had met with in his ſeveral navigations, he never found any who had ſuch ſtrict notions of their having a right to the excluſive property of every thing which their country produces, as the inhabitants of the Sound where he was now ſtationed. At firſt, they wanted to be paid for the wood and water that were carried on board; and had the Captain been upon the ſpot, when theſe demands were made, he would certainly have complied with them: but the workmen, in his abſence, maintained a different opinion, and refuſed to ſubmit to any ſuch claims. When ſome graſs, which appeared to be of no uſe to the natives, was wanted to be cut, as food for the few goats and ſheep which ſtill remained on board, they inſiſted that it ſhould be purchaſed, and were very unreaſonable in their terms; notwithſtanding which, Captain Cook conſented to gratify them, as far as he was able. It was always a ſacred rule with him never to take any of the property of the people whom he viſited, without making them an ample compenſation.

The grand operation of our Navigators, in their preſent ſtation, was to put the ſhips into a complete repair for the proſecution of the expedition. While this buſineſs was carrying on, our Commander took the opportunity of examining every part of the Sound; in the courſe of which he gained a farther knowledge of the inhabitants, who, in general, received him with great civility. In one inſtance he met with a ſurly Chief, who could not be ſoftened with preſents, though he condeſcended to accept of them. The females of the place over which he preſided, ſhewed a more agreeable diſpoſition; for ſome of the young women expeditiouſly dreſſed themſelves in their beſt apparel, and, aſſembling in a body, welcomed the Engliſh to their village, by joining in a ſong, which was far from being harſh or diſagreeable. On another occaſion, the Captain was entertained with ſinging. Being viſited by a number of ſtrangers, on the twenty-ſecond of April, as they advanced towards the ſhips, they all ſtood up in their canoes, and began to ſing. Some of their ſongs, in which the whole body joined, were in a ſlow, and others in a quicker time; and their notes were accompanied with the moſt regular motions of their hands; or with beating in concert, with their paddles, on the ſides of the canoes; to which were added other very expreſſive geſtures. At the end of each ſong, they continued ſilent for a few moments, and then began again, ſometimes pronouncing the word Hooee! forcibly as a chorus. Among the natives of the country, there was one Chief who attached himſelf to our Commander in a particular manner. Captain Cook having, at parting, beſtowed upon him a ſmall preſent, received, in return, a beaver ſkin, of much greater value. This called upon the Captain to make ſome addition to his preſent, with which the Chief was ſo much pleaſed, that he inſiſted on our Commander's acceptance of the beaver-ſkin cloak which he then wore; and of which he was particularly fond. Admiring this inſtance of generoſity, and deſirous that he ſhould not ſuffer by his friendſhip, the Captain gave him a new broad ſword, with a braſs hilt; the poſſeſſion of which rendered him completely happy (z).

(z) Cook, ubi ſupra, p. 269—286.

On Captain Cook's firſt arrival in this inlet, he had honoured it with the name of KING GEORGE'S SOUND; but he afterwards found that it is called NOOTKA by the natives (a). During his ſtay in the place, he diſplayed his uſual ſagacity and diligence, in conjunction with Mr. Anderſon, in collecting every thing that could be learned concerning the neighbouring country and its inhabitants; and the account is intereſting, as it exhibits a picture of productions, people, and manners very different from what had occurred in the Southern Ocean. I can only, as on former occaſions, ſlightly advert to a few of the more leading circumſtances. The climate, ſo far as our Navigators had experience of it, was found to be in an eminent degree milder than that on the Eaſt coaſt of America, in the ſame parallel of latitude; and it was remarkable that the thermometer, even in the night, never fell lower than 42°; while in the day it frequently roſe to 60°. With regard to trees, thoſe of which the woods are chiefly compoſed, are the Canadian pine, the white cypreſs, and the wild pine, with two or three different ſorts of pine that are leſs common. In the other vegetable productions there appeared but little variety: but it is to be conſidered that, at ſo early a ſeaſon, ſeveral might not yet have ſprung up; and that many more might be concealed from our Voyagers, in conſequence of the narrow ſphere of their reſearches. Of the land animals, the moſt common were bears, deer, foxes, and wolves. The ſea animals which were ſeen off the coaſt, were whales, porpoiſes, and ſeals. Birds, in general, are not only rare as to the different ſpecies, but very ſcarce as to numbers; and the few which are to be met with are ſo ſhy, that, in all probability, they are continually harraſſed by the natives; either to eat them as food, or to get poſſeſſion of their feathers, which are uſed as ornaments. Fiſh are more plentiful in quantity than birds, but were not found in any great variety; and yet, from ſeveral circumſtances, there was reaſon to believe, that the variety is conſiderably increaſed at certain ſeaſons. The only animals that were obſerved of the reptile kind were ſnakes and water-lizards; but the inſect tribe ſeemed to be more numerous. With reſpect to the inhabitants of the country, their perſons are generally under the common ſtature; but not ſlender in proportion, being uſually pretty full or plump, though without being muſcular. From their bringing to ſale human ſkulls and bones, it may juſtly be inferred that they treat their enemies with a degree of brutal cruelty; notwithſtanding which, it does not follow that they are to be reproached with any charge of peculiar inhumanity: for the circumſtance now mentioned only marks a general agreement of character with that of almoſt every tribe of uncivilized men, in every age, and in every part of the globe. Our Navigators had no reaſon to complain of the diſpoſition of the natives, who appeared to be a docile, courteous, good-natured people; rather phlegmatic in the uſual caſt of their tempers, but quick in reſenting what they apprehend to be an injury, and eaſily permitting their anger to ſubſide. Their other paſſions, and eſpecially their curioſity, ſeemed to lie in ſome meaſure dormant; one cauſe of which may be found in the indolence that, for the moſt part, is prevalent amongſt them. The chief employments of the men are thoſe of fiſhing, and of killing land or ſea-animals, for the ſuſtenance of their families; while the women are occupied in manufacturing their flaxen or woollen garments, or in other domeſtic offices. It muſt be mentioned to their honour, that they were always properly clothed, and behaved with the utmoſt decorum; juſtly deſerving all commendation, for a baſhfulneſs and modeſty becoming their ſex: and this was the more meritorious in them, as the male inhabitants diſcovered no ſenſe of ſhame. In their manufactures and mechanic arts, theſe people have arrived to a greater degree of extent and ingenuity, both with regard to the deſign and the execution, than could have been expected from their natural diſpoſition, and the little progreſs to which they have arrived in general civilization. Their dexterity, in particular, with reſpect to works of wood, muſt principally be aſcribed to the aſſiſtance they receive from iron tools, which are in univerſal uſe amongſt them, and in the application of which they are very dexterous. Whence they have derived their knowledge of iron, was a matter of ſpeculation with Captain Cook. The moſt probable opinion is, that this and other metals may have been introduced by way of Hudſon's Bay and Canada, and thus ſucceſſively have been conveyed acroſs the continent, from tribe to tribe. Nor is it unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that theſe metals may ſometimes be brought, in the ſame manner, from the North-weſtern parts of Mexico [EE]. The language of Nootka is by no means harſh or diſagreeable; for it abounds, upon the whole, rather with what may be called labial and dental, than with guttural ſounds. A large vocabulary of it was collected by Mr. Anderſon. Whilſt Captain Cook was at Nootka Sound, great attention was paid by him, as uſual, to aſtronomical and nautical ſubjects. The obſervations which he had an opportunity of making were, indeed, ſo numerous, as to form a very conſiderable addition to geographical and philoſophical ſcience (b).

(a) The entrance of the Sound is ſituated in the Eaſt corner of Hope Bay, in the latitude of 49° 33′ North, and in the longitude of 233° 12′ Eaſt.

On the twenty-ſixth, the repairs of the ſhips having been completed, every thing was ready for the Captain's departure. When, in the afternoon of that day, the veſſels were upon the point of ſailing, the mercury in the barometer fell unuſually low; and there was every other preſage of an approaching ſtorm, which might reaſonably be expected to come from the ſouthward. This circumſtance induced our Commander in ſome degree to heſitate, and eſpecially as night was at hand, whether he ſhould venture to ſail, or wait till the next morning. But his anxious impatience to proceed upon the voyage, and the fear of loſing the preſent opportunity of getting out of the Sound, made a greater impreſſion upon his mind than any apprehenſion of immediate danger. He determined, therefore, to put to ſea at all events; and accordingly carried his deſign into execution that evening. He was not deceived in his expectations of a ſtorm. Scarcely were the veſſels out of the Sound before the wind increaſed to a ſtrong gale, with ſqualls and rain, accompanied by ſo dark a ſky, that the length of the ſhips could not be ſeen. Happily the wind took a direction that blew our Navigators from the coaſt; and though, on the twenty-ſeventh, the tempeſt roſe to a perfect hurricane, and the Reſolution ſprang a leak, no material damage enſued. In the proſecution of the Voyage to the North, and back again to the Sandwich Iſlands, the facts that occurred were chiefly of a nautical kind. Minutely to record theſe, is not the purpoſe of the preſent work, and indeed, would extend it to an unreaſonable length. Recourſe muſt be had to the Voyage at large, for a detail of every circumſtance in which Captain Cook, as a Navigator, was concerned. In that Voyage will be found a full and exact account of the coaſts which he paſſed, the capes and promontories to which he gave names, the bays which he entered, the iſlands he diſcovered, the traverſes he made, the latitudes and longitudes that were ſettled by him, and the variations that happened in the wind and the weather. From this long and important navigation, I can only ſelect ſome few incidents, that may be accommodated to the taſte and expectations of the generality of readers. One thing it is not improper here to obſerve; which is, that the Captain, in his paſſage along the coaſt of America, kept at a diſtance from that coaſt, whenever the wind blew ſtrongly upon it, and ſailed on till he could approach it again with ſafety. Hence ſeveral great gaps were left unexplored, and particularly between the latitudes of 50° and 55°. The exact ſituation, for inſtance, of the [EE] From the North-weſtern parts of Mexico.] Two ſilver ſpoons, of a conſtruction ſimilar to what may ſometimes be ſeen in Flemiſh pictures of ſtill life, were procured here by Mr. Gore, who bought them from a native, who wore them, tied together with a leathern thong, as an ornament round his neck. Mr. Gore gave the ſpoons to Sir Joſeph Banks.

ſuppoſed Straits of Anian was not aſcertained. Every one who is acquainted with the character of our Commander will be ſenſible, that if he had lived to return again to the North in 1779, he would have endeavoured to explore the parts which had been left unexamined. The firſt place at which Captain Cook landed, after his departure from Nootka Sound, was at an Iſland, of eleven or twelve leagues in length, the South-weſt point of which lies in the latitude of 59° 49′ North, and the longitude of 216° 58′ Eaſt. Here, on the eleventh of May, at the foot of a tree, on a little eminence not far from the ſhore, he left a bottle, with a paper in it, on which were inſcribed the names of the ſhips, and the date of the diſcovery. Together with the bottle, he encloſed two ſilver two-penny pieces of his Majeſty's coin, which had been ſtruck in 1772. Theſe, with many others, had been given him by the Reverend Dr. Kaye, the preſent Dean of Lincoln; and our Commander, as a mark of his eſteem and regard for that learned and reſpectable Gentleman, named the Iſland, after him, KAYE'S ISLAND. At an inlet, where the ſhips came to an anchor, on the twelfth, and to which Captain Cook gave the appellation of PRINCE WILLIAM'S SOUND, he had an opportunity not only of ſtopping the leak which the Reſolution had ſprung in the late ſtorm, and of proſecuting his nautical and geographical diſcoveries, but of making conſiderable additions to his knowledge of the inhabitants of the American coaſt. From every obſervation which was made concerning the perſons of the natives of this part of the coaſt, it appeared that they had a ſtriking reſemblance to thoſe of the Eſquimaux and Greenlanders. Their canoes, their weapons, and their inſtruments for fiſhing and hunting, are likewiſe exactly the ſame, in point of materials and conſtruction, that are uſed in Greenland. The animals in the neighbourhood of Prince William's Sound are, in general, ſimilar to thoſe which are found at Nootka. One of the moſt beautiful ſkins here offered to ſale, was, however, that of a ſmall animal, which ſeemed to be peculiar to the place. Mr. Anderſon was inclined to think that it is the animal which is deſcribed by Mr. Pennant, under the name of the Caſan Marmot. Among the birds ſeen in this country, were the white-headed eagle; the ſhag; and the Alcedo, or great king-fiſher, the colours of which were very fine and bright. The humming-bird, alſo, came frequently and flew about the ſhip, while at anchor; but it can ſcarcely be ſuppoſed that it can be able to ſubſiſt here during the ſeverity of winter. Water-fowl, upon the whole, are in conſiderable plenty; and there is a ſpecies of diver, about the ſize of a partridge, which ſeems peculiar to the place. Torſk and halibut were almoſt the only kinds of fiſh that were obtained by our Voyagers. Vegetables, of any ſort, were few in number; and the trees were chiefly the Canadian and ſpruce pine, ſome of which were of a conſiderable height and thickneſs. The beads and iron that were found among the people of the coaſt, muſt undoubtedly have been derived from ſome civilized nation: and yet there was ample reaſon to believe, that our Engliſh navigators were the firſt Europeans with whom the natives had ever held a direct communication. From what quarter, then, had they gotten our manufactures? Moſt probably, through the intervention of the more inland tribes, from Hudſon's Bay, or the ſettlements on the Canadian lakes. This, indeed, muſt certainly have been the caſe, if iron was known amongſt the inhabitants of this part of the American coaſt, prior to the diſcovery of it by the Ruſſians, and before there was any traffic with them carried on from Kamtſchatka. From what was ſeen of Prince William's Sound, Captain Cook judged that it occupied, at leaſt, a degree and a half of latitude, and two of longitude, excluſively of the arms or branches, the extent of which is not known (c).

(c) Cook's Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 286. 341. 349, 350. 354. 362. 366. 371. 376, 377. 378. 380.

Some days after leaving this Sound, our Navigators came to an inlet, from which great things were expected. Hopes were ſtrongly entertained, that it would be found to communicate either with the ſea to the North, or with Baffin's or Hudſon's Bay to the Eaſt; and accordingly, it became the object of very accurate and ſerious examination. The Captain was ſoon perſuaded that the expectations formed from it were groundleſs; notwithſtanding which, he perſiſted in the ſearch of a paſſage, more, indeed, to ſatisfy other people, than to confirm his own opinion. In conſequence of a complete inveſtigation of the inlet, indubitable marks occurred of its being a river. This river, without ſeeing the leaſt appearance of its ſource, was traced by our Voyagers, as high as the latitude of 61° 30′, and the longitude of 210°, being ſeventy leagues from its entrance. During the courſe of the navigation, on the firſt of June, Lieutenant King was ordered on ſhore, to diſplay the royal flag, and to take poſſeſſion of the country in his Majeſty's name. The Lieutenant, at the ſame time, buried in the ground a bottle, containing ſome pieces of Engliſh coin, of the year 1772, and a paper, on which the names of the ſhips were inſcribed, and the date of the preſent diſcovery. The great river now diſcovered, promiſes to vie with the moſt conſiderable ones already known; and, by itſelf and its branches, lies open to a very extenſive inland communication. If, therefore, the knowledge of it ſhould be of future ſervice, the time which was ſpent in exploring it ought the leſs to be regretted. But to Captain Cook, who had a much greater object in view, the delay that was hence occaſioned was a real loſs, becauſe the ſeaſon was advancing apace. It was, however, a ſatisfaction to him to reflect, that if he had not examined this very conſiderable inlet, it would have been aſſumed, by ſpeculative fabricators of geography, as a fact, that there was a paſſage through it to the North

North Sea, or to Baffin's or Hudſon's Bay. Perhaps, too, it would have been marked, on future maps of the world, with greater preciſion, and more certain ſigns of reality, than the inviſible, becauſe imaginary, Straits of de Euca, and de Fonte. In deſcribing the inlet, our Commander had left a blank which was not filled up with any particular name; and, therefore, the Earl of Sandwich directed, with the greateſt propriety, that it ſhould be called COOK's RIVER. All the natives who were met with, during the examination of this river, appeared, from every mark of reſemblance, to be of the ſame nation with the inhabitants of Prince William's Sound; but from the people of Nootka, or King George's Sound, they eſſentially differed, both in their perſons and their language. The only things which were ſeen among them, that were not of their own manufacture, were a few glaſs beads, the iron points of their ſpears, and knives of the ſame metal. Whenceſoever theſe articles might be derived, it was evident that they had never had any immediate intercourſe with the Ruſſians; ſince, if that had been the caſe, our Voyagers would ſcarcely have found them clothed in ſuch valuable ſkins as thoſe of the ſea-otter. A very beneficial fur-trade might undoubtedly be carried on with the inhabitants of this vaſt coaſt. But, without a practicable northern paſſage, the ſituation is too remote to render it probable that Great Britain ſhould hence ever derive any material advantage; though it is impoſſible to ſay, with certainty, how far the ſpirit of commerce, for which the Engliſh nation is ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed, may extend [FF]. The moſt valuable, or rather the only valuable ſkins, which Captain Cook ſaw on the Weſt ſide of America, were thoſe of the ſea-otter; for as to the ſkins of all the other animals of the country, and eſpecially of the foxes and martins, they ſeemed to be of an inferior quality (d).

It was on the ſixth of June that our Navigators got clear of Cook's river. Proceeding in the courſe of their diſcoveries, when they were ſailing, on the nineteenth, amidſt the group of Iſlands which were called by Beering, Schumagin's Iſlands, Captain Clerke fired three guns, and brought to, expreſſing, by the proper ſignals, that he wiſhed to ſpeak with Captain Cook. At this our Commander was not a little alarmed; and, as no apparent danger had been remarked in the paſſage through the channel where the veſſels now were, it was apprehended that ſome accident, ſuch as ſpringing a leak, muſt have happened. On Captain Clerke's coming on board the Reſolution, he related that ſeveral of the natives had followed his ſhip; that one of them had made many ſigns, taking off his cap, and bowing after the manner of Europeans; and that, at length, he had faſtened to a rope, which was handed down to him, a ſmall thin wooden caſe or box. Having delivered his parcel ſafe, and ſpoken ſomething, accompanied with more ſigns, the canoes dropped aſtern, and left the Diſcovery. On opening the box, a piece of paper was found, folded up carefully, upon which ſomething was written, that was reaſonably ſuppoſed to be in the Ruſſian language. To the paper was prefixed the date 1778, and in the body of the note there was a reference to the year 1776. Although no perſon on board was learned enough to decypher the alphabet of the writer, his numerals ſufficiently marked that others had preceded our Voyagers in viſiting this dreary part of the globe; and the proſpect of ſoon meeting with men who were united to them in ties ſomewhat cloſer than thoſe of our common nature, and who were not ſtrangers to the arts and commerce of civilized life, could not but afford a ſenſible ſatisfaction to people who, for ſuch a length of time, had been converſant with the ſavages of the Pacific Ocean, and of the North American continent. Captain Clerke was, at firſt, of opinion that ſome Ruſſians had been ſhipwrecked; but no ſuch idea occurred to Captain Cook. He rather thought that the paper contained a note of information, left by ſome Ruſſian traders, to be delivered to the next of their countrymen who ſhould arrive; and that the natives, ſeeing the Engliſh paſs, and ſuppoſing them to be Ruſſians, had reſolved to bring off the note. Accordingly, our Commander purſued his voyage, without enquiring farther into the matter. On the twenty-firſt, amongſt ſome hills, on the main land, that towered above the clouds to a moſt amazing height, one was diſcovered to have a volcano, which continually threw up vaſt columns of black ſmoke. It doth not ſtand far from the coaſt; and it lies in the latitude of 54° 48′, and the longitude of 195° 45′. This mountain was rendered remarkable by its figure, which is a complete cone; and the volcano is at the very ſummit. While, in the afternoon of the ſame day, during a calm of three hours, the Engliſh were fiſhing with great ſucceſs for halibuts, a ſmall canoe, conducted by one man, came to them from an Iſland in the neighbourhood. On approaching the ſhip, he took off his cap, and bowed, as the native had done, who had viſited the Diſcovery a day or two before. From the acquired politeneſs of theſe people, as well as from the note already mentioned, it was evident that the Ruſſians muſt have a communication and traffic with them; and of this a freſh proof occurred in the preſent viſiter; for he wore a pair of green cloth breeches, and a jacket of black cloth, or ſtuff, under the gut-ſhirt or frock of his own country. In the proſecution of the voyage, on the twenty-ſixth, there was ſo thick a fog, that our Navigators could not [FF] May extend.] Several ſhips have been fitted out from our ſettlements in India, as well as in England, on the ſpeculation of this fur-trade. However, little benefit hath hitherto accrued from it, excepting to the proprietors of the firſt veſſel; the cargo which it carried having lowered the price of furs extremely in the China market.

ſee a hundred yards before them; notwithſtanding which, as the weather was moderate, the Captain did not intermit his courſe. At length, however, being alarmed at the ſound of breakers on one ſide of the ſhip, he immediately brought her to, and came to an anchor; and the Diſcovery, by his order, did the ſame. A few hours after, the fog having in ſome degree cleared away, it appeared that both the veſſels had eſcaped a very imminent danger. Providence, in the dark, had conducted them between rocks which our Commander would not have ventured to paſs through in a clear day, and had conveyed them to an anchoring-place, as good as he could poſſibly have fixed upon, had the choice been entirely at his option. On the twenty-ſeventh, our Voyagers reached an Iſland, that is known by the name of Oonalaſhka [GG]; the inhabitants of which behaved with a degree of politeneſs uncommon to ſavage tribes. A young man, who had overſet his canoe, being obliged by this accident to come on board the ſhip, went down into Captain Cook's cabin, upon the firſt invitation, without expreſſing the leaſt reluctance or uneaſineſs. His own clothes being wet, the Captain gave him others, in which he dreſſed himſelf with as much eaſe as any Engliſhman could have done. From the behaviour of this youth, and that of ſome of the reſt of the natives, it was evident that theſe people were no ſtrangers to Europeans, and to ſeveral of their cuſtoms. There was ſomething, however, in the Engliſh ſhips that greatly excited their attention; for ſuch as could not come off in canoes, aſſembled on the neighbouring hills to look at them. In one inſtance it was apparent that the inhabitants were ſo far from having made any progreſs in politeneſs, that they were ſtill immerſed in the moſt ſavage manners. For as our Commander was walking along the ſhore, on the twenty-ninth, he met with a group of them, of both ſexes, who were ſeated on the graſs, at a repaſt, conſiſting of raw fiſh, which they ſeemed to eat with as much reliſh as perſons in civilized life would experience from a turbot, ſerved up in the richeſt ſauce. Soon after the veſſels had come to an anchor at Oonalaſhka, a native of the Iſland brought on board ſuch another note as had been given to Captain Clerke. He preſented it to Captain Cook; but, as it was written in the Ruſſian language, and could be of no uſe to the Engliſh, though it might be of conſequence to others, the Captain returned it to the bearer, and diſmiſſed him with a few preſents; for which he expreſſed his thanks by making ſeveral low bows as he retired (e). On the ſecond of July, our Voyagers put to ſea from Oonalaſhka; and, purſuing their courſe of navigation and diſcovery, came, on the ſixteenth, within ſight of a promontory, near which our Commander ordered Lieutenant Williamſon to land, that he might ſee what direction the coaſt took beyond it, and what the country produced. Accordingly, Mr. Williamſon went on ſhore, and reported, on his return, that having landed on the point, and climbed the higheſt hill, he found that the fartheſt part of the coaſt in ſight bore nearly North. At the ſame time, he took poſſeſſion of the country in his Majeſty's name, and left a bottle, in which was encloſed a piece of paper, containing an inſcription of the names of the ſhips, together with the date of the diſcovery. To the promontory he gave the name of Cape NEWENHAM (f). The land, as far as Mr. Williamſon could ſee, produces neither tree nor ſhrub; but the lower grounds were not deſtitute of graſs, and of ſome other plants, very few of which were in flower.

When our Navigators, on the third of Auguſt, had advanced to the latitude of 62° 34′, a great loſs was ſuſtained by them in the death of Mr. Anderſon, the Surgeon of the Reſolution, who had been lingering under a conſumption for more than twelve months. He was a young man of a cultivated underſtanding and agreeable manners, and was well ſkilled in his own profeſſion; beſides which, he had acquired a conſiderable degree of knowledge in other branches of ſcience. How uſeful an aſſiſtant he was to Captain Cook, hath often appeared in the preſent narrative, and is fully diſplayed in the Voyage at large. Had his life been ſpared, the public would undoubtedly have received from him ſuch communications, on various parts of the natural hiſtory of the ſeveral places that had been viſited, as would juſtly have entitled him to very high commendation. The proofs of his abilities that now remain, will hand down the name of Anderſon, in conjunction with that of Cook, to poſterity [HH]. Soon after he had breathed his laſt, land having been ſeen at a diſtance, which was ſuppoſed to be an Iſland, our Commander honoured it with the appellation of ANDERSON'S ISLAND. The next day he removed Mr. Law, the Surgeon of the Diſcovery, into the Reſolution, and appointed Mr. Samwell, the Surgeon's firſt Mate of the Reſolution, to be Surgeon of the Diſcovery. On the ninth, Captain Cook came to an anchor under a point of land, to which he gave the name of CAPE PRINCE OF WALES, and which is remarkable by being the moſt weſtern extremity of America hitherto explored (g). This extremity is diſtant from the eaſtern Cape of Siberia only thirteen

leagues: and thus our Commander had the glory of aſcertaining the vicinity of the two continents, which had only been conjectured from the reports of the neighbouring Aſiatic inhabitants, and the imperfect obſervations of the Ruſſian navigators (b). Reſuming his courſe on the tenth, Captain Cook anchored in a bay, the land of which was at firſt ſuppoſed to be a part of the Iſland of Alaſchka, which is laid down in Mr. Stæhlin's map. But, from the figure of the coaſt; from the ſituation of the oppoſite ſhore of America; and from the longitude, the Captain ſoon began to think that it was more probably the country of the Tſchutſki, on the eaſtern extremity of Aſia, which had been explored by Beering in 1728. In the reſult it appeared that this was in fact the caſe. Our Commander became fully ſatisfied, in the farther progreſs of his voyage, that Mr. Stæhlin's map muſt be erroneous; and he had the honour of reſtoring the American continent to that ſpace which the geographer now mentioned had occupied with his imaginary Iſland of Alaſchka. From the Bay of St. Lawrence, belonging to the country of the Tſchutſki, our Navigators ſteered, on the eleventh, to the Eaſt, in order to get nearer to the coaſt of America. After that, proceeding to the North, they reached, on the ſeventeenth, the latitude of 70° 33′ (i). On this day, a brightneſs was perceived in the northern horizon, like that which is reflected from ice, and is commonly called the blink. This was at firſt but little noticed, from a ſuppoſition that there was no probability of meeting with ice ſo ſoon: and yet, the ſharpneſs of the air, and the gloomineſs of the weather, had, for two or three days paſt, ſeemed to indicate a ſudden change. In about an hour's time, the ſight of a large field of ice left Captain Cook no longer in doubt with regard to the cauſe of the brightneſs of the horizon. The ſhips, in the ſame afternoon, being then in the latitude of 70° 41′, were cloſe to the edge of the ice, and not able to ſtand on any farther. On the eighteenth, when the veſſels were in the latitude of 70° 44′, the ice on the ſide of them was as compact as a wall, and was judged to be at leaſt ten or twelve feet in height. Farther to the North, it appeared to be much higher. Its ſurface was extremely rugged, and in different places there were ſeen upon it pools of water. A prodigious number of ſea-horſes lay upon the ice; and ſome of them, on the nineteenth, were procured for food, there being at this time a want of freſh proviſions. When the animals were brought to the veſſels, it was no ſmall diſappointment to many of the ſeamen, who had feaſted their eyes for ſeveral days with the proſpect of eating them, to find that they were not ſea-cows, as they had ſuppoſed, but ſea-horſes. This diſappointment would not have been occaſioned, or the difference known, had there not happened to be one or two ſailors on board who had been in Greenland, and who declared what theſe animals were, and that it never was cuſtomary to eat of them. Such, however, was the anxiety for a change of diet, as to overcome this prejudice. Our Voyagers lived upon the ſea-horſes as long as they laſted; and there were few who did not prefer them to the ſalt meat. Captain Cook continued, to the twenty-ninth, to traverſe the Icy Sea beyond Beering's Strait, in various directions, and through numberleſs obſtructions and difficulties. Every day the ice increaſed, ſo as to preclude all hopes of attaining, at leaſt during the preſent year, the grand object of the voyage. Indeed, the ſeaſon was now ſo far advanced, and the time in which the froſt was expected to ſet in was ſo near at hand, that it would have been totally inconſiſtent with prudence, to have made any farther attempts, till the next ſummer, at finding a paſſage into the Atlantic. The attention, therefore, of our Commander was now directed to other important and neceſſary concerns. It was of great conſequence to meet with a place where our Navigators might be ſupplied with wood and water. But the point which principally occupied the Captain's thoughts was, how he ſhould ſpend the winter, ſo as to make ſome improvements in geography and navigation, and, at the ſame time, to be in a condition to return to the North, in farther ſearch of a paſſage, in the enſuing ſummer (k). Before Captain Cook proceeded far to the South, he employed a conſiderable time in examining the ſea and coaſts in the neighbourhood of Beering's Strait, both on the ſide of Aſia and America. In this examination, he aſcertained the accuracy of Beering, ſo far as he went; demonſtrated the errors with which Stæhlin's map of the New Northern Archipelago abounds; and made large additions to the geographical knowledge of this part of the world. "It reflects," as Mr. Coxe juſtly obſerves, "the higheſt honour even "on the Britiſh name, that our great Navigator extended his diſcoveries much farther in "one expedition, and at ſo great a diſtance from the point of his departure, than the "Ruſſians accompliſhed in a long ſeries of years, and in parts belonging or contiguous to "their own empire (l)."

On the ſecond of October, our Voyagers came within ſight of the Iſland of Conalaſhka, and anchored the next day in Samganoodah harbour. Here the firſt concern was to put the ſhips under the neceſſary repair; and, while the Carpenters were employed in this buſineſs, one third of the people had permiſſion, by turns, to go and collect the berries with which the Iſland abounds, and which, though now beginning to be in a ſtate of decay, did not a little contribute, in conjunction with ſpruce-beer, effectually to eradicate every ſeed of the ſcurvy that might exiſt in either of the veſſels. Such a ſupply of fiſh was likewiſe procured, as not only ſerved for preſent conſumption, but afforded a quantity to be carried out to ſea; ſo that hence a conſiderable ſaving was made of the proviſions of the ſhips, which was at this time an object of no ſmall importance. Captain Cook, on the eighth, received, by the hands of an Oonalaſhka man, named Derramouſhk, a very ſingular preſent, which was that of a rye loaf, or rather a pye in the form of a loaf, for it encloſed ſome ſalmon, highly ſeaſoned with pepper. This man had the like preſent for Captain Clerke, and a note for each of the two Captains, written in a character which none on board could underſtand. It was natural to ſuppoſe, that the preſents came from ſome Ruſſians in the neighbourhood; and therefore a few bottles of rum, wine, and porter, were ſent to theſe unknown friends in return; it being rightly judged that ſuch articles would be more acceptable than any thing beſides which it was in the power of our Navigators to beſtow. Corporal Lediard of the Marines [II], an intelligent man, was, at the ſame time, directed to accompany Derramouſhk, for the purpoſe of gaining farther information; and with orders, if he met with any Ruſſians, that he ſhould endeavour to make them underſtand that our Voyagers were Engliſhmen, and the friends and allies of their nation. On the tenth, the Corporal returned with three Ruſſian ſeamen, or furriers, who, with ſeveral others, reſided at Egoochſhac, where they had a dwelling-houſe, ſome ſtore-houſes, and a ſloop of about thirty tons burthen. One of theſe men was either Maſter or mate of this veſſel; another of them wrote a very good hand, and was acquainted with figures; and all of them were ſenſible and well-behaved perſons, who were ready to give Captain Cook every poſſible degree of information. The great difficulty in the reception and communication of intelligence, aroſe from the want of an interpreter. On the fourteenth, a Ruſſian landed at Oonalaſhka, whoſe name was Eraſim Gregorioff Sin Iſinyloff, and who was the principal perſon among his countrymen in this and the neighbouring Iſlands. Beſides the intelligence which our Commander derived from his converſations with Iſmyloff, and which were carried on by ſigns, aſſiſted by figures and other characters, he obtained from him the ſight of two charts, and was permitted to copy them. Both of them were manuſcripts, and bore every mark of authenticity. The firſt included the Penſhinſkian Sea; the coaſt of Tartary, down to the latitude of 41°; the Kuril Iſlands; and the peninſula of Kamtſchatka. But it was the ſecond chart that was the moſt intereſting to Captain Cook; for it comprehended all the diſcoveries made by the Ruſſians to the eaſtward of Kamtſchatka, towards America; which, however, excluſively of the Voyages of Beering and Tſcherikoff, amounted to little or nothing. Indeed, all the people with whom the Captain converſed at Oonalaſhka, agreed in aſſuring him, over and over again, that they knew of no other Iſlands, beſides thoſe which were laid down upon this chart; and that no Ruſſians had ever ſeen any part of the continent of America to the northward, excepting that which lies oppoſite to the country of the Tſchutſkis. When, on the twenty-firſt, Mr. Iſmyloff took his final leave of the Engliſh Navigators, our Commander entruſted to his care a letter to the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, in which was encloſed a chart of all the northern coaſts the Captain had viſited. It was expected that there would be an opportunity of ſending this letter, in the enſuing ſpring, to Kamtſchatka or Okotſk, and that it would reach Peterſburgh during the following winter. Mr. Iſmyloff, who faithfully and ſucceſsfully diſcharged the truſt our Commander had repoſed in him, ſeemed to poſſeſs abilities that might entitle him to a higher ſtation in life than that which he [II] Corporal Lediard of the marines.] This Corporal Lediard is an extraordinary man, ſomething of whoſe hiſtory cannot fail of being entertaining to my readers. In the winter of 1786, he ſet out on the ſingular undertaking of walking acroſs the continent of America; for the accompliſhment of which purpoſe, he determined to travel by the way of Siberia, and to procure a paſſage from that country to the oppoſite American coaſt. Being an American by birth, and having no means of raiſing the money neceſſary for his expences, a ſubſcription was raiſed for him by Sir Joſeph Banks, and ſome other Gentlemen, amounting, in the whole, to a little more than fifty pounds. With this ſum he proceeded to Hamburgh, from which place he went to Copenhagen, and thence to Peterſburgh, where he arrived in the beginning of March, 1787. In his journey from Copenhagen to Peterſburgh, finding that the gulph of Bothnia was not frozen over, he was obliged to walk round the whole of it, by Tornæo. At Peterſburgh he ſtayed till the twenty-firſt of May, when he obtained leave to accompany a convoy of military ſtores, which at that time was proceeding to Mr. Billings, who had been his ſhip-mate in Captain Cook's Voyage, and who was then employed by the Empreſs of Ruſſia, for the purpoſe of making diſcoveries in Siberia, and on the North-weſt coaſt of America. With this convoy Mr. Lediard ſet out, and in Auguſt reached the city of Irkutſk in Siberia. After that, he proceeded to the town of Yakutſk, where he met with Captain Billings. From this place he went back to Irkutſk, to ſpend a part of the winter; propoſing, in the ſpring, to return to Yakutſk, in order to proceed in the ſummer to Okotſk.

Hitherto Mr. Lediard had gone on proſperouſly, and flattered himſelf with the hopes of ſucceeding in his undertaking. But, in January laſt (1788) in conſequence of an expreſs from the Empreſs, he was arreſted, and, in half an hour's time, carried away, under the guard of two ſoldiers and an officer, in a poſt ſledge, for Moſcow, without his clothes, money, and papers. From Moſcow he was conveyed to the city of Moialoff in White Ruſſia, and thence to the town of Tolochin in Poland. There he was informed, that her Majeſty's orders were, that he was never to enter her dominions again without her expreſs permiſſion. During all this time, he ſuffered the greateſt hardſhips, from ſickneſs, fatigue, and want of reſt; ſo that he was almoſt reduced to a ſkeleton. From Tolochin he made his way to Konigſberg, having had, as he ſays, a miſerable journey, in a miſerable country, in a miſerable ſeaſon, in miſerable health, and a miſerable purſe; and diſappointed of his darling enterprize. Mr. Lediard informs Sir Joſeph Banks, to whom he ſent, from time to time, a full account of his tranſactions, that, though he had been retarded in his purſuits by malice, he had not travelled totally in vain; his obſervations in Aſia being, perhaps, as complete as a longer viſit would have rendered them. From his laſt letter it appears, that he propoſed to return, as ſpeedily as poſſible, from Konigſberg to England.

For the preceding intelligence I am wholly indebted to the obliging information of Sir Joſeph Banks.

occupied. He had a conſiderable knowledge of aſtronomy, and was acquainted with the moſt uſeful branches of the mathematics. Captain Cook made him a preſent of an Hadley's octant; and, though it was probably the firſt he had ever ſeen, he underſtood, in a very ſhort time, the various uſes to which that inſtrument can be applied. While the ſhips lay at Oonalaſhka, our Voyagers did not neglect to make a diligent enquiry into the productions of the Iſland, and the general manners of the inhabitants. On theſe, as being in a great meaſure ſimilar to objects which have already been noticed, it is not neceſſary to enlarge. There is one circumſtance, however, ſo honourable to the natives, that it muſt not be omitted. They are, to all appearance, the moſt peaceable and inoffenſive people our Commander had ever met with; and, with reſpect to honeſty, they might ſerve as a pattern to countries that are in the higheſt ſtate of civilization. A doubt is ſuggeſted, whether this diſpoſition may not have been the conſequence of their preſent ſubjection to the Ruſſians. From the affinity which was found to ſubſiſt between the dialects of the Greenlanders and Eſquimaux, and thoſe of the inhabitants of Norton's Sound [KK] and Oonalaſhka, there is ſtrong reaſon to believe, that all theſe nations are of the ſame extraction; and, if that be the caſe, the exiſtence of a northern communication of ſome kind, by ſea, between the Weſt ſide of America and the Eaſt ſide, through Baffin's Bay, can ſcarcely be doubted; which communication, nevertheleſs, may effectually be ſhut up againſt ſhips, by ice and other impediments. While the veſſels lay in Samganoodha harbour, Captain Cook exerted his uſual diligence in making nautical and aſtronomical obſervations. All things, on the twenty-ſixth, having been gotten ready for his departure, he put to ſea on that day, and ſailed for the Sandwich Iſlands; it being his intention to ſpend a few months there, and then to direct his courſe to Kamtſchatka, ſo as to endeavour to reach that country by the middle of May, in the enſuing ſummer (m).

On the twenty-ſixth of November, when the ſhips had proceeded ſouthward till they came to the latitude of 20° 55′, land was diſcovered, which proved to be an Iſland of the name of Mowee, that had not hitherto been viſited. It is one of the group of the Sandwich Iſlands. As it was of the laſt importance to procure a ſupply of proviſions at theſe Iſlands, and experience had taught our Commander, that he could have no chance of ſucceeding in this object, if it were left to every man's diſcretion to traffic for what he pleaſed, and in what manner he pleaſed; the Captain publiſhed an order, prohibiting all perſons from trading, excepting ſuch as ſhould be appointed by himſelf and Captain Clerke. Even theſe perſons were enjoined to trade only for proviſions and refreſhments. While our Navigators lay off Mowee, which was for ſome days, a friendly intercourſe was maintained with the inhabitants. Another Iſland was diſcovered on the thirtieth, which is called by the natives Owhyhee. As it appeared to be of greater extent and importance than any of the Iſlands which had yet been viſited in this part of the world, Captain Cook ſpent nearly ſeven weeks in ſailing round, and examining its coaſt. Whilſt he was thus employed, the inhabitants came off, from time to time, in their canoes, and readily engaged in traffic with our Voyagers. In the conduct of this buſineſs, the behaviour of the Iſlanders was more entirely free from ſuſpicion and reſerve than our Commander had ever yet experienced. Not even the people of Otaheite itſelf, with whom he had been ſo intimately and repeatedly connected, had diſplayed ſuch a full confidence in the integrity and good treatment of the Engliſh. Among the articles procured from the natives, was a quantity of ſugar-cane. Upon a trial, Captain Cook found that a ſtrong decoction of it produced a very palatable beer; on which account, he ordered ſome more to be brewed, for general uſe. When, however, the barrel was broached, not one of the crew would taſte of the liquor. As the Captain had no motive in preparing this beverage, but that of ſparing the rum and other ſpirits for a colder climate, he did not exert either authority or perſuaſion to prevail upon the men to change their reſolution; for he knew that there was no danger of the ſcurvy, ſo long as a plentiful ſupply could be obtained of different vegetables. Nevertheleſs, that he might not be diſappointed in his views, he gave orders that no grog ſhould be ſerved in the ſhips; and he himſelf, together with the officers, continued to make uſe of the ſugar-cane beer, which was much improved by the addition of a few hops, that chanced to be ſtill on board. There could be no reaſonable doubt of its being a very wholeſome liquor; and yet the inconſiderate crew alledged that it would be injurious to their health. No people are more averſe to every kind of innovation than ſeamen, and their prejudices are extremely difficult to be conquered. It was, however, by acting contrary to theſe prejudices, and by various deviations from eſtabliſhed practice, that Captain Cook had been enabled to preſerve his men from that dreadful diſtemper, the ſcurvy, which, perhaps, has deſtroyed more of our ſailors, in their peaceful voyages, than have fallen by the enemy in military expeditions. As the Captain was purſuing his examination of the coaſt of Owhyhee, it having fallen calm at one o'clock in the morning of the nineteenth of December, the Reſolution was left to the mercy of a North-eaſterly ſwell, which impelled her faſt towards the land; ſo that, long before day-break, lights were ſeen from the land, which was not more than a league diſtant. The night, at the ſame time, was dark, with thunder, lightning, and rain. As ſoon as it was light, a dreadful ſurf, within half a league of the veſſel, appeared breaking from the ſhore; and it was evident that our Navigators had been in the moſt perilous ſituation: nor was the danger yet over; for, in conſequence of the veering of the wind, they were but juſt able to keep their diſtance from the coaſt. What rendered their ſituation more alarming was, that a rope of the main-top ſail having given way, this occaſioned the ſail to be rent in two. In the ſame manner, the two top gallant ſails gave way, though they were not half worn out. However, a favourable opportunity was ſeized of getting others to the yards; and the Reſolution again proceeded in ſafety. On the ſixteenth of January, 1779, canoes arrived in ſuch numbers from all parts, that there were not fewer than a thouſand about the two ſhips, moſt of them crowded with people, and well laden with hogs, and other productions of the Iſland. It was a ſatisfactory proof of their friendly intentions, that there was not a ſingle perſon amongſt them who had with him a weapon of any kind; trade and curioſity alone appearing to be the motives which actuated their conduct. Among ſuch multitudes, however, as, at times, were on board, it will not be deemed ſurprizing, that ſome ſhould betray a thieviſh diſpoſition. One of them took out of the Reſolution a boat's rudder; and made off with it ſo ſpeedily, that it could not be recovered. Captain Cook judged this to be a favourable opportunity of ſhewing to theſe people the uſe of fire-arms; and accordingly he ordered two or three muſquets, and as many four-pounders, to be fired over the canoe which carried off the rudder. It not being intended that any of the ſhot ſhould take effect, the ſurrounding multitude of the natives ſeemed to be more ſurprized than terrified. Mr. Bligh having been ſent to examine a neighbouring bay, reported, on his return, that it had good anchorage and freſh water, and that it was in an acceſſible ſituation. Into this bay, therefore, the Captain reſolved to carry the ſhips, in order to refit, and to obtain every refreſhment which the place could afford. As night approached, the greater part of the Indians retired on ſhore; but numbers of them requeſted permiſſion to ſleep on board; in which requeſt, curioſity (at leaſt with regard to ſeveral of them) was not their ſole motive; for it was found, the next morning, that various things were miſſing; on which account our Commander determined not to entertain ſo many perſons another night. On the ſeventeenth, the ſhips came to an anchor in the bay which had been examined by Mr. Bligh, and which is called Karakakooa by the inhabitants. At this time, the veſſels continued to be much crowded with natives, and were ſurrounded with a multitude of canoes. Captain Cook, in the whole courſe of his voyages, had never ſeen ſo numerous a body of people aſſembled in one place. For, beſides thoſe who had come off to the Engliſh in their canoes, all the ſhore of the bay was covered with ſpectators, and many hundreds were ſwimming round the ſhips like ſhoals of fiſh. Our Navigators could not avoid being greatly impreſſed with the ſingularity of this ſcene; and perhaps there were few on board that now lamented the want of ſucceſs which had attended the endeavours of getting homeward, the laſt ſummer, by a northern paſſage. "To this diſappointment," ſays the Captain, "we owed our having it in our power to reviſit the Sandwich Iſlands, and to "enrich our Voyage with a diſcovery which, though the laſt, ſeemed, in many reſpects, "to be the moſt important that had hitherto been made by Europeans, throughout the "extent of the Pacific Ocean (n)." Such is the ſentence that concludes our Commander's journal: and the ſatisfaction with which this ſentence appears to have been written, cannot fail of ſtriking the mind of every reader. Little did Captain Cook then imagine, that a diſcovery which promiſed to add no ſmall honour to his name, and to be productive of very agreeable conſequences, ſhould be ſo fatal in the reſult. Little did he think, that the Iſland of Owhyhee was deſtined to be the laſt ſcene of his exploits, and the cauſe of his deſtruction.

(n) Cook's Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 532, 535, 536, 537, 538, 540—548, 549.

The reception which the Captain met with from the natives, on his proceeding to anchor in Karakakooa Bay, was flattering in the higheſt degree. They came off from the ſhore in aſtoniſhing numbers, and expreſſed their joy by ſinging and ſhouting, and by exhibiting a variety of wild and extravagant geſtures. Pareea, a young man of great authority, and Kaneena, another Chief, had already attached themſelves to our Commander, and were very uſeful in keeping their countrymen from being troubleſome. During the long cruize of our Navigators off the Iſland of Owhyhee, the inhabitants had almoſt univerſally behaved with great fairneſs and honeſty in their dealings, and had not ſhewn the ſlighteſt propenſity to theft: and this was a fact the more extraordinary, as thoſe with whom our people had hitherto maintained any intercourſe, were of the loweſt rank, being either ſervants or fiſhermen. But, after the arrival of the Reſolution and Diſcovery in Karakakooa Bay, the caſe was greatly altered. The immenſe crowd of Iſlanders that blocked up every part of the ſhips, not only afforded frequent opportunities of pilfering without riſk of detection; but held out, even if they ſhould be detected, a proſpect of eſcaping with impunity, from the ſuperiority of their numbers to that of the Engliſh. Another circumſtance, to which the alteration in the conduct of the natives might be aſcribed, aroſe from the preſence and encouragement of their Chiefs, into whoſe poſſeſſion the booty might be traced, and whom there was reaſon to ſuſpect of being the inſtigators of the depredations that were committed. Soon after the Reſolution had gotten into her ſtation, Pareea and Kaneena brought on board a third Chief, named Koah, who was repreſented as being a Prieſt, and as having, in his early youth, been a diſtinguiſhed warrior. In the evening, Captain Cook, attended by Mr. Bayley and Mr. King, accompanied Koah on ſhore. Upon this occaſion, the Captain was received with very peculiar and extraordinary ceremonies; with ceremonies that indicated the higheſt reſpect on the part of the natives, and which, indeed, ſeemed to fall little ſhort of adoration. One of the principal objects that engaged our Commander's attention at Owhyhee, was the ſalting of hogs for ſea-ſtore; in which his ſucceſs was far more compleat than had been attained in any former attempt of the ſame kind. It doth not appear that experiments relative to this ſubject had been made by the navigators of any nation before Captain Cook. His firſt trials were in 1774, during his ſecond voyage round the world; when his ſucceſs, though very imperfect, was, nevertheleſs, ſufficient to encourage his farther efforts, in a matter of ſo much importance. As the preſent voyage was likely to be protracted a year beyond the time for which the ſhips were victualled, he was under a neceſſity of providing, by ſome ſuch method, for the ſubſiſtence of the crews, or of relinquiſhing the proſecution of his diſcoveries. Accordingly, he loſt no opportunity of renewing his attempts; and the event anſwered his moſt ſanguine expectations. Captain King brought home with him ſome of the pork which was pickled at Owhyhee in January, 1779; and, upon its being taſted by ſeveral perſons in England about Chriſtmas 1780, it was found to be perfectly ſound and wholeſome (o). It ſeemed to be deſtined, that in every inſtance Captain Cook ſhould excel all who had gone before him, in promoting the purpoſes of navigation. On the twenty-ſixth, the Captain had his firſt interview with Terreeoboo, the King of the Iſland. The meeting was conducted with a variety of ceremonies, among which, the cuſtom of making an exchange of names, which, amongſt all the Iſlanders of the Pacific Ocean is the ſtrongeſt pledge of friendſhip, was obſerved. When the formalities of the interview were over, our Commander carried Terreeoboo, and as many Chiefs as the pinnace could hold, on board the Reſolution. They were received, on this occaſion, with every mark of reſpect that could be ſhewn them; and, in return for a beautiful and ſplendid feathered cloak which the King had beſtowed on Captain Cook, the Captain put a linen ſhirt on his Majeſty, and girt his own hanger round him. In the progreſs of the intercourſe which was maintained between our Voyagers and the natives, the quiet and inoffenſive behaviour of the latter took away every apprehenſion of danger; ſo that the Engliſh truſted themſelves among them at all times, and in all ſituations. The inſtances of kindneſs and civility which our people experienced from them were ſo numerous, that they could not eaſily be recounted. A ſociety of Prieſts, in particular, diſplayed a generoſity and munificence, of which no equal example had hitherto been given: for they furniſhed a conſtant ſupply of hogs and vegetables to our Navigators, without ever demanding a return, or even hinting at it in the moſt diſtant manner. All this was ſaid to be done at the expence of a great man among them, who was at the head of their body, whoſe name was Kaoo, and who on other occaſions manifeſted his attachment to the Engliſh. There was not always ſo much reaſon to be ſatisfied with the conduct of the warrior Chiefs, or Earees, as with that of the Prieſts. Indeed, the ſatisfaction that was derived from the uſual gentleneſs and hoſpitality of the inhabitants, was frequently interrupted by the propenſity of many of them to ſtealing; and this circumſtance was the more diſtreſſing, as it ſometimes obliged our Commander and the other officers to have recourſe to acts of ſeverity, which they would willingly have avoided, if the neceſſity of the caſe had not abſolutely called for them.

(o) An account of the proceſs may be ſeen in Captain King's Voyage, p. 12.

Though the kind and liberal behaviour of the natives continued without remiſſion, Terreeoboo, and his Chiefs, began, at length, to be very inquiſitive about the time in which our Voyagers were to take their departure. Nor will this be deemed ſurprizing, when it is conſidered that, during ſixteen days in which the Engliſh had been in the bay of Karakakooa, they had made an enormous conſumption of hogs and vegetables. It did not appear, however, that Terreeoboo had any other view in his enquiries, than a deſire of making ſufficient preparation for diſmiſſing our Navigators with preſents, ſuitable to the reſpect and kindneſs towards them which he had always diſplayed. For, on his being informed that they were to leave the Iſland in a day or two, it was obſerved that a kind of proclamation was immediately made, through the villages, requiring the people to bring in their hogs and vegetables, for the King to preſent to the Orono (p), on his quitting the country. Accordingly, on the third of February, being the day preceding the time which had been fixed for the ſailing of the ſhips, Terreeoboo invited Captain Cook and Mr. King to attend him to the place where Kaoo reſided. On their arrival, they found the ground covered with parcels of cloth, at a ſmall diſtance from which lay an immenſe quantity of vegetables; and near them was a large herd of hogs. At the cloſe of the viſit, the greater part of the cloth, and the whole of the hogs and vegetables, were given by Terreeoboo to the Captain and Mr. King; who were aſtoniſhed at the value and magnificence of the preſent; for it far exceeded every thing of the kind which they had ſeen either at the Friendly or Society Iſlands [LL]. Mr. King had in ſo high a degree conciliated the affections, and gained the eſteem, of the inhabitants of Owhyhee, that, with offers of the moſt flattering nature, he was ſtrongly ſolicited to remain in the country. Terreeoboo and Kaoo waited upon Captain Cook, whoſe ſon they ſuppoſed Mr. King to be, with a formal requeſt that he might be left behind. To avoid giving a poſitive refuſal to an offer which was ſo kindly intended, the Captain told them, that he could not part with Mr. King at that time, but that, on his return to the Iſland in the next year, he would endeavour to ſettle the matter to their ſatisfaction. Early, on the fourth, the ſhips ſailed out of Karakakooa Bay, being followed by a large number of canoes. It was our Commander's deſign, before he viſited the other Iſlands, to finiſh the ſurvey of Owhyhee, in hopes of meeting with a road better ſheltered than the bay he had juſt left. In caſe of not ſucceeding in this reſpect, he purpoſed to take a view of the South-eaſt part of Mowee, where he was informed that he ſhould find an excellent harbour (q).

(q) Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, vol. iii. written by Mr. King, p. 1—31.

The circumſtances which brought Captain Cook back to Karakakooa Bay, and the unhappy conſequences that followed, I ſhall give from Mr. Samwell's narrative of his death. This narrative was, in the moſt obliging manner, communicated to me in manuſcript, by Mr. Samwell, with entire liberty to make ſuch uſe of it as I ſhould judge proper. Upon a peruſal of it, its importance ſtruck me in ſo ſtrong a light, that I wiſhed to have it ſeparately laid before the world. Accordingly, with Mr. Samwell's concurrence, I procured its publication, that, if any objections ſhould be made to it, I might be able to notice them in my own work. As the narrative hath continued for more than two years unimpeached and uncontradicted, I eſteem myſelf fully authorized to inſert it in this place, as containing the moſt complete and authentic account of the melancholy cataſtrophe, which, at Owhyhee, befel our illuſtrious Navigator and Commander. It ſhall be inſerted below [MM]. In

The ſame gale had occaſioned much " diſtreſs among ſome canoes, that had paid us a " viſit from the ſhore. They were " brought on board, and, with the others, partook of " the kindneſs and humanity of Captain Cook.

" On the morning of Wedneſday, the tenth, we " were within a few miles of the harbour; and were " ſoon joined by ſeveral canoes, in which appeared " many of our old acquaintance, who ſeemed to have " come to welcome us back. Among them was " Coo, aha, a Prieſt: he had brought a ſmall pig, " and ſome cocoa-nuts in his hand, which, after " having chaunted a few ſentences, he preſented to " Captain Clerke. He then left us, and haſtened " on board the Reſolution, to perform the ſame " friendly ceremony before Captain Cook. Having " but light winds all that day, we could not gain the " harbour. In the afternoon, a Chief of the firſt " rank, and nearly related to Kariopoo, paid us a viſit " on board the Diſcovery. His name was Ka,mea, " mea: he was dreſſed in a very rich feathered cloak, " which he ſeemed to have brought for ſale, but " would part with it for nothing except iron daggers. Theſe, the Chiefs, ſome time before our " departure, had preferred to every other article; for, " having received a plentiful ſupply of hatchets and " other tools, they began to collect a ſtore of warlike " inſtruments. Kameamea procured nine daggers " for his cloak; and, being pleaſed with his reception, he and his attendants ſlept on board that night.

" In the morning of the eleventh of February, the " ſhips anchored again in Keragegooah Bay, and " preparation was immediately made for landing the " Reſolution's foremaſt. We were viſited but by " few of the Indians, becauſe there were but few in " the bay. On our departure, thoſe belonging to " other parts, had repaired to their ſeveral habitations, and were again to collect from various quarters, before we could expect to be ſurrounded by " ſuch multitudes as we had once ſeen in that harbour. In the afternoon, I walked about a mile " into the country, to viſit an Indian friend, who " had, a few days before, come near twenty miles, " in a ſmall canoe, to ſee me, while the ſhip lay " becalmed. As the canoe had not left us long before a gale of wind came on, I was alarmed for the " conſequence: however, I had the pleaſure to find " that my friend had eſcaped unhurt, though not " without ſome difficulties. I take notice of this " ſhort excurſion, merely becauſe it afforded me an " opportunity of obſerving, that there appeared no " change in the diſpoſition or behaviour of the inhabitants. I ſaw nothing that could induce me to " think, that they were diſpleaſed with our return, " or jealous of the intention of our ſecond viſit. On " the contrary, that abundant good-nature which " had always characteriſed them, ſeemed ſtill to glow " in every boſom, and to animate every countenance (9). The next day, February the twelfth, " the ſhips were put under a taboo, by the Chiefs, a " ſolemnity, it ſeems, that was requiſite to be obſerved before Kariopoo, the King, paid his firſt " viſit to Captain Cook, after his return. He " waited upon him the ſame day, on board the Reſolution, attended by a large train, ſome of which " bore the preſents deſigned for Captain Cook; who " received him in his uſual friendly manner, and " gave him ſeveral articles in return. This amicable ceremony being ſettled, the taboo was diſſolved; matters went on in the uſual train; and the " next day, February the thirteenth, we were viſited " by the natives in great numbers: the Reſolution's " maſt was landed, and the aſtronomical obſervatories erected on their former ſituation. I landed, " with another Gentleman, at the town of Kavaroah, where we found a great number of canoes, " juſt arrived from different parts of the Iſland, and " the Indians buſy in conſtructing temporary huts on " the beach, for their reſidence during the ſtay of " the ſhips. On our return on board the Diſcovery, we learned, that an Indian had been detected " in

(9) Mr. King relates, that our Voyagers, upon coming to anchor, were ſurprized to find their reception very different from what it had been on their firſt arrival. He acknowledges, however, that the unſuſpicious conduct of Terreeoboo, who, the next morning, came immediately to viſit Captain Cook, and the conſequent return of the natives to their former friendly intercourſe with the Engliſh, are ſtrong proofs that they neither meant nor apprehended any change of conduct. "Things," ſays Mr. King, "went on in "their uſual "quiet courſe, "till the after- "noon of the "thirteenth." Voyage, ubi ſupra, p. 36, 37, 38.

In conſequence of the barbarous diſpoſition of the natives, the whole remains of Captain Cook could not be recovered. For, though every exertion was made for that purpoſe; though

" in ſtealing the armourer's tongs from the forge, " for which he received a pretty ſevere flogging, and " was ſent out of the ſhip. Notwithſtanding the " example made of this man, in the afternoon ano- " ther had the audacity to ſnatch the tongs and a " chiſſel from the ſame place, with which he jumped " overboard, and ſwam for the ſhore. The Maſter " and a midſhipman were inſtantly diſpatched after " him, in the ſmall cutter. The Indian ſeeing " himſelf purſued, made for a canoe; his country- " men took him on board, and paddled as ſwift as " they could towards the ſhore; we fired ſeveral " muſkets at them, but to no effect, for they ſoon " got out of the reach of our ſhot. Pareah, one of " the Chiefs, who was at that time on board the Diſ- " covery, underſtanding what had happened, imme- " diately went aſhore, promiſing to bring back the " ſtolen goods. Our boat was ſo far diſtanced, in " chacing the canoe which had taken the thief on " board, that he had time to make his eſcape into the " country. Captain Cook, who was then aſhore, " endeavoured to intercept his landing; but, it " ſeems, that he was led out of the way by ſome of " the natives, who had officiouſly intruded themſelves " as guides. As the Maſter was approaching near " the landing-place, he was met by ſome of the In- " dians in a canoe: they had brought back the tongs " and chiſſel, together with another article, that we " had not miſſed, which happened to be the lid of " the water-caſk. Having recovered theſe things, " he was returning on board, when he was met by " the Reſolution's pinnace, with five men in her, " who, without any orders, had come from the ob- " ſervatories to his aſſiſtance. Being thus unexpect- " edly reinforced, he thought himſelf ſtrong enough " to inſiſt upon having the thief, or the canoe which " took him in, delivered up as repriſals. With that " view he turned back; and having found the canoe " on the beach, he was preparing to launch it into " the water, when Pareah made his appearance, and " inſiſted upon his not taking it away, as it was his " property. The officer not regarding him, the " Chief ſeized upon him, pinioned his arms behind, " and held him by the hair of his head; on which, " one of the ſailors ſtruck him with an oar: Pareah " inſtantly quitted the officer, ſnatched the oar out " of the man's hand, and ſnapped it in two acroſs " his knee. At length the multitude began to at- " tack our people with ſtones. They made ſome " reſiſtance, but were ſoon overpowered, and obliged " to ſwim for ſafety to the ſmall cutter, which lay " farther out than the pinnace. The officers, not " being expert ſwimmers, retreated to a ſmall rock " in the water, where they were cloſely purſued by " the Indians. One man darted a broken oar at " the Maſter; but his foot ſlipping at the time, he " miſſed him, which fortunately ſaved that officer's " life. At laſt, Pareah interfered, and put an end " to their violence. The Gentlemen, knowing that " his preſence was their only defence againſt the " fury of the natives, entreated him to ſtay with " them, till they could get off in the boats; but that " he refuſed, and left them. The Maſter went to " ſeek aſſiſtance from the party at the obſervatories; " but the midſhipman choſe to remain in the pinnace. " He was very rudely treated by the mob, who plun- " dered the boat of every thing that was looſe on " board, and then began to knock her to pieces, for " the ſake of the iron-work; but Pareah fortunately " returned in time to prevent her deſtruction. He " had met the other Gentleman on his way to the " obſervatories, and, ſuſpecting his errand, had " forced him to return. He diſperſed the crowd " again, and deſired the Gentlemen to return on " board: they repreſented, that all the oars had " been taken out of the boat; on which he brought " ſome of them back, and the Gentlemen were glad " to get off, without farther moleſtation. They had " not proceeded far, before they were overtaken by " Pareah, in a canoe: he delivered the Midſhipman's " cap, which had been taken from him in the ſcuf- " fle, joined noſes with them, in token of reconcili- " ation, and was anxious to know, if Captain Cook " would kill him for what had happened. They " aſſured him of the contrary, and made ſigns of " friendſhip to him in return. He then left them, " and paddled over to the town of Kavaroah, and " that was the laſt time we ever ſaw him. Captain " Cook returned on board ſoon after, much diſpleaſ- " ed with the whole of this diſagreeable buſineſs; " and the ſame night ſent a Lieutenant on board the " Diſcovery to learn the particulars of it, as it had " originated in that ſhip. It was remarkable, that " in the midſt of the hurry and confuſion attending " this affair, Kanynah (a Chief who had always " boen on terms particularly friendly with us) came " from the ſpot where it happened, with a hog to ſell " on board the Diſcovery: it was of an extraordinary " large ſize, and he demanded for it a pahowa, or " dagger, of an unuſual length. He pointed to us, " that it muſt be as long as his arm. Captain " Clerke not having one of that length, told him, " he would get one made for him by the morning; " with which being ſatisfied, he left the hog, and " went aſhore without making any ſtay with us. It " will not be altogether foreign to the ſubject, to " mention a circumſtance, that happened to-day on " board the Reſolution. An Indian Chief aſked " Captain Cook at his table, if he was a Tata Toa; " which means a fighting man, or a ſoldier. Being " anſwered in the affirmative, he deſired to ſee his " wounds: Captain Cook held out his right-hand, " which had a ſcar upon it, dividing the thumb " from the finger, the whole length of the metacar- " pal bones. The Indian, being thus convinced of " his being a Toa, put the ſame queſtion to another " Gentleman preſent, but he happened to have none " of thoſe diſtinguiſhing marks: the Chief then ſaid, " that he himſelf was a Toa, and ſhewed the ſcars of " ſome wounds he had received in battle. Thoſe " who were on duty at the obſervatories, were diſ- " turbed, during the night, with ſhrill and melan- " choly ſounds, iſſuing from the adjacent villages, " which they took to be the lamentations of the " women. Perhaps the quarrel between us, might " have filled their minds with apprehenſions for the " ſafety of their huſbands: but, be that as it may, " their mournful cries ſtruck the ſentinels with unu- " ſual awe and terror.

" To widen the breach between us, ſome of the " Indians, in the night, took away the Diſcovery's " large cutter, which lay ſwamped at the buoy of " one of her anchors: they had carried her off ſo " quietly, that we did not miſs her till the morning; " Sunday, February the fourteenth. Captain Clerke " loſt no time in waiting upon Captain Cook, to " acquaint him with the accident: he returned on " board, with orders for the launch and ſmall cutter " to go, under the command of the ſecond Lieute- " nant, and lie off the Eaſt point of the bay, in " order to intercept all canoes that might attempt to " to get out; and, if he found it neceſſary, to fire " upon them. At the ſame time, the third Lieute- " nant of the Reſolution, with the launch and ſmall " cutter, was ſent on the ſame ſervice, to the oppo- " ſite point of the bay; and the Maſter was diſpatch- " ed in the large cutter, in purſuit of a double " canoe, already under ſail, making the beſt of her " way out of the harbour. He ſoon came up with " her, and by firing a few muſquets, drove her on " ſhore, and the Indians left her: this happened to be " the canoe of Omea, a man who bore the title of " Orono. He was on board himſelf, and it would " have been fortunate, if our people had ſecured " him, for his perſon was held as ſacred as that of " the King. During this time, Captain Cook was " preparing to go aſhore himſelf, at the town of " Kavaroah, in order to ſecure the perſon of Kario- " poo, before he ſhould have time to withdraw him- " ſelf to another part of the Iſland, out of our reach.

though negociations and threatenings were alternately employed, little more than the principal part of his bones (and that with great difficulty) could be procured. By the poſſeſſion of

" This appeared the moſt effectual ſtep that could be " taken on the preſent occaſion, for the recovery of " the boat.—It was the meaſure he had invariably " purſued, in ſimilar caſes, at other Iſlands in theſe " ſeas, and it had always been attended with the " deſired ſucceſs: in fact, it would be difficult to " point out any other mode of proceeding on theſe " emergencies, likely to attain the object in view " (10). We had reaſon to ſuppoſe, that the King " and his attendants had fled when the alarm was " firſt given: in that caſe, it was Captain Cook's in- " tention to ſecure the large canoes which were " hauled up on the beach. He left the ſhip about " ſeven o'clock, attended by the Lieutenant of Ma- " rines, a Serjeant, Corporal, and ſeven private " men: the pinnace's crew were alſo armed, and " under the command of Mr. Roberts. As they " rowed towards the ſhore, Captain Cook ordered " the launch to leave her ſtation at the Weſt point " of the bay, in order to aſſiſt his own boat. This " is a circumſtance worthy of notice; for it clearly " ſhews, that he was not unapprehenſive of meeting " with reſiſtance from the natives, or unmindful of " the neceſſary preparation for the ſafety of himſelf " and his people. I will venture to ſay, that from " the appearance of things juſt at that time, there " was not one, beſide himſelf, who judged that ſuch " precaution was abſolutely requiſite: ſo little did " his conduct on the occaſion, bear the marks of " raſhneſs, or a precipitate ſelf-confidence! He " landed, with the Marines, at the upper end of the " town of Kavaroah: the Indians immediately " flocked round, as uſual, and ſhewed him the cuſ- " tomary marks of reſpect, by proſtrating themſelves " before him. There were no ſigns of hoſtilities, or " much alarm among them. Captain Cook, how- " ever, did not ſeem willing to truſt to appearances; " but was particularly attentive to the diſpoſition of " the Marines, and to have them kept clear of the " crowd. He firſt enquired for the King's ſons, two " youths who were much attached to him, and ge- " nerally his companions on board. Meſſengers " being ſent for them, they ſoon came to him, and " informing him that their father was aſleep, at a " houſe not far from them, he accompanied them " thither, and took the Marines along with them. " As he paſſed along, the natives every where pro- " ſtrated themſelves before him, and ſeemed to have " loſt no part of that reſpect they had always ſhewn " to his perſon. He was joined by ſeveral Chiefs, " among whom was Kanynah, and his brother " Koohowrooah. They kept the crowd in order, " according to their uſual cuſtom; and, being igno- " rant of his intention in coming on ſhore, frequently " aſked him, if he wanted any hogs, or other pro- " viſions: he told them that he did not, and that his " buſineſs was to ſee the King. When he arrived at " the houſe, he ordered ſome of the Indians to go in, " and inform Kariopoo, that he waited without to " ſpeak with him. They came out two or three " times, and inſtead of returning any anſwer from " the King, preſented ſome pieces of red cloth to " him, which made Captain Cook ſuſpect that he " was not in the houſe: he therefore deſired the " Lieutenant of Marines to go in. The Lieutenant " found the old man juſt awaked from ſleep, and " ſeemingly alarmed at the meſſage; but he came " out without heſitation. Captain Cook took him " by the hand, and in a friendly manner aſked him " to go on board, to which he very readily conſented. " Thus far matters appeared in a favourable train, " and the natives did not ſeem much alarmed or " apprehenſive of hoſtility on our ſide; at which " Captain Cook expreſſed himſelf a little ſurprized, " ſaying, that as the inhabitants of that town appeared " innocent of ſtealing the cutter, he ſhould not moleſt " them, but that he muſt get the King on board. " Kariopoo ſat down before his door, and was ſur- " rounded by a great crowd: Kanynah and his bro- " ther were both very active in keeping order among " them. In a little time, however, the Indians were " obſerved arming themſelves with long ſpears, clubs, " and daggers, and putting on thick mats, which " they uſe as armour. This hoſtile appearance in- " creaſed, and became more alarming, on the arrival " of two men in a canoe from the oppoſite ſide of the " bay, with the news of a Chief, called Kareemoo, " having been killed by one of the Diſcovery's " boats. In their paſſage acroſs, they had alſo deli- " vered this account to each of the ſhips. Upon that " information, the women, who were ſitting upon " the beach at their breakfaſts, and converſing fami- " liarly with our people in the boats, retired, and a " confuſed murmur ſpread through the crowd. An " old Prieſt came to Captain Cook, with a cocoa-nut " in his hand, which he held out to him as a preſent, " at the ſame time ſinging very loud. He was often " deſired to be ſilent, but in vain: he continued im- " portunate and troubleſome, and there was no ſuch " thing as getting rid of him or his noiſe: it ſeemed " as if he meant to divert their attention from his " countrymen, who were growing more tumultuous, " and arming themſelves in every quarter. Captain " Cook, being at the ſame time ſurrounded by a " great crowd, thought his ſituation rather hazard- " ous: he therefore ordered the Lieutenant of Ma- " rines to march his ſmall party to the water-ſide, " where the boats lay within a few yards of the " ſhore: the Indians readily made a lane for them to " paſs, and did not offer to interrupt them. The " diſtance they had to go might be about fifty or " ſixty yards; Captain Cook followed, having hold " of Kariopoo's hand, who accompanied him very " willingly: he was attended by his wife, two ſons, " and ſeveral Chiefs. The troubleſome old Prieſt " followed, making the ſame ſavage noiſe. Keowa, " the younger ſon, went directly into the pinnace, " expecting his father to follow; but juſt as he arrived " at the water-ſide, his wife threw her arms about " his neck, and, with the aſſiſtance of two Chiefs, " forced him to ſit down by the ſide of a double " canoe. Captain Cook expoſtulated with them, " but to no purpoſe: they would not ſuffer the King " to proceed, telling him, that he would be put to " death if he went on board the ſhip. Kariopoo, " whoſe conduct ſeemed entirely reſigned to the will " of others, hung down his head, and appeared much " diſtreſſed.

" While the King was in this ſituation, a Chief, " well known to us, of the name of Coho, was ob- " ſerved lurking near, with an iron dagger, partly " concealed under his cloak, ſeemingly, with the " intention of ſtabbing Captain Cook, or the Lieu- " tenant of Marines. The latter propoſed to fire at " him, but Captain Cook would not permit it. " Coho cloſing upon them, obliged the officer to " ſtrike him with his piece, which made him retire. " Another Indian laid hold of the Serjeant's muſquet, " and endeavoured to wrench it from him, but was " prevented by the Lieutenant's making a blow at " him. Captain Cook, ſeeing the tumult increaſe, " and the Indians growing more daring and reſolute, " obſerved, that if he were to take the King off by " force, he could not do it without ſacrificing the " lives of many of his people. He then pauſed a " little, and was on the point of giving his orders to " reimbark, when a man threw a ſtone at him; " which he returned with a diſcharge of ſmall ſhot " (with which one barrel of his double piece was " loaded). The man, having a thick mat before " him, received little or no hurt: he brandiſhed his " ſpear, and threatened to dart it at Captain Cook, " who being ſtill unwilling to take away his life, " inſtead of firing with ball, knocked him down with " his muſquet. He expoſtulated ſtrongly with the " moſt forward of the crowd, upon their turbulent " behaviour. He had given up all thoughts of get- " ting the King on board, as it appeared impracti- " cable; and his care was then only to act on the " defenſive, and to ſecure a ſafe embarkation for his " ſmall

(10) Mr. King acknowledges, that he was always fearful, that the degree of confidence which Captain Cook had acquired from his long and uninterrupted courſe of ſucceſs, in his tranſactions with the natives of theſe ſeas, might, at ſome unlucky moment, put him too much off his guard. of them, our Navigators were enabled to perform the laſt offices to their eminent and unfortunate Commander. The bones, having been put into a coffin, and the ſervice being read

" ſmall party, which was cloſely preſſed by a body of " ſeveral thouſand people. Keowa, the King's ſon, " who was in the pinnace, being alarmed on hearing " the firſt firing, was, at his own entreaty, put on " ſhore again; for even at that time, Mr. Roberts, " who commanded her, did not apprehend that " Captain Cook's perſon was in any danger: other- " wiſe he would have detained the Prince, which, no " doubt, would have been a great check on the " Indians. One man was obſerved, behind a double " canoe, in the action of darting his ſpear at Captain " Cook, who was forced to fire at him in his own " defence, but happened to kill another cloſe to him, " equally forward in the tumult: the Serjeant ob- " ſerving that he had miſſed the man he aimed at, " received orders to fire at him, which he did, and " killed him. By this time, the impetuoſity of the " Indians was ſomewhat repreſſed; they fell back in " a body, and ſeemed ſtaggered: but being puſhed " on by thoſe behind, they returned to the charge, " and poured a volley of ſtones among the Marines, " who, without waiting for orders, returned it with " a general diſcharge of muſquetry, which was " inſtantly followed by a fire from the boats. At " this Captain Cook was heard to expreſs his aſto- " niſhment: he waved his hand to the boats, called " to them to ceaſe firing, and to come nearer in to " receive the Marines. Mr. Roberts immediately " brought the pinnace as cloſe to the ſhore as he " could, without grounding, notwithſtanding the " ſhowers of ſtones that fell among the people: but " ——, the Lieutenant, who commanded in the " launch, inſtead of pulling in to the aſſiſtance of " Captain Cook, withdrew his boat farther off, at " the moment that every thing ſeems to have de- " pended upon the timely exertions of thoſe in the " boats. By his own account, he miſtook the ſignal: " but be that as it may, this circumſtance appears to " me, to have decided the fatal turn of the affair, " and to have removed every chance which remained " with Captain Cook, of eſcaping with his life. " The buſineſs of ſaving the Marines out of the " water, in conſequence of that, fell altogether upon " the pinnace; which thereby became ſo much " crowded, that the crew were, in a great meaſure, " prevented from uſing their fire-arms, or giving " what aſſiſtance they otherwiſe might have done, to " Captain Cook; ſo that he ſeems, at the moſt criti- " cal point of time, to have wanted the aſſiſtance of " both boats, owing to the removal of the launch. " For, notwithſtanding that they kept up a fire on " the crowd, from the ſituation to which they remov- " ed in that boat, the fatal confuſion which enſued " on her being withdrawn, to ſay the leaſt of it, " muſt have prevented the full effect, that the " prompt co-operation of the two boats, according to " Captain Cook's orders, muſt have had, towards " the preſervation of himſelf and his people (11). " At that time, it was to the boats alone, that Cap- " tain Cook had to look for his ſafety; for, when " the Marines had fired, the Indians ruſhed among " them, and forced them into the water, where four " of them were killed: their Lieutenant was wound- " ed, but fortunately eſcaped, and was taken up by " the pinnace. Captain Cook was then the only " one remaining on the rock: he was obſerved " making for the pinnace, holding his left hand " againſt the back of his head, to guard it from the " ſtones, and carrying his muſquet under the other " arm. An Indian was ſeen following him, but with " caution and timidity; for he ſtopped once or twice, " as if undetermined to proceed. At laſt he advanced " upon him unawares, and with a large club (12), or " common ſtake, gave him a blow on the back of the " head, and then precipitately retreated. The ſtroke " ſeemed to have ſtunned Captain Cook: he ſtaggered " a few paces, then fell on his hand and one knee, " and dropped his muſquet. As he was riſing, and " before he could recover his feet, another Indian " ſtabbed him in the back of the neck with an iron " dagger. He then fell into a bite of water about " knee deep, where others crowded upon him, and " endeavoured to keep him under: but ſtruggling " very ſtrongly with them, he got his head up, and " caſting his look towards the pinnace, ſeemed to " ſolicit aſſiſtance. Though the boat was not above " five or ſix yards diſtant from him, yet from the " crowded and confuſed ſtate of the crew, it ſeems, it " was not in their power to ſave him. The Indians " got him under again, but in deeper water: he was, " however, able to get his head up once more, and " being almoſt ſpent in the ſtruggle, he naturally " turned to the rock, and was endeavouring to ſup- " port himſelf by it, when a ſavage gave him a blow " with a club, and he was ſeen alive no more. They " hauled him up lifeleſs on the rocks, where they " ſeemed to take a ſavage pleaſure in uſing every " barbarity to his dead body, ſnatching the daggers " out of each other's hands, to have the horrid ſatiſ- " faction of piercing the fallen victim of their bar- " barous rage.

" I need make no reflection on the great loſs we " ſuffered on this occaſion, or attempt to deſcribe " what we felt. It is enough to ſay, that no man " was ever more beloved or admired: and it is truly " painful to reflect, that he ſeems to have fallen a " ſacrifice merely for want of being properly ſup- " ported; a fate, ſingularly to be lamented, as hav- " ing fallen to his lot, who had ever been conſpi- " cuous for his care of thoſe under his command, and " who ſeemed, to the laſt, to pay as much attention " to their preſervation, as to that of his own life. " If any thing could have added to the ſhame and " indignation univerſally felt on this occaſion, it " was to find, that his remains had been deſerted, " and left expoſed on the beach, although they " might have been brought off. It appears, from " the information of four or five Midſhipmen, who " arrived on the ſpot at the concluſion of the fatal " buſineſs, that the beach was then almoſt entirely " deſerted by the Indians, who at length had given " way to the fire of the boats, and diſperſed through " the town: ſo that there ſeemed no great obſtacle " to prevent the recovery of Captain Cook's body; " but the Lieutenant returned on board without " making the attempt. It is unneceſſary to dwell " longer on this painful ſubject, and to relate the " complaints and cenſures that fell on the conduct of " the Lieutenant. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, " that they were ſo loud as to oblige Captain Clerke " publicly to notice them, and to take the depoſi- " tions of his accuſers down in writing. The " Captain's bad ſtate of health and approaching diſ- " ſolution, it is ſuppoſed, induced him to deſtroy " theſe papers a ſhort time before his death. It is a " painful taſk, to be obliged to notice circumſtances, " which ſeem to reflect upon the character of any " man. A ſtrict regard to truth, however, compel- " led me to the inſertion of theſe facts, which I have " offered merely as facts, without preſuming to con- " nect with them any comment of my own: eſteem- " ing it the part of a faithful hiſtorian, " to exte- " nuate nothing, nor ſet down aught in malice."

" The fatal accident happened at eight o'clock in " the morning, about an hour after Captain Cook " landed. It did not ſeem, that the King, or his " ſons, were witneſſes to it; but it is ſuppoſed that " they withdrew in the midſt of the tumult. The " principal actors were the other Chiefs, many of " them the King's relations and attendants: the man " who ſtabbed him with the dagger was called " Nooah. I happened to be the only one who re- " collected his perſon, from having on a former " occaſion mentioned his name in the journal I kept. " I was induced to take particular notice of him, " more from his perſonal appearance than any other " conſideration, though he was of high rank, and a " near relation of the King: he was ſtout and tall, " with a fierce look and demeanour, and one who " united in his figure the two qualities of ſtrength " and

(11) I have been informed, on the beſt authority, that, in the opinion of Captain Philips, who commanded the Marines, and whoſe judgment muſt be of the greateſt weight, it is extremely doubtful whether any thing could ſucceſsfully have been done to preſerve the life of Captain Cook, even if no miſtake had been committed on the part of the launch.

(12) " I have " heard one of " the Gentle- " men who were " preſent ſay, " that the firſt " injury he re- " ceived was " from a dagger, " as it is repre- " ſented in the " Voyage; but, " from the ac- " count of many " others, who " were alſo eye- " witneſſes, I " am confident, " in ſaying, that " that he was " firſt ſtruck " with a club. " I was after- " wards con- " firmed in this, " by Kaireekea, " the Prieſt, who " particularly " mentioned the " name of the " man who gave " him the blow, " as well as that " of the Chief " who after- " wards ſtruck " him with the " dagger. read over to them, were committed to the deep, on the twenty-firſt, with the uſual military honours. What were the feelings of the companies of both the ſhips, on this occaſion, muſt be left to the world to conceive; for thoſe who were preſent know, that it is not in the power of any pen to expreſs them. A promotion of officers followed the deceaſe of Captain Cook. Captain Clerke having ſucceeded of courſe to the command of the expedition, removed on board the Reſolution. By him Mr. Gore was appointed Captain of the Diſcovery, and the reſt of the Lieutenants obtained an addition of rank, in their proper order. Mr. Harvey, a Midſhipman, who had been in the laſt as well as the preſent voyage, was promoted to the vacant Lieutenantcy (r).

Not long after Captain Cook's death, an event occurred in Europe, which had a particular relation to the voyage of our Navigator, and which was ſo honourable to himſelf, and to the great nation from whom it proceeded, that it is no ſmall pleaſure to me to be able to lay the tranſaction ſomewhat at large before my readers. What I refer to is, the letter which was iſſued, on the nineteenth of March, 1779, by Monſieur Sartine, Secretary of the Marine Department at Paris, and ſent to all the Commanders of French ſhips. The reſcript was as follows: "Captain Cook, who ſailed from Plymouth in July, 1776, "on board the Reſolution, in company with the Diſcovery, Captain Clerke, in order to "make ſome diſcoveries on the coaſts, iſlands, and ſeas of Japan and California, being on "the point of returning to Europe; and ſuch diſcoveries being of general utility to all "nations, it is the King's pleaſure, that Captain Cook ſhall be treated as a Commander of "a neutral and allied power, and that all Captains of armed veſſels, &c. who may meet "that famous Navigator, ſhall make him acquainted with the King's orders on this behalf, "but, at the ſame time, let him know, that on his part he muſt refrain from all hoſtilities "(s)." By the Marquis of Condorcet we are informed, that this meaſure originated in the liberal and enlightened mind of that excellent Citizen and Stateſman, Monſieur Turgot. "When war," ſays the Marquis, "was declared between France and England, "M. Turgot ſaw how honourable it would be to the French nation, that the veſſel of "Captain Cook ſhould be treated with reſpect at ſea. He compoſed a memorial, in which "he proved, that honour, reaſon, and even intereſt, dictated this act of reſpect for humanity; and it was in conſequence of this memorial, the author of which was unknown "during his life, that an order was given not to treat as an enemy, the common benefactor of every European nation (t)." Whilſt great praiſe is due to Monſieur Turgot, for having ſuggeſted the adoption of a meaſure which hath contributed ſo much to the reputation of the French Government, it muſt not be forgotten, that the firſt thought of ſuch a plan of conduct was probably owing to Dr. Benjamin Franklin. Thus much, at leaſt, is certain, that this eminent Philoſopher, when Embaſſador at Paris from the United States of America, preceded the Court of France in iſſuing a ſimilar requiſition; a copy of which cannot fail of being acceptable to the reader.

"and agility, in a greater degree, than ever I remembered to have ſeen before in any other man. "His age might be about thirty, and by the white "ſcurf on his ſkin, and his ſore eyes, he appeared to "be a hard drinker of Kava. He was a conſtant "companion of the King, with whom I firſt ſaw "him, when he paid a viſit to Captain Clerke. The "Chief who firſt ſtruck Captain Cook with the club, "was called Karimano, craha, but I did not know "him by his name. Theſe circumſtances I learnt of "honeſt Kaireekea, the Prieſt; who added, that they "were both held in great eſteem on account of that "action: neither of them came near us afterwards. "When the boats left the ſhore, the Indians carried "away the dead body of Captain Cook and thoſe of "the Marines, to the riſing ground, at the back of "the town, where we could plainly ſee them with "our glaſſes from the ſhips. This moſt melancholy "accident appears to have been altogether unexpected and unforeſeen, as well on the part of the "natives as ourſelves. I never ſaw ſufficient reaſon "to induce me to believe, that there was any thing "of deſign, or a pre-concerted plan on their ſide, or "that they purpoſely ſought to quarrel with us: "thieving, which gave riſe to the whole, they were "equally guilty of, in our firſt and ſecond viſits. It "was the cauſe of every miſunderſtanding that happened between us: their petty thefts were generally overlooked, but ſometimes ſlightly puniſhed: "the boat, which they at laſt ventured to take away, "was an object of no ſmall magnitude to people in "our ſituation, who could not poſſibly replace her, "and therefore not ſlightly to be given up. We "had no other chance of recovering her, but by "getting the perſon of the King into our poſſeſſion: "on our attempting to do that, the natives became "alarmed for his ſafety, and naturally oppoſed "thoſe whom they deemed his enemies. In the "ſudden conflict that enſued, we had the unſpeakable misfortune of loſing our excellent Commander, "in the manner already related. It is in this light "the affair has always appeared to me, as entirely "accidental, and not in the leaſt owing to any previous offence received, or jealouſy of our ſecond "viſit entertained by the natives. Pareah ſeems to "have been the principal inſtrument in bringing "about this fatal diſaſter. We learnt afterwards, "that it was he who had employed ſome people to ſteal "the boat: the King did not ſeem to be privy to it, "or even apprized of what had happened, till Captain Cook landed. It was generally remarked, "that at firſt, the Indians ſhewed great reſolution in "facing our fire-arms; but it was entirely owing to "ignorance of their effect. They thought that "their thick mats would defend them from a ball, "as well as from a ſtone; but being ſoon convinced "of their error, yet ſtill at a loſs to account how "ſuch execution was done among them, they had "recourſe to a ſtratagem, which, though it anſwered "no other purpoſe, ſerved to ſhew their ingenuity "and quickneſs of invention. Obſerving the flaſhes "of the muſquets, they naturally concluded, that "water would counteract their effect, and therefore, "very ſagaciouſly, dipped their mats, or armour, in "the ſea, juſt as they came on to face our people: "but finding this laſt reſource to fail them, they "ſoon diſperſed, and left the beach entirely clear. "It was an object they never neglected, even at the "greateſt hazard, to carry off their ſlain; a cuſtom, "probably owing to the barbarity with which they "treat the dead body of an enemy, and the trophies "they make of his bones (13)."

"To

" To all Captains and Commanders of armed Ships, acting by Commiſſion from the " Congreſs of the United States of America, now in war with Great Britain.

" Gentlemen,

" A ſhip having been fitted out from England before the commencement of this war,
" to make diſcoveries of new countries in unknown ſeas, under the conduct of that moſt
" celebrated Navigator and Diſcoverer, Captain Cook; an undertaking truly laudable in " itſelf, as the increaſe of geographical knowledge facilitates the communication between
" diſtant nations, in the exchange of uſeful products and manufactures, and the extenſion
" of arts, whereby the common enjoyments of human life are multiplied and augmented,
" and ſcience of other kinds encreaſed, to the benefit of mankind in general—This is " therefore moſt earneſtly to recommend to every one of you, that in caſe the ſaid ſhip,
" which is now expected to be ſoon in the European ſeas on her return, ſhould happen to " fall into your hands, you would not conſider her as an enemy, nor ſuffer any plunder to " be made of the effects contained in her, nor obſtruct her immediate return to England,
" by detaining her, or ſending her into any other part of Europe, or to America; but that " you would treat the ſaid Captain Cook and his people with all civility and kindneſs,
" affording them, as common friends to mankind, all the aſſiſtance in your power, which " they may happen to ſtand in need of. In ſo doing, you will not only gratify the gene-
" roſity of your own diſpoſitions, but there is no doubt of your obtaining the approbation
" of the Congreſs, and your other American owners.

" I have the honour to be,
" Gentlemen,
" Your moſt obedient,
" humble ſervant,
" B. FRANKLIN,
" Miniſter Plenipotentiary from the Congreſs
" of the United States, at the Court of " France."

" At Paſſy, near Paris,
" this 10th day of
" March, 1779.

It is obſervable, that as Dr. Franklin acted on his own authority, he could only earneſtly recommend to the Commanders of American armed veſſels not to conſider Captain Cook as an enemy; and it is ſomewhat remarkable, that he mentions no more than one ſhip; Captain Clerke not being noticed in the requiſition. In the confidence which the Doctor expreſſed, with reſpect to the approbation of Congreſs, he happened to be miſtaken. As the Members of that Aſſembly, at leaſt with regard to the greater part of them, were not poſſeſſed of minds equally enlightened with that of their Embaſſador, he was not ſupported by his Maſters in this noble act of humanity, of love to ſcience, and of liberal policy. The orders he had given were inſtantly reverſed; and it was directed by Congreſs, that eſpecial care ſhould be taken to ſeize Captain Cook, if an opportunity of doing it occurred. All this proceeded from a falſe notion that it would be injurious to the United States for the Engliſh to obtain a knowledge of the oppoſite coaſt of America. The conduct of the Court of Spain was regulated by ſimilar principles of jealouſy. It was apprehended by that Court, that there was reaſon to be cautious of granting, too eaſily, an indulgence to Captain Cook; ſince it was not certain what miſchiefs might enſue to the Spaniards from a northern paſſage to their American dominions. M. de Belluga, a Spaniſh Gentleman and officer, of a liberal and a philoſophical turn of mind, and who was a Member of the Royal Society of London, endeavoured to prevail upon the Count of Florida Blanca, and M. d'Almodavar, to grant an order of protection to the Reſolution and Diſcovery; and he flattered himſelf, that the Miniſters of the King of Spain would be prevailed upon to prefer the cauſe of ſcience to the partial views of intereſt: but the Spaniſh Government was not capable of riſing to ſo enlarged and magnanimous a plan of policy. To the French nation alone, therefore, was reſerved the honour of ſetting an example of wiſdom and humanity, which, I truſt, will not, hereafter, be ſo uncommon in the hiſtory of mankind [NN].

The progreſs of the voyage, after the deceaſe of Captain Cook, doth not fall within the deſign of the preſent narrative. It muſt be ſufficient, therefore, barely to mention, that the Sandwich Iſlands were farther explored, and a large addition of whatever relates to the knowledge of their productions and inhabitants obtained; that Kamtſchatka was viſited, and a very friendly intercourſe maintained with the Ruſſian officers of that country; that our Navigators experienced the moſt generous and hoſpitable treatment from Major Behm in particular, the Commander of the Garriſon at Bolcharetſk; that they proceeded to the [NN] Be ſo uncommon in the hiſtory of mankind.] For the materials from which the preceding account is drawn up, I am indebted to Sir Joſeph Banks. Sir Joſeph and Mr. Stephens have been at conſiderable pains to obtain, by application to the Duke of Dorſet, an authentic copy of the protection granted by the Court of France to Captain Cook's ſhips. If it ſhould arrive in time, it will be inſerted at the end of the article.

I ſhall here add, that as ſoon as Captain Gore was informed of the order of the French Government (an account of which he received at Canton) he thought himſelf bound, in return for the liberal exceptions made in favour of our Navigators, to refrain from laying hold of any opportunities of capture that might chance to occur, and to preſerve, throughout his voyage, the ſtricteſt neutrality (14).

North,

North, in purſuit of the grand object of the expedition; that, having paſſed through Beering's Strait, and attained to ſomething more than ſixty-nine degrees and a half of northern latitude, they found it abſolutely impoſſible to penetrate through the ice, either on the ſide of America or on the ſide of Aſia; that every hope being excluded of accompliſhing this way a paſſage into the Atlantic Ocean, Captain Clerke was obliged to come to the determination of ſailing back to the ſouthward; that on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, (1779) being leſs than a month after this determination, the Captain died of a conſumption [OO]; that Captain Gore ſucceeded to the command of the Reſolution, and Lieutenant King to that of the Diſcovery; that a ſecond viſit was paid to Kamtſchatka, by which a farther acquaintance was gained with that part of the world; that no ſmall acceſſion of information was acquired with reſpect to geographical ſcience in general; that our Voyagers purſued their courſe by the coaſts of Japan and China; that they made ſome ſtay at Canton; that thence they proceeded to the Cape of Good Hope; that they came to an anchor at Stromneſs, on the twenty-ſecond of May, 1780; that both ſhips arrived ſafe at the Nore, on the fourth of October, after an abſence of four years, two months, and twenty-two days; that, during the whole of the undertaking, the Reſolution loſt only five men by ſickneſs, three of whom were in a precarious ſtate of health at their departure from England, while the Diſcovery did not loſe a ſingle man; and that the hiſtory of the voyage, from the time in which Captain Cook's journal ends, was written with great ability by Mr. King. With concern I add, that, by the deceaſe of Captain King, who died at Nice, in Italy, in the year 1784, this country ſuſtained another loſs of an able and ſcientific Commander and Navigator, who hath left a memorial of his talents and ſervices, which has honourably united his name with that of the immortal Cook.

From the relation that has been given of Captain Cook's courſe of life, and of the important events in which he was engaged, my readers cannot be ſtrangers to his general character. This, therefore, might be left to be collected from his actions, which are the beſt exhibitions of the great qualities of his mind. But, perhaps, were I not to endeavour to afford a ſummary view of him in theſe reſpects, I might be thought to fail in that duty which I owe to the public on the preſent occaſion. It cannot, I think, be denied, that genius belonged to Captain Cook in an eminent degree. By genius I do not here underſtand imagination merely, or that power of culling the flowers of fancy which poetry delights in; but an inventive mind; a mind full of reſources; and which, by its own native vigour, can ſuggeſt noble objects of purſuit, and the moſt effectual methods of attaining them. This faculty was poſſeſſed by our Navigator in its full energy, as is evident from the uncommon ſagacity and penetration which he diſcovered in a vaſt variety of critical and difficult ſituations. To genius Captain Cook added application, without which nothing very valuable or permanent can be accompliſhed, even by the brighteſt capacity. For an unremitting attention to whatever related to his profeſſion, he was diſtinguiſhed in early life. In every affair that was undertaken by him, his aſſiduity was without interruption, and without abatement. Wherever he came, he ſuffered nothing which was fit for a ſeaman to know or to practiſe, to paſs unnoticed, or to eſcape his diligence. The genius and application of Captain Cook were followed by a large extent of knowledge; a knowledge which, beſide a conſummate acquaintance with navigation, comprehended a number of other ſciences. In this reſpect, the ardour of his mind roſe above the diſadvantages of a very confined education. His progreſs in the different branches of the mathematics, and particularly in aſtronomy, became ſo eminent, that, at length, he was able to take the lead in making the neceſſary obſervations of this kind, in the courſe of his voyages. He attained, likewiſe, to ſuch a degree of proficiency in general learning, and the art of compoſition, as to be able to expreſs himſelf with a manly clearneſs and propriety, and to become reſpectable as the narrator, as well as the performer, of great actions. Another thing, ſtrikingly conſpicuous in Captain Cook, was the perſeverance with which he purſued the noble ob-

[OO] The Captain died of a conſumption.] Captain Clerke departed this life in the thirty-eighth year of his age. He was brought up to the Navy from his earlieſt youth, and had been in ſeveral actions during the war which began in 1756. In the action between the Bellona and the Courageux, being ſtationed in the mizen-top, he was carried overboard with the maſt; but was taken up without having received any hurt. He was a Midſhipman in the Dolphin, commanded by Captain Byron, in her voyage round the world; after which he ſerved on the American ſtation. In 1768, he made his ſecond voyage round the world, in the Endeavour, as Maſter's Mate; and, in conſequence of the death of Mr. Hicks, which happened on the twenty-third of May, 1771, he returned home a Lieutenant. His third circum-navigation of th globe was in the Reſolution, of which he was appointed the Second Lieutenant; and he continued in that ſituation till his return in 1775; ſoon after which he was promoted to the rank of Maſter and Commander. In what capacity he ſailed with Captain Cook in this laſt expedition, need not be added. The conſumption of which Captain Clerke died, had evidently commenced before he left England, and he lingered under it during the whole voyage. Though his very gradual decay had long made him a melancholy object to his friends, neverthleſs, they derive ſome conſolation from the equanimity with which he bore his diſorder, from the conſtant flow of good ſpirits maintained by him to his lateſt hour, and from his ſubmitting to his fate with chearful reſignation. It was, however, impoſſible, ſays Mr. King, "not to "feel a more than common degree of compaſſion for "a perſon, whoſe life had been a continued ſcene of "thoſe difficulties and hardſhips, to which a ſeaman's "occupation is ſubject, and under which he at laſt "ſunk (15)."

(15) King's Voyage, p. 280, 8vo.

jects to which his life was devoted. This, indeed, was a moſt diſtinguiſhed feature in his character: in this he ſcarcely ever had an equal, and never a ſuperior. Nothing could divert him from the points he aimed at; and he perſiſted in the proſecution of them, through difficulties and obſtructions which would have deterred minds of very conſiderable ſtrength and firmneſs. What enabled him to perſevere in all his mighty undertakings, was the invincible fortitude of his ſpirit. Of this, inſtances without number occur in the accounts of his expeditions; two of which I ſhall take the liberty of recalling to the attention of my readers. The firſt is, the undaunted magnanimity with which he proſecuted his diſcoveries along the whole South-eaſt coaſt of New Holland. Surrounded as he was with the greateſt poſſible dangers, ariſing from the perpetual ſucceſſion of rocks, ſhoals, and breakers, and having a ſhip that was almoſt ſhaken to pieces by repeated perils, his vigorous mind had a regard to nothing but what he thought was required of him by his duty to the public. It will not be eaſy to find, in the hiſtory of navigation, a parallel example of courageous exertion. The other circumſtance I would refer to is the boldneſs with which, in his ſecond voyage, after he left the Cape of Good Hope, he puſhed forwards into unknown ſeas, and penetrated through innumerable mountains and Iſlands of ice, in the ſearch of a ſouthern continent. It was like launching into chaos: all was obſcurity, all was darkneſs before him; and no event can be compared with it, excepting the ſailing of Magelhaen's, from the ſtraits which bear his name, into the pacific Ocean (u). The fortitude of Captain Cook, being founded upon reaſon, and not upon inſtinct, was not an impetuous valour, but accompanied with compleat ſelf-poſſeſſion. He was maſter of himſelf on every trying occaſion, and ſeemed to be the more calm and collected, the greater was the exigence of the caſe. In the moſt perilous ſituations, when our Commander had given the proper directions concerning what was to be done while he went to reſt, he could ſleep, during the hours he had allotted to himſelf, with perfect compoſure and ſoundneſs (w). Nothing could be a ſurer indication of an elevated mind; of a mind that was entirely ſatisfied with itſelf, and with the meaſures it had taken. To all theſe great qualities, Captain Cook added the moſt amiable virtues. That it was impoſſible for any one to excel him in humanity, is apparent from his treatment of his men through all his voyages, and from his behaviour to the natives of the countries which were diſcovered by him. The health, the convenience, and, as far as it could be admitted, the enjoyment of the ſeamen, were the conſtant objects of his attention; and he was anxiouſly ſolicitous to meliorate the condition of the inhabitants of the ſeveral Iſlands and places which he viſited. With regard to their thieveries, he candidly apologized for, and overlooked, many offences which others would have ſharply puniſhed; and when he was laid under an indiſpenſable neceſſity of proceeding to any acts of ſeverity, he never exerted them without feeling much reluctance and concern. In the private relations of life, Captain Cook was entitled to high commendation. He was excellent as a huſband and a father, and ſincere and ſteady in his friendſhips: and to this it may be added, that he poſſeſſed that general ſobriety and virtue of character, which will always be found to conſtitute the beſt ſecurity and ornament of every other moral qualification. With the greateſt benevolence and humanity of diſpoſition, Captain Cook was occaſionally ſubject to a haſtineſs of temper. This, which has been exaggerated by the few (and they are indeed few) who are unfavourable to his memory, is acknowledged by his friends. It is mentioned both by Captain King and Mr. Samwell, in their delineations of his character. Mr. Hayley, in one of his poems, calls him the mild Cook; but, perhaps, that is not the happieſt epithet which could have been applied to him. Mere mildneſs can ſcarcely be conſidered as the moſt prominent and diſtinctive feature in the mind of a man, whoſe powers of underſtanding and of action were ſo ſtrong and elevated, who had ſuch immenſe difficulties to ſtruggle with, and who muſt frequently have been called to the firmeſt exertions of authority and command. Laſtly, Captain Cook was diſtinguiſhed by a property which is almoſt univerſally the concomitant of truly great men, and that is, a ſimplicity of manners. In converſation he was unaffected and unaſſuming; rather backward in puſhing diſcourſe; but obliging and communicative in his anſwers to thoſe who addreſſed him for the purpoſes of information. It was not poſſible that, in a mind conſtituted like his, ſuch a paltry quality as vanity could find an exiſtence.

In this imperfect delineation of Captain Cook's character, I have ſpoken of him in a manner which is fully juſtified by the whole courſe of his life and actions, and which is perfectly agreeable to the ſentiments of thoſe who were the moſt nearly connected with him in the habits of intimacy and friendſhip. The pictures which ſome of them have drawn of him, though they have already been preſented to the public, cannot here with propriety be omitted, and, therefore, ſhall be given in note [PP].

[PP] And, therefore, ſhall be given in note.] Captain King has expreſſed himſelf concerning him in the following terms. "The conſtitution of his "body was robuſt, inured to labour, and capable of "undergoing the ſevereſt hardſhips. His ſtomach "bore, without difficulty, the coarſeſt and moſt un-"grateful food:—Great was the indifference with "which he ſubmitted to every kind of ſelf-denial. "The qualities of his mind were of the ſame hardy, "vigorous kind with thoſe of his body. His under-"ſtanding was ſtrong and perſpicacious. His judg-"ment, in whatever related to the ſervices he was "engaged

From a ſurvey of Captain Cook's character, it is natural to extend our reflections to the effects of the ſeveral expeditions in which he was engaged. Theſe, indeed, muſt have largely

" engaged in, quick and ſure. His deſigns were " bold and manly; and both in the conception, and " in the mode of execution, bore evident marks of a " great original genius. His courage was cool and " determined, and accompanied with an admirable " preſence of mind in the moment of danger. His " temper might perhaps have been juſtly blamed, as " ſubject to haſtineſs and paſſion, had not theſe been " diſarmed by a diſpoſition the moſt benevolent and " humane. Such were the outlines of Captain " Cook's character; but its moſt diſtinguiſhing fea- " ture was that unremitting perſeverance in the pur- " ſuit of his object, which was not only ſuperior to " the oppoſition of dangers, and the preſſure of hard- " ſhips, but even exempt from the want of ordinary " relaxation. During the long and tedious voyages " in which he was engaged, his eagerneſs and acti- " vity were never in the leaſt abated. No incidental " temptation could detain him for a moment: even " thoſe intervals of recreation, which ſometimes un- " avoidably occurred, and were looked for by us with " a longing, that perſons, who have experienced the " fatigues of ſervice, will readily excuſe, were ſub- " mitted to by him with a certain impatience, when- " ever they could not be employed in making a far- " ther proviſion for the more effectual proſecution of " his deſigns (16)."

(16) King's Voyage, p. 48, 49.

" The character of Captain Cook," ſays Mr. Samwell, " will be beſt exemplified by the ſervices he has " performed, which are univerſally known, and have " ranked his name above that of any navigator of " ancient or of modern times. Nature had endowed " him with a mind vigorous and comprehenſive, " which in his riper years he had cultivated with care " and induſtry. His general knowledge was exten- " ſive and various: in that of his own profeſſion he " was unequalled. With a clear judgment, ſtrong " maſculine ſenſe, and the moſt determined reſolu- " tion; with a genius peculiarly turned for enter- " prize, he purſued his object with unſhaken perſe- " verance:—vigilant and active in an eminent de- " gree:—cool and intrepid among dangers; patient " and firm under difficulties and diſtreſs; fertile in " expedients; great and original in all his deſigns; " active and reſolved in carrying them into execu- " tion. Theſe qualities rendered him the animating " ſpirit of the expedition: in every ſituation, he " ſtood unrivalled and alone; on him all eyes were " turned; he was our leading-ſtar, which at its ſet- " ting, left us involved in darkneſs and deſpair. His " conſtitution was ſtrong, his mode of living tempe- " rate.——He was a modeſt man, and rather baſhful; " of an agreeable lively converſation, ſenſible and " intelligent. In his temper he was ſomewhat haſty, " but of a diſpoſition the moſt friendly, benevolent, " and humane. His perſon was above ſix feet high, " and though a good-looking man, he was plain both " in addreſs and appearance. His head was ſmall; " his hair, which was a dark brown, he wore tied " behind. His face was full of expreſſion; his noſe " exceedingly well ſhaped; his eyes, which were " ſmall and of a brown caſt, were quick and pierc- " ing; his eye-brows prominent, which gave his " countenance altogether an air of auſterity. He " was beloved by his people, who looked up to him " as to a father, and obeyed his commands with " alacrity. The confidence we placed in him was " unremitting; our admiration of his great talents " unbounded; our eſteem for his good qualities af- " fectionate and ſincere.——He was remarkably diſ- " tinguiſhed for the activity of his mind: it was that " which enabled him to pay an unwearied attention " to every object of the ſervice. The ſtrict œconomy " he obſerved in the expenditure of the ſhip's ſtores, " and the unremitting care he employed for the pre- " ſervation of the health of his people, were the " cauſes that enabled him to proſecute diſcoveries in " remote parts of the globe, for ſuch a length of time " as had been deemed impracticable by former navi- " gators. The method he diſcovered for preſerving " the health of ſeamen in long voyages, will tranſ- " mit his name to poſterity as the friend and bene- " factor of mankind: the ſucceſs which attended it, " afforded this truly great man more ſatisfaction, " than the diſtinguiſhed fame that attended his diſ- " coveries. England has been unanimous in her " tribute of applauſe to his virtues, and all Europe " has borne teſtimony to his merit. There is hardly " a corner of the earth, however remote and ſavage, " that will not long remember his benevolence and " humanity. The grateful Indian, in time to come, " pointing to the herds grazing his fertile plains, " will relate to his children how the firſt ſtock of " them was introduced into the country; and the " name of Cook will be remembered among thoſe " benign ſpirits, whom they worſhip as the ſource of " every good, and the fountain of every bleſſing " (17)."

(17) Some particulars concerning the life and character of Captain Cook, annexed to the narrative of his death, p. 25—27.

At the concluſion of the Introduction to the Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, is an eulogium on Captain Cook, drawn up by one of his own profeſſion, of whom it is ſaid, that he is not more diſtinguiſhed by the elevation of rank, than by the dignity of private virtues (18). Though this excellent eulogium muſt be known to many, and perhaps to moſt, of my readers, they will not be diſpleaſed at having the greater part of it brought to their recollection. Captain James Cook " poſſeſſed," ſays the writer, " in an eminent degree, all the qualifications requi- " ſite for his profeſſion and great undertakings; toge- " ther with the amiable and worthy qualities of the " beſt men. Cool and deliberate in judging: ſaga- " cious in determining: active in executing: ſteady " and perſevering in enterprizing from vigilance and " unremitting caution: unſubdued by labour, diffi- " culties, and diſappointments: fertile in expedients: " never wanting preſence of mind: always poſſeſſing " himſelf, and the full uſe of a ſound underſtanding. " Mild, juſt, but exact in diſcipline: he was a father " to his people, who were attached to him from af- " fection, and obedient from confidence. (19) Introduction to the Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, p. lxxxvi—lxxxix.

" The laſt character I ſhall here inſert of Captain Cook, comes from a learned writer, who, in conſequence of ſome diſagreements which are underſtood to have ſubſiſted between him and our great Navigator, cannot be ſuſpected of intending to celebrate him in the language of flattery. Dr. Reinhold Forſter, having given a ſhort account of the Captain's death, adds as follows: " Thus fell this truly glorious and juſtly
" admired Navigator.—If we conſider his extreme " abilities, both natural and acquired, the firmneſs
" and conſtancy of his mind, his truly paternal care " for the crew entruſted to him, the amiable manner
" with which he knew how to gain the friendſhip of " all the ſavage and uncultivated nations, and even
" his conduct towards his friends and acquaintance,
" we muſt acknowledge him to have been one of the " greateſt men of his age, and that reaſon juſtifies
" the tear which friendſhip pays to his memory (20)."
After ſuch an encomium on Captain Cook, leſs regard may juſtly be paid to the deductions from it, which are added by Dr. Forſter. What he hath ſaid concerning the Captain's temper, ſeems to have received a tincture of exaggeration, from prejudice and perſonal animoſity; and the Doctor's inſinuation, that our Navigator obſtructed Lieutenant Pickerſgill's promotion, is, I have good reaſon to believe, wholly groundleſs. There is another error which muſt not paſs unnoticed. Dr. Forſter puts in his caveat againſt giving the name of Cook's Straits to the Straits between Aſia and America, diſcovered by Beering. But if the Doctor had read the Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, publiſhed by authority, he would have ſeen, that there was no deſign of robbing Beering of the honour to which he was entitled."

(20) Forſter's Hiſtory of the Voyages and Diſcoveries made in the North, p. 404.

[22] I ſhall ſubjoin below a ſhort view of the ſubject.] " It muſt, however, be obſerved, that, with regard to the three principal conſequences of our great Navigator's tranſactions I have nothing farther to offer. Theſe are, his having diſpelled the illuſion of a Terra Auſtralis Incognita; his demonſtration of the impracticability of a northern paſſage from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean; and his having eſtabliſhed a ſure method of preſerving the health of ſeamen in the longeſt voyages, and through every variety of latitude and climate. Concerning each of theſe capital objects, I have already ſo fully ſpoken, that it is not in my power to add to the impreſſion of their importance, and of Captain Cook's merits in relation to them, which, I truſt, is firmly fixed on the mind of every reader.

It is juſtly remarked, by the Biſhop of Carliſle, that one great advantage accruing to the world from our late ſurveys of the globe, is, that they have confuted fanciful theories, too likely to give birth to impracticable undertakings. The ingenious reveries of ſpeculative philoſophers, which have ſo long amuſed the learned, and raiſed the moſt ſanguine expectations, are now obliged to ſubmit, perhaps with reluctance, to the ſober dictates of truth and experience. Nor will it be only by diſcouraging future unprofitable ſearches, that the late voyages will be of ſervice to mankind, but alſo by leſſening the dangers and diſtreſſes formerly experienced in thoſe ſeas which are within the actual line of commerce and navigation. From the Britiſh diſcoveries, many commercial improvements may be expected to ariſe in our own times: but, in future ages, ſuch improvements may be extended to a degree, of which, at preſent, we have no conception. In the long chain of cauſes and effects, no one can tell how widely and beneficially the mutual intercourſe of the various inhabitants of the earth may hereafter be carried on, in conſequence of the means of facilitating it, which have been explored and pointed out by Captain Cook.

The intereſts of ſcience, as well as of commerce, ſtand highly indebted to this illuſtrious Navigator. That a knowledge of the globe on which we live is a very deſirable object, no one can call in queſtion. This is an object which, while it is ardently purſued by the moſt enlightened philoſophers, is ſought for with avidity, even by thoſe whoſe ſtudies do not carry them beyond the loweſt rudiments of learning. It need not be ſaid what gratification Captain Cook hath provided for the world in this reſpect. Before the voyages of the preſent reign took place, nearly half the ſurface of the earth was hidden in obſcurity and confuſion. From the diſcoveries of our Navigator, geography has aſſumed a new face, and become, in a great meaſure, a new ſcience; having attained to ſuch a completion, as to leave only ſome leſs important parts of the globe to be explored by future voyagers (21).

(21) Lieutenant Roberts's admirable chart will ſet this matter in the ſtrongeſt light.

Happily for the advancement of knowledge, acquiſitions cannot be obtained in any one branch, without leading to acquiſitions in other branches, of equal, and perhaps of ſuperior conſequence. New oceans cannot be traverſed, or new countries viſited, without preſenting freſh objects of ſpeculation and enquiry, and carrying the practice, as well as the theory, of philoſophy, to a higher degree of perfection. Nautical aſtronomy, in particular, was in its infancy, when the late voyages were firſt undertaken; but, during the proſecution of them, and eſpecially in Captain Cook's laſt expedition, even many of the petty officers could obſerve the diſtance of the moon from the ſun, or a ſtar, the moſt delicate of all obſervations, with ſufficient accuracy. As for the officers of ſuperior rank, they would have felt themſelves aſhamed to have it thought that they did not know how to obſerve for, and compute the time at ſea; though ſuch a thing had, a little before, ſcarcely been heard of among ſeamen. Nay, firſt-rate philoſophers had doubted the poſſibility of doing it with the exactneſs that could be wiſhed. It muſt, however, be remembered, that a large ſhare of praiſe is due to the Board of Longitude, for the proficiency of the Gentlemen of the Navy in taking obſervations at ſea. In conſequence of the attention of that Board to this important object, liberal rewards have been given to Mathematicians for perfecting the lunar tables, and facilitating calculations; and artiſts have been amply encouraged in the conſtruction of inſtruments and watches, much more accurately and compleatly adapted to the purpoſes of navigation than formerly exiſted.

It is needleſs to mention what a quantity of additional information has been gained with reſpect to the riſe and times of the flowing of the tides; the direction and force of currents at ſea; and the cauſe and nature of the polarity of the needle, and the theory of its variations. Natural knowledge has been increaſed by experiments on the effects of gravity in different and very diſtant places: and, from Captain Cook's having penetrated ſo far into the Southern Ocean, it is now aſcertained, that the phænomenon, uſually called the Aurora Borealis, is not peculiar to high northern latitudes, but belongs equally to all cold climates, whether they be North or South.

Amidſt the different branches of ſcience that have been promoted by the late expeditions, there is none, perhaps, that ſtands ſo highly indebted to them as the ſcience of botany. At leaſt twelve hundred new plants have been added to the known ſyſtem; and large acceſſions of intelligence have accrued with regard to every other part of natural hiſtory. This point has already been evinced by the writings of Dr. Sparrman, of the two Forſters, father and ſon, and of Mr. Pennant; and this point will illuſtriouſly be manifeſted, when the great work of Sir Joſeph Banks ſhall be accompliſhed, and given to the world.

It is not to the enlargement of natural knowledge only, that the effects ariſing from Captain Cook's voyages are to be confined. Another important object of ſtudy has been opened by them; and that is, the ſtudy of human nature, in ſituations various, intereſting, and uncommon. The Iſlands viſited in the centre of the South Pacific Ocean, and the principal ſcenes of the operations of our diſcoverers, were untrodden ground. As the inhabitants, ſo far as could be obſerved, had continued, from their original ſettlement, unmixed with any different tribe; as they had been left entirely to their own powers for every art of life, and to their own remote traditions for every political or religious cuſtom or inſtitution; as they were uninformed by ſcience, and unimproved by education, they could not but afford many ſubjects of ſpeculation to an inquiſitive and philoſophical mind. Hence may be collected a variety of important facts with reſpect to the ſtate of man; with reſpect to his attainments and deficiencies, his virtues and vices, his employments and diverſions, his feelings, manners, and cuſtoms, in a certain period of ſociety. Even the curioſities which have been brought from the diſcovered Iſlands, and which enrich the Britiſh Muſeum, and the late Sir Aſhton Lever's (now Mr. Parkinſon's) repoſitory, may be conſidered as a valuable acquiſition to this country; as ſupplying no ſmall fund of information and entertainment.

Few enquiries are more intereſting than thoſe which relate to the migrations of the various families or tribes that have peopled the earth. It was known in general, that the Aſiatic nation, called Malayans, poſſeſſed, in former times, much the greateſt trade in the Indies; and that they frequented, with their merchants ſhips, not only all the coaſts of Aſia, but ventured over even to the coaſts of Africa, and particularly to the great Iſland of Madagaſcar. But that, from Madagaſcar to the Marqueſas and Eaſter Iſland, that is, nearly from the Eaſt ſide of Africa, till we approach towards the Weſt ſide of America, a ſpace including above half the circumference of the globe, the ſame nation of the Oriental world ſhould have made their ſettlements, and founded colonies throughout almoſt every intermediate ſtage of this immenſe tract, in Iſlands at amazing diſtances from the mother continent, and the natives of which were ignorant of each other's exiſtence; is an hiſtorical fact, that, before Captain Cook's voyages, could be but very imperfectly known. He it is who hath diſcovered a vaſt number of new ſpots of land, lurking in the boſom of the South Pacific Ocean, all the inhabitants of which diſplay ſtriking evidences of their having derived their deſcent from one common Aſiatic original. Nor is this apparent ſolely from a ſimilarity of cuſtoms and inſtitutions, but is eſtabliſhed by a proof which conveys irreſiſtible conviction to the mind, and that is, the affinity of language. The collections that have been made of the words which are uſed in the widely-diffuſed Iſlands and countries that have lately been viſited, cannot fail, in the hands of ſuch men as a Bryant and a Marſden, to throw much light on the origin of nations, and the peopling of the globe. From Mr. Marſden, in particular, who has devoted his attention, time, and ſtudy to this curious ſubject, the literary world may hereafter expect to be highly inſtructed and entertained.

There is another family of the earth, concerning which new information has been derived from the voyages of our Britiſh Navigators. That the Eſquimaux, who had hitherto only been found ſeated on the coaſts of Labradore and Hudſon's Bay, agreed with the Greenlanders in every circumſtance of cuſtoms, manners, and language, which could demonſtrate an original identity of nation, had already been aſcertained. But that the ſame tribe now actually inhabit the iſlands and coaſts on the Weſt ſide of North America, oppoſite Kamtſchatka, was a diſcovery, the completion of which was reſerved for Captain Cook. In his narrative it will be ſeen that theſe people have extended their migrations to Norton Sound, Oonalaſhka, and Prince William's Sound; that is, to nearly the diſtance of fifteen hundred leagues from their ſtations in Greenland, and the coaſt of Labradore. Nor does this curious fact reſt merely on the evidence ariſing from ſimilitude of manners: for it ſtands confirmed by a table of words, exhibiting ſuch an affinity of language as will remove every doubt from the mind of the moſt ſcrupulous enquirer.

Other queſtions there are, of a very important nature, the ſolution of which will now be rendered more eaſy than hath heretofore been apprehended. From the full confirmation of the vicinity of the two continents of Aſia and America, it can no longer be repreſented as ridiculous to believe, that the former furniſhed inhabitants to the latter. By the facts recently diſcovered, a credibility is added to the Moſaic account of the peopling of the earth (22). That account will, I doubt not, ſtand the teſt of the moſt learned and rigorous inveſtigation. Indeed, I have long been convinced, after the cloſeſt meditation of which I am capable, that ſound philoſophy and genuine revelation never militate againſt each other. The rational friends of religion are ſo far from dreading the ſpirit of enquiry, that they wiſh for nothing more than a candid, calm, and impartial examination of the ſubject, according to all the lights which the improved reaſon and the enlarged ſcience of man can afford.

(22) Introduction to the Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, p. lvi—lxxv.

One great effect of the voyages made under the conduct of Captain Cook, is their having excited a zeal for ſimilar undertakings. Other Princes and other nations are engaged in expeditions of navigation and diſcovery. By order of the French Government, Meſſ. de la Peyrouſe and de Langle ſailed from Breſt, in Auguſt, 1785, in the frigates Bouſſole and Aſtroloobe, on an enterprize, the expreſs purpoſe of which was the improvement of geography, aſtronomy, natural hiſtory, and philoſophy, and to collect accounts of cuſtoms and manners. For the more effectual proſecution of the deſign, ſeveral Gentlemen were appointed to go out upon the voyage, who were known to excel in different departments of ſcience and literature. M. Dagelet went as Aſtronomer; M. de la Martiniere, P. Recevour, and M. de la Freſne, as Naturaliſts; and the Chevalier de Lamanon, and M. Monges, Junior, as Natural Philoſophers. The officers of the Bouſſole were men of the beſt information, and the firmeſt reſolution; and the crew contained a number of artificers, in various kinds of mechanic employments. Marine watches, and other inſtruments, were provided; and M. Dagelet was particularly directed to make obſervations with M. Condamine's invariable pendulum, to determine the differences in gravity, and to aſcertain the true proportion of the equatorial to the polar diameter of the earth. From ſome accounts which have already been received of theſe voyagers, it appears, that they have explored the coaſt of California; have adjuſted the ſituation of more than fifty places, almoſt wholly unknown; and have viſited Owhyhee, and the reſt of the eſtimation, both at home and abroad. Perhaps, indeed, greater honour is paid to his name abroad than at home. Foreigners, I am informed, look up to him with an admiration which is not equalled in this country. A remarkable proof of it occurs, in the eulogy of our Navigator, by Michael Angelo Gianetti, which was read at the Royal Florentine Academy, on the ninth of June, 1785, and publiſhed at Florence, in the ſame year (x). Not having ſeen it, I am deprived of the power of doing juſtice to its merit. If I am not miſtaken in my recollection, one of the French Literary Academies has propoſed a prize for the beſt elogium on Captain Cook; and there can be no doubt but that ſeveral candidates will appear upon the occaſion, and exert the whole force of their eloquence on ſo intereſting a ſubject. To the applauſes of our Navigator, which have already been inſerted, I cannot avoid adding, in a note, ſome poetical teſtimonies concerning him. The firſt I ſhall produce is from a foreign Poet, M. l'Abbé Liſle. This Gentleman has concluded his "Les Jardins" with an encomium on Captain Cook, of which the following lines are a tranſlation [RR].

(x) Monthly Review, vol. lxxiii. p. 458.

the Sandwich Iſlands (23). When the expedition ſhall be completed, the whole reſult of it will doubtleſs be laid before the public.

Although Captain Cook has made ſuch vaſt diſcoveries in the Northern Ocean, on and between the Eaſt of Aſia and the Weſt coaſt of America, Mr. Coxe has well ſhewn that there is ſtill room for a farther inveſtigation of that part of the world. Accordingly, the object has been taken up by the Empreſs of Ruſſia, who has committed the conduct of the enterprize to Captain Billings, an Engliſhman in her Majeſty's ſervice. As Captain Billings was with Captain Cook in his laſt voyage, he may reaſonably be ſuppoſed to be properly qualified for the buſineſs he has undertaken. The deſign, with the execution of which he is entruſted, appears to be very extenſive and important; and, if it ſhould be crowned with ſucceſs, cannot fail of making conſiderable additions to the knowledge of geography and navigation (24).

(24) Coxe's Comparative View of the Ruſſian Diſcoveries, p. 27—30.

There is one event at home, which has evidently reſulted from Captain Cook's diſcoveries, and which, therefore, muſt not be omitted. What I refer to, is the ſettlement at Botany Bay. With the general policy of this meaſure the preſent narrative has not any concern. The plan, I doubt not, has been adopted with the beſt intentions, after the matureſt deliberation, and perhaps with conſummate wiſdom. One evident advantage ariſing from it is, that it will effectually prevent a number of unhappy wretches from returning to their former ſcenes of temptation and guilt, and may open to them the means of induſtrious ſubſiſtence and moral reformation. If it be wiſely and prudently begun and conducted, who can tell what beneficial conſequences may ſpring from it, in future ages? Immortal Rome is ſaid to have riſen from the refuſe of mankind.

While we are conſidering the advantages the diſcoverers have derived from the late navigations, a queſtion naturally occurs, which is, What benefits have hence accrued to the diſcovered? It would be a ſource of the higheſt pleaſure to be able to anſwer this queſtion to compleat ſatisfaction. But it muſt be acknowledged, that the ſubject is not wholly free from doubts and difficulties; and theſe doubts and difficulties might be enlarged upon, and exaggerated, by an imagination which is rather diſpoſed to contemplate and repreſent the dark than the luminous aſpect of human affairs. In one reſpect, Mr. Samwell has endeavoured to ſhew, that the natives of the lately-explored parts of the world, and eſpecially ſo far as relates to the Sandwich Iſlands, were not injured by our people; and it was the conſtant ſolicitude and care of Captain Cook, that evil might not be communicated in any place to which he came. If he was univerſally ſucceſsful, the good which, in various caſes, he was inſtrumental in producing, will be reflected upon with the more peculiar ſatisfaction.

There is an eſſential difference between the voyages that have lately been undertaken, and many which have been carried on in former times. None of my readers can be ignorant of the horrid cruelties that were exerciſed by the conquerors of Mexico and Peru; cruelties which can never be remembered, without bluſhing for religion and human nature. But to undertake expeditions with a deſign of civilizing the world, and meliorating its condition, is a noble object. The receſſes of the globe were inveſtigated by Captain Cook, not to enlarge private dominion, but to promote general knowledge; the new tribes of the earth were viſited as friends; and an acquaintance with their exiſtence was ſought for, in order to bring them within the pale of the offices of humanity, and to relieve the wants of their imperfect ſtate of ſociety. Such were the benevolent views which our Navigator was commiſſioned by his Majeſty to carry into execution; and there is reaſon to hope that they will not be wholly unſucceſsful. From the long-continued intercourſe with the natives of the Friendly, Society, and Sandwich Iſlands, ſome rays of light muſt have darted on their infant minds. The uncommon objects which have been preſented to their obſervation, and excited their ſurprize, will naturally tend to enlarge their ſtock of ideas, and to furniſh new materials for the exerciſe of their reaſonable faculties. It is no ſmall addition to their comforts of life, and their immediate enjoyments, that will be derived from the introduction of our uſeful animals and vegetables; and if the only benefit they ſhould ever receive from the viſits of the Engliſh, ſhould be the having obtained freſh means of ſubſiſtence, that muſt be conſidered as a great acquiſition (25).

(25) Introduction, ubi ſupra, p. lxxv, lxxvi.

But may not our hopes be extended to ſtill nobler objects? The connection which has been opened with theſe remote inhabitants of the world, is the firſt ſtep toward their improvement; and conſequences may flow from it, which are far beyond our preſent conceptions. Perhaps, our late voyages may be the means appointed by Providence, of ſpreading, in due time, the bleſſings of civilization among the numerous tribes of the South Pacific Ocean, and preparing them for holding an honourable rank among the nations of the earth. There cannot be a more laudable attempt, than that of endeavouring to reſcue millions of our fellow-creatures from that ſtate of humiliation in which they now exiſt (26). Nothing can more eſſentially contribute to the attainment of this great end, than a wiſe and rational introduction of the Chriſtian Religion; an introduction of it in its genuine ſimplicity; as holding out the worſhip of one God, inculcating the pureſt morality, and promiſing eternal life as the reward of obedience. Theſe are views of things which are adapted to general comprehenſion, and calculated to produce the nobleſt effects.

There have not been wanting elegant writers of our own country, who have embraced with pleaſure the opportunities that have offered of paying a tribute of praiſe to Captain Cook. The ingenious and amiable Miſs Hannah More has lately ſeized an occaſion of celebrating the humane intentions of the Captain's diſcoveries.

" Had thoſe advent'rous ſpirits who explore

(29) SLAVERY, a Poem.

Soon after the account arrived in England of Captain Cook's deceaſe, two poems were publiſhed in celebration of his memory; one of which was an Ode, by a Mr. Fitzgerald, of Gray's-Inn. But the firſt, both in order of time and of merit, was an Elegy, by Miſs Seward, whoſe poetical talents have been diſplayed in many beautiful inſtances to the public. This Lady, in the beginning of her Poem, has admirably repreſented the principle of humanity by which the Captain was actuated in his undertakings.

" Ye, who ere while for COOK's illuſtrious brow
" Pluck'd the green laurel, and the oaken bough,
" Hung the gay garlands on the trophied oars,
" And pour'd his fame along a thouſand ſhores,
" Strike the ſlow death-bell!—weave the ſacred
" verſe,
" And ſtrew the cypreſs o'er his honor'd hearſe;
" In ſad proceſſion wander round the ſhrine,
" And weep him mortal, whom ye ſung divine!
" Say firſt, what Pow'r inſpir'd his dauntleſs
" breaſt
" With ſcorn of danger, and inglorious reſt,
" To quit imperial London's gorgeous plains,
" Where, rob'd in thouſand tints, bright Pleaſure
" reigns?—
" What Pow'r inſpir'd his dauntleſs breaſt to brave
" The ſcorch'd Equator, and th' Antarctic wave?
" Climes, where fierce ſuns in cloudleſs ardors
" ſhine,
" And pour the dazzling deluge round the Line;
" The realms of froſt, where icy mountains riſe,
" 'Mid the pale ſummer of the polar ſkies?—
" IT WAS HUMANITY!—on coaſts unknown,
" The ſhiv'ring natives of the frozen zone,
" And the ſwart Indian, as he faintly ſtrays
" ' Where Cancer reddens in the ſolar blaze,'
" She bade him ſeek;—on each inclement ſhore
" Plant the rich ſeeds of her exhauſtleſs ſtore;
" Unite the ſavage hearts, and hoſtile hands,
" In the firm compact of her gentle bands;
" Strew her ſoft comforts o'er the barren plain,
" Sing her ſweet lays, and conſecrate her fane.
" IT WAS HUMANITY!—O Nymph divine!
" I ſee thy light ſtep print the burning Line!
" There thy bright eye the dubious pilot guides,
" The faint oar ſtruggling with the ſcalding tides.—
" On as thou lead'ſt the bold, the glorious prow,
" Mild, and more mild, the ſloping ſun-beams
" glow;
" Now weak and pale the leſſen'd luſtres play,
" As round th' horizon rolls the timid day;
" Barb'd with the fleeted ſnow, the driving hail,
" Ruſh the fierce arrows of the polar gale;
" And thro' the dim, unvaried, ling'ring hours,
" Wide o'er the waves incumbent horror low'rs."

Captain Cook's endeavours to ſerve the inhabitants of New Zealand, by the vegetables and animals he left among them, are thus deſcribed.

" To theſe the Hero leads his living ſtore,
" And pours new wonders on th' uncultur'd ſhore;
" The ſilky fleece, fair fruit, and golden grain;
" And future herds and harveſts bleſs the plain.
" O'er the green ſoil his Kids exulting play,
" And ſounds his clarion loud the Bird of day;
" The downy Gooſe her ruffled boſom laves,
" Trims her white wing, and wantons in the " waves;
" Stern moves the Bull along th' affrighted ſhores,
" And countleſs nations tremble as he roars."

I ſhall only add the pathetic and animated concluſion of this fine Poem.

" But ah!—aloft on Albion's rocky ſteep,
" That frowns incumbent o'er the boiling deep,
" Solicitous, and ſad, a ſofter form
" Eyes the lone flood, and deprecates the ſtorm.—
" Ill-fated matron!—for, alas! in vain
" Thy eager glances wander o'er the main!—
" 'Tis the vex'd billows, that inſurgent rave,
" Their white foam ſilvers yonder diſtant wave,
" 'Tis not his ſails!—thy huſband comes no more!
" His bones now whiten an accurſed ſhore!—
" Retire,—for hark! the ſea-gull ſhrieking ſoars,
" The lurid atmoſphere portentous low'rs;
" Night's ſullen ſpirit groans in ev'ry gale,
" And o'er the waters draws the darkling veil,
" Sighs in thy hair, and chills thy throbbing
" breaſt—
" Go, wretched mourner!—weep thy griefs to reſt!
" Yet, tho' through life is loſt each fond delight,
" Tho' ſet thy earthly ſun in dreary night,
" Oh! raiſe thy thoughts to yonder ſtarry plain,
" And own thy ſorrow ſelfiſh, weak, and vain:
" Since, while Britannia, to his virtues juſt,
" Twines the bright wreath, and rears th' immor" tal buſt;
" While on each wind of heav'n his fame ſhall riſe,
" In endleſs incenſe to the ſmiling ſkies;
" THE ATTENDANT POWER, that bade his ſails
" expand,
" And waft her bleſſings to each barren land,
" Now raptur'd bears him to th' immortal plains,
" Where Mercy hails him with congenial ſtrains;
" Where ſoars, upon Joy's white plume, his ſpirit free,
" And angels choir him, while he waits for THEE.

Captain Cook's diſcoveries, among other effects, have opened new ſcenes for a poetical fancy to range in, and preſented new images to the ſelection of genius and taſte. The Morais, in particular, of the inhabitants of the South Sea Iſlands, afford a fine ſubject for the exerciſe of a plaintive muſe. Such a muſe hath ſeized upon the ſubject; and, at the ſame time, has added another wreath to the memory of our Navigator. I refer to a Lady, who hath already, in many paſſages of her " Peru," in her " Ode on the Peace," and, above all, in her " Irregular Fragment," amply proved to the world, that ſhe poſſeſſes not only the talent of elegant and harmonious verſification, reſpect. Accordingly, it was reſolved to do this by a medal; and a voluntary ſubſcription was opened for the purpoſe. To ſuch of the Fellows of the Society as ſubſcribed twenty guineas, a gold medal was appropriated: ſilver medals were aſſigned to thoſe who contributed a ſmaller ſum; and to each of the other Members one in bronze was given. The Subſcribers of twenty guineas were Sir Joſeph Banks, Preſident; the Prince of Anſpach, the Duke of Montagu, Lord Mulgrave, and Meſſieurs Cavendiſh, Peachey, Perrin, Poli, and Shuttleworth. Many deſigns, as might be expected, were propoſed upon the occaſion. The medal which was actually ſtruck, contains, on one ſide, the head of Captain Cook in profile, and round it, JAC. COOK OCEANI INVESTIGATOR ACERRIMUS; and on the exergue, REG. SOC. LOND. SOCIO SUO. On the reverſe is a repreſentation of Britannia, holding a globe. Round her is inſcribed, NIL INTENTATUM NOSTRI LIQUERE; and on the exergue, AUSPICIIS GEORGII III. Of the gold medals which were ſtruck on this occaſion, one was preſented to his Majeſty, another to the Queen, and a third to the Prince of Wales. Two were ſent abroad: the firſt to the French King, on account of the protection he had granted to the ſhips under the command of Captain Cook; and a ſecond to the Empreſs of Ruſſia, in whoſe dominions the ſame ſhips had been received and treated with every degree of friendſhip and kindneſs. Both theſe preſents were highly acceptable to the great perſonages to whom they were tranſmitted. The French King expreſſed his ſatisfaction in a very handſome letter to the Royal Society, ſigned by himſelf, and underſigned by the Marquis de Vergennes; and the Empreſs of Ruſſia commiſſioned Count Oſterman to ſignify to Mr. Fitzherbert the ſenſe ſhe entertained of the value of the preſent, and that ſhe had cauſed it to be forthwith depoſited in the Muſeum of the Imperial Academy of Sciences. As a farther teſtimony of the pleaſure ſhe derived from it, the Empreſs preſented to the Royal Society a large and beautiful gold medal, containing on one ſide the effigies of herſelf, and on the reverſe a repreſentation of the ſtatue of Peter the Great. After the general aſſignment of the medals, (which took place in the ſpring of the year 1784) there being a ſurplus of money ſtill remaining, the Preſident and Council reſolved that an additional number ſhould be ſtruck off in gold, to be diſpoſed of as preſents to Mrs. Cook, the Earl of Sandwich, Dr. Benjamin Franklin, Dr. Cooke, Provoſt of King's College, Cambridge, and Mr. Planta. About the ſame time, it was agreed, that Mr. Aubert ſhould be allowed to have a gold medal of Captain Cook, on his paying for the gold, and the expence of ſtriking it; in conſideration of his intention to preſent it to the King of Poland (y).

During the two viſits of the Reſolution and Diſcovery at Kamtſchatka, it was from Colonel Behm, the Commandant of that Province, that the ſhips, and the officers and men belonging to them, had received every kind of aſſiſtance which it was in his power to beſtow. His liberal and hoſpitable behaviour to the Engliſh navigators, is related at large in Captain King's Voyage. Such was the ſenſe entertained of it by the Lords of the Admiralty, that they determined to make a preſent to the Colonel of a magnificent piece of plate, with an inſcription expreſſive of his humane and generous diſpoſition and conduct. The elegant pen of Dr. Cooke was employed in drawing up the inſcription, which, after it had been ſubjected to the opinion and correction of ſome Gentlemen of the firſt eminence in claſſical taſte, was as follows:

cation, but the ſpirit of true poetry. The concluſion of the Poem I refer to is as follows.

" Great COOK! Ambition's lofty flame
So oft directed to deſtroy,
Led Thee to circle with thy name,
The Smile of love, and hope, and joy!
Thoſe fires that lend the dang'rous blaze
The devious comet trails afar,
Might form the pure, benignant rays
That gild the morning's gentle ſtar—
Sure, where the Hero's aſhes reſt,
The nations late emerg'd from night
Still haſte—with love's unwearied care:
That ſpot in laviſh flowers is dreſt,
And fancy's dear, inventive rite
Still paid with fond obſervance there!

" Ah no!—around his fatal grave
No laviſh flowers were ever ſtrew'd,
No votive gifts were ever laid—
His blood a ſavage ſhore bedew'd!
His mangled limbs, one haſty prayer,
One pious tear by friendſhip paid,
Were caſt upon the raging wave!
Deep in the wild abyſs he lies,
Far from the cheriſh'd ſcene of home;
Far, far from Her whoſe faithful ſighs
A huſband's trackleſs courſe purſue;
Whoſe tender fancy loves to roam
With Him o'er lands and oceans new;
And gilds with Hope's deluding form
The gloomy path-way of the ſtorm.

" Yet, COOK! immortal wreaths are thine!—
While Albion's grateful toil ſhall raiſe
The marble tomb, the trophied buſt,
For ages faithful to its truſt;
While, eager to record thy praiſe,
She bids the Muſe of Hiſtory twine
The chaplet of undying fame,
And tell each poliſh'd land thy worth;
The ruder natives of the earth
Shall oft repeat thy honour'd name;
While infants catch the frequent ſound,
And learn to liſp the oral tale;
Whoſe fond remembrance ſhall prevail
Till Time has reach'd his deſtin'd bound."

It is ſomewhat remarkable, that female poets have hitherto been the chief celebrators of Captain Cook in this country. Perhaps a ſubject which would furniſh materials for as rich a production as Camoen's Luſiad, and which would adorn the pen of a Hayley or a Cowper, may hereafter call forth the genius of ſome poet of the ſtronger ſex.

Sir Hugh Palliſer, who, through life, manifeſted an invariable regard and friendſhip for Captain Cook, has diſplayed a ſignal inſtance, ſince the Captain's deceaſe, of the affection and eſteem in which he holds his memory. At his eſtate in Buckinghamſhire, Sir Hugh hath conſtructed a ſmall building, on which he has erected a pillar, containing the fine character of our great Navigator that is given at the end of the Introduction to the laſt Voyage, and the principal part of which has been inſerted in the preſent work. This character was drawn up by a moſt reſpectable Gentleman, who has long been at the head of the naval profeſſion; the honourable Admiral Forbes, Admiral of the Fleet, and General of Marines; to whom Captain Cook was only known by his eminent merit and his extraordinary actions (a).

(a) From the information of Sir Hugh Palliſer.

Amidſt the numerous teſtimonies of regard that have been paid to Captain Cook's merits and memory, the important object of providing for his family hath not been forgotten. Soon after the intelligence arrived of his unfortunate deceaſe, this matter was taken up by the Lords of the Admiralty, with a zeal and an effect, which the following authentic document will fully diſplay.

" At the Court at St. James's, the " (L. S.) " 2d of February, 1780;

" Preſent,

" The KING's Moſt Excellent Majeſty in Council.

" Whereas there was this day read, at the Board, a memorial from the Right Honourable
" the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, dated the 27th of laſt month, in the words
" following; viz.

" Having received an authentic account of the death of that great Navigator, Captain
" James Cook, who has had the honour of being employed by Your Majeſty in three " different voyages, for the diſcovery of unknown countries, in the moſt diſtant parts " of the globe; we think it our duty humbly to repreſent to Your Majeſty, that this " meritorious officer, after having received from Your Majeſty's gracious benevolence,
" as a reward for his public ſervices in two ſucceſsful circumnavigations, a comfortable
" and honourable retreat, where he might have lived many years to benefit his family,
" he voluntarily relinquiſhed that eaſe and emolument to undertake another of theſe
" voyages of diſcovery, in which the life of a Commander, who does his duty, muſt " always be particularly expoſed, and in which, in the execution of that duty, he fell,
" leaving his family, whom his public ſpirit had led him to abandon, as a legacy to his " country. We do therefore humbly propoſe, that Your Majeſty will be graciouſly " pleaſed to order a penſion of two hundred pounds a year to be ſettled on the widow,
" and twenty-five pounds a year upon each of the three ſons of the ſaid Captain James
" Cook, and that the ſame be placed on the ordinary eſtimate of the navy.

" His Majeſty, taking the ſaid memorial into His Royal conſideration, was pleaſed,
" with the advice of His Privy Council, to order, as it is hereby ordered, that a penſion
" of two hundred pounds a year be ſettled on the widow, and twenty-five pounds a year
" upon each of the three ſons of the ſaid Captain James Cook, and that the ſame be placed " on the ordinary eſtimate of His Majeſty's navy; and the Lords Commiſſioners of the " Admiralty are to give the neceſſary directions herein accordingly.

" W. FAWKENER."

The preceding memorial to the King was ſigned by the Earl of Sandwich, Mr. Buller, the Earl of Liſburne, Mr. Penton, Lord Mulgrave, and Mr. Mann; and the ſeveral officers of the Board of Admiralty ſeconded the ardour of their ſuperiors, by the ſpeed and generoſity with which his Majeſty's royal grant to Captain Cook's widow and children paſſed through the uſual forms (b). Another occaſion was afterwards ſeized of conferring a ſubſtantial benefit on the Captain's family. The charts and plates, belonging to the Voyage to the Pacific Ocean, were provided at the expence of Government; the conſequence of which was, that a large profit accrued from the ſale of the publication. Of this profit, half was conſigned, in truſt, to Sir Hugh Palliſer and Mr. Stephens, to be applied to the uſe of Mrs.

Cook, during her natural life, and afterwards to be divided between her children [SS]. Honour, as well as emolument, hath graciouſly been conferred by his Majeſty upon the deſcendants of Captain Cook. On the third of September, 1785, a coat of arms was granted to the family, of which a deſcription will be given below [TT]. Our Navigator had ſix children; James, Nathaniel, Elizabeth, Joſeph, George, and Hugh. Of theſe, Joſeph and George died ſoon after their birth, and Elizabeth in the fifth year of her age. James, the eldeſt ſon, who was born at St. Paul's, Shadwell, on the thirteenth of October, 1763, is now a Lieutenant in Majeſty's navy. In a letter, written by Admiral Sir Richard Hughes, in 1785, from Granada, to Mrs. Cook, he is ſpoken of in terms of high approbation. Nathaniel, who was born on the fourteenth of December, 1764, at Mile-end Old Town, was brought up, likewiſe, in the naval ſervice, and was unfortunately loſt on board his Majeſty's ſhip Thunderer, Commodore Walſingham, in the hurricane which happened at Jamaica on the third of October, 1780. He is ſaid to have been a moſt promiſing youth. Hugh, the youngeſt, was born on the twenty-ſecond of May, 1776; and was ſo called after the name of his father's great friend, Sir Hugh Palliſer (c).

(c) From the information of Mrs. Cook.

It hath often been mentioned, in terms of no ſmall regret, that a monument hath not yet been erected to the memory of Captain Cook, in Weſtminſter Abbey. The wiſh and the hope of ſuch a monument are hinted at in the cloſe of the Biſhop of Carliſle's Introduction, ſo often referred to; and the ſame ſentiment is expreſſed by the author of the Eulogium, at the end of that Introduction. Sir Hugh Palliſer has alſo ſpoken to the like purpoſe, in a communication I received from him. It would certainly redound to the honour of the nation, to order a magnificent memorial of the abilities and ſervices of our illuſtrious Navigator; on which account, a tribute of that kind may be regarded as a deſirable thing. But a monument in Weſtminſter Abbey would be of little conſequence to the reputation of Captain Cook. His fame ſtands upon a wider baſe, and will ſurvive the comparatively periſhing materials of braſs, or ſtone, or marble. The name of Cook will be held in honour, and recited with applauſe, ſo long as the records of human events ſhall continue in the earth: nor is it poſſible to ſay, what may be the influence and rewards, which, in other worlds, ſhall be found to attend upon eminent examples of wiſdom and of virtue.] K.

[SS] And afterwards to be divided between her children.] A fourth was allotted to Captain King, and the remaining fourth to Mr. Bligh, and to the repreſentatives of Captain Clerke. Mr. Anderſon's repreſentatives had previouſly been gratified.

His track thereon is marked with red lines. And for creſt, on a wreath of the colours, is an arm imbowed, veſted in the uniform of a Captain of the Royal Navy. In the hand is the union jack, on a ſtaff Proper. The arm is encircled by a wreath of palm and laurel.

COOPER, or COUPER (THOMAS), a learned Biſhop in the XVIth Century, was born in the city of Oxford, about the year 1517, but not of ſuch mean parentage as is inſinuated by Anthony Wood [A]. He was educated in grammar-learning in the ſchool joining to St. Mary Magdalen-College, of which he was a Choriſter (a). Making great proficiency there beyond his years, he was elected firſt Demi, and then in 1539 Probationer, and, the year following, perpetual Fellow of that College (b). On the 7th of July 1539, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c), and that of Maſter, June 6, 1543 (d). About which time, he became Maſter of the School wherein he had received his education (e). In 1546, he left his Fellowſhip, being then probably married, and applied himſelf to the ſtudies of polite Literature and Phyſic (f). When Queen Mary came to the Crown, he being inclined to the Proteſtant Religion, took the degree of Bachelor of Phyſic, in 1556 (g), and practiſed in that faculty at Oxford (h). But, after that Queen's death, he returned to his former ſtudy of Divinity, and became a frequent and celebrated Preacher (i). March 18, 1566-7, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor, and Doctor in Divinity (k); and, about that time, was made Dean of Chriſt-Church in Oxford (l); and for ſeveral years after, was Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity (m). In 1569, he was made Dean of Glouceſter (n); and February 24, 1570, conſecrated Biſhop of Lincoln (o). The 27th of July 1572, he preached a ſermon at St. Paul's-Croſs, in vindication of the Church of England, and its Liturgy; to which an anſwer was ſent him by a diſaffected perſon (p); which anſwer the induſtrious Mr. Strype hath printed at length, in his Annals of the Reformation (q). A few years after, he was deſired to viſit King's College in Cambridge [B], but refuſed to do it, unleſs he had a ſpecial commiſſion for that that purpoſe (r). Upon occaſion of the public exerciſes (known by the name of Propheſyings) being continued in ſeveral parts of his dioceſe, particularly in Hertfordſhire [C], the Queen ſent him a letter, in 1577, to put a ſtop to thoſe exerciſes (s). There was a deſign, in 1579, to remove him to Norwich, on the intended tranſlation of Biſhop Scambler to Ely; but, for certain reaſons [D], Dr. Cooper declined this offer (t). He did a good ſervice to his dioceſe in 1582, by getting a commiſſion ſuperſeded, that had been obtained under pretence of diſcovering concealed lands and eſtates granted by the Crown; but which, in reality, was very perplexing and oppreſſive both to the Clergy and Laity (u). His diſtinguiſhed merit and abilities having recommended him to his Sovereign's favour and eſteem, he was tranſlated in 1584, to the rich Biſhopric of Wincheſter (w); where, as he had done before in every other ſtation, he became much noted for his learning and ſanctity of life (x). Soon after his conſecration, he went and reſided in his new dioceſe; and becauſe it abounded with great numbers of Recuſants, he thought it neceſſary to take an Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion along with him (y). Moreover, being apprehenſive of great danger from them, and of an invaſion that way, he petitioned the Privy-Council, to ſuppreſs the boldneſs of the Papiſts in the county of Southampton [E]. Not long after, he was accuſed of Covetouſneſs (z), of which he cleared himſelf [F]. Upon the diſcovery of William Parry's treaſon, he put out 'an order of Prayer and Thankſgiving for the preſer-'vation of the Queen's life and ſafety; to be uſed in the Dioceſe of Wincheſter (a).' In the year 1588, he preached at St. Paul's-Croſs, on the 17th of November, being a day of public thankſgiving, as well for the Queen's acceſſion to the throne, as for the ſignal victory obtained over the Spaniſh Armada (b). This reverend and holy Biſhop, as Mr. Wood ſtyles him (c), died at Wincheſter, April 29, 1594, and was buried in the cathedral there, on the ſouth-ſide of the choir, a little above the Biſhop's ſeat. Over his grave was ſoon after laid a flat marble, with a Latin inſcription in proſe and verſe [G]. The ſeveral

[C] The Queen ſent him a Letter in 1757, to put a ſtop to the Propheſyings, that were continued in his Dioceſe.] Theſe Propheſyings, otherwiſe named Exerciſes, were grounded upon 1 Corinth. XIV. 31. Ye may all propheſy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. They were ſet on foot in ſeveral parts of the kingdom about the year 1571 (3); and conſiſted of conferences among the Clergy, for the better improving of themſelves, and one another, in the knowledge of Scripture and Divinity. For that purpoſe, certain Miniſters within a convenient compaſs in each Dioceſe, aſſembled together in a pariſh church, commonly in ſome market-town; and there, one after another, gave their judgments briefly of the ſenſe of ſome place or places of Scripture, propounded before to be diſcuſſed, either by the Biſhop, or the Archdeacon's order, or ſome other grave perſon: and then it was determined by a Moderator (4). The chief members of the aſſemblies were Moderators, Writers, and Speakers. The Moderators, who were generally four in number, pitched upon the parts of Scripture that were to be handled. The Writers collected ſeveral obſervations upon every verſe of thoſe parts of Scripture, and ſo proceeded upon the whole. The Speakers diſcourſed, or enlarged, upon ſuch portions as were ſeverally aſſigned to them. Their method of proceeding was thus: They began and ended with prayer: then the firſt Moderator propoſed and read the firſt verſe of the text, or chapter that was to be handled. Upon which verſe the Writers read in order the obſervations they had gathered. Then the Speaker aſſigned to that part of the text, enlarged upon the ſame. After him the reſt of the Speakers had liberty to give any brief notes upon that verſe. In the mean time, the Moderator's care, was to take notice of any error, negligence, or ignorance in any of the Writers and Speakers, and to correct and reform them. After which he farther added ſuch obſervations as he had gathered upon that verſe. And after him the reſt of the Moderators, in due order, did the like, till as much was ſaid upon that verſe, as was thought convenient. All the time, both the Speakers and Writers, took notice in writing, of the obſervations given by any of the Speakers or Moderators. And ſo all the Moderators proceeded with the whole text, or chapter, verſe by verſe (5). Theſe Propheſyings, or Exerciſes, were put down in the Dioceſe of Norwich in 1574 (6), but continued in others, particularly in the North, for above ten years after (7). However, they were almoſt generally ſuppreſſed in 1577 (8), on account of their being thought to be Seminaries of Puritaniſm.

Whereby 'the country ſhould be diſburthened of a company of 'dangerous people. And the reſt that remained be 'put in ſome fear (10).'

[F] He was accuſed of Covetouſneſs.] Of which he cleared himſelf, by producing a ſchedule of the value of his biſhoprick, and the charges payable out of it. By that it appeared, that the clear value, or rent of aſſize, of that biſhoprick amounted then to two thouſand ſeven hundred pounds ten ſhillings and ſixpence, yearly; and the charges iſſuing out of it, to two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-ſeven pounds: ſo remained clear to him, only three hundred and ninety eight pounds nine ſhillings. From the ſame ſchedule it moreover appears, that ſome of the Courtiers were quartered upon this biſhopric. For there is one article in it thus, 'My Lord of Leiceſter's fee 100*l.*' And another, 'Paid yearly in annuities, granted by Biſhop 'Gardiner and Biſhop White; wherein Sir Fr. Wal-'ſingham's fee is contained—218*l.* 6*s.* 8*d* (11).

ſeveral books he publiſhed, were theſe: I. 'The Epitome of Chronicles from the 'ſeventeenth year after Chriſt, to 1540, and thence afterwards to the year 1560.' Lond. 1560, 4*to*. The two firſt parts of this Chronicle, and the beginning of the third as far as the ſeventeenth year after Chriſt, were compoſed by Thomas Lanquet, a young man of twenty-four years of age. But he being cut off by untimely death, Mr. Cooper finiſhed the work; and his part, which is the third, contains almoſt thrice as much as Lanquet's two parts, being chiefly taken from Achilles Pyrminius. When it was finiſhed, a third perſon publiſhed it ſurreptitiouſly, and in a very faulty manner, in 1559, under the title of Lanquet's Chronicle: whereupon, our author reviſed, corrected, and publiſhed it again in 1560, under the general title of Cooper's Chronicle, &c. The running title to the firſt and ſecond part, is Lanquet's Chronicle; and to the third, The Epitome of Chronicles. II. Theſaurus Linguæ Romanæ & Brittanicæ, &c. and Dictionarium Hiſtoricum & Poeticum. Lond. 1565, fol. This Dictionary was ſo much eſteemed by Queen Elizabeth, that ſhe endeavoured to promote the author as high in the church as ſhe could (d). It is an improvement of Bibliotheca Eliotæ; Elyot's Library or Dictionary; printed at Lond. 1541, fol. to which Mr. Cooper added thirty-three thouſand words and phraſes, beſides a fuller account of the true ſignification of words (e): Or rather, it is taken out of Robert Stephens's Theſaurus Linguæ Latinæ, and out of Friſii Lexicon Latino-Teutonicum (f). III. 'A brief Expoſition of ſuch Chapters of the Old Teſtament, as uſually are read in the 'Church at Common-Prayer, on the Sundays throughout the Year.' Lond. 1573, 4*to*. IV. 'Sermon at Lincoln 1575, on Matth. xvi. 26, 27.' Lond. 8*vo*. V. 'Twelve Ser-'mons on Rom. i. 16. Matth. vii. 15, 16. 1 Cor. x. 1. 3. 5. Matth. xiii. 3. 5. and John viii. 46.' Lond. 1580, 4*to*. VI. 'An Admonition to the People of England. 'Wherein are anſwered not only the ſlanderous Untruths, reproachfully uttered by Mar-'tin, the Libeller, but alſo many other Crimes by ſome of his brood, objected generally 'againſt all Biſhops, and the chief of the Clergy; purpoſely to deface and diſcredit the 'preſent ſtate of the Church.' Lond. 1589, 4*to*. This was a ſolid and judicious anſwer to John ap Henry's ſcurrilous and abuſive libels againſt the Eſtabliſhed Church, publiſhed under the name of Martin Mar-Prelate (g). Ap Henry, or his Club of Puritans, replied to the Biſhop's book, in two ludicrous pamphlets, intitled, 'Ha'ye any work for a Cooper?' and 'More Work for a Cooper (h).'——Biſhop Cooper's character is repreſented by ſeveral writers in a very advantageous light. One ſtyles him (i), a very learned man, eloquent, and well acquainted with the Engliſh and Latin languages. Another (k) ſays of him, that he was a man of great gravity, learning, and holineſs of life. He was, ſays A. Wood (l), furniſhed with all kind of learning almoſt beyond all his contemporaries, and not only adorned the pulpit with his ſermons, but alſo the Commonwealth of Learning with his writings. 'Of him, ſays Sir John Harrington (m), I can ſay much, and I ſhould 'do him great wrong if I ſhould ſay nothing: For he was indeed a reverent man, very 'well learned, exceeding induſtrious; and, which was in thoſe dayes counted a great praiſe 'to him, and a chief cauſe of his preferment, he wrote that great Dictionary that yet bears 'his name. His life in Oxford was very commendable, and in ſome ſort ſaint-like; for, 'if it be ſaint-like to live unreprovable, to bear a croſs patiently, to forgive great injuries 'freely, this man's example is ſampleleſs in this age.' He married a wife at Oxford [H], with whom he happened to be very unhappy, ſhe proving unfaithful to his bed. 'The 'whole Univerſity, in reverence of the man, and indignity of the matter, offered to ſeparate 'her from him by public authority, and ſo to ſet him free, being the innocent party. 'But he would by no means agree thereto, alledging he knew his own infirmity, that he 'might not live unmarried; and to divorce and marry again, he would not charge his 'conſcience with ſo great a ſcandal.'

i. e. 'Here lies Thomas Cooper, formerly Biſhop 'of Lincoln, and late of Wincheſter, a very bounti-'ful, learned and vigilant prelate, who died piouſly 'in the Lord, April 29, in the year 1594. While 'Cooper's Dictionary, Chronicle, and other writings 'are in being, Cooper's great fame will laſt. He was 'of Oxford, Dean of Glouceſter, for ſeveral years Vice-'Chancellor of the former; then he became Biſhop 'of Lincoln, and thence was tranſlated to Wincheſter, 'where he ſat Biſhop ten years. He was very learned, 'extremely bountiful to the poor, and with great di-'ligence explained the divine oracles. COOPER (ANTHONY ASHLEY), Earl of Shafteſbury, one of the ableſt perſons, greateſt Politicians, and moſt diſtinguiſhed Miniſters in the laſt century. He derived from his birth, all the advantages that could ſpring from an honourable deſcent joined to a large fortune. His father was Sir John Cooper of Rockborn in the county of Southampton, Bart.

Bart. by Anne, daughter and ſole heireſs of Sir Anthony Aſhley, of Winborne St. Giles in the county of Dorſet, Knight and Baronet (a); from whom he inherited an eſtate of eight thouſand pounds a year, and all the influence that aroſe from ſuch a fortune, and the credit of his anceſtors in the Weſt of England, which was very conſiderable (b)[A] He was born at Winborne St. Giles, July 22, 1621 (c), and educated with great care under the eye of his parents during his infancy, in which he diſcovered ſuch extraordinary parts, as not only gave hopes of his becoming one day a perſon of excellent abilities, but rendered him even at that time the ſubject of general admiration; ſo that while a very boy he was conſidered as a prodigy, and, if we may credit his Hiſtorian, very extraordinary things were predicted of him (d)[B]. He had the misfortune to loſe his father, March 23, 1631, before he was ten years of age, and thereby, as his only child, became entitled to his large eſtate (e). At the age of fifteen he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, and became a Fellow-Commoner of Exeter college, under the tuition of the famous Dr. Prideaux who was then Rector of it, and is ſaid to have ſtudied hard there for about two years (f), and very well maintained the character with which he came thither, of being a ſingular and moſt ſurprizing genius. He removed from thence to Lincoln's-Inn (g), where he applied himſelf with great vigour and diligence to the ſtudy of the Law, but more eſpecially turned his thoughts to the gaining a perfect ſkill in the conſtitution of this kingdom, in which, as in every thing elſe that claimed his attention, he became a wonderful proficient, and on various occaſions in the future courſe of life, clearly diſcovered, that no man more thoroughly underſtood it than himſelf (h). He was thus employed, when, in the nineteenth year of his age, he was choſen one of the Burgeſſes to repreſent the town of Tewkeſbury in Glouceſterſhire, in that Parliament which met at Weſtminſter April 13, 1640 (i), and of which very great hopes were entertained, but, to the great ſorrow of the nation, were all fruſtrated by its ſudden, unexpected, and fatal diſſolution (k). We have no account of his diſtinguiſhing himſelf in that aſſembly, and indeed there was but very little time for it. It is however highly probable that he was very well affected to the King's ſervice, of which he gave ſufficient proofs at the beginning of the Civil Wars, by repairing to Oxford, and offering his ſervice there to his Majeſty, not for ſubduing or conquering his country, but for reducing ſuch, as had either deſerted or miſtaken their duty, to his Majeſty's obedience. This was a very extraordinary ſcheme for a perſon of two or three and twenty years of age to propoſe, and therefore it is not at all ſtrange that it ſhould ſurprize his Majeſty, when, in an audience obtained for that purpoſe, he propoſed

[A] Which was very conſiderable.] As to this Gentleman's deſcent, by the father's ſide, we find, that in the 22d of Henry VIII. Richard Cooper, Eſq; purchaſed from Sir Amyas Pawlet the Manor of Pawlet (1), in Somerſetſhire, ſtill in the poſſeſſion of this family, and erected into a Barony in their favour by King Charles II. This Richard Cooper, by Jane his wife, daughter of Sir John Kingſmill, of Sydmonton, in the county of Southampton, Knight, had iſſue John Cooper, of Rockborn, in the ſame county, who was afterwards knighted, and was the father of Sir John Cooper, Knt. mentioned in the text, and who was alſo created Baronet, July 4, 1622. As for his mother's family, ſhe was deſcended by the females from the ancient houſes of Hamlynes (2), Pleſheys, and Malmaines, poſſeſſors of Winborne St. Giles, from whom it deſcended to Anthony Aſhley, Eſq; who, for his great ſervices in the Cadiz expedition, where he acted as Secretary at War, had the honour of Knighthood conferred upon him (3). He was afterwards promoted to be one of the Clerks of the Privy-Council in the reign of King James I (4); but falling under the diſpleaſure of that Prince, and being removed from his office, his large fortune, which conſiſted of two thouſand marks a year in real eſtate, and as much in money and effects, tempted one Sir James Creighton (5) to enter into a wicked conſpiracy with Henry Smith and Mary Rice, ſervants to Sir Anthony, in the year 1610, to deprive him of his life and fortune; in order to which, Mary Rice preſented a petition to the King, ſetting forth, that her huſband, William Rice, dead eighteen years before, was poiſoned by Henry Smith, at the inſtance of Sir Anthony Aſhley, and Henry Smith confeſſed the ſame: but upon referring this petition to the Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, the whole iniquity was found out, and the conſpirators puniſhed in the Star-Chamber. This Sir Anthony Aſhley, July 3, 1622, was created a Baronet (6), who by his wife, daughter of Philip Okeover, of Okeover, in the county of Stafford, had only one daughter, Anne, who married Sir John Cooper, by whom ſhe had this only ſon, to whom his grandfather was alſo godfather, and gave him both his names, ſo that he was chriſtened Anthony Aſhley, as being the preſumptive heir of both families (7).

[B] Were predicted of him.] As the ancients were given to believe in omens and prodigies, ſo it was the foible of the laſt, as well as ſome preceding ages, to yield but too much faith to pretended prophecies and idle prognoſtications. Of this nature we may reckon what a certain writer tells us of a Proteſtant Gentleman, that flying out of Germany for his religion, was charitably received and entertained by Sir John Cooper, who being extremely taken with the wonderful parts of his ſon, who could not then be above nine years old, addreſſed him, in the preſence of his father, in theſe words (8), 'Child, if thou wilt be religious, 'and keep cloſe to God, and take care to avoid the 'vain and deſtructive allurements of prophaneneſs 'and debauchery, and entertain a fixed reſolution to 'improve all thy parts and abilities for the advancing the Proteſtant Religion, you ſhall be a man of 'the largeſt parts in Chriſtendom, and ſhall be an inſtrument of doing an extraordinary piece of ſervice 'to your King, which ſhall be very acceptable to 'him, whereupon you ſhall ſtand high in his favour, 'and be promoted to very great honour, yet ſhall afterwards loſe your Prince's favour, and be as much 'diſreſpected as before honoured and admired; yet, 'at the ſame time, you ſhall be one of the moſt popular men under Heaven: and that you may know 'that this will fall out according to my prediction, 'pray remember this that I am now going to tell you, 'and write it down in your pocket-book that you 'may not forget it. Not long after your coming 'from the Univerſity, you ſhall be in extream danger 'of drowning, telling him the very day when it 'ſhould happen.' The author afterwards proceeds to ſhew, that this accident did happen, and was followed by all the other events hinted at in the prediction, which was not publiſhed till after the Earl of Shafteſbury's death, and it is very probable was invented not long before it.

putting an end to the war by acting upon such principles (l). We have this fact from a person who had the best opportunities of knowing the truth of it, whose candour in any other instance was never doubted, and whose account however has been neglected because it is without date, and does not seem to agree with other relations. But for all this it might very well have happened in the spring of the year 1643, and seems equally to deserve the reader's notice and belief [C]. It is very certain that Weymouth submitted on the ninth of August the same year (m), and we have a very long account in the work of the noble Historian, of the dispute that happened between Prince Maurice and the Marquis of Hertford, as to the appointing Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper Governor of that place, which was at first positively refused by the King, and at last, though not without great difficulty, granted (n). Whoever will take the pains to compare and consider these two seemingly inconsistent accounts, will find them very reconcileable, and clearly perceive, that the truth is to be collected from adverting to this circumstance, that as the former is given us by the friend of this Gentleman; so the latter, which for this purpose was also inserted in the notes [D], was penned when the noble author had no good opinion of the person

[C] To deserve the reader's notice and belief.] As no body was better acquainted with this noble Peer than Mr. Locke, so it is highly probable, that what he has left us concerning him was taken from his own mouth, or, if received from any other authority, at least confirmed by himself. What is said in the text is sufficient to shew, that it might possibly be true, and the authorities just mentioned, may induce us to believe it really was so (9). Mr. Locke's account runs thus: 'Being at Oxford in the beginning of the civil 'war, for he was on that side as long as he had any 'hopes to serve his country there, he was brought to 'King Charles I. by the Lord Falkland, his friend, 'then Secretary of State, and presented to him, as 'having something to offer to his Majesty worth his 'consideration. At this audience he told the King, 'that he thought he could put an end to the war if 'his Majesty pleased, and would assist him in it. The 'King answered, that he was a very young man for 'so great an undertaking. Sir, replied he, that will 'not be the worse for your affairs, provided I do the 'business. Whereupon the King shewing a willingness to hear him, he discoursed to him to this purpose. The Gentlemen and men of estates, who first 'engaged in that war, seeing now, after a year or two, 'that it seems to be no nearer the end than it was at 'first, and beginning to be weary of it, I am very well 'satisfied would be glad to be in quiet at home again, 'if they could be assured of a redress of their grievances, and have their rights and liberties secured to 'them. This I am satisfied is the present temper generally through all England, and particularly in those 'parts where my estate and concerns lie. If therefore 'your Majesty will empower me to treat with the Parliament garrisons, to grant them a full and general 'pardon, with an assurance that a general amnesty '(arms being laid down on both sides) should reinstate 'all things in the same posture they were before the 'war, and then a free Parliament should do what 'more remained to be done for the settlement of the 'nation.' He added farther,

'That he would begin and try the experiment first 'in his own country, and doubted not but the good 'success he should have there, would open him the 'gates of other adjoining garrisons, bringing them the 'news of peace, and security in laying down their arms. 'Being furnished with full power, according to his desire, away he goes to Dorsetshire, where he managed 'a treaty with the garrisons of Pool, Weymouth, Dorchester, and others, and was so successful in it, that 'one of them was actually put into his hands, as the 'others were to have been some few days after. But 'Prince Maurice, who commanded some of the 'King's forces, being with his army then in those 'parts, no sooner heard that the town was surrendered, but he presently marched into it, and gave 'the pillage of it to his soldiers. This Sir Anthony 'saw with the utmost displeasure, and could not 'forbear to express his resentments to the Prince, so 'that there passed some pretty hot words between 'them; but the violence was committed, and thereby his design broken. All that he could do was, 'that he sent to the other garrisons he was in treaty 'with to stand upon their guard, for that he could 'not secure his articles to them, and so this design 'proved abortive, and died in silence.'

[D] Is also inserted in the notes.] It is only by this method of carefully comparing, and candidly considering, the same passages, as they are variously related by persons of different sentiments and opposite opinions, that the real matter of fact ever comes to be known. The Earl of Clarendon was so much concerned in this affair, that he must have known it to the bottom: but whether he has related all he knew, or shewn how or why Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper came to be suspected at Oxford, the reader must judge for himself. The story, as he tells it, runs thus (10). 'There was, says he, an accident fell out a little before this time, that gave new argument of trouble 'to the King, upon a difference between Prince Maurice and the Marquis. It hath been said, that the 'Earl of Carnarvon, who was General of the horse of 'the western army, had marched from Bristol the day 'before the Prince, and had taken Dorchester and 'Weymouth before his Highness came up to the 'army, both considerable places, and the seats of great 'malignity. The former was not thought necessary 'to be made a garrison, but the latter was the best 'port town of that county, and to be kept with great 'care. The Marquis had made some promise of 'the government thereof when it should be taken, of 'which they made no doubt, to Sir Anthony-Ashley 'Cooper, a young Gentleman of that county, of a 'fair and plentiful fortune, and one who, in the 'opinion of most men, was like to advance the place 'by being governor of it, and to raise men for the 'defence of it, without lessening the army, and had, 'in expectation of it, made some provision of officers 'and soldiers, when it should be time to call them 'together. Prince Maurice, on the other side, had 'some other person in his view, upon whom he intended to confer that charge when it should fall. 'In the moment that the town was taken, and before 'the Prince came thither, Sir Anthony hearing that 'the Marquis came not with the army, but remained 'some time at Bristol, made all the haste he could to 'him, and came thither the same day the King left 'it, and applied himself to the Marquis, who remembered his promise, and thought himself obliged 'to make it good, and that it was in his power so to 'do, since it appeared that the town was taken, before the King had declared to him, that he should 'not go to the army till when he ought to be looked 'upon as General of it. He conferred with the 'Chancellor of the Exchequer upon it, as a matter in 'which his honour was concerned, and on which his 'heart was set. "Sir Anthony came likewise to "him, who was of his acquaintance, and desired his "assistance; that after so much charge he had been "put to in the expectation of it, and to prepare for "it, he might not be exposed to the mirth and contempt of the country." It was evident, that if he 'returned with the commission from the Marquis '(which he was most inclined to give him) both he 'and the commission would be affronted, and the town 'would not be suffered to submit to him: therefore perſon of whom he was ſpeaking. Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper was alſo at that time High-Sheriff of the county of Dorſet, and choſe therefore in that quality, rather than by virtue of any military commiſſion, to raiſe, as he had power to do, the whole ſtrength of the county, and to embark them at once in the cauſe of the King and the Conſtitution (o). To this intent he iſſued his ſummons for aſſembling the Poſſe Comitatus, on a day certain at Dorcheſter, which is the county town, but, before that day came, he was invited to Oxford by a letter from his Majeſty; Col. Goring was ſent into his neighbourhood with ſome forces (p); and Col. William Aſhburnham came to him at Dorcheſter, and produced a commiſſion of ſuch a nature, as plainly enough demonſtrated that there was no intention to confide in him, or to allow him to proceed in that way which he thought could alone determine this conteſt, without involving the nation in a long and bloody war (q). He conferred notwithſtanding with Col. Aſhburnham, told him what he had done, and with what view; but perceiving plainly that his behaviour was diſliked, and his perſon in danger, he retired, firſt to his own houſe, and from thence went into the Parliament quarters (r). Neither was it long after that he went up to London, where he was very well received by the leading men on that ſide, who knew well his weight and intereſt in his county, and had a very high opinion of his parts and capacity to ſerve them, in caſe they could attach him thoroughly to their intereſts. This however was not very eaſily done, for though the Noble Hiſtorian is pleaſed to ſay, (and though it be his it is but a coarſe ſaying) That he gave himſelf up body and ſoul to the Parliament (s), yet this does not very clearly appear, ſince it is very certain that he betrayed none of the counſels with which he was truſted at Oxford, nor took any other ſtep, by which he might render his former connections any way uſeful to thoſe whom he had now joined (t). But it is indeed evident that he accepted a commiſſion from the Parliament (u), and raiſed forces in Dorſetſhire for the recovery of ſome places out of the hands of thoſe, who he thought had nothing elſe in view but carrying on a war for the entire reduction of the kingdom, the merit of which might entitle them to great rewards, from the new government that might be then eſtabliſhed upon the ruins of the antient and legal conſtitution (w); and it is no wonder at all that he ſhould oppoſe this, if we conſider how large an eſtate he had, and conſequently, excluſive of principles, how much it was his private intereſt to look unto the ſafety of his country (x). In October 1644 he took Wareham by ſtorm, and very ſoon after reduced all the adjacent parts of Dorſetſhire. This, and ſome other actions of the ſame nature, might poſſibly induce the Earl of Clarendon to add to the harſh character beforementioned, that he became an implacable enemy to the Royal family (y). One may reaſonably ſuppoſe they had other ſentiments of him at Oxford, ſince he was truſted with ſome private negotiations between his Majeſty and Denzil Lord Hollis, at the treaty of Uxbridge, for which the latter was afterwards queſtioned in Parliament, and had loſt

'the Chancellor was of opinion, that there was no 'other way but to appeal to the King, and deſire his 'favour, as well as his juſtice, in giving his commiſ-'ſion to the perſon deſigned by the Marquis, which 'would remove that part of the exception which 'would moſt trouble the Prince; and he offered to 'write himſelf very earneſtly to the King. Beſides 'his deſire to gratify the Marquis, he did, in truth, 'believe it of great importance to his Majeſty's ſer-'vice, to engage a perſon of ſuch a fortune and in-'tereſt ſo thoroughly in his quarrel, as he then believed 'ſuch an obligation muſt needs do, the flexibility and 'inſtability of that Gentleman's nature not being 'then underſtood or ſuſpected.

'He did write with all the ſkill and importunity 'he could uſe to the King, and writ to the Lord 'Faulkland, "To take Sir John Colepepper with "him, if he found any averſion in the King, that "they might together diſcourſe and prevail with "him." But his Majeſty poſitively and obſtinately 'refuſed to grant it, and ſaid, "He would not, to "pleaſe the Marquis in an unjuſt pretence, put a "public diſobligation and affront upon his nephew." 'So the expreſs returned without effect, and the 'Marquis was as ſenſibly touched as could be ima-'gined, and ſaid, "That he was fallen from all "credit with the King, and was made incapable of "doing him further ſervice; that his fidelity ſhould "never be leſſened towards him, (as in truth he was "incapable of a diſloyal thought), but ſince he was "become ſo totally uſeleſs to the King and to his "friends, he hoped his Majeſty would give him leave "to retire to his own houſe, where he doubted not "he ſhould be ſuffered to live privately, and quietly "to pray for the King." The Chancellor knew 'well the nature of the Marquis, that would never 'give him leave to purſue any reſolution which he 'found might prove inconvenient to his Majeſty, for 'whom he had all poſſible duty; yet he knew too, 'that the miſchief was not ſmall, from the obſerva-'tion that the Marquis thought himſelf ill uſed, and 'that there were too many who would take the op-'portunity to foment thoſe jealouſies and diſcontents, 'and therefore reſolved (having diſpatched all things 'which were incumbent on him at Briſtol, and uſed 'all freedom with the Marquis for the diſpelling all 'troubleſome imaginations) to go himſelf to the King, 'and to repreſent that affair to him, and the probable 'conſequences of it, with new inſtances. And, at 'laſt, with very great difficulty, he did ſo far prevail 'with his Majeſty, that he gave a commiſſion to Sir 'Anthony-Aſhley Cooper, to be Governor of Wey-'mouth, which he was the more eaſily perſuaded to, 'out of ſome prejudice he had to the perſon who he 'underſtood was deſigned to that government.' The words a little before this time, at the beginning of this account, refer to the plundering of Weymouth and Melcombe, by Prince Maurice, which this writer acknowledges, at the ſame time he excuſes it all he can. He adds however, that upon this, Lyme and Poole, the only two garriſons the Parliament had in thoſe parts, inſtead of ſubmitting, ſent the Prince ſo peremptory an anſwer, that though he wanted not either troops or cannon, he did not think fit to approach them (11). This agrees exactly with the former relation, and we may eaſily diſcern why thoſe who had broken their words with Sir Anthony were afraid to truſt him; neither are the words the noble Hiſtorian puts into his mouth common ſenſe, if he had not been deeper engaged than from this relation appears. This ſevere cenſure upon his mutability therefore might have been ſpared: if any reflections were to be made, they ought to have fallen upon that great ſoldier of fortune, who made ſo free with his own word, the liberties of the Engliſh nation, and the King his uncle's intereſts (12).

his life, if Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper could have found his memory of what paſſed in that buſineſs (z) [E]. Neither was this the only ſervice he did the Royal cauſe: for when it began every where to decline, and conſequently when there could be no motives of intereſt to induce him, he thought of a ſurprizing expedient for giving a check to the power of the Parliament, by raiſing the CLUB-MEN (a), who put Sir Thomas Fairfax, after the fatal battle of Naſeby, to a ſtand, and which deſign had probably given a new turn to affairs, if it had been as vigorouſly executed, as it was wiſely and warily concerted (b) [F]. Thus was Sir Anthony employed in propping the Royal Cauſe, when the Princes, Rupert and Maurice, abandoned the King, and accepted paſſes from the Parliament to retire beyond the ſeas (c). Towards the end of 1645 he was choſen Sheriff of Norfolk (d), and approved by Parliament. The next year he was Sheriff of Wiltſhire, and had an ordinance of Parliament to enable him to reſide out of the county (e). In 1651 he was of the Committee of Twenty, appointed to conſider of ways and means for reforming the Law (f). He was alſo one of the Members of that Convention that met after General Cromwell turned out the Long Parliament, and was very active in oppoſing his ambitious deſigns, which occaſioned the diſſolution of that aſſembly (g). He was again a Member of the Parliament of 1654, and was one of the principal perſons who ſigned that famous Proteſtation, charging the Protector with tyranny and arbitrary government: neither was it in Cromwell's power, when it was at the higheſt, to prevent his being elected, which forced him to turn him, and other honeſt Gentlemen, out of the Houſe, which was done more than once, but particularly in 1656, when he ſhewed as much courage and firmneſs in expoſing and thwarting the illegal meaſures of that arbitrary Uſurper, as any man in the kingdom (h). It is indeed true, that the Protector endeavoured to gain him, as he did other perſons of eminent parts and extenſive influence, by appointing him one of his Privy-Council: but as to what has been ſuggeſted, of his aiming to become his ſon-in-law, and coming by that means into the chief management of affairs, may be well conſidered as a calumny (i), ſince it can be hardly doubted, that had it been true, Cromwell would not have miſſed that opportunity, of fixing him in the ſupport of his government and of his family. When the Protector Richard was depoſed, and the Rump came again into power, they nominated Sir Anthony one of their Council of State (k), and a Commiſſioner for managing the army. He was at that very time engaged in a ſecret correſpondence with the friends of his Majeſty King Charles II. laid the ſcheme of Sir George Booth's inſurrection in 1659, and, if he had not been defeated, would have joined him with all the ſtrength of Dorſetſhire (l). This could not be ſo ſecretly carried, but that the Parliament had notice of it, and upon a complaint, that though Sir George Booth was the hand, yet another Knight was the head of that buſineſs, he was not only queſtioned but impriſoned. He defended himſelf with great art and ſkill, notwithſtanding which, it was with infinite difficulty that he was acquitted and diſcharged (m) [G]. The [E] Could have found his memory of what paſſed in that buſineſs.] In the treaty at Uxbridge the King had ſome ſeparate and private communication with Lord Hollis, then Mr. Hollis, and the Lord Commiſſioner Whitlocke. Lord Saville, who, about that time, was created Earl of Eſſex, going over afterwards to the Parliament (13), gave information of this, and the warm and violent party, who hated Hollis for adhering ſteadily to his principles, were very deſirous of having this imputation fixed upon him, which they apprehended it was in the power of Sir Anthony to do. There had been an old enmity between them, and Mr. Hollis had prevented Sir Anthony from coming into the Houſe of Commons, though he had been fairly elected. When the latter came to be examined, he ſaid, that though what he knew of that matter might poſſibly tend to acquit Hollis of the charge, yet he could not ſuffer himſelf to ſay any thing about it, becauſe it would look as if he would have taken this occaſion to revenge himſelf, in caſe it had been in his power (14). This did not ſatisfy the Houſe by any means, ſo that they ordered him to withdraw, and threatened him with a commitment to the Tower. That had no effect, and though ſeveral of his friends came out to him in the Lobby, and perſuaded him to ſatisfy the Houſe; yet he would not depart from his firſt reſolution, but anſwered, he neither could nor would remember any thing about it. After a long debate, the main queſtion was put, and, for want of evidence, Mr. Hollis, though with difficulty, was acquitted (15). He went ſome time after to make his acknowledgments to Sir Anthony, who told him, he was not at all obliged to him, that he would have done the ſame thing for any other man in the like circumſtances; but added, that he knew the value of his friendſhip, and ſhould be glad to merit it, by having the greateſt regard for him for the future, which offer was very readily accepted, and a friendſhip commenced from thence, which laſted as long as their lives (16).

[F] As it was wiſely and warily concerted.] The true ſtate of the buſineſs there hinted at, was briefly this: Sir Anthony met with Serjeant Fountaine, by accident, at an inn, and in diſcourſing about public affairs, they quickly agreed in their ſentiments, that the nation would be equally undone, which ever ſide prevailed, and that therefore it ought to be the aim of all well-diſpoſed perſons to compel the violent of both parties to ſacrifice their animoſities and private views to the intereſt of the public, that abſolutely required a peace (17). In order to bring this about, the Commons in ſeveral counties were encouraged to take up arms, to declare themſelves neuters, and to inſiſt upon a treaty, by which they might be reſtored to the benefit of the laws, and of the Conſtitution (18). This was carried ſo far, that Sir Thomas Fairfax received their propoſals, and promiſed to communicate them to the Parliament; but General Cromwell and others, bent upon driving things to extremities, attacked ſome bodies of club-men, and getting the better of them, cut the poor people to pieces without mercy, which diſconcerted the ſcheme, and frighted thoſe who had the management of it from purſuing it as they intended (19). The reader will obſerve, that this was built upon the ſame principles with that propoſition which Sir Anthony had made to the King about a year before.

[G] That he was acquitted and diſcharged.] Theſe were times of infinite perplexity, and in which even men of the greateſt abilities had much ado to ſecure themſelves. It was on May 13, 1659, that Sir Anthony

The Rump afterwards appointed him one of the Committee to ſecure the Tower, one of the Six Commiſſioners for the command of the army, and Colonel of a regiment of horſe (n). Soon after, with eight other members of the old Council of State, he ſigned a letter to General Monk to encourage him to march into England (o), which was the firſt direct ſtep made towards the Reſtoration, as Sir Anthony's regiment of horſe was one of the firſt that joined that General, upon his marching into this kingdom (p). It was by his influence that the abjuration oath was laid aſide; and even the Noble Hiſtorian is pleaſed to allow, that as the revolt of the fleet under the command of Vice-Admiral Lawſon, was what broke the heart of the Committee of Safety; ſo he is alſo forced to own, that this was brought about by Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper, who gained that gallant officer (q) from his old patron Sir Henry Vane, and prevailed upon him to tell Sir Henry, when he came in perſon to the fleet, that he would ſubmit to no authority but that of the Parliament. He was alſo very inſtrumental in quaſhing General Lambert's deſign, which had otherwiſe prevented the King's return (r); and though no doubt General Monk's intentions for the ſervice of the King were very ſincere, yet it is certain that Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper put it out of his power to act otherwiſe than he did, by firſt procuring that great man an unlimited commiſſion from the Parliament, and then obliging him in the Council of State, to remove ſuch officers as they could not depend upon, and particularly Sir William Lockhart, who was Governor of Dunkirk, and to re place them by perſons of whom they had a better opinion, as in that caſe by Edward Harley, which left no room for diſputes (s). He was returned a member for Dorſetſhire, in that which was called the Healing Parliament, which ſat April 25, 1660, and a reſolution being taken to reſtore the Conſtitution, he was named one of the twelve members of the Houſe of Commons to carry their invitation to the King (t); and it was in his performing this ſervice, that he had the misfortune to be overturned in a carriage upon a Dutch road, and thereby to receive a dangerous wound between the ribs, which ulcerated many years after, and was opened when he was Lord High-Chancellor, a circumſtance neceſſary to be mentioned, on account of the ſcandalous reflections that were afterwards made upon it (u). Upon his return to England, and the King's coming over, he was, together with General Monk, and other great perſons, ſworn of His Majeſty's Moſt Honourable Privy-Council (w). He was alſo one of the Commiſſioners for the trial of the regicides, and the reflection made thereupon by the Oxford Hiſtorian might have been ſpared, ſince nothing is more certain, than that he had nothing to do with the counſels of thoſe, that either bethony-Aſhley Cooper was appointed one of the Council of State, in which the executive part of the government was veſted (20). Upon the 18th of the ſame month a charge was brought before that council againſt Sir Anthony and the Lord Commiſſioner Whitlocke, for correſponding with the King, or ſome of his Miniſters abroad (21). It was the misfortune of this noble perſon, of whom we are ſpeaking, to be as little in the good graces of Whitlocke, as of Clarendon, as will very plainly appear from the following account, which he gives us of Sir Anthony's defence (22). 'Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper made the higheſt 'profeſſions that could be made of his innocence, and 'the higheſt imprecations of God's judgments upon 'him and his poſterity, if ever he had any correſpon-'dence with the King, or with Sir Edward Hyde, or 'any of the King's Miniſters or friends; and his ex-'preſſions were ſo high, that they bred in ſome the 'more ſuſpicion of him; but at this time he was be-'lieved, and what followed afterwards is known.' It appears from hence, and from another paſſage that we ſhall have occaſion to mention immediately, that this gentleman had no opinion of Sir Anthony's ſincerity or veracity. But the queſtion is, or at leaſt ought to be, whether this opinion was well founded? Sir Anthony's life and fortune were at ſtake in this caſe; and, which is more, the welfare and ſafety of this nation: if therefore Sir Anthony had no concern or intercourſe with the King, or his friends abroad, though he had concerted meaſures for procuring a free Parliament, in which the ſenſe of the nation might be known, in reference to the government they were moſt inclined to live under, he certainly had a right to defend himſelf in what manner he thought proper: no doubt this was none of the moſt eligible methods, but perhaps it was the only method to preſerve himſelf amongſt ſuch people. Now the fact was really thus, and this is not an apology contrived for the defence of this noble perſon's memory, but ariſes from evidence, which I will inſtantly produce. Many years after this, when he was Earl of Shafteſbury, and a priſoner in the tower, he wrote a letter to King Charles II. the following paſſage in which fully ſhews his principles, and from what views he promoted the Reſtoration (23). The facts contained in it are very curious and very important, and I believe there will be hardly found any man ſo great a Sceptick as to believe, that the Earl of Shafteſbury would depart from truth, in a letter written to his ſovereign, upon ſubjects of which that Prince was as much maſter as he. 'I had the 'honour to have a principal hand in your Reſtoration, 'neither did I act in it but on a principle of piety and 'honour: I never betrayed, as your Majeſty knows, 'the party or councils I was of. I kept no correſpon-'dence with, nor I made no ſecret addreſſes to, your 'Majeſty; neither did I endeavour or obtain any pri-'vate terms or articles for myſelf, or reward for what 'I had done, or ſhould do. In whatever I did towards 'the ſervice of your Majeſty, I was ſolely acted by the 'ſenſe of that duty I owed to God, the Engliſh nation, 'and your Majeſty's juſt right and title. I ſaw the 'hand of Providence that had led us through various 'forms of government, and had given power into the 'hands of ſeveral ſorts of men, but he had given none 'of them a heart to uſe it as they ſhould: they all 'fell to the prey, ſought not the good or ſettlement 'of the nation, endeavoured only the enlargement 'and continuance of their own authority, and graſped 'at thoſe very powers they had complained of ſo much, 'and for which ſo bloody and ſo fatal a war had been 'raiſed, and continued in the bowels of the nation. 'I obſerved the leaders of the great parties of religion, 'both laity and clergy, ready and forward to deliver 'up the rights and liberties of the people, and to in-'troduce an abſolute dominion; ſo that tyranny might 'be eſtabliſhed in the hands of thoſe that favoured 'their way, and with whom they might have hopes to 'divide the preſent ſpoil, having no eye to poſterity, 'or thought of future things.' The accuſation which occaſioned this note hung in the Houſe of Commons 'till the 14th of September, 1659, and then we have the following account of it from an author before cited (24). 'Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper voted not guilty 'of the accuſation againſt him, of having correſpon-'dence with the King. The queſtion was not brought 'againſt me for the ſame matter, there being no 'ground for it as there was for the other.'

trayed or ſhed the blood of their Sovereign (x). Upon the approach of the coronation, the King his maſter thought fit to raiſe him to the dignity of the peerage, and, by Letters Patent dated April 20, 1661, created him Baron Aſhley of Winborne St. Giles's, with very honourable mention of the ſhare he had in bringing him back to his kingdom (y) [H]. He was ſoon after made Chancellor and Under-Treaſurer of the Exchequer (z); and upon the death of that loyal old Peer, and his great friend and patron, the wiſe and worthy Earl of Southampton, he was appointed one of the Lords Commiſſioners (a) for executing the office of High-Treaſurer. He continued in the counſels and in the confidence of the King his maſter, during the happieſt part of his reign, and ſtood as high in his favour as any of his Miniſters. He was afterwards made Lord Lieutenant of the county of Dorſet (b); and on the twenty-third of April 1672, he was created Baron Cooper of Pawlet in the county of Somerſet, and Earl of Shafteſbury (c). At this time the Lord Keeper Bridgeman parting with the Seals, he was, on the fourth day of November, raiſed to the great and envied poſt of Lord High-Chancellor of England (d), which office he executed, as even his enemies allow, with equal ability and integrity [I]. In his other capacities, of a Miniſter and Privy-Counſellor, he has been variouſly ſpoken of, and it would require a volume to enter into the merits of the queſtion, and to diſcuſs fairly and impartially what has been ſaid, and what might be ſaid, on both ſides. In this article, however, we cannot be expected to enter into any ſuch field; and ſhall therefore be content with obſerving, that from the public records of his diſcharge of theſe offices, particularly his ſpeeches in Parliament upon the ſwearing in the Lord High-Treaſurer Clifford, his ſucceſſor Sir Thomas Oſborne and Mr. Baron Thurland (e), we muſt conclude him one of the ableſt men, and one of the moſt accompliſhed orators, this nation has ever bred. The ſhort time that he was at the helm was a ſeaſon of ſtorms and tempeſts, and it is but doing him ſtrict juſtice to ſay, that they could not either affright or diſtract him. Whatever he did he did with his might, and there was a ſpirit and dignity in his adminiſtration, which that government could never recover after he left it (f). He was the ſoul and genius of the Miniſtry while he made a part of it; but whether he did not carry things too high, and out

[H] In bringing him back to his kingdom.] We have already ſhewn, from as good authority as can be deſired, that this noble perſon, as he acted very cautiouſly on one ſide in the management of that nice affair, behaved alſo very diſintereſtedly on the other. Whitlocke very frankly owns, that he was ready to have gone to the King with propoſals, and what he blames this great man for, was an intention to reſtore the King, without making terms (25). It was, however, the judgment of Lord Aſhley, that this was the only right way of acting; for he thought that any terms ſo made would alter the Conſtitution; and what he chiefly aimed at by bringing back the king, was reviving the Conſtitution, which, from the experience of ſucceſſive changes, he judged would be a bleſſing to the nation. Sir Philip Warwick tells us in his Memoirs, that himſelf, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, and Sir Geoffery Palmer, met Mr. Anneſly, afterwards Earl of Angleſey, Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper, and Sir William Morrice, before the Healing Parliament ſat, by which his Majeſty was very well informed of their good intentions for his ſervice (26). The ſame writer informs us, that General Monk was tampered with by the French Embaſſador, and great offers made to ſupport him, in caſe he had been ſuſceptible of French counſels; and acquaints us, that it was upon the appointing of a new Council of State, the names of ſome of which he gives us, and amongſt them Sir Anthony, that the old republicans began to fear the calling back of the King (27). There is alſo extant a letter to Admiral Montague, afterwards Earl of Sandwich, from Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper, upon Lambert's defeat, which plainly ſhews his ſenſe of things in general, and of that ſeaſonable ſtroke in particular (28). But the words in the preamble to his patent are ſo full and expreſs, that they need not any authority to ſupport, or commentary to explain, them. In this his Majeſty takes notice (29), 'that he had in 'ſundry reſpects manifeſted his loyalty to King Charles 'I. and his great affection to his country in the late 'perilous and difficult times, and likewiſe to him, by 'his prudent and ſeaſonable advice and conſultation 'with General Monk, in order to his reſtoration, in 'conſideration of which acceptable ſervices he created 'him to the degree and dignity of a Baron.'

[I] With equal ability and integrity.] He reſided, during his continuance in that employment, at Exeter-houſe in the Strand, and proceeded from thence to Weſtminſter, with all the ſolemnity poſſible; for it was his opinion, that ceremony and ſtate were both uſeful and neceſſary to keep up the credit of great offices (30); for to uſe his Lordſhip's own words to Baron Thurland, Reputation is a thing of conſequence to magiſtrates as well as merchants. He wore an aſh-coloured ſilk gown, richly laced, and did not at all alter his garb upon his acceſſion to that high ſeat of judicature. He was deſirous of cutting buſineſs ſhort, and of avoiding forms, in which we are told, that the Lawyers gave him ſo much trouble, that to be able to proceed, he was forced to return to them: however, he was as expeditious as it was poſſible, and his quick penetration enabled him to ſee very far in a ſhort time, and what he ſaw, his eloquence made every body elſe ſee; ſo that whatever he decreed was ſo plain, and ſo perſpicuous, that there needed no learning to perceive he was in the right, nor was it poſſible to puzzle things again ſo much as to create a doubt that he was in the wrong (31). This gave him a high reputation at that time; ſo that Mr. Dryden, to beget an opinion of his own impartiality, in that moſt invidious character which he gave of his Lordſhip, was forced to throw in a fine compliment upon his integrity in the diſtribution of juſtice (32). It was a point of too great conſequence to be omitted, and it ſeems was then too well underſtood to be miſrepreſented. Some attempts have been ſince made to leſſen his character, as a Chancellor; but whoever conſiders them attentively, and obſerves that they are deſtitute of facts, and publiſhed at a great diſtance of time, will not be much moved by them (33). Another writer, immediately after his Lordſhip's death, ſpeaks of his behaviour thus (34): 'With what 'prudence, candour, honour, and integrity, he acquitted himſelf in that great and weighty employment, 'the tranſactions of the Court of Chancery, during 'the time of his Chancellorſhip, will beſt teſtify. Juſtice then ran in an equal channel, ſo that the cauſe 'of the rich was not ſuffered to ſwallow up the rights 'of the poor, nor was the ſtrong or cunning oppreſſor 'permitted to devour the weak or unſkilful oppoſer; 'but the abuſed found relief ſuitable to their diſtreſs, 'and thoſe by whom they were abuſed a ſevere reprehenſion, anſwerable to their crimes. The miſchievous conſequences which commonly ariſe from 'the delays, and other practices of that court were, 'by his ingenious and judicious management, very 'much abated, and every thing weighed and determined with exact judgment and equity.'

of the reach of all other capacities but his own, it would favour of raſhneſs to determine (g) [K]. When the King had taken a reſolution, as he was apt to take ſuch reſolutions without conſulting others, of changing meaſures, the Chancellor very quickly diſcerned it; and as he knew it was for his ſafety, ſo he thought it no diminution to his honour, to follow the example of his Prince, and therefore he changed in time, in which his enemies ſay he had a very great dexterity; and, on the other hand, his friends believe, that he made a virtue of neceſſity, and when he ſaw that his great parts could be no longer ſerviceable to his Maſter in office, he thought it very allowable to make uſe of them to ſave himſelf (h): and in this it is no ſmall commendation, that he retired with credit, where it would have been the higheſt point of wiſdom in any other man to have eſcaped ruin (i). The Duke of York was apprehenſive, from his conduct in Parliament, that he ſhould find him in many reſpects uncomplying, and was therefore very earneſt with the King to remove him, which however his Majeſty was not much inclined to do, becauſe he had a great opinion of his ſkill in finding out expedients, and of diverting dangers before things came to extremity (k). At length, however, that point was carried, and Nov. 9, 1673, the Earl of Shafteſbury reſigned the Great-Seal, but with ſome particular circumſtances, with the knowledge of which the reader cannot be diſpleaſed (l) [L]. [K] It would ſavour of raſhneſs to determine.] All that is ſaid, either in our general hiſtories, or private memoirs, of the conduct of the Earl of Shafteſbury while in power, and as it were at the head of the adminiſtration, is liable to many objections, and ought therefore to be read with much circumſpection. Such as have written direct apologies for him, of which there are ſeveral, will have every thing to have been not only well and wiſely, but uprightly and virtuouſly done, which, perhaps, is more than ought to be advanced in favour of any Miniſter (35). On the other hand, ſuch as make no ſecret of their diſlike to this great man, very ſeldom ſhew the leaſt ſcruple of painting him in the blackeſt colours; and both diſcover how far they deviate both from impartiality and truth, by running into palpable abſurdities, and viſible contradictions. A few inſtances ſeem to be requiſite, that it may appear we have collected the materials of this article with that caution and care which its importance demands. There were three great ſtrokes which diſtinguiſhed the period of his miniſtry, and it is not a little difficult to form a right judgment of his behaviour in any one of them. The firſt of theſe is as to his ſhutting up the Exchequer. In reference to this, Sir Joſeph Tyley's manuſcript (36) poſitively affirms, that the meaſure was of Lord Aſhley's contrivance, but that it was picked out of him when heated with wine, and in a free converſation by Sir Thomas Clifford, who, by that artifice, got himſelf advanced to the Peerage, and to the high dignity of Lord Treaſurer of England. An honourable author affirms the direct contrary; he compares the Earl of Shafteſbury and the Lord Clifford to a ſub-ſheriff and a ſheriff; the former, he ſays, had the authority, and the latter carried the wand (*). Both theſe ſtories cannot be true, and it is highly probable that neither of them are ſo. The Earl of Shafteſbury was not a man to be over-reached, and Lord Clifford had too great a capacity to ſtoop to any direction. It is moſt likely, that they acted in concert; and though it may be very true, that the Earl of Shafteſbury was ambitious of being Treaſurer, yet he might be prevailed upon to give way to the Lord Clifford, becauſe the very meaſure required the aſſiſtance of a Chancellor, and none of the great men in that adminiſtration were capable of exerciſing that office but the Earl of Shafteſbury. The Earls of Clarendon and Southampton had mutually ſupported each other in thoſe poſts, and we may very reaſonably ſuppoſe, that Shafteſbury and Clifford propoſed to follow their examples. Indeed it is certain they did follow them as long as they were in power; and whoever conſiders the ſpeeches made by the Chancellor Shafteſbury, at the admiſſion of Lord Clifford, and his ſucceſſor, the Lord Oſborne, to the office of Treaſurer, will ſee ſuch a manifeſt difference as will give no ſmall weight to this conjecture (37). The ſecond great ſtroke was, the declaration for Liberty of Conſcience, in which both theſe great Miniſters were equally concerned, though with very different views, for Lord Clifford was then a concealed, and not long after a declared, Papiſt: the Earl of Shafteſbury was deſirous of obliging the Diſſenters. The former was for maintaining this Declaration, even againſt the opinion of Parliament; the latter, finding his maſter wavering, gave up the Declaration, that he might put himſelf at the head of the Proteſtant intereſt. They both acted, conſidering the circumſtances under which the Declaration was framed, like wiſe Stateſmen; and, when they came to divide, each of them ſhewed a ſteadineſs to his principles, not in the leaſt unworthy of a great politician; ſo that Lord Clifford retired with credit, and the Earl of Shafteſbury kept his power when he loſt his poſt; and when no longer able to rule a Court, ſhewed his dexterity in becoming the ruler of the people (38). The third great ſtroke was peculiarly his, and that was, the iſſuing writs during the receſs of Parliament, in virtue of his office, and making uſe of his intereſt in the country to procure elections in conſequence of thoſe writs, agreeable to the views of his adminiſtration. Father Orleans, who had his lights from King James, applauds this meaſure, and acknowledges as well the candour as the capacity of the Chancellor, in reſpect to his maſter's ſervice (39). The honourable writer before-mentioned gives us quite another account. He tells us (40), the Chancellor did it to bring in his own creatures in Dorſetſhire more eſpecially, and to keep out the friends of Col. Strangeways, whom he diſliked for many reaſons, but moſt for being a very loyal gentleman. It happens unluckily, that he entirely overturns his own ſyſtem, by acknowledging, that all the perſons brought in by Shafteſbury's intereſt, were Royaliſts (41). However, the Houſe of Commons turned them out again without the leaſt ſtruggle, either on the part of theſe new members, or of the Crown. Shafteſbury ſaid upon this, that if the King would not ſupport his Chancellor, his Chancellor could do little in that capacity for his maſter's ſervice. Upon the whole, it ſeems to be pretty clear, that the Earl of Shafteſbury was in hopes the Court would have proſecuted the Dutch war with ſuch ſucceſs, as to have carried the glory of the Engliſh flag to the utmoſt height, promoted the Engliſh commerce in it's largeſt extent, and have ſacrificed that kind of bigotry, which he judged to be the bane of the Proteſtant Religion, in which caſe he thought the power of the Crown, and the grandeur of the people, muſt have ſtood upon the ſame baſis; but finding that other ſchemes were bringing upon the carpet, though not by the King, but rather the Duke, he choſe to make a ſhort turn, and to comply with thoſe who could ſave him, inſtead of continuing to play a deſperate game in conjunction with ſuch, as, to make their peace, might be tempted to make him a victim (42).

[L] With the knowledge of which the reader cannot be diſpleaſed.] We have this relation, which is pleaſant enough in it's circumſtances, and theſe are ſo much the more credible, from their agreeing exactly with the characters of the perſons mentioned, from Mr. Archdeacon Echard, which we ſhall give the reader in his own words (43). 'Soon after the breaking up of the 'Parliament, the Earl was ſent for, on a Sunday morn-'ing, to Court, as was alſo Sir Heneage Finch, Attor-'ney-General, to whom the ſeals were promiſed. As 'ſoon as the Earl came, he retired with the King in-'to the cloſet, while the prevailing party waited in 'triumph quitted the Court, he continued to make a great figure in Parliament: his abilities enabled him to ſhine, and his inclinations did not incline him to reſt (m). In 1675, the Lord Treaſurer Danby introduced the Teſt Bill into the Houſe of Lords, which was vigorouſly oppoſed by the Earl of Shafteſbury, who, if we may believe a great Prelate, diſtinguiſhed himſelf more in this Seſſions than ever he had done (n), which is ſomewhat ſingular, conſidering he had long before attained the reputation of being one of the greateſt Speakers of that age. In this indeed he ſhewed his parts, and contradicted the character that ſome had given him, of being an indiſcreet Orator, by inſiſting, for a full hour, on the folly and impropriety of condemning all reſiſtance by an expreſs law (o). He ſhewed, that as government could not ſubſiſt if men might reſiſt as often as they were diſpleaſed; ſo liberty muſt be loſt, if in no caſe reſiſtance was lawful. He obſerved, that a King might be in the hands of a faction, and then it would be treaſon to oppoſe what had the ſanction of his name, though it was to reſcue his authority. He delivered this diſcourſe with his uſual eaſe and freedom, though he knew that every word he ſaid was watched, and his enemies had the mortification of finding, that he could ſay what he pleaſed, without putting it in their power, how much ſoever it was in their will, to hurt him (p). A diſpute between the two Houſes, occaſioned an unexpected prorogation, by which the bill was loſt. There enſued upon this a receſs of fifteen months, and when the Parliament met again Feb. 16, 1676-7, the Duke of Buckingham argued, that it ought to be conſidered as diſſolved. The Earl of Shafteſbury was of the ſame opinion, and maintained it with ſo much warmth, that together with the Duke beforementioned, the Earl of Saliſbury, and the Lord Wharton, he was ſent to the Tower, where he continued for thirteen months, though the other Lords upon their ſubmiſſion were ſpeedily diſcharged (q). In order to be delivered from his confinement, he applied himſelf to the Court of King's-Bench, where, after his Counſel had done ſpeaking, he argued his own caſe with much eloquence and wit. He was notwithſtanding remanded to the Tower, and, at the next meeting of Parliament, this application was magnified into a great crime by the then Lord Treaſurer Danby, who very ſoon after was obliged to have recourſe to the ſame method for his own deliverance, and felt very ſenſibly the weight of thoſe ſevere doctrines, which he took ſo much pains to eſtabliſh upon this occaſion (r). At length the Earl of Shafteſbury made a full ſubmiſſion, and, upon an addreſs of the Houſe of Peers, the King was pleaſed to diſcharge him (s), and the precedent made in his caſe was afterwards reverſed (t). He managed the oppoſition to the Earl of Danby's adminiſtration with ſuch vigour and dexterity, that it was found abſolutely impoſſible to do any thing effectually in Parliament, without changing the ſyſtem which then prevailed. The King, who deſired nothing ſo much as to be eaſy, reſolving to make ſuch a change, diſmiſſed all the Privy Council at once, and formed a new one: this was declared April 21, 1679, and at the ſame time the Earl of Shafteſbury was appointed Lord Preſident (u). This was one of the beſt received, as well as one of the moſt popular meaſures, in his whole reign, and was equally acceptable to the people at home, and to the natural allies of this nation abroad (w). It had not however long the good effects that were expected from it, which was owing to the factions at Court; and thoſe quickly roſe to ſuch a height, that the Earl was removed from that high employment on the fifth of October following (x). He had drawn upon himſelf the implacable hatred of the Duke of York, by ſteadily promoting, if not originally inventing, the project of an Excluſion Bill. In reſpect to this he was indeed immoveable, notwithſtanding he knew the King would never conſent to it, and though moſt of his friends were inclined to accept the expedient offered by the Court, of providing againſt what they feared, by eſtabliſhing legal limitations. It is not our buſineſs to determine in ſo nice and important a point; but this we may have leave to ſay, that his Lordſhip's reaſons were clear and weighty, allowing his principles to be well founded (y) [M]. 'triumph to ſee him return without the purſe. His 'Lordſhip being alone with the King, ſaid, Sir, I 'know you intend to give the ſeals to the Attorney Gene-'ral, but I am ſure your Majeſty never intended to diſ-'miſs me with contempt. The King, who could not 'do an ill-natured thing, replyed, God's fiſh, my 'Lord, I will not do it with any circumſtance that may 'look like an affront. Then Sir, ſaid the Earl, I de-'ſire your Majeſty will permit me to carry the ſeals before 'you to chapel, and ſend for them afterwards from my 'houſe. To which his Majeſty readily complied, and 'the Earl entertained the King with news, and other 'diverting ſtories, 'till the very minute he was to go 'to chapel, purpoſely to amuſe the courtiers and his 'ſucceſſor, who he believed was upon the rack for 'fear he ſhould prevail upon the King to change his 'mind. The King and the ſtill Chancellor came out 'of the cloſet talking together, and ſmiling, and 'went together to chapel, which ſurprized them all, 'who could have no opportunity to inform them-'ſelves what was to be expected; and ſome ran im-'mediately to tell the Duke of York all their mea-'ſures were broken; and the Attorney-General was 'ſaid to be inconſolable. After ſermon the Earl went 'home with the ſeals, and that evening the King gave 'them to the Attorney-General, a man of great parts 'and abilities, with the title of Lord Keeper.

[M] Allowing his principles to be well founded.] It was a misfortune to the Earl of Shafteſbury, that thoſe who were angry with him have tranſmitted to poſterity the hiſtory of thoſe times in which he lived, and of that government in which he had ſo large a ſhare. As for inſtance, Sir William Temple having come in by the intereſt of the Earl of Arlington, and being afterwards ſupported by that of the Lord Treaſurer Danby, could not avoid feeling a diſtaſte to one who left the former, and oppoſed the latter; and of this there are viſible marks in thoſe paſſages of his Memoirs, where the Earl of Shafteſbury is mentioned (44). The Biſhop of Saliſbury was very intimate in his turn with the

(44) Temple's Works, vol. i. p. 334, 335. 337. 339, 340, 341. 343, &c.

The diſcovery of the Popiſh plot opened a way for ſubverting the Earl of Danby's miniſtry, and the general opinion ſeems to be, that this induced the Earl of Shafteſbury to puſh that matter, not only with vigour but vehemence. There is nothing plainer than that he was the author and promoter of all the proſecutions that followed thereupon, as well in the inferior Courts, as in Parliament; with a view of quaſhing the Popiſh party entirely, and of excluding the Duke, which were the points he had moſt at heart, and which, without doubt, he purſued with unrelenting ſeverity (z). Upon the King's ſummoning a Parliament to meet at Oxford, March 21, 1680-1, he joined with ſeveral Lords in a petition to prevent its meeting there (a), which however failed of ſucceſs. He was preſent in that Parliament, and ſtrenuouſly ſupported the Excluſion Bill, which however was thrown out in the Houſe of Lords. He is likewiſe ſaid to have uſed his utmoſt endeavours to have reconciled his Majeſty to that meaſure, but without effect (b). It is no wonder that ſuch a conduct as this ſhould inflame the Duke and his friends againſt him, and not long after, an occaſion either offered or was found, to make him feel the weight of their reſentments. Upon the diſſolution of that Parliament, and his return to London, one Bryan Haines applied himſelf to him, under pretence that he could make ſtill clearer diſcoveries than hitherto had been made of the Popiſh plot, and the murther of Sir Edmund Bury Godfrey, provided, that for this ſervice, he might obtain a pardon (c). But when this man was brought before the Privy-Council, he gave quite another account, and boldly charged the Earl with endeavouring to ſuborn him (d). Upon this information his Lordſhip was apprehended on the ſecond of July 1681, and after being examined by his Majeſty in Council, he was committed to the Tower, where he remained upwards of four months, notwithſtanding he petitioned, and took every other legal method to obtain a trial, or to be admitted to bail according to the Habeas Corpus Act (e). At length, on the twenty-fourth of October, 1681, a bill was preſented to the Grand Jury at the Seſſions Houſe in the Old Bailey, againſt him, for high-treaſon, and the witneſſes were examined in open court. They certainly teſtified enough, or rather too much: for, on the one hand, the evidence they gave was very incredible in itſelf; and, on the other, their characters were ſo infamous, that even a probable ſtory would ſcarcely have deſerved belief upon their depoſition (f). But what was chiefly relied on, was a paper found in the Earl's ſtudy, which contained the draught of an aſſociation: yet it was neither written, or ſo much as marked, with his hand; and though it contained many ſtrange things, yet it was full of the higheſt the Earl of Shafteſbury, as well as other great men of thoſe times, but had the misfortune to be upon bad terms with him afterwards, by bringing the unfortunate Lord Stafford to charge Shafteſbury at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, with being a friend to the Papiſts a little before he ſuffered death (45). The Hon. Roger North had his reaſons alſo for diſliking him, which he tells us very fairly; ſpeaks upon all occaſions as an enemy, but as an enemy declared, and therefore the leſs to be feared (46). It cannot be aſſerted, that when theſe writers relate facts concerning this noble Lord, they do not deſerve credit; for as men of ſenſe and reputation, that is due to whatever they relate, as a thing known: but theſe remarks, and many more that might be added, are ſufficient to take off the edge of their cenſures, to leſſen the credibility of their conjectures, and to keep the reader from having an implicit faith in the characters they have drawn of a man they did not love, and that chiefly, becauſe he oppoſed thoſe who are the heroes of their reſpective works, ſuch as Lord Halifax, Lord Danby, and Lord North. As to the point of the Bill of Excluſion, it is generally mentioned as an inſtance of the Earl of Shafteſbury's diſlike to monarchy, and thoſe who oppoſed it are magnified as men who were beſt affected to what was, at that time, eſteemed the Engliſh Conſtitution. One of thoſe writers ſays, that the Earl of Shafteſbury never denied his changing ſides, but, on the contrary, took a pleaſure in relating the many turns he had made, and in ſhewing that he made them at the proper times (47). It might have been added, that he valued himſelf likewiſe upon never betraying thoſe he left, and upon quitting parties without leaving his principles. He had a good opinion of King Charles the ſecond's inclinations, and thought his affairs were prejudiced by carrying the dead weight of a Popiſh ſucceſſor. This he thought neceſſary to be removed, and thought the only way to remove it, without prejudice to the monarchy, was to exclude the Duke of York, and paſs on to the next heir. He judged that ſuch a law, would be no improper inſtance of the abſolute power of a King and Parliament, might provide for the ſafety of the ſubject, and yet leave the power of the Crown entire, without tinging the Conſtitution with the leaſt colour of a common wealth (48). How far he might act in this from his perſonal reſentment againſt the Duke of York, what views he might have of re-eſtabliſhing his own power, or what ſchemes he might be drawn into after the diſſolution of the Oxford Parliament, are out of the caſe. We are ſpeaking of the grounds upon which he promoted the Excluſion, and how far they were reconcileable to his former principles, of which the reader, from what has been ſaid, may very eaſily ſettle his judgment. As for Lord Halifax, who was the great patron of the limitations, he made no ſcruple of owning, that he meant thereby not to limit the ſucceſſor only, but to leſſen and curtail the prerogatives of the Crown. He carried it ſo far, if we may believe the Biſhop of Sarum, and there is not the leaſt colour for diſbelieving him, as to inſinuate, that a Popiſh King was a bleſſing, as it afforded an opportunity of putting all his ſucceſſors under theſe reſtraints (49). Now granting theſe accounts to be true, there cannot be any thing clearer than that Shafteſbury continued a Royaliſt, though at the head of an oppoſition, and that Lord Halifax acted, or affected to act, upon the maxims of a common-wealth's man, when in the ſervice of the Court. The reaſons why Shafteſbury always rejected the ſcheme of limitations were, firſt, becauſe he thought it was not for the benefit of the ſubject, that the prerogatives of the Crown ſhould be leſſened, but that the abuſe of thoſe prerogatives by Miniſters ſhould be puniſhed; and therefore he conceived it unjuſt, that the Engliſh Monarchy ſhould ſuffer for the fault of the Duke of York; and ſecondly, he thought limitations impracticable, becauſe, if the perſon limited came to be King, and had a Parliament to his mind, thoſe limitations might be as eaſily and as legally repealed as ever they were enacted. It is evident, that neither of theſe objections lay againſt his ſcheme of the Excluſion; for that would have left the Monarchy ſound and entire, and have placed ſuch a new head as would have always maintained his own title, and muſt have governed by law, in order to have it effectually in his power to do that; which would have been an advantage to the nation, rather than an inconvenience.

zeal for the preſervation of the King's perſon (g). Upon the whole, the Jury thought fit to return the bill Ignoramus. This occaſioned a very high controverſy, many aſſerting that this was inconſiſtent with their oaths, and others, who took themſelves to be as good judges, maintaining as poſitively, that, conſiſtently with their oaths, they could not have found another verdict; and ſeveral things were publiſhed on both ſides (h) [N]. It is certain that great [N] Were publiſhed on both ſides.] The reader will find a full account of the proceedings againſt the Earl of Shafteſbury, upon this bill of indictment, in it's proper place (50), and will there ſee what was ſworn againſt him, and by whom. The great deſign of the Court was to make it evident to all the world, that the King could not obtain juſtice, even for the higheſt offences committed againſt him by a ſubject, from the manifeſt partiality of the Grand Juries in London, diſpoſed and packed by malecontent ſheriffs. The proof of this was ſuppoſed to depend on the manifeſt ſtrength of the evidence offered to prove the facts laid in this indictment, which it was alledged the Grand Jury could not reject, without breach of their oaths (51). On the other hand, it was inſiſted upon, that the Grand Jury being ſworn to bring in a true verdict, they could not, in their conſciences, return Bilà vera, where the evidence was inconſiſtent, given by infamous witneſſes, and made up of abſurd and incredible relations; in ſhort, that a Grand Jury was bound to return Ignoramus, notwithſtanding any evidence, when they, in their conſciences, ſaw reaſon not to believe that evidence (52). To this purpoſe, a ſtrong and bold piece was written, as a certain great Prelate informs us, by the learned and ingenious Mr. Somers, afterwards Lord Somers, and Chancellor of England (53). As for the Aſſociation mentioned in the text, the ſame Prelate tells us, and indeed it is very probable, that it was put into the hands of the Earl of Shafteſbury when the Parliament ſat at Oxford, in which an Aſſociation had been propoſed, as a neceſſary ſecurity againſt the apprehenſions of Popery, and the dangers ariſing from a Popiſh Succeſſor after the Excluſion Bill was rejected (54). Thus much is certain, that the Aſſociation was not mentioned in the indictment, but was offered as a ſupplemental and corroborative proof of what was ſworn againſt his Lordſhip by the witneſſes. There was another ſtrange circumſtance attended this, that one Mr. Wilſon, who, on the part of the Earl, attended to receive back ſuch of his papers as were ſeized, and were not conſidered as criminal, and to mark thoſe of another nature, that it might appear they were really found in the Earl's cuſtody; I ſay it was another ſtrange circumſtance in regard to this Aſſociation, that it was not indorſed as the other papers were, and that Mr. Wilſon was committed for High-Treaſon (55). To ſay the plain truth, theſe were very dreadful times, when all parties had recourſe to the moſt unjuſtifiable methods for carrying their points. Such as oppoſed the Government made no ſcruple of publiſhing the moſt bitter and injurious libels againſt it. On the other hand, thoſe employed by the Court ſacrificed truth and decency, without the leaſt ſcruple. Marchmont Needham, who had been employed by the Regicides and the Parliament, to vilify the Royal Family in the moſt ſcandalous and barbarous manner, was paid by the Miniſters to abuſe and defame the Earl of Shafteſbury, which he did with all the alacrity in the world (56), and his abuſe is transferred, verbatim, into the account given of this noble perſon by the Oxford Hiſtorian (57). It was given out, with the like deſign, that the Earl of Shafteſbury had the vanity to expect to be choſen King of Poland, and this made way for calling him Count Tatſky, alluding to the tap which had been applied upon the breaking out of the ulcer between his ribs when he was Lord Chancellor (58). It was alſo a ſtanding jeſt with the lower form of Wits, to ſtile him Shiftſbury inſtead of Shafteſbury (59). A very grave author is pleaſed to tell us, that when his Lordſhip was Chancellor, one Sir Paul Neal watered his mares with Rheniſh and ſugar, that is, entertained his miſtreſſes (60); which, if true, was certainly a ſtory that needed not to be communicated to poſterity. We are told, that King Charles II. who would both take liberties and bear them, once ſaid to the Earl at Court, in a vein of raillery and good humour, and in reference only to his amours, I believe, Shafteſbury, thou art the wickedeſt fellow in my dominions. To which, with a low bow, and a very grave face, the Earl replied, May it pleaſe your Majeſty, of a ſubject I believe I am; at which the merry Monarch laughed heartily. When parties were at their greateſt height, the King would very often honour him with his converſation, and would aſk his opinion upon indifferent things, which was not pleaſing to the Miniſters, as it carried nothing of that averſion which they would have had the world believe he entertained againſt his Lordſhip (61). In return, there is good reaſon to maintain, that whatever lengths party might carry him, his Lordſhip ſtill retained a deep ſenſe of that favour, with which his indulgent maſter had honoured him (62); and it happens a little ſtrangely, that the author who has drawn this noble perſon's character in the blackeſt colours has, notwithſtanding, left us a paſſage, which is the ſtrongeſt proof of it (63). 'If he was a friend really to any 'human kind beſides himſelf, I believe it was to 'King Charles II. whoſe gaiety, breeding, wit, good 'humour, familiarity, and diſpoſition, to enjoy the 'pleaſures of ſociety and greatneſs, engaged him very 'much, that had a great ſhare of wit, agreeableneſs, 'and gallantry himſelf. But this ſame ſuperiority 'ſpoiled all; his Majeſty would not be always in'fluenced by him, but would take ſhort turns on his 'toe, and ſo fruſtrate his projects: and by that, 'finding he could not work under him, ſtrove, if 'poſſible, to reduce his authority, and get above 'him. It ſeems, by what was given out, that he 'would not have hurt the King perſonally, but kept 'him tame in a cage with his ordinary pleaſures 'about him.' C.

(63) North's Examen, p. 119.

* [In the preceding narrative, there are two errors in point of fact, which require to be noticed. It is ſaid that, in 1643, Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper was High Sheriff of the county of Dorſet, and choſe in that quality, rather than by virtue of any military commiſſion, to raiſe the whole ſtrength of the county, in the cauſe of the King and the Conſtitution. But it appears, from the Rolls of Dorſetſhire, which have been examined by a near relation of the family, that this account is not true. The miſtake, of Sir Anthony's having been High Sheriff that year, aroſe from the active part which he then took in the public tranſactions of the county, as related in the article.

Another error, far leſs natural, and more eaſy to be avoided, but which, nevertheleſs, has been adopted by all his Biographers, is, that in 1645 he was High Sheriff of Norfolk. But with that county he had no connection, nor had he any property in it; ſo that he could have no pretenſion to exerciſe there the office deſcribed. The fact is, that the Sheriff of Norfolk at the time ſpecified was Sir Jacob Aſtley, afterwards created Lord Aſtley.

Anthony-Aſhley Cooper, firſt Earl of Shafteſbury, was ſo diſtinguiſhed by his abilities and character, was advanced to ſuch high ſtations, and took ſo active a part in the public tranſactions of his time, that his name frequently occurs in all the general hiſtories of that period. Few, however, of the hiſtorical works that have lately been produced, record any other facts concerning him than thoſe which are mentioned by the writers of the laſt century. We only meet with different repreſentations of his character, according to the reſpective views and ſentiments of the authors by whom his actions are related. The hiſtorian from whom we derive the moſt of what appears to be new with regard to the Earl of Shafteſbury, is Sir John Dalrymple. This Gentleman has aſcertained two circumſtances concerning him, which redound not a little to his honour. In the firſt place, Sir John has great rejoicings were made upon his Lordſhip's acquittal and diſcharge, and a MEDAL was alſo ſtruck upon that occaſion, which gave a ſubject to the ſatyric muſe of Mr. Dryden, whoſe poem under that title is thought not at all inferior to any of his writings; which however decides nothing as to the fact, ſince Poets do not always ſucceed beſt upon the baſis of truth or reaſon (i). The Earl, as ſoon as he was at liberty, endeavoured to vindicate himſelf by law, and brought an action againſt one Mr. Cradock, for ſpeaking of him as a traytor. A rule however being made upon the motion of the defendant, that the trial ſhould not be had before a Jury either of London or Middleſex, but in any other county that his Lordſhip ſhould chuſe, he thought fit to diſcontinue his ſuit (k). He reſided for many has clearly proved, that the Earl, though he is always reckoned one of the cabal, had no concern in the iniquitous treaty which King Charles the Second entered into with the court of France in 1670, and by which he became a penſioner to Lewis the Fourteenth. The only members of the cabal who were privy to this treaty, were Lord Clifford and the Earl of Arlington; and it was conducted by the Lord Arundel of Wardour (64). Secondly, in the liſts which Sir John Dalrymple has given of thoſe Gentlemen who are ſaid to have received ſums of money from the French court, Lord Shafteſbury's name does not appear. Indeed, it is certain, from the beſt authority, that he refuſed large offers from that court; and his integrity in this reſpect is acknowledged by our hiſtorian (65). Whatever were the Earl's faults, he was above being bribed to act againſt the intereſts of his country; nor would he condeſcend to accept of any gratifications from the King of France, even when others of his party thought they might honeſtly do it, for the purpoſe of more effectually oppoſing the arbitrary deſigns of Charles the Second.—Another circumſtance redounding to Lord Shafteſbury's honour, mentioned by Sir John Dalrymple, is, that his Lordſhip promoted the Habeas Corpus Act, that great palladium of the perſonal liberty of the ſubject (66).—Sir John has, likewiſe, taken notice of a remarkable inſtance of the Earl's popularity, in the latter part of his Life. This was in 1681, when the Grand Jury returned ignoramus to the Bill for High Treaſon that had been preferred againſt him; at which time the acclamations in the court were ſo great as to laſt an hour (67).

In theſe few things Sir John Dalrymple has borne an honourable teſtimony to Lord Shafteſbury's memory; but, in almoſt every other reſpect, he has been very ſevere upon his Lordſhip, and hath not only retailed the charges commonly urged againſt his character, but has loaded it with freſh accuſations. Speaking of his being raiſed to the Peerage, upon the Reſtoration, Sir John ſays, that it was an honour afterwards ill requited by him (68): but ſurely the dignity conferred upon Aſhley Cooper could afford no juſt reaſon why he ſhould not oppoſe the meaſures of Charles the Second, when he found them to be arbitrary and tyrannical. Another point animadverted upon, is Lord Aſhley's having aſſiſted at the trial of the Regicides. "The moſt cruel circumſtance," obſerves our Hiſtorian, "in the trial of theſe perſons was, that ſeveral of the popular party, of whom Aſhley Cooper was one, ſate as their judges, and doomed them to die for that rebellion to which they had incited them (69)." Though we are far from approving of Lord Aſhley's conduct on this occaſion, we think, at the ſame time, that it was by no means ſo malignant as is here repreſented. There is ſomething unjuſt in thus ſingling out his particular name, and expoſing it to cenſure, when others were equally guilty, and ought, therefore, to have been mentioned. But it is not a fact that Lord Aſhley doomed the Regicides to die for a rebellion to which he had incited them. He did not himſelf engage in the parliamentary cauſe till his endeavours to ſerve the King had, through miſrepreſentation, proved wholly ineffectual. When he did engage in that cauſe, he continued in arms but a very little time; and there is not the leaſt ſhadow of a reaſon for believing that any of the perſons in queſtion were influenced by him in the part they took againſt Charles the Firſt. Beſides, it was not for their being concerned in the grand rebellion (as it is commonly called) that he joined in condemning them, but for their having been Regicides; for their having been the active and immediate inſtruments in bringing the King to the block; an event which Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, in conjunction with the reſt of the Preſbyterians, muſt have regarded with the utmoſt abhorrence.

(68) Review, ubi ſupra, p. 20.

(69) Ibid. p. 21.

In the progreſs of his hiſtory, Sir John Dalrymple aſſerts, without heſitation, that it was by the advice of the Earl of Shafteſbury that Charles the Second ſeized the iſſues of the Exchequer (70). He aſcribes to the Earl all the unconſtitutional meaſures which had been adopted previouſly to his putting himſelf at the head of the oppoſition to the court (71); and yet Sir John had before acknowledged that his Lordſhip, while in power, was ſupported by the people, becauſe he pretended a reverence for their rights (72). Nay, our hiſtorian has not ſcrupled to repreſent Lord Shafteſbury as the contriver of the Popiſh Plot. His note upon the ſubject is too curious to be omitted. "It has been much doubted," ſays he, "whether "Shafteſbury contrived the Popiſh Plot, or if he "only made uſe of it, after it broke out. Some "papers I have ſeen convince me he contrived it, "though the perſons he made uſe of as informers ran "beyond their inſtructions. The common objection "to the ſuppoſition of his contriving the plot, is, "the abſurdity of its circumſtances. When Shafteſ"bury himſelf was preſſed with regard to that ab"ſurdity, he made an anſwer which ſhows equally "the depth and the irregularity of his genius. An "account of it is in North's Examen, p. 95. "'A "certain Lord of his confidence in Parliament, once "aſked him what he intended to do with the plot, "which was ſo full of nonſenſe as would ſcarce go "down with tantum non ideots: what then could he "propoſe by preſſing the belief of it upon men of "common ſenſe, and eſpecially in Parliament."— "It is no matter," ſaid he, "the more nonſenſical "the better: if we cannot bring them to ſwallow "worſe nonſenſe than that, we ſhall never do any "good with them (73).'" It is much to be lamented that Sir John Dalrymple has not produced the papers which convinced him that the Earl of Shafteſbury was the contriver of the Popiſh Plot. Amidſt all the curious and valuable letters and memorials which compoſe the ſecond volume of Sir John's publication, nothing could have been of greater importance than the production of theſe papers. If they had been publiſhed, and if they had been found undeniably to aſcertain the fact which Sir John Dalrymple ſuppoſes them to prove, they would not only have for ever fixed, without controverſy, the flagitiouſneſs of Lord Shafteſbury's character, but would have cleared up one of the moſt obſcure and intricate parts of the Engliſh hiſtory. As to the anecdote related by Roger North, it does not come up to the point; not to mention that he was a very prejudiced writer, and that every one, who is acquainted with the world, knows what little ſtreſs is often to be laid on the ſtories which are told on the authority of certain Lords, or other nameleſs perſons. Till, therefore, the papers in queſtion ſhall be produced, and till it ſhall appear that they contain not merely ſurmizes, but undoubted facts, we muſt be permitted to pay no regard to Sir John Dalrymple's opinion. It is acknowledged, that the Earl of Shafteſbury proſecuted, with great violence, the perſons who were accuſed of being concerned in the Popiſh Plot; nor have we any intention of attempting to vindicate his conduct in this reſpect. At the ſame time, we perceive many years at Thanet Houſe in Alderſgate-ſtreet; but finding his health decay, his ſpirits declining, and the times growing ſtill more and more tempeſtuous, to which we may add, that thoſe who were his bittereſt enemies were now in the zenith of their power, he thought it high time to ſeek for ſome place of retirement, where, out of the reach of their endeavours to injure him, he might wear out the ſmall remainder of his life in peace (l). It was with this view, that in the month of November, 1682, he embarked for Holland, and arriving ſafely at Amſterdam, after a very dangerous voyage, he took a houſe there, propoſing to live in a manner ſuitable to his quality, being viſited by perſons of the firſt diſtinction, and treated with all the deference and reſpect that he could deſire; but being ſeized by his old ceive no ſufficient reaſon for queſtioning his belief in the reality of that plot. In ſuch a belief, however miſtaken it might be, he only concurred in ſentiment with the wiſeſt and beſt men of that period, with the nation in general, and with the ſolemn declarations of the two Houſes of Parliament. That he was the contriver of the plot appears to us to be altogether incredible. If this had been the caſe, how could a fact ſo atrocious and important have eſcaped, for ſuch a length of time, the moſt complete detection? No one had more bitter enemies than the Earl of Shafteſbury; and they would have rejoiced in every opportunity of expoſing his character and actions. Nor would ſuch an opportunity have been wanting, if he had been guilty of the crime with which he is charged. The plot grew into diſcredit; ſeveral of the informers, and particularly Titus Oates, were ſeverely puniſhed for the teſtimonies they had given; and yet it never appeared, in the courſe of the evidence, that the contrivance of this famous conſpiracy originated in Lord Shafteſbury. We have much perſonal reſpect for Sir John Dalrymple, and are fully ſenſible of the value of the hiſtorical information contained in his memoirs; but we muſt be permitted to ſay, that he is ſometimes too precipitate in his deciſions.

Since the preceding reflections were written, we have had the pleaſure of finding them confirmed by the opinion of Mrs. Macaulay Graham. This ingenious Lady obſerves in general, that the whole plot contains ſuch low abſurdities and palpable contradictions, that it is impoſſible it could be invented, or adopted by any man of parts or education (74); and with regard to Lord Shafteſbury in particular, ſhe has the following remark. He "has been accuſed of forging the circumſtances of the Popiſh Plot. But in all our hiſtorical reſearches, we cannot find any traces either of the Earl's having been the original contriver of thoſe circumſtances depoſed by Oates and Bedloe, or even of aggravating the contrivance of others: and if this had been the caſe, it is impoſſible, conſidering the low and corrupt characters of the witneſſes, and the malicious vigilance of the court, that he ſhould have eſcaped detection (75)."

(75) Ibid. p. 423, 424.

The ſame juſtly celebrated female hiſtorian has made a ſeries of reflections on the Popiſh Plot, which are ſo impartial and judicious, that the inſertion of them will probably afford a gratification to our readers. Nor can they be regarded as foreign to the ſubject of the preſent article, ſince Lord Shafteſbury took ſo active and capital a part in the proceedings relative to the plot.

"It is, ſays Mrs. Macaulay Graham, the violence, the virulence, and the want of candour in all parties, which have deceived the judgment of all the hiſtorians who have written on theſe times. Mr. Hume enumerates every circumſtance which is the moſt favourable to the Papiſts, without making any mention of all thoſe variety of incidents which confirmed the doubts even of the moſt ſcrupulous men of theſe times, and led them to believe, that many circumſtances of the plot were true, though many were added, and others much magnified; and then he pronounces, that the party formed againſt the King and his brother were compoſed of a populace ſo credulous from prejudice, ſo blended with religious antipathy, as implicitly to believe the moſt palpable abſurdities, and conducted by leaders ſo little ſcrupulous, as to endeavour, by encouraging perjury, ſubornation, lies, impoſtures, and even by ſhedding innocent blood, to gratify their own furious ambition, and ſubvert all legal authority. That there are ſuch individuals in all parties, to the ſhame of human nature, it muſt be acknowledged. But Mr. Hume, who makes very ſlight animadverſions on the depraved conduct of the other party, of the wicked uſe they made of witneſſes, whom they acknowledged to have been corrupt and perjured, might have taken into conſideration that unhappy facility which attends all vulgar characters, in the believing every report which they wiſh to believe; and, in particular, if ſuch report ſhould gratify the views of avarice, ambition, or the keener feelings of reſentment: that the Earl of Shafteſbury, and ſeveral others, were at this time well acquainted with the intentions on foot, not only to procure a toleration, but a re-eſtabliſhment of Popery in this kingdom as the national religion, and that, with the deſire of giving a general alarm to the public, they might be led to believe that there was ſomething at bottom more black than appeared on the ſurface of things, and which might induce them to go on in their endeavours to unravel the myſtery; and that even the manifold inconſiſtencies and abſurdities contained in the narratives, inſtead of diſcouraging them, might ſerve only as farther incentives to diſcover the bottom of the plot, and might be conſidered as objections which a more complete information would fully remove.

"Theſe are the grounds of juſtification, or at leaſt palliation, for the warmth with which the popular leaders proſecuted the plot, which may lead to ſome uſeful obſervations, that may aſſiſt us to unravel that maze of intricate circumſtances and incidents, which, by their oppoſition to each other, hold the judgment in ſuſpenſe, and prevent the candid mind from proceeding to any deciſive determination on this very obſcure part of the Engliſh hiſtory. It is to be remembered, that Charles had not only favoured all the ambitious views of France, but had actually entered into a conſpiracy with the French court, to deſtroy one of the chief ſupports of the Proteſtant intereſt, in the reduction of the United Provinces: that he had actually ſupported that part of the demands of France, which provided for the re-eſtabliſhment of Popery in Holland, by refuſing to make a peace with the States General, till they had complied with all the exorbitant conditions offered by the haughty Lewis: that he had actually entered into a treaty, by which that monarch was to ſupply him with men and arms to ſubdue the liberties of his own ſubjects, and to re-eſtabliſh Popery in England; and that he had pledged his faith, to avow to the whole world his own converſion to the ſee of Rome: that his brother, the preſumptive heir to the crown, had, with more integrity, though leſs policy, avowed his converſion: that both the brothers had married Papiſts, and by their reſpective marriage contracts, the Romiſh religion was openly celebrated in the royal palaces of England: that by the legal protection given to the family prieſts, and the connivance to other individuals of this order without number, to frequent the metropolis, and diſperſe themſelves all over the kingdom, the great work of converſion was carried on with ſuch ſucceſs, and with ſuch countenance from the court, that it alarmed the fears of the church, and induced them to put the nation on their guard againſt the impending evil. With theſe apparent dangers the Duke of York, and his Secretary, with other inferior emiſſaries, were employed in carrying on criminal correſpondences with the courts of Rome and Paris, to take advantage of the favourable criſis, and to lend their aſſiſtance towards the rooting out the peſtilent northern hereſy. The Jeſuits in England had their correold diſtemper the gout, it ſpeedily flew up into his ſtomach, and ſoon became mortal; ſo that he expired on the twenty-ſecond of Jan. 1682-3, in the ſixty-ſecond year of his age (m.) His correſpondence with the brotherhood all over Europe; and, with their patron in Rome, under whoſe authority, and by whoſe direction they proceeded in all things, had their ſtated times and places of rendezvous, had held their general aſſembly, agreeably to ſummons, on the very ſame day in April, mentioned by Oates, in the Duke of York's own houſe, according to what this Prince confeſſed to Sir John Reresby: and, in addition to theſe circumſtances, the Ducheſs of York, to cover the retreat of thoſe prieſts and jeſuits who were deepeſt in the ſecret, made a private voyage to Holland. It is affirmed in one of the trials of the Papiſts, that Ewers, who is often and very materially mentioned in Dugdale's evidence, was one of theſe prieſts; and candour muſt acknowledge, that it is difficult to conceive why a Secretary of State ſhould order the Mayor of Dover to arreſt and detain Norris, together with his companion, unleſs it was apprehended that the party had ſtill ſome ſecrets not known to the public. From all theſe circumſtances it is highly probable that Oates, though not ſo much in the confidence of the leaders of the party as to be entruſted with any plans or ſchemes which they had formed for the entire converſion of the Engliſh, and the bringing its Church into obedience to the See of Rome, had heard enough from the inferior emiſſaries to be convinced, that there was ſome grand deſign carrying on, which was to be fatal to the Proteſtant cauſe, and that ſtirred up by reſentment for the contempt with which he was treated, and the poverty in which he was ſuffered to remain, he had made up in invention for the want of knowledge of particulars; and that Bedloe and the whole crew of informers, had all grounded their ſeveral depoſitions on what they had obſerved to be the common talk and expectations of the party, viz. that Proteſtantiſm in England would be ſoon extirpated, and the Romiſh religion prevail. Turberville, ſome time before he thought of following the trade of a witneſs, told Dr. Lloyd, afterwards Biſhop of St. Aſaph, that this opinion was current among all the Papiſts; alſo that a great deal of blood would be ſhed before it could be brought about; and all the converts from Popery, whether they acted the part of witneſſes, or not, frequently mentioned this circumſtance in their private diſcourſe.

"It is poſſible that the moſt extraordinary and the moſt incredible parts of the depoſitions might ariſe from the extravagant conceits of the inferior Papiſts, who endeavoured in this manner to account for the ſanguine hopes which their leaders had of rooting out, in a ſhort time, the northern hereſy; and, in regard to the evidence ſo circumſtantially given in of the deſign of killing the King, it is more than probable that it aroſe from ſome very imprudent expreſſions of a warm reſentment which the party had conceived againſt his Majeſty, for the having broken his word in regard to the avowing his converſion, and the taking meaſures for the re-eſtabliſhment of Popery, according to his treaty with France; and the continual aſſertion, that his Majeſty had deceived them, I think may very fairly be applied to the King's having taken the money from France on this pretence, and the afterwards refuſing to fulfil the conditions on which the money was given.

"Can any man of candour ſay, that a conſpiracy to re-eſtabliſh Popery as the national religion is not proved by Charles's firſt treaty with France, and by Coleman's letters? and will not any man of candour acknowledge, that ſuch a conſpiracy was juſtly the object of public concern? All the injuſtice, therefore, which accompanied the proſecution of the plot lay in the iniquity of the bench, and in the iniquity of thoſe who endeavoured to divert the ſtorm of public reſentment from the proper objects to the inferior emiſſaries. With ſuch encouragement as the King's being a concealed, and his brother an avowed Papiſt, this ſect muſt, agreeably to their religious opinions, have acted criminally if they had not made a full uſe of the opportunity to deſtroy hereſy and reſtore the ancient conſtitution of the Church of Chriſt: and though the corruptions of intereſt might mix with the deſigns of the leaders, the generality of the party were, undoubtedly, actuated by the laudable motives of conſcience and pious zeal. All the criminality lay on the ſide of the King and his brother, who, by the baſeſt treachery and the moſt flagrant breach of truſt, had formed a conſpiracy againſt thoſe people whom they were bound by every law, human and divine, to protect. It was againſt them and againſt them only, that the reſentment of the nation could, with any degree of juſtice, fall. To reduce their power within ſafe and ſalutary bounds, ſhould have been the general and particular concern of every ſect of Proteſtants; and to this grand object the wiſdom of Parliament ought to have been alone directed. But in any attempts of this nature it is plain that the Commons would have been forſaken by the High Church-party and the Houſe of Lords; and in conſequence of ſuch a deſertion by the majority of the nation. In this light we are to conſider the Popiſh ſufferers as victims ſacrificed by the court to appeaſe the wrath of the people; and, on the other ſide, as victims to the policy of the deep intriguers in the oppoſition, to expoſe the guilt of the court. The ways, it muſt be acknowledged, to obtain this end, by procuring evidence through the temptation of a reward, were infamous: yet, to the reproach of modern times, this ſnare for the lives of the innocent, and for the conſciences of the corrupt, is a practice which ſtill prevails in the adminiſtration of Government, and is ſtill ſupported by the wiſdom of the bench, as a lawful, a laudable, and a neceſſary expedient to obtain juſtice on public delinquents (76)."

(76) Hiſtory of England, vol. vii. p. 283—289.

To return to Sir John Dalrymple: that hiſtorian, in ſome other reſpects, bears very hard upon the memory of Lord Shafteſbury, and not always, in our opinion, with ſufficient reaſon. In his account of the Earl's death, he ſays, on the authority of a letter written from Holland, that he was full of ſuſpicions and fears; that he would not ſleep, except in his cloaths, that he might be ready to ſtart up; and that the paſſions which agitated him muſt have made a ſtrong impreſſion upon thoſe who ſaw him; for they imagined, that, even when he ſlept, he kept his eyes open (77). Sir John, however, has afterwards acknowledged, that he laid an undue ſtreſs upon this letter; and that if he had known the character of the writer, (one Maſſal) to have been ſo bad as he ſince found it to have been, he certainly ſhould not have given credit to any thing ſaid by him (78).

(78) Memoirs, &c. vol. ii. Appendix to the Review of Events, p. 325.

Mrs. Macaulay Graham in ſeveral reſpects follows Sir John Dalrymple, in the accounts ſhe occaſionally gives of Lord Shafteſbury's conduct; though in others ſhe differs from that hiſtorian. One inſtance to this purpoſe we have already ſeen. Another occurs in her repreſentation of the motives by which the Earl was actuated in quitting the ſervice of King Charles the Second; and as ſhe has hence taken occaſion to enter pretty largely into a deſcription of her views of his Lordſhip's character, we ſhall tranſcribe the paſſage.

"At this period of time, ſays ſhe, the Earl of Shafteſbury's conduct is ſo myſterious, that it has given riſe to various conjectures, which appear almoſt equally improbable and groundleſs. It has been repreſented by ſome writers, that he was diſguſted by the King's timidity, and was determined to abandon the ſervice of a Prince who had not the reſolution to carry any hazardous enterprize into execution; by others, that he was offended with the not having his irregular writs ſupported by the royal authority; and ſome of the royaliſts carry their prejudices ſo far as to aſſert, that he had conceived a hatred to the royal brothers, and entered into the intrigues of the court, with the intention of betraying its councils, of expoſing it to the reſentment of the injured public, and thus laying the foundation of ſuch jealouſies between the King and his people, as might end in the change of government, or in renewing thoſe civil diſtractions which

"The aſſertion, that Shafteſbury was diſguſted with the King's timidity, is, I think, contradicted by plain matters of fact; which ſhew that his Majeſty kept firm to his purpoſe of ſubduing the refractory ſpirit of Parliament, till after the period when Shafteſbury, by a bold and unexpected ſtroke of policy, threw off the odium he had incurred from his intrigues with the court, and ſecured his perſonal ſafety by a timely oppoſition to thoſe meaſures which he had approved in the cabinet. That Shafteſbury ſhould take any great offence at the want of ſupport to his irregular writs, is not very likely; becauſe the King had, as far as lay in his power, exculpated his Miniſter, by declaring to the Parliament that they were iſſued in obedience to his command; and the laſt aſſertion ſtands on no grounds of probability, ſince it is plain, that the Earl had not imbibed any of thoſe republican prejudices which war againſt a tranquil ſubmiſſion to the government of an individual, or any of thoſe fixed notions in religious matters which could tend to the making him uneaſy under the legal eſtabliſhment. It was from the provocation of a perſonal diſguſt only, that he firſt left the royal party. He had been patronized by Cromwell, and was a firm ſupporter of his uſurpation: he was active in the introducing monarchy again into the kingdom; was raiſed by the reigning family to the dignity of a Peer; and his ſervices, as had been thoſe of many of the warm royaliſts, were not forgotten: on theſe reaſons he could have no provocations adequate to the contracting ſuch a deep reſentment againſt the royal brothers, as ſhould engage him in ſuch dark and dangerous projects of revenge.

"It appears from the whole tenour of Shafteſbury's conduct, that he was a turbulent and an ambitious man; that he prized his perſonal power and intereſt ſuperior to any of thoſe objects which affect the general happineſs; but he was incapable of that mean avarice which ſubjects men to criminal and diſhonourable actions, on the lucre of pecuniary gain, and was the only individual of the Cabal who refuſed the accepting a bribe from the French King. As the Earl of Shafteſbury's abilities were great, his expectations were ſanguine; and in all probability he entered into the treaty with France, in the hopes, by ſuch a compliance with the King's favourite project, to direct the counſels of the cabinet, and become the ſole Miniſter.

"The whimſical and abſurd deſign of altering the religion of the country, the folly and extravagance of which Shafteſbury's underſtanding would immediately have pointed out, he was an entire ſtranger to: the ſcheme of ſubduing Holland, and lulling the ſuſpicions of the nation aſleep, on the King's growing greatneſs, by national acquiſitions, though highly criminal, did not in ſpeculation appear impracticable; and the authority of the Prince is never terrible to an ambitious Miniſter, who is flattered with the idea that he ſhall be able to render it perſonal to himſelf.

"On this view of the ſubject, Shafteſbury engaged in the attempt of ſubverting the conſtitution of his country, with all that daring ſpirit of enterprize which is peculiar to men who are ſenſible of the ſuperiority of their genius; and he was undoubtedly encouraged in the undertaking by the divided ſtate of the nation; the perſecution under which the Non-Conformiſts groaned, which would readily incline them to ſupport that power which offered them protection; the important conceſſions made to the prerogative; the compliant, if not corrupt, conduct of the Parliament; and that general ſpirit of ſubmiſſion which poſſeſſed the whole nation.

"The very unexpected ill ſucceſs of the war, which occaſioned the neceſſity of applying to the Parliament before the progreſs of power was brought to a ſufficient maturity, the Duke's injudicious declaration of his religion, which explained to the whole nation the meaning of that myſterious conduct in Government which had puzzled the politicians, and, in all probability, diſcovered to Shafteſbury the ſecret intentions of the treaty, gave a very different aſpect to affairs than what the firſt appearances had carried; and in addition to theſe reaſons for altering the plan of his conduct, the Earl of Shafteſbury found himſelf engaged in the moſt hazardous enterprize, with men whoſe abilities were inferior to his own, who were envious of each other's intereſt with the King, who were not united by any tie of mutual confidence, who were quarrelling among themſelves, and who had all more the ear of the Sovereign than the Chancellor, who had the mortification to find himſelf not equal in royal favour with the rake Buckingham, the impetuous bigot Clifford, or that dull, yet profligate tool of power, Lauderdale. Theſe were undoubtedly ſufficient reaſons for the Earl of Shafteſbury to take ſhelter under the ſhield of popularity, from thoſe evils which an inferior underſtanding could eaſily foreſee. By his not carrying his courtſhip to the popular party ſo far as to part with his high office, it appears that he intended, either by favour or fear, to preſerve, if poſſible, his place in the Adminiſtration, and to direct his future conduct on the principles of preferment, or fierce oppoſition, as times and incidents ſhould adviſe (79)."

(79) Hiſtory of England, vol. vi. p. 410—414.

In the relation of the Earl of Shafteſbury's death, Mrs. Macaulay Graham has inadvertently been led to copy Sir John Dalrymple's miſtaken account of that tranſaction; and ſhe has accompanied her narration with a reflection on his Lordſhip, which we muſt regard as more ſevere than juſt. "His furious "temper," ſays ſhe, "united to his great capacity, "had done the cauſe of liberty and the friends of the "conſtitution ſo much miſchief, that he may juſtly "be ſaid to be the author of that ſhort-lived, though "ruinous power of the royal brothers, which proved "ſo fatal to the moſt illuſtrious characters of the age: "an eminent proof that the love of action, ſo inſeparable to exalted virtue, is a very miſchievous "quality when it is not governed by benevolence "and diſcretion; and that when the mind is left a "prey to the tyranny of unruly paſſions, the extent "of mental abilities and the vigour of imagination, "by exalting our deſires, and enlarging our power "of committing evil, and attracting the envy of "mankind, becomes a real misfortune, and ſerves "only to render us more diſtinguiſhed, though leſs "pitied objects of wretchedneſs (80)." A little after, our female hiſtorian expreſſes herſelf with greater candour, and, in our opinion, with greater truth. "It is alſo proper," ſhe ſays, "to obſerve, "conſidering the manner in which the Earl's cha"racter has been blackened, and the many faults "which it is neceſſary for an hiſtorian to have ob"ſerved in his conduct, that whilſt he poſſeſſed the "high office of Chancellor, his decrees were equally "remarkable for juſtice and integrity; and as he "was the only man among the Cabal who had a "ſufficient ſenſe of honour to withſtand the corrup"tions of French bribery, even when countenanced "by the example, and encouraged by the permiſ"ſion of his Sovereign, it may juſtly be inferred, "that the exceptionable and vicious part of his con"duct, as a Miniſter and Patriot, neither lay in the "baſeneſs of his heart, or the defect of his judgment; "and that the keen and galling paſſions of ambition "and revenge, were the great corruptors of a noble "nature (81)."

Mr. Macpherſon's character of the Earl of Shafteſbury, whether ſtrictly juſt or not, muſt be allowed to be drawn with a maſterly hand. It occurs in the account which that hiſtorian gives of the Cabal. "The Lord Aſhley," ſays he, "whoſe name ſtands "fourth in the Committee, was firſt in abilities and "extraordinary talents. Bound by no principle, "and reſtrained by no ties, his uncommon parts "having room to play, appeared in their utmoſt "force to the world. Bold and intrepid in his "counſels, yet full of addreſs in his manner, he could mory, came uninvited, and accompanied it to Winborne St. Giles's, where he was interred with his anceſtors (n); and, in 1732, a noble monument, with a large inſcription to his honour,

" execute with confidence, whatever he had planned " with art. Naturally reſtleſs in his temper, he loved " trouble from its amuſement, and though ambi- " tious, was fond of confuſion, more as a field of " action, than as the means of acquiring power. His " knowledge of human nature was very extenſive. " He was acquainted with the tempers of men, and " commanded them through the channel of their " ruling paſſions. Without the reputation of con- " ſtancy, he gained the confidence of parties through " their opinion of his talents; and though he de- " ſerted meaſures frequently, he never betrayed his " friends. He was an eloquent ſpeaker; but more " ſubtle in his argument, than ſolid in his judgment; " indefatigable in buſineſs, but verſatile and change- " able in his ſchemes. Meaſuring the rules of policy " by his own variable paſſions, he was attached to no " political principle, to no particular ſyſtem of go- " vernment. Now a republican, now all for mo- " narchy; to-day a ſupporter of liberty, to-morrow " the ſlave of abſolute power: and thus, though re- " gularly under the dominion of his inſatiable de- " ſires, he ſeemed always inconſiſtent with himſelf. " During the firſt years of Charles, the attachment " of the nation to their Sovereign deprived him of a " field for exerting his abilities, which were only " calculated to ſhine in times of tumult and confu- " ſion. He continued in office, more through the " influence of the Earl of Southampton, whoſe niece " he had married, than from any opinion of his po- " litical conſequence. When Buckingham acquired " influence, he attached himſelf to his counſels; and " this near approach to Charles, was the means of " diſcovering to him talents, which he deemed ſuit- " able for executing his ſchemes (82)."

(82) Hiſtory of Great Britain, vol. i. p. 134, 135.

Of all the writers that have characteriſed the Earl of Shafteſbury, Mr. Horace Walpole is the moſt ſevere. This Gentleman, after his account of the Earl of Rocheſter, thus introduces the ſubject of the preſent article. " As Lord Rocheſter was immerſed " only in the vices of that reign, his was an innocent " character compared to thoſe who were plunged in " its crimes. A great weight of the latter fell to the " ſhare of the Lord in queſtion, who had canted " tyranny under Cromwell, practiſed it under " Charles the Second, and who diſgraced the cauſe " of liberty by being the buſieſt inſtrument for it, " when every other party had rejected him. It was " the weakeſt vanity in him to brag that Cromwell " would have made him King: the beſt he could " hope for was not to be believed; if true, it only " proved that Cromwell took him for a fool. That " he ſhould have acted in the trials of the Regicides " was but agreeable to his character—or to his want " of it. Let us haſten to his works: he was rather a " copious writer for faction than an author; for in no " light can one imagine that he wiſhed to be re- " membered." Mr. Walpole, after giving a liſt of the Earl's writings, which conſiſt chiefly of ſpeeches made in Parliament, concludes as follows. " One " cannot but obſerve with concern what I have be- " fore remarked, that writing the life of a man is " too apt to inſtill partiality for the ſubject. The " hiſtory of Lord Shafteſbury in the Biographia is " almoſt a panegyric; whereas a bon-mot of the Earl " himſelf was his trueſt character. Charles the " ſecond ſaid to him one day; " Shafteſbury, I be- " lieve thou art the wickedeſt fellow in my domi- " nions." He bowed, and replied, " Of a ſubject, " Sir, I believe I am (83)."

Such is the account which Mr. Walpole has given of the Earl of Shafteſbury; and it will eaſily be imagined, that we have not inſerted it by way of approbation, but of cenſure. Nor could even a ſevere cenſure of it be imputed either to a want of juſtice or of candour. Mr. Walpole, who is ſo exquiſite a judge of painting, ought to have underſtood better the drawing of a moral picture, the delineation of a character. In his repreſentation, the Earl appears not only deſtitute of virtue, but of ability: and yet his Lordſhip's bittereſt enemies have acknowledged, that his talents were of the firſt order. They have equally acknowledged, that he never betrayed his friends, and that he ſtood firm againſt the allurements of bribery. As to the ſtory of his bragging that Cromwell would have made him King, let thoſe believe it, who are capable of giving credit to all the partial and prejudiced anecdotes, which, upon very doubtful authority, have been recorded to his diſadvantage.

Extremely different is the treatment which the Earl of Shafteſbury has received from the judicious Rapin. That hiſtorian, while he relates the actions of the Earl with fidelity, whether favourable or unfavourable to his memory, has accompanied his narration with reflections which are equally the dictates of truth and of candour. Upon occaſion of his Lordſhip's quitting the ſervice of the court, and becoming the leader of the oppoſition, M. Rapin has made the following remarks.

" The Earl of Shafteſbury from this time was always in the head of the country party, and cauſed the King to undergo great mortifications, as will hereafter appear. But I muſt give here a very material caution to thoſe who read father Orleans's hiſtory, or ſuch Engliſh or foreign authors as eſpouſe the King's cauſe. All theſe writers paint the Earl of Shafteſbury in very black colours. He was, according to them, the greateſt villain that ever lived; his wickedneſs was anſwerable to the extent of his genius, and the depth of his penetration. He was perpetually contriving how to torment the King and Duke of York, or rather to ruin them irrecoverably. He was not only the head but the ſoul, of his party, by which they were actuated. In ſhort, every thing tranſacted afterwards by the Parliament againſt the King, is ſolely imputed to him, and it is artfully inſinuated, that, had it not been for ſuch an agent, the nation would have remained in tranquility, and the Parliament, content with the King's favourable anſwers, and gracious promiſes, would have been quiet, and attempted nothing againſt the court. Thus, according to theſe writers, all the meaſures and precautions taken afterwards by the Parliament againſt the deſigns of the court, were entirely owing to Shafteſbury's malice and revenge. It is eaſy to perceive, that their deſign is to cauſe to vaniſh the grounds of the Parliament's fear and complaint of the conduct of the court, by inſinuating, that theſe complaints were frivolous, and the effects of Shafteſbury's vengeance, who, they ſay, directed both Houſes of Parliament, or rather had them entirely at command. For my part, I am no way concerned to vindicate the Earl of Shafteſbury's honour, but believe myſelf obliged to remark, for the more eaſy diſcovery of the truth, that the project of the Cabal to render the King abſolute, and introduce Popery, is of unqueſtionable certainty. The authors juſt mentioned, ſcruple not to own it, and ſhould they deny it, the thing would not be leſs true. Conſequently the Parliament coming to a full and exact knowledge of this deſign, which was only ſuſpected before, had all the reaſon in the world for their fear and caution againſt the King and his Miniſters. This being granted, let the Earl of Shafteſbury have been a villain, or an honeſt man; let him have betrayed the King's ſecrets, and acted only through a ſpirit of revenge; let his fear of the Parliament be the ſole motive of his engaging in the country party againſt the King; or let him have acted from a principle of honour and duty, in order to ſave the Church and State, the thing itſelf remains the ſame. The good or bad qualities of the Earl of Shafteſbury did not cauſe the Parliament to have more or leſs reaſon to fear the deſigns of the King and his Miniſters. If they were prejudicial to religion and the ſtate, as cannot be denied, the Parliament had reaſon to take the beſt meaſures to prevent them. Why therefore are theſe meaſures, theſe precautions, aſcribed to Shafteſbury's malice and artifices, ſince there was another and more natural cauſe. Before the Earl of Shafteſbury appeared in the party contrary to the court, the Parlia-honour, was erected by his worthy deſcendant, the late Earl of Shafteſbury (o). His Lordſhip married three wives; the firſt, Margaret, daughter to Thomas Lord Coventry, by whom he had no iſſue; ſecondly, Frances, daughter to David Earl of Exeter, by whom he had

(o) Collins's Peerage, vol. ii. p. 383.

Parliament had begun to take theſe precautions, though the court's deſigns were yet but ſuſpected: they were better informed by the Earl of Shafteſbury: why therefore is it ſuppoſed, that after this information, they ſuddenly relinquiſh their former motives, and act only with a view to ſerve as inſtruments of Shafteſbury's revenge? This is not even probable, and yet the authors abovementioned loſe no opportunity of reproaching the Earl of Shafteſbury, and aſcribing ſolely to him all the mortifications the King afterwards received. Beſides the reader's inſtruction, my deſign, in what I have ſaid, is to hinder ſuch as have read, or ſhall read the other hiſtorians, from thinking it ſtrange that I do not every moment exclaim againſt the Earl of Shafteſbury's conduct, as if he were the ſole author of what was done againſt the King; and that I content myſelf with ſaying in a word, this Lord uſed all his intereſt and credit to break the meaſures of the King and his Miniſters (84)."

(84) Hiſt. of Eng. vol. xi. p. 393—395. fourth ed. 8vo.

M. Rapin had before obſerved, that Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper was one of the greateſt geniuſes England had produced for many years; and that this is the teſtimony equally given him by friends and enemies (85).

(85) Ibid. p. 337.

In the Britiſh Biography, the writer of the article concerning his Lordſhip has ſummed up his character in a few words, and with exemplary candour. "The "Earl of Shafteſbury," ſays the Biographer, "was a "man of very great abilities, profoundly ſkilled in "the laws and conſtitution of his country, and one of "the greateſt Stateſmen and moſt accompliſhed Ora"tors of the age in which he lived. He has been "much cenſured for his ambition, and the mutabi"lity of his conduct; and it muſt be confeſſed that "his behaviour, when in power, was, in many in"ſtances, very exceptionable; though it may, per"haps, be doubted, whether there is ſufficient foun"dation for the ſeverity with which he has been "treated by ſome ingenious writers (86)."

(86) Britiſh Biog. vol. vi. p. 169.

We ſhall add the portrait that has been drawn of our famous Stateſman by the late Mr. Granger. "The great talents of the Earl of Shafteſbury, and "his exact knowledge of men and things, contri"buted to render him one of the firſt characters of "his age. But the violence of his paſſions, and the "flexibility of his principles, prompted him to act "very different, and even contrary parts. This was "in ſome meaſure owing to the changes in the times "in which he lived; but is more to be attributed to "the mutability of his character, which ever varied "with the intereſts of his ambition. When we con"ſider him as ſitting in the higheſt tribunal of the "kingdom, explaining and correcting the laws, de"tecting fraud, and exerting all the powers of his "eloquence on the ſide of juſtice; we admire the "able Lawyer, the commanding Orator, and the "upright Judge. But when he enters into all the "iniquitous meaſures of the Cabal, when he proſti"tutes his eloquence to enſlave his country, and be"comes the factious leader and the popular incen"diary; we regard him with an equal mixture of "horror and regret (87)." It may here be remarked, that it is now deciſively known, that Lord Shafteſbury did not enter into all the iniquitous meaſures of the Cabal: nor is it true that he proſtituted his eloquence to enſlave his country. Whatever may be thought of one or two of his ſpeeches, which he delivered officially, when Lord Chancellor, it is certain that his abilities as an Orator were uſually exerted in the cauſe of liberty, and to preſerve the kingdom from becoming ſubject to civil tyranny and religious perſecution.

(87) Biog. Hiſt. of Eng. vol. iii. P. 362, 363. ſecond edition.

Theſe are the various repreſentations which have been given of the Earl of Shafteſbury's character; and moſt of them, we ſee, are highly to his diſadvantage. Sir John Dalrymple obſerves, that every thing has been written againſt him, and nothing for him (88). This is not ſtrictly true, as is evident from Collins's Peerage, and the paſſages which we have quoted from Rapin and the Britiſh Biography. There were, likewiſe, one or two accounts of him, publiſhed ſoon after his death, which were entirely of a panegyrical nature. Theſe we have read, but do not think them worthy of particular notice, as they are rather party publications than juſt pieces of Biographical compoſition. Mr. Locke's account of our eminent Stateſman, though ſhort, and very imperfect, is a ſufficient teſtimony of the high opinion which that great Philoſopher entertained of his Lordſhip.

(88) Memoirs, &c. vol. ii. Appendix to the Review of Events, P. 325.

A complete life of the Earl of Shafteſbury, by which we mean a full and particular narrative of his political conduct, and which would, in fact, comprehend the principal events of his time, is ſtill a deſideratum in the hiſtorical literature of this country: nor have the noble family been unmindful of the ſubject. His Lordſhip's deſcendants have wiſhed to reſcue their anceſtor from the obloquy with which his memory has been loaded, and to ſet his actions in a juſt light; but the deſign has not yet been fully carried into execution. The Earl had himſelf written a hiſtory of his own times, which, when he was obliged to flee to Holland, he entruſted to the care of Mr. Locke. Unfortunately for the public, when Algernon Sidney was infamouſly put to death, on a charge of treaſon grounded upon papers which were found in his cloſet, Mr. Locke, intimidated with the apprehenſion of a like proſecution, committed Lord Shafteſbury's manuſcript to the flames. The profeſſed deſign of the work was to diſplay to the world the principles and motives by which his enemies had been actuated, and to give a true and impartial account of his own conduct. Whatever degree of ſelf-love may be ſuppoſed, in certain caſes, to have operated upon his Lordſhip's mind, it will be allowed, that, in conſequence of his genius, his knowledge, the eminent ſtations he occupied, and his acceſs to the ſources of information, he muſt have been capable of throwing great light on the tranſactions of the time. The hiſtory began with the Reformation, and traced the courſe of events down to the Civil War, with a view of pointing out the defects of the Conſtitution, and of ſtating what ought farther to be done, in order to ſtrengthen and confirm the liberties of the people. It is underſtood that the Earl was particularly excellent in his characters. Some of theſe, in looſe papers, are ſtill in the poſſeſſion of the family. The largeſt fragment now remaining is in the early part of the work, where the author has drawn the characters of the principal Gentlemen who flouriſhed in the county of Dorſet, at the time in which he arrived to man's eſtate. From this fragment, a curious extract, ſome years ſince, made its way to the public. We mean the account of the Hon. William Haſtings, of Woodlands in Dorſetſhire, by his quality ſon, brother, and uncle to the Earls of Huntingdon; which account is ſaid to have firſt appeared in Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa, and has ſince been publiſhed in the Connoiſſeur, and the Britiſh Biography (89). Were it not to be ſeen in books of eaſy acceſs, we ſhould here have inſerted it with pleaſure. It affords a ſtriking example of Lord Shafteſbury's talent in characteriſtic compoſition; and Mr. Walpole, who in no other reſpect has ſpoken favourably of his Lordſhip, has obſerved, that it is a curious and well drawn portrait of our ancient Engliſh gentry (90).

(89) Connoiſſeur, vol. iii. p. 75—79. N° 81. Britiſh Biography, vol. vi. p. 170, 171. I have examined the whole of Evans's edition of Peck's Deſiderata Curioſa; without finding there the character of William Haſtings.

(90) Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 55, 56.

For the loſs which was occaſioned by Mr. Locke's timidity or prudence, he was ſolicitous to make ſome degree of reparation. Accordingly, he formed an intention of writing, at large, the hiſtory of his noble friend; and if he had accompliſhed his intention, his work would undoubtedly have been a very valuable preſent to the public. It muſt, therefore, be regretted, that he was prevented from proceeding any farther in the completion of his deſign than collecting the few materials which occur in his letter to a perſon of quality.

But though Lord Shafteſbury's own memoirs were thus had Anthony his ſon and heir (p); and thirdly, Margaret, daughter of William Lord Spencer, by whom he left no iſſue (q). Anthony, his only ſon and ſucceſſor, was born on the 16th of January, 1651, and married Dorothy, daughter to John Earl of Rutland, by whom he had two ſons, Anthony and Maurice, and four daughters, Lady Frances, married to (p) Dugdale's Baronage, vol. ii. p. 482; where he is entirely miſtaken as to his Lordſhip's having iſſue by his laſt wife, and not by his ſecond.

(q) This appears from the inſcription upon his monument.

thus unfortunately deſtroyed, and Mr. Locke failed of executing his purpoſe, there was another Biographer, who wrote a Life of the Earl, ſoon after his deceaſe. This was Thomas Stringer, Eſq; of Ivy Church, near Saliſbury, a Gentleman of great integrity and excellent character; who had held, we believe, under his Lordſhip, when High-Chancellor of England, the office of Clerk of the preſentations; and who was much eſteemed by ſome of the principal perſons of the age. With Mr. Locke in particular, he maintained an intimate friendſhip to the time of his death, which happened in 1702. Mr. Stringer's account has been the ground-work on which the narrative intended for the public eye, by the noble family, has been built. It contained a valuable hiſtory of the Earl's life; but was probably much inferior in compoſition to what Mr. Locke's would have been; and indeed, in its original form, it was too imperfect for publication. Sometime about the year 1732, this manuſcript, together with the reſt of the Shafteſbury papers, was put into the hands of Mr. Benjamin Martyn, a Gentleman who was then known in the literary world, in conſequence of having written a tragedy, entitled Timoleon, which had been acted with ſucceſs at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane. Mr. Martyn made Mr. Stringer's manuſcript the baſis of his own work, which he enriched with ſuch ſpeeches of the Earl as are yet remaining, and with ſeveral particulars drawn from ſome looſe papers left by his Lordſhip. He availed himſelf, likewiſe, of other means of information, which more recent publications had afforded; and prefixed to the whole an introduction of conſiderable length, wherein he paſſed very high encomiums on our great Stateſman, and ſtrengthened them by the teſtimonies of Mr. Locke and Monſ. Le Clerc. He added, alſo, ſtrictures on L'Eſtrange, Sir William Temple, Biſhop Burnet, and others, who had written to his Lordſhip's diſadvantage. One anecdote, which we well remember, it cannot but be agreeable to the public and to the noble family to ſee related. It is well known with what ſeverity the Earl of Shafteſbury's character is treated by Dryden, in his Abſalom and Achitophel. Nevertheleſs, ſoon after that fine ſatire appeared, his Lordſhip, having the nomination of a Scholar, as Governor of the Charter-Houſe, gave it to one of the Poet's ſons, without any ſolicitation on the part of the father, or of any other perſon. This act of generoſity had ſuch an effect upon Dryden, that, to teſtify his gratitude, he added, in the ſecond edition of the poem, the four following lines, in celebration of the Earl's conduct as Lord Chancellor.

In Iſrael's court ne'er ſat an Abethdin
With more diſcerning eyes, or hands more clean,
Unbrib'd, unſought, the wretched to redreſs,
Swift of diſpatch, and eaſy of acceſs.

When King Charles the Second read theſe lines, he told Dryden that he had ſpoiled by them all which he had before ſaid of Shafteſbury.

Notwithſtanding the pains that had been taken by Mr. Martyn, the late Earl of Shafteſbury did not think the work ſufficiently finiſhed for publication; and, therefore, ſomewhat more than twenty years ago, he put it into the hands of his friend, Dr. Gregory Sharpe, Maſter of the Temple. All, however, that Dr. Sharpe performed, was to recommend it to the care of a Gentleman ſtill living, who is diſtinguiſhed for his accurate acquaintance with the hiſtory of England; and for the aſtoniſhing preciſion and extent of his memory with reſpect to the minuteſt circumſtances of the facts, dates, and perſons which occur in the whole courſe of that hiſtory. This Gentleman examined Mr. Martyn's manuſcript with attention, pointed out its errors, made references, and ſuggeſted a number of inſtances in which it might be improved, but did not proceed much farther in the undertaking. At length, the work was conſigned to another perſon, who ſpent conſiderable labour upon it, enlarged it by a variety of additions, and had it in contemplation to avail himſelf of every degree of information which might render it a correct hiſtory of the time, as well as a narrative of the Life of Lord Shafteſbury. The reaſons (not unfriendly on either ſide) which prevented the perſon now mentioned from completing his deſign, and occaſioned him to return the papers to the noble family, are not of ſufficient conſequence to be here related. Whether the work is likely ſoon to appear, it is not in our power to aſcertain. In the mean while, it is a neceſſary act of juſtice to the memory of the firſt Earl of Shafteſbury, and cannot but be agreeable to every one of his deſcendants, and to our readers in general, to mention a few of the things which may be expected to be elucidated, whenever the account of him ſhall be publiſhed.

In the twenty-firſt volume of the Parliamentary hiſtory, there is a long ſpeech againſt Richard Cromwell's Houſe of Lords, concerning which the writers of that hiſtory ſay, that they do not warrant the authenticneſs of it, becauſe they think it too bold for the time. They add, "but that it is as old, is clear "from all appearances." Indeed, ſoon after it is ſaid to have been delivered, it was publiſhed under the title of "A ſeaſonable Speech, made by a Wor-"thy Member of Parliament in the Houſe of Com-"mons, concerning the other Houſe." According to the Shafteſbury papers, the perſon by whom it was actually ſpoken was Sir Anthony-Aſhley Cooper; and it reflects great credit on his ſpirit, courage, and eloquence. Were it not too long, we ſhould gladly have inſerted it from the Parliamentary Hiſtory (91).

(91) Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. xxi. p. 297—310. ſecond edit.

It is well known that few things have been deemed more cenſurable in the Earl of Clarendon's conduct, than the part he took with regard to the ſale of Dunkirk. This tranſaction Lord Aſhley ſtrenuouſly oppoſed; and he was equally hoſtile to that Stateſman's narrow principles and policy reſpecting the Diſſenters. The penalties of the Act of Uniformity, and the ſeverities of the Five Mile Act were regarded by him with the greateſt abhorrence, and he contended againſt them to the utmoſt of his power.

Another object diſplayed in the unpubliſhed Life of Lord Shafteſbury, is his zeal for the promotion of manufactures, trade, and commerce. This object he was particularly led to by his ſituation as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he employed himſelf upon it with unremitting attention and ardour. The numerous papers which are now in the poſſeſſion of the family, relative to matters of a commercial nature, are full proofs of what is here aſſerted.

A farther circumſtance, mentioned and enlarged upon to the credit of Lord Aſhley, is his having prevented the King, in 1666, from going to war with the Hamburghers, on account of an attack which four Dutch men of war had made on ſome Engliſh merchant ſhips that lay in the Elbe. The city of Hamburgh was in no degree blameable on this occaſion. It was, however, with difficulty that Lord Aſhley could diſſuade his Majeſty from proceeding to extremities. No account of this tranſaction has, we believe, made its way into any of our general hiſtories.

After the Earl of Clarendon's diſgrace, ſome popular meaſures were, for a ſhort time, purſued by Government. The triple alliance was formed againſt the encroaching power of France; new regulations were iſſued with regard to the mode of conducting public buſineſs; ſeveral rules and ordinances were eſtabliſhed and ratified, reſpecting navigation; a declaration was made by the King, to Parliament, in favour of Proteſtant Diſſenters; and an order appeared in the Gazette, calculated to ſuppreſs, as much as poſſible, the practice of duelling. In theſe and other inſtances, the narrative endeavours to ſhew, that Lord Aſhley was the principal Agent, and not Sir Orlando Bridgeman; to Francis Stonehouſe of Hungerford Park, in the county of Berks, Eſq; Lady Elizabeth, wife of James Harris, of Saliſbury, Eſq; Lady Dorothy, who was eſpouſed to Edward Hooper, of Hern-court in the county of Southampton, Eſq; and Lady Gertrude, who died unmarried, Bridgeman; who, though he was made Lord Keeper on the diſmiſſion of the Earl of Clarendon, did not ſucceed that Nobleman in his political power and intereſt. Without preſuming to determine this point, one thing is certain, and will deciſively be proved by the work in queſtion, that, at the period we are ſpeaking of, Lord Aſhley addreſſed a memorial to the King, which contained excellent advice with relation to the management of public affairs.

One of the moſt important parts of the Earl of Shafteſbury's life was whilſt he was a Member of the CABAL; and, at this time, his conduct, with no ſmall appearance of juſtice, has almoſt univerſally been conſidered as very liable to cenſure. The four things principally brought as charges againſt him, are the ſhutting up of the Exchequer; the Declaration of Indulgence; the iſſuing of Writs for vacant Boroughs, during the Receſs of Parliament; and the Speech againſt the Dutch, in which was introduced, "Delenda eſt Carthago." That his Lordſhip was the perſon who gave or ſuggeſted the advice for ſhutting up the Exchequer, has been aſſerted by ſeveral writers, in conſequence of a paſſage in Biſhop Burnet, and an idle ſtory related by Echard. We ſay an idle ſtory related by Echard; for nothing can be more certain than that it is totally without foundation. So far was Lord Aſhley from adviſing the meaſure in queſtion, or even concurring in it, that it was directly oppoſed by him; and he contended ſo powerfully againſt it, that the deſign was at firſt laid aſide. When it was renewed, he drew up his reaſons in writing againſt it, and left them with the King. The paper containing theſe reaſons, together with a letter of his Lordſhip to a friend, in which he juſtifies himſelf againſt the charge of having ſupported the ſcheme, will be found in the family narrative.

With reſpect to the Declaration of Indulgence, the advice was given by Sir Thomas Clifford, whoſe principal view in it was to favour the Papiſts; and, for the ſame cauſe, the meaſure was readily adopted by his Majeſty. Lord Aſhley, however, cloſed in with it, from his ardent zeal for Toleration, and his regard for the Proteſtant Diſſenters. His reaſons for this part of his conduct are ſpecified in the work. He ſeems to have entertained a notion, which we have no intention of vindicating, that, for the ſake of exerciſing mercy, and in matters of mere penalty, the King might exerciſe a diſpenſing power. Biſhop Burnet, with an inaccuracy not uncommon in him, ſpeaking of the Declaration, ſays, the Lord Keeper Bridgeman refuſed to put the Seal to it, as judging it to be contrary to law; and that on this account he was diſmiſſed, and the Earl of Shafteſbury made Lord Chancellor (92). Now the fact is, that Sir Orlando Bridgeman did put the Seal to the Declaration, and that Shafteſbury was not appointed Lord Chancellor till eight months after that event.

(92) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own Time, vol. i. p. 429, 430. third edit.

Our great Stateman's conduct in iſſuing writs, before the meeting of Parliament, for the election of Members, in the room of thoſe who were deceaſed, has often, and we do not ſay unjuſtly, been condemned. Burnet ſays, "that Lord Shafteſbury reſolved "to recommend himſelf to the confidence of the "court by a new ſtrain, never before thought of "(93):" but this is an aſſertion which is grounded on a total ignorance of the ſubject. That in the three preceding reigns of Queen Elizabeth, King James the Firſt, and King Charles the Firſt, ſeveral writs had been iſſued out, for electing Members, during the prorogation of Parliament, is clearly evinced in the work we are ſpeaking of; and the reaſons are aſſigned, why the Earl choſe to obey the King's commands. Though we are far from believing that any thing can fully juſtify his compliance in this reſpect, it may, nevertheleſs, be remarked, that his memory ought not to be loaded with aggravations which are not founded in truth.

(93) Ibid. p. 430.

The laſt of the four accuſations urged againſt him, as one of the Cabal, is his famous Speech, delivered in Parliament, on the fourth of February, 1672-3, on the Dutch war. Even the candid Rapin obſerves, that the Earl of Shafteſbury muſt have had a forehead of braſs to pronounce ſuch a ſpeech before ſo auguſt an aſſembly (94). In the family narrative, great pains are taken to ſhew, that the Earl ſpoke only officially; that this was the conſtant mode in that reign; that the ſpeech he himſelf had prepared was entirely changed by the council; that the offenſive words in particular, "Delenda eſt Carthago," were there inſerted; and that he was obliged to deliver the ſpeech as it had been framed at the board. Theſe things are maintained with a conſiderable degree of apparent ſtrength; and it is ſufficiently ſhewn, that his Lordſhip was far from being ſatisfied with the taſk which was impoſed upon him. Whether he ought not rather to have given up his office, than thus to have ſubmitted to compliances which were contrary to his inclination and his principles, is another queſtion, which firm integrity will eaſily decide.

(94) Hiſt. of Eng. vol. xi. p. 381. fourth edit.

There are various other inſtances in which the manuſcript ſo often referred to, endeavours to throw light on the Earl of Shafteſbury's character and conduct, and to clear him from the aſperſions with which his name has been blackened. Many circumſtances are, likewiſe, recorded concerning him, which have not yet appeared before the public eye. But not to touch on all the particulars that our memory might furniſh, we ſhall only advert to his reception in Holland, and to the manner of his death, which laſt, as we have already ſeen, has greatly been miſrepreſented. Mrs. Macaulay Graham aſſerts, that in order to ſecure the protection of the States of Holland, he ſolicited the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam to be made one of the Upper Burghers of that city; but had the mortification to ſuſtain a refuſal, through the intrigues of the Engliſh Conſul, who took care to put the Dutch in mind of the part the Earl had formerly taken againſt their Commonwealth. "Thus," adds our female hiſtorian, "did this unfortunate refugee, "once the idol of a numerous party, once the terror "of a government which he hated, and reſpected for "his abilities even by thoſe who were acquainted "with his vices and imperfections, languiſh through "a period of ſix weeks, ſurrounded only by a few "inconſiderable refugees, and without receiving "from the inhabitants of that place where he had "ſought an aſylum, any of the common compli-"ments uſually paid to men in his ſtation (95)." A very different repreſentation of things is given in the narrative that is in the poſſeſſion of the family. From that narrative it will appear, that, when the Earl of Shafteſbury arrived in Holland, he was viſited by ſeveral of the States, and by perſons of the greateſt quality; that the principal men of Amſterdam aſſured him of their protection, and, for this purpoſe, made him a Burgeſs of their city; and that they ſhewed him all the reſpect and honours which were in their power. Indeed, theſe circumſtances are confirmed by the teſtimony of Monſ. Le Clerc, in his Bibliotheque Choiſie, than whom no one could be better informed upon the ſubject. With regard to the manner of the Earl's death, he did not expire, as hath often been repreſented, in the arms of Ferguſon, but in the arms of Mr. Wheelock, one of his Gentlemen; and it is aſſerted, that he maintained, to the laſt, an uncommon patience, reſignation, and fortitude of mind.

(95) Hiſt. of Eng. vol. vii. p. 422.

After the different, and, in various reſpects, contradictory accounts which have been given of Lord Shafteſbury by a number of writers, it may be thought difficult to form a juſt eſtimate of his character. However, as our advantages for coming to a judgment upon this head have been ſuperior to thoſe which were enjoyed by the general run of hiſtorians, we ſhall ſtate our ſentiments concerning him with integrity and impartiality. On his abilities, his eloquence, and the eminent talents he poſſeſſed for unmarried, in 1704. His Lordſhip departing this life on the 10th of November, 1699, was ſucceeded by Anthony his ſon and heir (r), of whom an account will be given in the next article.

gaining an aſcendency over mankind, we need not enlarge; as theſe have already been ſufficiently aſcertained, and are acknowledged by moſt of his enemies. In private life he appears to have had many eſtimable qualities; nor have any proofs been afforded of the profligacy which has ſometimes been aſcribed to him. According to the records of the family, he was very conſtant in his attendance on divine worſhip, and kept a Chaplain in his houſe, whoſe name was Highmore. Dr. Benjamin Whichcot is likewiſe ſaid to have lived much with his Lordſhip, and to have preached before him the greater part of the ſermons that were afterwards printed. The friends of the Earl of Shafteſbury were ardently attached to him; and he numbered among his friends perſons of the moſt reſpectable character. To have enjoyed the good opinion, the regard, and the affection, of ſuch men as Mr. Stringer, Dr. Whichcot, and Mr. Locke, is no mean teſtimony in his favour. As to the Earl's public life, we are of opinion that it was often highly culpable; and that no hiſtory will ever be able to clear him of having occaſionally been guilty of manifeſt inconſiſtencies, and ſubmitted to ſhameful compliances. His bold and daring mind was not ſufficiently reſtrained by ſcruples, when his ambition could be gratified; and perhaps there are inſtances in which the violence of his meaſures may be ſuſpected of having been tarniſhed with the colours of revenge. But however juſtly he may be cenſured for particular parts of his conduct, and whatever ſacrifices he might make to the urgency of ſtrong paſſions, his views appear to have been generally directed to the promotion of the intereſt and freedom of his country. Whilſt we condemn his vehemence in the affair of the Popiſh Plot, we are convinced that, in other reſpects, the actions of the latter period of his life may be juſtified, and that the tyrannical deſigns of King Charles the Second merited the utmoſt warmth of his oppoſition. Upon the whole, there were three points in which, through the uſual tenor of his life, the Earl of Shafteſbury was entitled to applauſe. Theſe were his attention to the protection and advancement of Trade and Commerce; his endeavours to counteract the growing power of France; and his attachment to the cauſe of religious liberty. He wrote an Eſſay on Toleration, ſtill preſerved in the family, which was evidently the ground-work of Mr. Locke's admirable letters on that ſubject. Several of the meaſures propoſed and ſupported by him were preparatory to thoſe that were adopted at the Revolution; and he contributed, by his ardour, to raiſe and animate the ſpirit, which, in the end, produced that illuſtrious event; ſo that, amidſt all his obliquities and faults, he deſerves to be celebrated, as having been no ſmall benefactor to the free Conſtitution of England.] K.

 [COOPER (ANTHONY-ASHLEY), third Earl of Shafteſbury, was born on the 26th of February, 1670-71, at Exeter Houſe in London, which was at that time the town reſidence of his grandfather, concerning whom ſo much has been ſaid in the preceding article. His father was Anthony-Aſhley Cooper, afterwards ſecond Earl of Shafteſbury, and his mother the Lady Dorothy Manners, daughter of John Earl of Rutland (a). Of his father there is ſuch a total ſilence in the hiſtories of the times, and the memorials of the family, that he was probably of a very inſignificant character, or at leaſt, not at all diſtinguiſhed by his mental abilities. Dryden ſpeaks of him with great contempt, in his Abſalom and Achitophel, as an unfeathered two-legged thing, and born a ſhapeleſs lump, like Anarchy (b). If this language had a reference to his external form, it was altogether unjuſt; for it appears from the pictures which remain of him, that in perſon he was remarkably handſome; and it has been imagined that his deceaſe was haſtened by his ſolicitude to remove ſome excreſcence which began rather to diſfigure his countenance. An improper application of remedies was productive of diſeaſes that were fatal to his conſtitution, and ultimately the occaſion of his death (c).

The third Earl of Shafteſbury was deſtined to make a very different figure. Immediately upon his birth, his grandfather conceived ſo tender an affection for him, that he undertook the care of his education; and being ſenſible of the great advantages which would accrue from a good ſhare of literature, he thought that no time could be too early for endeavouring to attain ſuch a neceſſary and deſirable object. That his grandſon, therefore, might be as ſpeedy as poſſible in his literary progreſs, he choſe a method of inſtilling into him, as it were inſenſibly, the ancient languages, by placing a perſon about him, who was ſo thoroughly verſed in the Latin and Greek tongues, as to be able to ſpeak either of them with the greateſt fluency. This perſon was a female, a Mrs. Birch, the daughter of a Schoolmaſter in Oxfordſhire or Berkſhire: and a woman who could execute ſo extraordinary a taſk, deſerves to have her name recorded with honour, among the learned ladies of England. Such was the effect of her inſtructions, that her pupil could read with eaſe both the Latin and Greek languages, when he was only eleven years old. At that age he was ſent by his grandfather to a private ſchool, where he continued till after the Earl's deceaſe. In the end of the ſucceeding ſummer, 1683, he was carried by his father to Wincheſter School, then under the care of Dr. Harris. Here our young Nobleman was very indifferently treated by all excepting the Maſter, being frequently inſulted on his grandfather's account, whoſe memory was extremely odious to the Zealots for deſpotic power. The ill uſuage which he met with at Wincheſter was ſo irkſome to Lord Aſhley, that he prevailed upon his father to remove him from that ſeminary, and to conſent to his deſire of going abroad. Accordingly, he began his travels in 1686 [A], under the care of Mr.

(1) Gen. ubi ſupra, v. P. 179, note

[A] Accordingly, he began his travels in 1686.] Lord Aſhley was accompanied in his tour, by Sir John Cropley, (with whom he continued in friendſhip to the end of his life) and by Mr. Thomas Sclater Bacon. His Lordſhip ſpent a conſiderable time in Italy, where, as is evident from all his writings, he acquired

Mr. Daniel Denoune, a Scotch Gentleman of great ingenuity and integrity, and every way qualified for the employment of a tutor (d). The Biographers of the third Earl of Shafteſbury have generally repreſented him as having been principally under the tuition of Mr. Locke. There can be no doubt but that this great Philoſopher was anxiouſly concerned for the improvement of the grandſon of his intimate friend; and it is highly probable that his ſentiments were conſulted, and his advice followed, with regard to the mode of the young Gentleman's education. But that he ever acted in the capacity of a direct Tutor to him, appears to have been an opinion which hath been taken up without a ſufficient foundation.

After a reſidence of three years abroad, Lord Aſhley returned, in 1689, to England, and was offered a Seat in Parliament for ſome one of the Boroughs in which his family had an intereſt. There were, however, ſeveral reaſons which induced him not to accept of ſuch an offer at this particular time; and what prevailed upon him more ſtrongly than any thing to decline the propoſal, was a reſolution he had formed of applying himſelf entirely to ſtudy, and encreaſing his knowledge with regard to ſubjects of the greateſt importance. In theſe views he happily ſucceeded, and laid a foundation in learning which was accurately extenſive, and truly liberal. After ardently proſecuting his literary purſuits for nearly five years, he was elected, in conſequence of Sir John Trenchard's death, a Burgeſs for Poole in Dorſetſhire. He had not been long in Parliament before an opportunity was afforded him of expreſſing that ſpirit of liberty, which he maintained to the end of his life, and by which his conduct, on all occaſions, was uniformly directed. The fact we refer to, was owing to the bringing in of the Bill for regulating Trials in caſes of High Treaſon. One Part of the Bill in particular, which allows counſel to the priſoner, was regarded by moſt of the friends of liberty as a matter of the laſt importance. For this reaſon Lord Aſhley had prepared a Speech in its behalf, which thoſe to whom he ſhewed it judged to be a very proper one upon the occaſion. But when his Lordſhip ſtood up to ſpeak it in the Houſe of Commons, he was ſo intimidated by the greatneſs of the auditory, that he loſt his memory, and was totally unable to proceed. The Houſe, after giving him a little time for recollection, called loudly for him to go on, which he did in the following terms: "If I, Sir, (addreſſing himſelf to the Speaker) who riſe only to give my opinion on the Bill now depending, am ſo confounded, that I am unable to expreſs the leaſt of what I propoſed to ſay; what muſt the condition of that man be, who, without any aſſiſtance is pleading for his life, and under apprehenſions of being deprived of it?" This ſudden turn of thought pleaſed the Houſe extremely, and is believed to have had a greater effect than any of the other arguments that were urged in favour of the Bill. During the remainder of that Parliament, Lord Aſhley perſevered in the ſame mode of conduct, always zealouſly concurring in every motion that tended to the farther ſecurity of Liberty [B]; and though motions of this kind frequently came from perſons with whom he had no connection in politics, and who belonged to a party of a different denomination, he, nevertheleſs, thought it his duty to ſupport them, whenever he apprehended that the propoſals they made were likely to be of ſervice to the kingdom. With theſe principles and diſpoſitions, it was juſtly to be lamented that the fatigues of attending regularly the buſineſs of the Houſe of Commons, had in a few years ſuch an effect upon his health, the frame of his body not acquired no ſmall degree of knowledge in the polite Arts. What his ſkill was in the art of painting in particular, may be determined by the treatiſe which he compoſed on the judgment of Hercules. It was his endeavour, while abroad, to improve himſelf, as much as poſſible, in every accompliſhment. He did not, therefore, greatly ſeek the company of other Engliſh young Genlemen; and whenever it happened that this could not be avoided, it was obſerved, that his diſcourſe was principally addreſſed to their Tutors, from whom he might either learn ſomething, or at leaſt converſe on ſuch topics as were moſt agreeable to his genius. French was ſpoken by him ſo readily, and with ſo good an accent, that in France he was often taken for a native; and the eaſe and agility he diſplayed in performing the exerciſes in which that nation excelled, contributed to lead them into ſuch an opinion (1).

(1) Gen. Dict. ubi ſupra, vol. ix. p. 179, note [A].

[B] Zealouſly concurring in every motion that tended to the farther ſecurity of liberty.] His zeal in defence of the freedom of the Conſtitution, notwithſtanding the clamours to which he was expoſed, will appear from the following paſſage of a letter of his to Thomas Stringer, Eſq; his grandfather's friend, of whom mention has been made in the life of the firſt Earl of Shafteſbury.

London, February 15, 1695.

"I WILL not trouble you any farther now, nor "indeed have I time. We have got the Bill to be "engroſſed, which lays an incapacity on the elector "(as the late paſſed act does on the elected) in caſe "of corruption, meat, drink, &c. and which obliges "the Knight of the Shire to have 500*l.* a year, or "the inheritance of it, as freehold within the county, "and a Burgeſs 200*l.* a year ſomewhere at leaſt in "England on the ſame terms. You could, I believe, ſcarcely imagine with yourſelf, who theſe "are in the world, or who they are in the Houſe, "who oppoſe this, and all other ſuch Bills as this, "might and main; and who they are that are condemned for flying in the face of government, as "they call it, by being for ſuch things as theſe are, "and preſſing ſuch hard things on the Prerogative "or Court. In ſhort, you would hardly believe that "your poor friend, who now writes to you, has ſentence (and bitter ſentence too) every day paſſed "upon him for going, as you may be ſure he goes, "and ever will go on ſuch occaſions as theſe, whatever party it be, that is in or out at Court, that is, "in poſſeſſion of the places, and afraid of loſing "their daily bread, by not being ſervile enough, or "that are out of places, and think by croſſing the "Court, and ſiding with good and popular things "againſt it, to get into thoſe places of profit and "management. No more. My kind ſervice to "Mrs. Stringer, and my ſervice too to your ſon. "Your ſincere friend, &c.

"A. ASHLEY (2)." (2) Ibid. p. 179, 180, note [C].

being naturally robuſt, that he was obliged to decline coming again into Parliament, after the diſſolution in 1698.

Lord Aſhley being now at liberty to purſue the courſe of life that was moſt agreeable to his inclination, he went directly to Holland, where he ſpent his time in converſation with Monſ. Bayle, Monſ. Le Clerc, and ſeveral other ingenious and learned men who then reſided in that country. The pleaſure and improvement ariſing from an acquaintance with theſe Gentlemen, his Lordſhip found to be ſo great, that he was induced to continue there more than a twelvemonth. Being determined not to be interrupted in what was one of his principal objects in going to Holland, the diligent and effectual proſecution of his literary purſuits, he concealed his name and title, pretending to be only a Student in Phyſic. It was ſolely in that character that he contracted an intimacy with Monſ. Bayle. However, a little before his return to England, being willing to be known to him by his proper appellation, he contrived to have Monſ. Bayle invited to dinner by a friend (e), for the purpoſe of meeting Lord Aſhley. That morning Monſ. Bayle accidentally called upon his Lordſhip, and being preſſed by him to ſtay, anſwered, that he could not by any means do it, becauſe he had an appointment to meet Lord Aſhley, and muſt be punctual to his engagement. The interview at dinner, occaſioned, as may reaſonably be ſuppoſed, no ſmall degree of mirth; and the diſcovery contributed to ſtrengthen the friendſhip that had already been formed, and which was preſerved by an uninterrupted correſpondence to Monſ. Bayle's death. During this time, there was printed at London, in 8*vo*. an imperfect edition of Lord Aſhley's "Inquiry concerning Virtue." It had been ſurreptitiouſly taken from a rough draught, ſketched when he was no more than twenty years of age. His Lordſhip, who was greatly chagrined at this event, immediately bought up the impreſſion before many books were ſold, and ſet about compleating the treatiſe, as it afterwards appeared in the ſecond volume of the Characteriſtics. The perſon by whom he was thus unhandſomely treated was ſpeedily diſcovered to be Mr. John Toland, who, in this tranſaction, repaid with ingratitude a very generous benefactor (f).

Soon after Lord Aſhley's return to England, he became, by the deceaſe of his father, Earl of Shafteſbury. As he was endued with the prudence of paying a proper regard to his own affairs, he was involved in ſuch a multiplicity of buſineſs on coming to the poſſeſſion of his eſtate, that he was prevented from attending the Houſe of Lords, during the firſt Seſſion after he had ſucceeded to the Peerage. Nor did he appear in that Houſe, in the ſecond Seſſion, till his friend the Lord Somers ſent a meſſenger to acquaint him that his preſence was neceſſary, on account of the Partition Treaty, which at that time was under the conſideration of Parliament. This was in February 1700-1. The Earl of Shafteſbury immediately went poſt to London; and though, when Lord Somers's letter was brought to him, he was beyond Bridgwater in Somerſetſhire, and his conſtitution was ill calculated for ſuſtaining any extraordinary fatigue, he travelled with ſuch ſpeed, that he was in the Houſe of Peers on the following day; exhibiting an inſtance of diſpatch, which at that time was more uncommon, and leſs eaſy to be performed, than it is at preſent. During the remainder of the Seſſion, he attended his Parliamentary duty as much as his health would permit, being earneſt to ſupport the meaſures of King William, who was then engaged in forming the grand Alliance. Nothing, in the Earl of Shafteſbury's judgment, could more effectually aſſiſt that glorious undertaking, than the choice of a good Parliament. He uſed, therefore, his utmoſt efforts to facilitate the deſign; and ſuch was his ſucceſs, upon the election of a new Houſe of Commons, (parties at that criſis being nearly on an equality) that his Majeſty told him he had turned the ſcale. So high was the opinion which the King had formed of the Earl's abilities and character, that an offer was made him of being appointed Secretary of State. This, however, was an offer which his declining conſtitution would not permit him to accept. But although he was diſabled from engaging in the courſe of official buſineſs, he was capable of giving advice to his Majeſty, who frequently conſulted him on affairs of the higheſt importance. Nay, it is underſtood, that he had a great ſhare in compoſing that celebrated laſt Speech of King William, which was delivered on the 31ſt of December, 1701.

Upon the acceſſion of Queen Anne to the throne, Lord Shafteſbury returned to his retired manner of life, being no longer adviſed with in relation to public concerns. At the ſame time, he was removed from the Vice-Admiralty of the county of Dorſet, which had been in the family for three ſucceſſive generations. This ſlight, though it was a matter of little conſequence, was the only one that could have been ſhewn him, as it was the ſingle thing which he had ever held under the Crown. The meaſure of taking it from him was ſuppoſed to have originated in certain Stateſmen who reſented his ſervices to another party in the late reign. In the beginning of 1703, the Earl made a ſecond journey to Holland, where he reſided till nearly the cloſe of the following year. Soon after this, the French Prophets occaſioned a great diſturbance throughout the nation by their enthuſiaſtic extravagancies; and ſome were of opinion that, in order to ſuppreſs them, it was neceſſary to have recourſe to methods of ſeverity. Lord Shafteſbury, who had well conſidered the affair, and who abhorred any ſtep which looked like perſecution, apprehended that that ſuch meaſures tended rather to enflame than to cure the diſeaſe. This was the origin of his "Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm," which he ſent to Lord Somers, then Preſident of the Council, and which, being approved of by that Nobleman and other Gentlemen to whom it was ſhewn, was publiſhed in 1708, though without the name of the author, or that of the perſon to whom it was addreſſed. His "Moraliſt, a philoſophical Rhapſody, being a Recital of certain Converſations on natural and moral Subjects," appeared in Jan. 1709; and in the May following his "Senſus Communis: An Eſſay upon the Freedom of Wit and Humour; in a Letter to a Friend." The three works now mentioned were printed at London in 8*vo*. It was in the ſame year that he entered into the marriage ſtate, with Mrs. Jane Ewer, the youngeſt daughter of Thomas Ewer, Eſq; of Lee in Hertfordſhire. By this Lady, to whom his Lordſhip was related, he had an only ſon, Anthony the late Earl of Shafteſbury (g). It is certain that Miſs Ewer was not the firſt object of our noble author's affections, and that he did not think of paying his addreſſes to her till after he had met with a diſappointment with regard to another Lady of greater fortune and family. In forming this union, he ſeems to have been chiefly influenced by the ſolicitations of his friends; and evidently did not engage in it with any very romantic ideas of love and happineſs [C]. In 1710, his "Soliloquy; or, Advice to an Author," was publiſhed, at London, in 8*vo*. While he was thus employing himſelf in literary compoſition, his health declined ſo faſt, that it was recommended to him to ſeek aſſiſtance from a warmer climate. Having taken this reſolution, he took leave, by letter, of ſeveral of his acquaintance, among the number of whom was Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford, and who had then been lately advanced to that title. As this letter is not in the uſual ſtrain of thoſe addreſſed to Miniſters of State, it ſhall be inſerted below, together with another to the Lord Godolphin [D]. In July, 1711, the Earl of Shafteſbury ſet out for Naples, [C] He ſeems to have been chiefly influenced by the ſolicitations of his friends, and evidently did not engage in it with any romantic ideas of love and happineſs.] In a letter written to his friend, Robert Moleſworth, Eſq; afterwards Lord Viſcount Moleſworth, previouſly to his marriage, he thus expreſſes himſelf: "What other people will ſay of ſuch a match I "know not, nor what motives they will aſſign for it, "when intereſt is ſet aſide. Love, I fear, will "ſcarcely be a tolerable pretence in ſuch a one as I "am: and for family, I have a brother ſtill alive, "whom I may have ſtill ſome hopes of. What a "weakneſs, then, would it be thought in me, to "marry with little or no fortune, and not in the "higheſt degree of quality neither? Will it be "enough that I take a breeder out of a good family, "with a right education, fit for a mere wife; and "with no advantages, but ſimple innocence, modeſty, "and the plain qualities of a good mother and a "good nurſe? This is as little the modern reliſh, as "that old faſhioned wife of Horace's;

"Sabina qualis, aut peruſta ſolibus
"Pernicis uxor Appuli.

"Can you or my friends who preſs me to this, bear "me out in it? The experiment, however, ſhall be "made, if I live out this ſummer: and you ſhall hear "me ſay as the old batchelor in the Latin Menander, "with a little alteration;

"Etſi hoc moleſtum, atque alienum a vita mea "Videtur, ſi vos tantopere iſtuc voltis, fiat."

After his Lordſhip's marriage, having received, from the ſame friend, the compliments that are uſual on ſuch an occaſion, he returned the following anſwer: "Were I to talk of marriage, and forced to "ſpeak my mind plainly, and without the help of "humour or raillery, I ſhould doubtleſs offend the "moſt part of ſober married people, and the ladies "chiefly. For I ſhould in reality think I did wonders, in extolling the happineſs of my new ſtate, "and the merits of my wife in particular, by ſaying, "that I verily thought myſelf as happy a man now as "ever. And is not that ſubject enough for joy? "What would a man of ſenſe wiſh more? For my "own part, if I find any ſincere joy, it is becauſe I "promiſed myſelf no other than the ſatisfaction of "my friends, who thought my family worth preſerving, and myſelf worth nurſing in an indifferent "crazy ſtate, to which a wife (if a good one) is a "great help. Such a one I have found, and if by "her help or care I can regain a tolerable ſhare of "health, you may be ſure it will be employed as you "deſire, ſince my marriage itſelf was but a means to "that end (3)."

If we did not make allowances for the effect which a continued indiſpoſition of the body is apt to have upon the mind, we ſhould be ready to ſay, that theſe letters do not place Lord Shafteſbury in the moſt amiable point of view.

Naples, and purſuing his journey by way of France, was obliged to paſs through the Duke of Berwick's army, which at that time lay encamped near the borders of Piedmont. Here he was entertained by that famous General in the moſt friendly manner, and every aſſiſtance was given him to conduct him in ſafety to the Duke of Savoy's dominions. Our noble author's removal to Italy was of no ſervice to the re-eſtabliſhment of his health; for after having reſided at Naples about a year and a half, he departed this life on the 4th of February, Old-ſtile, 1712-13, in the forty-ſecond year of his age. The only pieces which he finiſhed after he came to this city, were the "Judgment of Hercules," and the "Letter concerning Deſign," which laſt was added to that impreſſion of the Characteriſtics that appeared in 1732. It was in 1711 that the firſt edition was publiſhed of all the Characteriſtics together, and in the order in which they now ſtand. But this publication not being entirely to his Lordſhip's ſatisfaction, he chiefly employed the latter part of his life in preparing his writings for a more elegant edition, which was given to the world in 1713, ſoon after his deceaſe. The ſeveral prints that were then firſt interſperſed through the volumes were all invented by himſelf, and deſigned under his immediate inſpection; and for this purpoſe he was at the pains of drawing up a moſt accurate ſet of inſtructions, the manuſcript of which is ſtill preſerved in the family. That no miſtakes might be committed, the Earl did not leave to any other hands ſo much as the drudgery of correcting the preſs. In the three volumes of the "Characteriſtics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times," he compleated the whole of his works which he intended for the public eye. Not long before his death he had formed a ſcheme of writing a diſcourſe on Painting, Sculpture, and the other Arts of Deſign, which, if he had lived to have finiſhed it, might have proved a very pleaſing and uſeful work, as he had a fine taſte in ſubjects of that kind: but his premature deceaſe prevented his making any great progreſs in the undertaking. In 1716 ſome of his letters were publiſhed at London, in 8*vo*. under the title of "Several Letters written by a noble Lord to a young Man at the Univerſity [E]. Five years after-

[E] Several letters written by a noble Lord to a young Man of the Univerſity.] Theſe letters were written to Michael Ainſworth, of the pariſh of St. Giles's, where Lord Shafteſbury lived, at whoſe expence he was educated and maintained at Oxford. The collection contains ten letters upon philoſophical and theological ſubjects, but were never deſigned by the author to be made public. They contain many valuable reflections upon the moſt important ſubjects; of which we ſhall give the reader a ſpecimen. In the ſecond letter, which is dated May 10, 1707, he obſerves, that the higheſt principle, which is the love of God, is beſt attained, not by dark ſpeculations and Monkiſh philoſophy, but by moral practice and love of mankind, and a ſtudy of their intereſts, the chief of which, and that which only raiſes them above the degree of brutes, is freedom of reaſon in the learned world, and good government and liberty in the civil world. Tyranny in one is ever accompanied or ſoon followed by tyranny in the other. And when ſlavery is brought upon a people, they are ſoon reduced to that baſe and brutal ſtate, both in their underſtandings and morals. True zeal therefore for God and religion muſt be ſupported by real love for mankind; and love of mankind cannot conſiſt but with a right knowledge of man's great intereſts, and of the only way and means (that of liberty and freedom) which God and nature has made neceſſary and eſſential to his manly dignity and character. They therefore, who betray theſe principles and the rights of mankind, betray religion even ſo as to make it an inſtrument againſt itſelf. In his third letter he remarks that it is the buſineſs of all, as many as are raiſed in knowledge, above the poor illiterate and laborious vulgar, to explain, as far as poſſible, the reaſons of the divine laws, delivered to us in poſitive commands by our ſacred legiſlator, their conſent with the law of nature, their ſuitableneſs to ſociety, and to the peace, happineſs and enjoyment of ourſelves. "It is there alone, "that we have need of recourſe to fire and brimſtone, "and what other puniſhments the Divine Goodneſs "(for our good) has condeſcended to threaten us with, "where the force of theſe arguments cannot prevail. "Our buſineſs within ourſelves is to ſet ourſelves free, "according to that perfect law of liberty, which we "are bid to look into. . . . . And I am delighted to "read theſe words from you, viz. that we are made "to contemplate and love God intirely, and with a free "and voluntary love. But this, you will ſee, is a myſ-"tery too deep for thoſe ſouls, whom you converſe "with, and ſee around you. They have ſcarce heard "of what it is to combat with their appetites and "ſenſes.

afterwards, in 1721, another collection of the ſame kind appeared, entitled, "Letters from the Right Honourable the late Earl of Shafteſbury, to Robert Moleſworth, Eſq; now Lord Viſcount of that Name, with two Letters written by the late Sir John Cropley: to which

" ſenſes. They think themſelves ſufficiently juſtified, " as men, and ſufficiently qualified as holy men, and " teachers of religion, if they can compaſs matters, by " the help of circumſtances and outward fortune, ſo " as happily to reſtrain thoſe luſts and appetites of " theirs within the bounds of ordinary human laws. " Hence thoſe allurements of external objects (as you " well remark) they are ſo far from declining, that " they raiſe and advance them by all poſſible means, " without fear of adding fuel to their inflamed deſires, " in a heart, which can never burn towards God, till " thoſe other fires are extinct. God grant, that ſince " you know this better way, this chaſte and holy diſ- " cipline, you may ſtill purſue it, with that juſt and " pious jealouſy over your own heart, that neither " your eyes, nor any of your ſenſes, may be led away " to ſerve themſelves, or any thing, but that Creator, " who made them for his ſervice, and in whom alone " is happineſs and reſt." In the fourth letter, dated April the 2d 1708, he tells us, that of virtue there can be no reward but of the ſame kind with itſelf: nothing can be ſuperadded to it. And even heaven itſelf can be no other, than the addition of grace to grace; virtue to virtue, and knowledge to knowledge; by which we may ſtill more and more comprehend the chief virtue, and higheſt excellence, the giver and diſpenſer of all. In the fifth letter, dated January the 28th 1708-9, he remarks, that " all that we call improvement of " our minds in dry and empty ſpeculation; all learn- " ing or whatever elſe, either in theology or other " ſciences, which has not a direct tendency to render " us honeſter, milder, juſter and better, is far from be- " ing juſtly ſo called. And even all that philoſophy, " which is built on the compariſon and compounding " of ideas, complex, implex, reflex, and all that din " and noiſe of metaphyſics; all that pretended ſtudy " and ſcience of nature called natural philoſophy, " Ariſtotelian, Carteſian, or whatever elſe it be, all " thoſe high contemplations of ſtars and ſpheres and " planets; and all the other inquiſitive curious parts " of learning, are ſo far from being neceſſary improve- " ments of the mind, that without the utmoſt care " they ſerve only to blow it up in conceit and folly, " and render men more ſtiff in their ignorance and " vices." He obſerves afterwards, that we never more need a juſt cheerfulneſs, good humour, or alacrity of mind, that when we are contemplating God and Virtue. So that it may be aſſigned as one cauſe of the auſterity and harſhneſs of ſome men's Divinity, that in their habit of mind, and by that very moroſe and ſour temper, which they contract with their hard ſtudies, they make the idea of God ſo much after the pattern of their own bitter ſpirit. . . . . But here is the great and eſſential matter of the laſt conſequence to our ſouls and minds, to keep them from the contagion of pleaſure. And to ſhew you, that I am not by this an imitator of the ſevere aſcetic Monaſtic race of Divines, or an admirer of any thing that looks like reſtraint in knowledge, or learning or ſpeculation, conſider of this that I am going to ſay to you, and carry your reflection as far back, as to that firſt little glimmering of ingenuity, which ſhewed itſelf in you in your childhood, I mean the art of painting. Had you been to have made one of thoſe artiſts of the nobler kind, who paint hiſtory, and actions, and nature, and had you been ſent by me into Italy or elſewhere, to learn the ſtyle and manner of the great maſters; what advice, think you, ſhould I have given you? I ſay, what advice, not as Chriſtian, or Philoſopher, or man of virtue, but merely as a lover of the art, ſuppoſing I had even been of a very vicious life, and had no other end in ſending you abroad than to have procured pictures, and have got you a maſterly hand in that kind, and to have employed afterwards for my own uſe, and for the ornament of my houſe. Moſt certainly my advice muſt have been this; (and thus any other maſter or patron of common ſenſe would have accoſted you;) " You are now going to learn what is ex- " cellent and beautiful in the way of painting. You " will go where there are many pictures of many diffe- " rent hands, and quite contrary in their manner and " ſtyle. You will find many judges of different opi- " nions; and the worſt maſters, the worſt pieces, the " worſt ſtyles and manners will have their admirers. " How is it you ſhould form your Reliſh? By what " means ſhall you come to have a right admiration " yourſelf, and praiſe and imitate only what is truly " exquiſite and good in the kind? If you follow " your ſudden fancy and bent, if you fix your eye on " that, which moſt ſtrikes and pleaſes you at the firſt " ſight, you will moſt certainly never come to have " a good eye at all. You will be led aſide, and have a " florid, and gay, and fooliſh fancy; and any lewd " tawdry piece of dawbing will make a ſtronger im- " preſſion on you than the moſt majeſtic chaſte piece " of the ſobereſt maſter; and a FLEMISH or a FRENCH " Manner will more prevail with you than a true " ITALIAN. How ſhall we do then in this caſe? " Why even thus, (for what way is there elſe?) Make " it a ſolemn rule to yourſelf, to check your own " eye and fancy, which naturally leads to gaiety; and " turn it ſtrongly on that, which it cares not at " firſt to dwell upon. Be ſure that you paſs by on " every occaſion, whatever little idle piece of a neg- " ligent looſe kind may be apt to detain your eye; " and fix yourſelf upon the nobler, more maſterly, " and ſtudied pieces of ſuch, as were known Virtuoſo's, " and admired by all ſuch. If you find no grace or " charm at the firſt looking, look on, continue to ob- " ſerve all that you poſſibly can; and when you " have got one glimpſe, improve it, copy it, cultivate " the idea, and labour till you have worked yourſelf " into a right taſte, and formed a reliſh and under- " ſtanding of what is truly beautiful in the kind." This is what any ordinary maſter or pattern of common good ſenſe would have ſaid to you upon your enterprize on painting; and this is what I now ſay to you on your great enterprize on knowledge and learning. This is the reaſon I cry out to you againſt pleaſure; to beware of thoſe paths, which lead to a wrong knowledge, a wrong judgment of what is ſupremely BEAUTIFUL and GOOD. In the ſixth letter dated February the 8th, 1709, his Lordſhip writes thus. " Time will be, when your greateſt diſturbance " will ariſe from that antient difficulty, πόθεν τὸ κακὸν. " But when you have well inured yourſelf to the pre- " cepts and ſpeculation, which give the view of its no- " ble contrary (τὸ καλὸν,) you will reſt ſatisfied. But " be perſuaded in the mean time, that wiſdom is " more from the heart than from the head. Feel " goodneſs, and you will ſee all things fair and good. " Let it be your chief endeavour to make acquaint- " ance with what is good, that by ſeeing perfectly, by " the help of reaſon, what good is and what ill, you " may prove whether that, which is from revelation, " be not perfectly good and conformable to this " ſtandard. For if ſo, the very end of the goſpel " proves its truth; and that, which to the vulgar is " only knowable by miracles, and teachable by poſi- " tive precepts and commands, to the wiſe and vir- " tuous is demonſtrable by the nature of the thing. " So that how can we forbear to give our aſſent to " thoſe doctrines, and that revelation, which is de- " livered to us, and inforced by miracles and won- " ders? But to us the very teſt and proof of the " divineneſs and truth of that revelation is from the " excellence of the things revealed. Otherwiſe the " wonders themſelves would have little effect or " power; nor could they be thoroughly depended on, " were we even as near to them as thoſe, who lived " more than a thouſand years ſince, when they were " freſhly wrought, and ſtrong in the memory of men. " This is what alone can juſtify our eaſineſs of faith; " and in this reſpect we can never be too reſigned, " too willing, or too complaiſant. Mean while let " your eye be ſimple, and turn it from the ἄδηλον to the " δῆλον. View God in goodneſs and in his works, " which have that character: dwell with honeſty, and " beauty, and order; ſtudy and love what is of this " kind; and in time you will know and love the " author (5)."

is prefixed a large Introduction, by the Editor (b)." This editor was Mr. Toland, who, in the preſent, as well as in the former caſe, aſſumed a liberty not very agreeable to the family. In their opinion, as the correſpondence was almoſt entirely of a private nature, it was on that account unfit for public view. However, it ſet his Lordſhip's integrity in the moſt amiable point of light. As to Mr. Toland's introduction, it is chiefly founded on conjecture, and many things in it are abſolutely falſe. An extract or two from the letters will be inſerted below [F]. The Earl of Shafteſbury had an eſteem for the works of the beſt Engliſh Divines; one remarkable inſtance of which was diſplayed in his writing a Preface to a volume of Dr. Whichcot's Sermons, publiſhed in 1698. Copies of theſe Sermons had been taken in ſhort-hand, as they were delivered from the pulpit; and the Earl had ſo high an opinion of them, that he not only introduced them to the world by his Preface, but had them printed under his own particular inſpection (i). In his letters to a young man at the Univerſity, he ſpeaks of Biſhop Burnet and Dr. Hoadly in terms of great applauſe, and has done juſtice to the merits of Tillotſon, Barrow, Chillingworth and Hammond, as the chief pillars of the Church againſt Fanaticiſm (k). But whatever regard his Lordſhip might have for ſome of our Divines, it was to the writings of Antiquity that his admiration was principally directed. Theſe were the conſtant objects of his ſtudy, and from them he formed his ſyſtem of Philoſophy, which was of the civil, ſocial, and theiſtic kind. His favourite books were the moral works of Xenophon, Horace, the Commentaries and Enchiridion of Epictetus as publiſhed by Arrian, and Marcus Antoninus. Theſe authors he always carried with him in his various excurſions, and they are now extant in his library, filled throughout with marginal notes, references, and explanations, all written in his own hand (l). To this catalogue Plato ſhould undoubtedly have been added, of whom it is evident that the Earl of Shafteſbury was a diligent reader, an ardent admirer, and a zealous imitator. Simplicius is, likewiſe, ſpoken of by him in high terms of approbation, as may be ſeen in his letter to a Student (m). In the Supplement to the Biographia Britannica, Lucian is mentioned as one of the ancient writers whom his Lordſhip admired. But this is certainly a miſtake, for it appears, on the contrary, that he had a particular averſion to that author (n).

(n) This Remark, communicated by Dr. Towers, is grounded on the authority of the Letters to a Student.

Concerning his Lordſhip's brother, Maurice Aſhley Cooper, it may not be improper to take notice, that he was the author of a tranſlation of Xenophon's Cyropœdia, or the inſtitution of Cyrus. "This tranſlation," ſays the late Mr. James Harris, "is made in "all the purity and ſimplicity of the original, and to it the tranſlator has prefixed a truly "philoſophical Dedication to my mother, who was one of his ſiſters. I eſteem it an "honour to call this author my uncle, and that not only from his rank, but much more "from his learning and unblemiſhed virtue; qualities which the love of retirement (where "he thought they could be beſt cultivated) induced him to conceal, rather than to produce "in public (o)."

The only child left by the third Earl of Shafteſbury was Anthony Aſhley Cooper the fourth Earl; a Nobleman concerning whom Mr. Huntingford remarks, that there never exiſted a man of more benevolence, moral worth, and true piety; and this is a character which we can confirm by our own teſtimony, having had the honour of enjoying his acquaintance and correſpondence. We were particularly informed by him, that, whilſt he had the greateſt reverence for the memory and character of his father, and a high eſteem

[F] An extract or two from the letters will be inſerted below.] In the ſeventh letter to Mr. Moleſworth, dated from Beachworth, in Surry, January the 6th, 1708-9, his Lordſhip writes thus: "I never "thought I ſhould ſee any of the great men at Court "ſo inclinable to public good, as to regard or "hearken to a man, who has chiefly that at heart. "And, to ſay truth of myſelf, I always thought I had "a ſtubbornneſs of nature, which would hinder me "from making a right advantage of good Miniſters, "whenever we ſhould come to have any ſuch. But "being taken down very early in my life from thoſe "high imaginations I had, and thoſe hopes of doing "ſervice in the plain way of buſineſs and Parliaments, "the mortification wrought ſo far in my advantage, "that I became milder and more tractable; and in "this condition you found me, when you laid hold "of an opportunity, and with a particular mark of "friendſhip recommended me to a great man, and "brought me under obligation to him. The little "time I have had ſince with him, I employed the beſt "I could, in ſuch advices and ſuch offer of ſervice as "became me. Nor do I think I have been any way "unfortunate in giving the leaſt offence, at raiſing "that frightful idea, which courtiers are apt to have "of patriots and men of rigid virtue. I flatter my-"ſelf egregiouſly, or I am well in his opinion, and "have loſt no ground. But if it be ſo, and as I "faithfully believe, I will be ſworn, there never was "a more diſintereſted man in his ſtation; for if I may "judge by myſelf, he leaves it to his friends, and "thoſe he has obliged to be grateful, and to act for "him as they fancy, and as their heart prompts "them; but for his part, he lays no burdens, nor "requires any ſervice in return." In the fourth letter dated from Beachworth, November the 4th, 1708, he writes thus: "You may think me melan-"choly, if you will. I own, there was a time in "public affairs, when I really was; for ſaving your-"ſelf, and perhaps one or two more (I ſpeak the moſt) "I had none that acted with me againſt the injuſtice "and corruption of both parties; each of them in-"flamed againſt me, particularly one, becauſe of my "birth and principles; the other, becauſe of my "pretended apoſtaſy, which was only adhering to "thoſe principles, on which their party was founded. "There have been apoſtates indeed ſince that time. "But the days are long ſince paſt, that you and I "were treated as Jacobites. What to ſay for ſome "companions of our's, as they are now changed, I "know not; but as to my own particular, I aſſure "you, that ſince thoſe ſad days of the public, which "might have helped on perhaps with that melancholy "or ſpleen which you fear in me, and for certain "have helped me to this ill ſtate of health, I am now "however as free as poſſible; and even in reſpect to "my health too, excepting only the air of London, "I am, humanly ſpeaking, very paſſable (6)."

(6) Gen. Dict. ubi ſupra, p. 186.

for his writings, he did not concur with him in thoſe parts of his works which appear to be ſceptical with regard to the Chriſtian Religion.

Such are the circumſtances of the third Earl of Shafteſbury's life, the materials of which we have principally taken, not from the Supplement to the Biographia Britannica, but from the great General Dictionary; and that for a very ſufficient reaſon. The article in that work was written by the late Earl, as he himſelf informed the preſent Biographer. On the authenticity, therefore, of its facts we may ſafely rely; and in other reſpects it is ſuperior to the account which has been drawn up by one of our predeceſſors.

It now remains that we conſider Lord Shafteſbury as a writer: and in this character ſuch different repreſentations have been given of him; he has been ſo much applauded, and ſo much condemned, that it will be neceſſary to be ſomewhat copious on the ſubject. And that we may the more effectually attain our purpoſe of forming a juſt eſtimation of him in his literary capacity, we ſhall purſue his works in the order aſſigned to them by himſelf; after which we ſhall take a general ſurvey of him as an author, and attend particularly to his ſtile and compoſition.

The firſt piece which occurs in the Characteriſtics, is his "Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm," with regard to which we have but few remarks to make. We have before ſeen that his view in publiſhing it, was laudable, as his deſign was to prevent the French Prophets and their adherents from being perſecuted: and it will ſcarcely now be denied that it was better to treat them with contempt than ſeverity. As to the tract itſelf, we do not think that it is entitled to any high degree of applauſe. It is written with vivacity, and ſometimes with humour; but, on the whole, it is a deſultory performance, and there are in it ſeveral exceptionable paſſages. There is but little preciſion in it; nor does it convey much philoſophical information on the ſubject of Enthuſiaſm. However, on its firſt appearance, it greatly excited the public attention, both at home and abroad [G].

He

[G] It greatly excited the public attention, both at home and abroad.] Very ſoon after its appearance, it was attacked in a pamphlet in 8*vo.* entitled, "Remarks upon a Letter by a Lord concerning Enthuſiaſm, not written in Raillery but good Humour." (7) Another Anſwer was publiſhed in May, 1709 (7), under the title of "Bart'lemy Fair: or, an Enquiry after Wit, in which due Reſpect is had to a Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm, by my Lord ." The author of this publication was Mr. Wotton. A third attack came out in the ſame year, entitled, "Reflections upon a Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm, by Lord : In another Letter to a Lord (8)." In 1708, a French tranſlation of the "Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm," was printed at the Hague (9). Even the great Leibnitz condeſcended to make this tract the object of his attention: for he wrote ſome remarks upon it in French, which are publiſhed by Monſieur des Maireauz, in the ſecond Volume of "Recueil de diverſes Pieces ſur la Philoſophie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Hiſtoire, les Mathematiques, &c. par Meſſ. Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, et autres Autheurs celebres." Printed at Amſterdam, in 1720 (10). The following extract, from the General Dictionary, will farther explain our noble Author's ſentiments and views upon the point in queſtion. "Lord Shafteſbury had perhaps a greater antipathy to Enthuſiaſm than moſt other perſons, having ſeen many of the fatal conſequences attending this deception in ſome people, with whom he was particularly acquainted. He wrote a little treatiſe upon the ſubject ſome years before the Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm, which he addreſſed to his brother, and which has never been made public. We ſhall quote the following paſſage from it, where he ſpeaks of himſelf and his brother. Being riſen both of us pretty late in the morning, which was Sunday, we went, you know, to Church for the firſt time this new year. Thither I never went with truer zeal, in a better diſpoſition, or with wholeſomer reflections. And, what ſatisfied me ſtill the more, it was by appointment, that we were that day to receive the Sacrament together, having had no opportunity of a long time. Here we both of us joined in bleſſing that good Providence, which had by reaſon and education ſeparated us from the impure and horrid ſuperſtitions, monſtrous enthuſiaſms, and wild fanaticiſms of thoſe blaſphemous Viſionaries we ſaw abounding in the world, and which had given us on the contrary ſide ſuch eſtabliſhed rules of worſhip, as were ſo decent, chaſte, innocent, pure; and had placed us in a Religion and Church, where in reſpect of the moderate party and far greater part, the principle of Charity was really more extenſive than in any Chriſtian or Proteſtant Church beſides in the world; where zeal was not phrenſy and enthuſiaſm; Prayer and Devotion not rage and fits of looſe extravagance; Religious diſcourſes not cant and unintelligible nonſenſe, nor the character of a Saint reſembling that of their inſpired and godly men or women leaders; but where a good and virtuous life, with a hearty endeavour of ſervice to one's country and to mankind, joined with a religious performance of all ſacred duties, and a conformity with the eſtabliſhed rites, was enough to anſwer the higheſt character of Religion, and where all other pretences to gifts and ſupernatural endowments beyond theſe moral and Chriſtian perfections were juſtly ſuſpected and treated as villainy, cheat, impoſture, and madneſs. In a letter of his dated May the 5th 1709, he writes thus of the Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm: "I think your genius has dictated "right to you about a little pamphlet, which, it "ſeems, is commonly ſold with the Reflections lately "wrote upon it; which, if ſhort, I would not for "once debar you from, but have you hear what is "ſaid in anſwer, leſt you ſhould ſeem to yourſelf "miſtaken or diffident, as to the truth. For my own "part, I cannot but think from my heart, that the "author of the pamphlet (whatever air of humour "he may give himſelf, the better to take with the "polite world) is moſt ſincere to virtue and religion, "and even to the intereſt of our Church. For many "of our modern aſſertors of toleration have ſeemed "to leave us deſtitute of what he calls a public leading or miniſtry; which notion he treats as mere enthuſiaſm or horrid irreligion. For in truth Religion cannot be left thus to ſhift for itſelf, without "the care and countenance of the Magiſtrate. But "in the Remarks or Reflections I find the anſwers are ſo "far from underſtanding this plain ſenſe of leading, "that they think it means only leading by the noſe. "So excellent are theſe Gentlemen at improving ridicule againſt themſelves. They care not who "defends religion, or how it is defended, if it be "not defended in their way. They cry out upon a "deluge of Scepticiſm breaking out and overwhelming us, in this witty knowing age; and yet they "will allow no remedy proper in the caſe, no application to the world in a more genteel, polite, open, "and free way. They for their parts (witneſs Dr. "A——y againſt the good Mr. H——y) have aſſerted virtue upon baſer principles and more falſe "and deſtructive by far, than Epicurus, Democritus, Ariſtippus, or any of the ancient Atheiſts. "They

(10) Gen. Dict. ubi ſupra, p. 181, 182. note [F].

The next treatiſe is the " Senſus Communis: an Eſſay on the Freedom of Wit and " Humour." This work is more conſiderable in point of extent than the former one, but is nearly entitled to the ſame character. The noble author, in our opinion, is far from being ſpecific in his ideas. Some of the ſentiments here advanced had been occaſionally thrown out in the Letter concerning Enthuſiaſm; but in the preſent tract he enters into a larger defence of the application of raillery to ſubjects of ſpeculative enquiry, and among the reſt to matters of religious opinion. His advocates have aſſerted, that unjuſt repreſentations have often been given of the poſitions maintained by him upon this head [H]. This aſſertion we acknowledge to be true; but, at the ſame time, we are convinced, that Lord Shafteſbury, by the inaccurate and unguarded manner in which he hath written, hath laid himſelf fairly open to animadverſion and cenſure. Many perſons have expreſſed great diſapprobation of his ideas concerning the uſe of wit and humour. To expoſe his Lordſhip's notions in this reſpect, is the buſineſs of the firſt of Dr. Brown's Eſſays on the Characteriſtics. The Doctor contends, with great ingenuity, that Ridicule is a ſpecies of Eloquence; that reaſon alone is the detector of falſhood, and the teſt of truth; that ridicule can never pretend to this character; that it is one of the moſt powerful engines, by which error can be maintained and eſtabliſhed; and that its proper object is folly of conduct and chiefly affectation. What Dr. Brown maintained was not admitted without controverſy. Several writers appeared in defence of the Earl of Shafteſbury, and amongſt others, the Reverend Mr. Charles Bulkley, an ingenious and learned Diſſenting Miniſter

" They have ſubverted all morality, all grounds of " honeſty, and ſupplanted the whole doctrine of our " Saviour, under pretence of magnifying his revela- " tion. In Philoſophy they give up all foundations, " all principles of Society, and the very beſt arguments " to prove the Being of a Deity. And by the way, " this pamphlet, which they are ſo offended at, is ſo " ſtrong on this head, that the author aſſerts the Deity " even on the foundations of his innate idea, and the " power of this notion even over Atheiſts themſelves, " and by the very conceſſion of Epicurus and that " ſect (11)."

(11) Gen. Dict. ubi ſupra, p. 181, 182. note [F].

[H] That unjuſt repreſentations have often been given of the poſitions maintained by him upon this head.] We ſhall here inſert what has been urged in his Lordſhip's defence, in the General Dictionary. " This author has been much miſrepreſented with reſpect to his notions of wit and ridicule. From his having recommended them in ſome caſes as uſeful, he has been treated as an advocate of that low, mean and vicious buffoonery, which without decency or diſtinction ſeeks a laugh from every thing. The falſhood of this charge may be ſufficiently ſeen from an impartial view of what he has ſaid on this ſubject, and that more particularly in this ſecond treatiſe. His opinion if fairly examined, ſeems indeed to be no more than this, that ridicule may be made of excellent uſe, either againſt ridicule itſelf, when falſe and miſapplied, or againſt grave, ſpecious, and deluſive impoſture. It is with a view to the rendering it ſubſervient to theſe two purpoſes, that he juſtly condemns other uſes of it more licentious, and with great care diſtinguiſhes the decent from its contrary. Thus (vol. i. p. 63.) " To go about induſtriouſly (ſays he) to confound " men in a myſterious manner, and to make advan- " tage or draw pleaſure from that perplexity they " are thrown into, by ſuch uncertain talk; is as un- " handſome in a way of raillery, as when done with " the greateſt ſerioufneſs, or in the moſt ſolemn way " of deceit——Again——It is certainly a mean, im- " potent and dull ſort of wit, which amuſes all alike, " and which leaves the moſt ſenſible men, and even " a friend, equally in doubt and at a loſs to under- " ſtand what one's real mind is upon any ſubject. " This is that groſs ſort of Raillery, which is ſo of- " fenſive in good company. And indeed there is as " much difference between one ſort and another, as " between fair-dealing and hypocriſy, or between the " genteeleſt wit and the moſt ſcurrilous buffoonery. " —Again, vol. i. p. 128.—By this time (my friend!) " you may poſſibly, I hope, be ſatisfied, that as I am " in earneſt in defending raillery, ſo I can be ſober " too in the uſe of it. It is in reality a ſerious ſtudy to " learn to temper and regulate that humour, which " nature has given us as a more lenitive remedy " againſt vice, and a kind of ſpecific againſt ſuperſti- " tion, and melancholy deluſion. There is a great " difference between ſeeking how to raiſe a laugh " from every thing, and ſeeking in every thing what " juſtly may be laughed at." See alſo pages 82, 3, 4, 5. of the ſame vol.—But a more remarkable inſtance than all theſe may be given from a manuſcript epiſtle of this author to Monſieur Coſte, when cenſuring a criticiſm of Monſieur Dacier (who would ſuppoſe the 34th Ode B. 1. of Horace to be ironical banter) he ſays, " There is a due proportion in irony " well known to all polite writers, eſpecially Horace, " who ſo well copied that noted Socratic kind. Go " but a little further with it, and ſtrain it beyond a " certain juſt meaſure, and there is nothing ſo offen- " ſive, injurious, hypocritical, bitter, and contrary to " all true ſimplicity, honeſty, or good manners."

" As to thoſe uſes of ridicule which he allows, with regard to impoſture he tells us (vol. i. p. 11.) that we " can never too much honour or revere any thing for " grave, if we are aſſured the thing is grave, as we " apprehend it. The main point is to know always " true gravity from the falſe; and this can only be by " carrying the rule conſtantly with us, and freely " applying it not only to the things about us, but to " ourſelves. For if unhappily we loſe the meaſure " in ourſelves, we ſhall ſoon loſe it in every thing " beſides. Now what rule or meaſure is there in the " world, except in conſidering the real temper of " things, to find which are truly ſerious and which " ridiculous? And how can this be done, unleſs by " applying the ridicule, to ſee whether it will bear? " But if we fear to apply this rule in any thing, what " ſecurity can we have againſt impoſture in all things?" Again, as to the uſe of ridicule againſt ridiculers themſelves, and univerſal ſcoffers, he very pertinently ſays (vol. i. p. 134.) that " if it be the complaint of our " ſtanding Reformers, that they are not heard ſo well " by the Gentlemen of faſhion; if they exclaim againſt " thoſe airy wits, who fly to ridicule as a protection, " and make ſucceſsful ſallies from that quarter; why " ſhould it be denied one, who is only a volunteer in " this cauſe, to engage the adverſary on his own terms, " and expoſe himſelf willingly to ſuch attacks, on " the ſingle condition of being allowed fair play in " the ſame kind?"

" So little, as appears from hence, was this author an advocate for a vague, indecent, and boundleſs ridicule, or inclined to employ his wit and humour, otherwiſe than under the abovementioned reſtrictions, and when the above occaſions called for it. What indeed he contended for, was not the droll and the buffooniſh, but the humourous, the eaſy, and the facetious, the ſame genius and ſpirit, in which one of the moſt important facts of our Chriſtian faith has been lately defended, and in which Free-thinking itſelf was once vigorouſly attacked; both of them with univerſal approbation as well of the manner, as of the argument (12)."

(12) Ibid. p. 182. note [H].

of the city of London [I]. In a work which was aſcribed to the late Mr. Ramſay, the painter, the author attempted to ſhew that Ridicule is of two kinds, and that it may be applied to opinions as well as to manners: and we cannot avoid expreſſing our concurrence with the writer in this view of the ſubject. The uſual objects of Ridicule are, indeed, certain improprieties and peculiarities of character and conduct, and to aſſert, in general, that it is the teſt of truth, is advancing a falſe poſition. Reaſon is undoubtedly the genuine and proper teſt of truth. Nevertheleſs, Ridicule may in ſome caſes be juſtly applied to opinions. There are tenets ſo flagrantly abſurd, that it is not eaſy to refrain from viewing them in the light of Humour and Raillery; and perhaps the beſt way of expoſing them, may be to diſplay them in that light. That ſome of the doctrines of Popery (not to mention other doctrines) cannot ſtand this mode of trial, has more than once been evinced, and particularly appears in Tillotſon's Rule of Faith. We confeſs, however, that Ridicule, when applied to grave and important ſubjects, is a very dangerous weapon; that it ought to be adopted with the utmoſt diſcretion, and that it hath often been made uſe of in an improper manner.

In the third work, the "Soliloquy; or, Advice to an Author," the Earl of Shafteſbury riſes in his literary character; for there are not many things in the performance which are liable to much cenſure. Dr. Brown ſpeaks of this treatiſe in terms of high applauſe. "Here," ſays the Doctor, "bating only a few accidental paſſages, which will be occaſio-"nally pointed out hereafter, we ſhall have little more to do, than to approve and ad-"mire; the whole diſſertation being, in its general turn, one continued inſtance of its "author's knowledge and refined taſte in books, life, and manners. I could dwell with "pleaſure on the beauties of this work, if indeed they needed an explanation. But that "noble union of truth and eloquence which ſhines through the whole, as it ſupercedes, ſo "it would diſgrace any attempt of this kind. To the work itſelf therefore, I recommend "the Reader (p)." Perhaps this encomium is carried higher than ſtrict truth and juſtice will warrant. The writer of the preſent article, upon a late re-peruſal of the "Advice to an Author," did not find himſelf ſtruck with that admiration of it which he experienced in his younger days. There appeared to be too many things in it of a deſultory, not to ſay of a trifling nature. It contains, however, a variety of excellent matter; and what the noble Lord has advanced in recommendation of ſelf-examination, and in defence of critics and criticiſm, is particularly valuable. In this treatiſe thoſe paſſages occur, which are ſuppoſed to caſt a cenſure on the Philoſophy of Mr. Locke, and for which the Earl of Shafteſbury hath often been condemned. One of them is as follows: "In reality, how ſpecious a ſtudy, how ſolemn an amuſement is raiſed from what we call philoſophical ſpeculations!—the formalities of ideas—their compoſitions, compariſons, agreement, and diſagreement! What can have a better appearance, or bid fairer for genuine and true philoſophy? Come on then. Let me philoſophize in this manner; if this be indeed the way I am to grow wiſe. Let me examine my ideas of ſpace and ſubſtance; let me look well into matter and its modes; if this be to look into MYSELF; if this be to improve my underſtanding, and enlarge my mind. Let me obſerve, therefore, with diligence, what paſſes here; what connection and conſiſtency, what agreement or diſagreement I find

[I] And, amongſt others, by the Reverend Mr. Charles Bulkley.] This Gentleman, in a piece entitled "A "Vindication of my Lord Shafteſbury on the Subject "of Ridicule," obſerves, "that as his Lordſhip was "fully perſuaded, that the higheſt Ridicule may poſſibly "take place in matters of ſpeculation, controverſy, "and argument, and that it hath actually been in-"troduced into them; ſo, he, as well as others, "knows that the natural and proper rule by which "to diſcover what was ridiculous in Reaſon's Pro-"vince was the uſe of reaſon: in like manner, as "our ſenſe of order, beauty and proportion judges "and determines as to what is ridiculous in Archi-"tecture, Painting, and Dreſs, or whatever elſe muſt "be ſuppoſed naturally to fall under our cognizance "and inſpection. But then he juſtly ſuppoſed, that "there muſt be ſome certain way and method of "uſing this reaſon, which might be more ſucceſsful "than any other, not only towards detecting the ri-"diculous, but alſo towards diſcovering the ſolid and "the true. This method it was his deſign in the "two treatiſes to recommend;" and it was "no "other than reaſoning upon every ſubject in an eaſy, "chearful, good humoured way, which the noble "author recommends in oppoſition to that ſour and "melancholy, that magiſterial and impoſing manner "of treating religion, which, in his opinion, has "done ſuch infinite miſchief in the world. Nothing "can be plainer than that his Lordſhip uſes the "word Ridicule as ſynonymous to freedom, famili-"arity, good-humour, and the like." Mr. Bulkley, throughout his pamphlet, endeavours to prove, that Lord Shafteſbury's Teſt of Ridicule is "no other than the Teſt of free and chearful Enquiry, or that unreſtrained, ſociable, and pleaſant manner of inveſtigating truth, and examining opinions, which the noble author had obſerved, with ſuch high approbation, in the writings of the ancients." His Lordſhip was vindicated, likewiſe, in this reſpect, in an anonymous piece, entitled, "Animadverſions on Mr. "Brown's three Eſſays on the Characteriſtics." In "this publication it is contended, that it was the "Earl of Shafteſbury's deſign "to recommend the "Way of Ridicule, the chearful and facetious Ex-"erciſe of Reaſon, as a Preſervative from the Gloom "of Superſtition, and the Extravagances of Enthu-"ſiaſm." The ſame author farther remarks, that his Lordſhip, in his Eſſay on the Freedom of Wit and Humour, "has favoured us with a ſpecimen of "that humorous kind of writing which he means to "recommend. And whoever reads it in an accurate "and ſtudious manner, will not find his humour to "be (as Mr. Brown repreſents it) a light, trifling "and ſuperficial wit; which diverts itſelf with un-"meaning jokes, and ambiguous innuendoes; but "will be pleaſed to ſee how chaſte it is, how happily "tempered with gravity in treating the moſt impor-"tant ſubjects, and how ſucceſsfully it is employed "in defence of Liberty, Honeſty, and Religion (13)."

within: whether, according to my preſent ideas, that which I approve this hour, I am likely to approve as well the next: and in caſe it be otherwiſe with me, how or in what manner I ſhall relieve myſelf; how aſcertain my ideas, and keep my opinion, liking and eſteem of things the ſame. If this remains unſolved; if I am ſtill the ſame myſtery to myſelf as ever, to what purpoſe is all this reaſoning and acuteneſs? Wherefore do I admire my Philoſopher, or ſtudy to become ſuch a one myſelf (q)?' Theſe ſentiments are purſued by our noble author, in a manner that is very unjuſt and illiberal. It was, likewiſe, an act of ingratitude in him, thus to treat the man to whom he was under ſo many perſonal obligations, and who had been ſo cloſely connected with, and attached to his family. We ſhould, however, remember how much the Earl of Shafteſbury was devoted to the ſentimental philoſophy, which was directly oppoſite to that of Mr. Locke. It ought alſo to be added, that his Lordſhip, in one of his works, has ſpoken highly in favour of the "Eſſay on human Underſtanding." That book he recommended to a Student, as no leſs fit to qualify for buſineſs and an intercourſe with mankind, than for the Sciences and Univerſity. "No one," ſays he, (meaning Mr. Locke) "has done more towards "recalling of true philoſophy from barbarity into the uſe and practice of the world, and "into the company of the better and politer ſort, who might well be aſhamed of it in "its other dreſs. No one has opened a better and clearer way to reaſon. And above all I "wonder to hear him cenſured by any Church of Men, for advancing reaſon and bringing "the uſe of it ſo much into Religion (r)."

(r) Supplement to Biog. Brit. p. 34. note [B].

The ſecond volume of the Characteriſtics opens with the "Inquiry concerning Virtue," for the introduction of which preparations had been made by many ſentiments occaſionally delivered in the former treatiſes. On the whole, it is a very valuable performance, being finely written, and containing an excellent diſplay of the nature, tendency, and effects of virtuous and benevolent diſpoſitions and actions. Here, if any where, Lord Shafteſbury muſt be allowed to appear to great advantage. We do not mean, however, to aſſert that the work is perfect, or that it is not in ſome reſpects liable to cenſure, or, at leaſt, to juſt criticiſm. Though, from its firſt appearance it was much admired, and continued long to be held in admiration, it was, nevertheleſs, early the ſubject of animadverſions. It was attacked by Dr. Bernard de Mandeville, in his "Fable of the Bees," as founded on chimerical principles. But the attack of ſuch a writer was an honour, not a diſcredit to the work. Dr. Fiddes, in the Preface to his "General Treatiſe of Morality, founded upon "Principles of Reaſon only," has vindicated the "Inquiry" againſt Mandeville's cenſures: and has pointed out the truth and beauty of the ſentiments advanced by Lord Shafteſbury. Another writer, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in defence of his Lordſhip, was the ingenious Profeſſor Hutcheſon, of Glaſgow. Indeed, this Gentleman may be conſidered as having founded in ſome degree, his ſyſtem of morals on that of our noble author; or, at leaſt, there was ſuch a coincidence in their ideas, that they muſt ever be ranked as ſupporting the ſame principles, and engaged in the ſame cauſe. Several writers, however, of characters far ſuperior to that of Mandeville, and totally abhorrent of his ſentiments, have expreſſed their diſſatisfaction with ſome parts of the "Inquiry concerning Virtue." Mrs. Cockburn, while ſhe allows that the Earl of Shafteſbury's notions of moral Virtue were very noble and very juſt, and perfectly agreeable to Dr. Clarke's doctrine, ſays, that he ſeems to be defective in the foundation (s). Biſhop Butler, with that ſagacity which he ſo eminently poſſeſſed, has made ſome ſtrictures on the "Inquiry," that are too rational and too important to be omitted; and, therefore, they ſhall be inſerted below [K]. The Philoſophers, [K] And, therefore, ſhall be inſerted below.] "The not taking into conſideration this authority, (the authority of reflection or conſcience) ſays the Biſhop, which is implied in the idea of reflex approbation or diſapprobation, ſeems a material deficiency or omiſſion in Lord Shafteſbury's inquiry concerning virtue. He has ſhewn beyond all contradiction, that virtue is naturally the intereſt or happineſs, and vice the miſery of ſuch a creature as man, placed in the circumſtances which we are in this world. But ſuppoſe there are particular exceptions; a caſe which this author was unwilling to put, and yet ſurely it is to be put: or ſuppoſe a caſe which he has put and determined, that of a ſceptic not convinced of this happy tendency of virtue, or being of a contrary opinion. His determination is, that it would be without remedy. One may ſay more explicitly, that leaving out the authority of reflex approbation, or diſapprobation, ſuch an one would be under an obligation to act viciouſly; ſince intereſt, one's own happineſs, is a manifeſt obligation, and there is not ſuppoſed to be any other obligation in the caſe. "But does it much mend the "matter, to take in that natural authority of reflec"tion? There indeed would be an obligation to "virtue; but would not the obligation from ſup"poſed intereſt on the ſide of vice remain?" If it ſhould, yet to be under two contrary obligations, that is, under none at all, would not be exactly the ſame, as to be under a formal obligation to be vicious, or to be in circumſtances in which the conſtitution of man's nature plainly required, that vice ſhould be preferred. But the obligation on the ſide of intereſt really does not remain. For the natural authority of the principle of reflection is an obligation the moſt near and intimate, the moſt certain and known: whereas the contrary obligation can at the utmoſt appear no more than probable; ſince no man can be certain in any circumſtances, that vice is his intereſt in the preſent world, much leſs can he be certain againſt another: and thus the certain obligation would entirely ſuperſede and deſtroy the uncertain one; which yet would have been of real force without the former.

"In truth, the taking in this conſideration, totally changes the whole ſtate of the caſe; and ſhews, what this author does not ſeem to have been aware of, that the greateſt degree of ſcepticiſm which he thought poſſible, will ſtill leave men under the ſtricteſt moral obligations, whatever their opinion be concerning the happineſs of virtue. For that mankind upon reflection felt an approbation of what was good, and diſapprobation

Philoſophers, in general, who deduce the principles of virtue from ſelf-love only, and refer the obligation of it ſolely to the Will of God, are, of courſe, direct enemies to the moral ſyſtem of Lord Shafteſbury, and are not ſparing of their cenſures of it, whenever it comes in their way. Of this claſs was Dr. Brown, who hath made the "Inquiry" the particular object of his animadverſions, in the ſecond of his Eſſays on the Characteriſtics. Whilſt we acknowledge the ingenuity and importance of ſome of the Doctor's obſervations, we are far from thinking that he appears to as great advantage in this as in other parts of his work. In oppoſition to Dr. Brown, our noble author found an able defender in Mr. Bulkley, who publiſhed a pamphlet, the title of which was "A Vindication of my Lord "Shafteſbury, on the Subjects of Morality and Religion, being farther Remarks on a "Book entitled Eſſays on the Characteriſtics." Dr. Reid, in his late Treatiſe on the active Powers of Man, hath ſpoken of his Lordſhip, in different places, in language of approbation, and hath reckoned him with the judicious Moraliſts (t). Lord Monboddo is tranſcendant in his praiſes of the "Inquiry." "I have elſewhere ſaid," obſerves his Lordſhip, "that the Inquiry is the beſt book in Engliſh upon the ſubject of Morals: and I am "not at all diſpoſed to retract that opinion, but, on the contrary, after having read it over "again—I am fully convinced, that it is the beſt demonſtration to be found, in any book "that I know, ancient or modern, of the moſt important truth, the foundation, I think, "of theiſm, that virtue is the greateſt happineſs, and vice the greateſt miſery of men: for "we cannot otherwiſe be convinced ourſelves, nor convince others, that the world is "under the government of Supreme Intelligence, Power and Goodneſs (u)."

(t) Eſſays on the active Powers of Man, p. 145.

(u) Origin and Progreſs of Language, vol. iv. p. 351. note.

In the "Inquiry concerning Virtue," the Earl of Shafteſbury appeared in the cloſe, the logical, and the didactic form. But in the "Moraliſts, a philoſophical Rhapſody," he aſſumes a higher tone, and figures in a new character. Here he preſents himſelf in the mode of dialogue, and is the emulator of the Ancients, and particularly of Plato, in the boldeſt poetic manner of that eminent Philoſopher. Whatever may be thought of ſome things in the "Moraliſts," and eſpecially of the rapturous kind of language into which his Lordſhip is frequently carried, it is, we think, on the whole, a work of great and extraordinary merit. Dr. Brown had aſſerted, that the noble author hath ſtrangely attempted to ridicule and diſhonour religion in every ſhape (w). But, Mr. Bulkley has juſtly obſerved, that this aſſertion is ſo far from being true, that the whole treatiſe we are ſpeaking of is written in defence of a Deity and a Providence; and that the cauſe of pure, genuine and perfect theiſm is maintained in it with ſuch ſtrength of judgment, ſuch ſuperiority of reaſon, ſuch invincible force of argument, ſuch a commanding eloquence, and ſuch a ſublime ſtrain of piety, as cannot but naturally and juſtly recommend it to the ſtricteſt attention of all who intereſt themſelves in that higheſt and moſt momentous ſubject (x). With regard to the mode of compoſition adopted in the "Moraliſts," Biſhop Hurd ranks it among the beſt of the kind which we have in our language. "There are," bation of the contrary, he thought a plain matter of fact, as it undoubtedly is, which none could deny, but from mere affectation. Take in then that authority and obligation, which is a conſtituent part of this reflex approbation, and it will undeniably follow, though a man ſhould doubt of every thing elſe, yet, that he would ſtill remain under the neareſt and moſt certain obligation to the practice of virtue; an obligation implied in the very idea of virtue, in the very idea of reflex approbation.

(w) Eſſays on the Characteriſtics, p. 230.

(x) Britiſh. Biog. vol. vii. p. 445.

"And how little influence ſoever this obligation alone can be expected to have in fact upon mankind, yet one may appeal even to intereſt and ſelf-love, and aſk, ſince from man's nature, condition, and the ſhortneſs of life, ſo little, ſo very little indeed, can poſſibly in any caſe be gained by vice; whether it be ſo prodigious a thing to ſacrifice that little to the moſt intimate of all obligations; and which a man cannot tranſgreſs without being ſelf-condemned, and unleſs he has corrupted his nature, without real ſelf-diſlike? This queſtion I ſay may be aſked, even upon ſuppoſition that the proſpect of a future life were ever ſo uncertain.

"The obſervation that man is thus by his very nature a law to himſelf, purſued to its juſt conſequences, is of the utmoſt importance; becauſe, from it, it will follow, that though men ſhould, through ſtupidity or ſpeculative ſcepticiſm, be ignorant of or diſbelieve any authority in the univerſe to puniſh the violation of this law; yet, if there ſhould be ſuch authority, they would be as really liable to puniſhment, as though they had been beforehand convinced, that ſuch puniſhment would follow. For in whatever ſenſe we underſtand juſtice, even ſuppoſing what I think would be very preſumptuous to aſſert, that the end of divine puniſhment is no other than that of civil puniſhment, namely, to prevent future miſchief; upon this bold ſuppoſition, ignorance or diſbelief of the ſanction would by no means exempt even from this juſtice: becauſe it is not foreknowledge of the puniſhment, which renders obnoxious to it; but merely violating a known obligation.

"And here it comes in one's way to take notice of a manifeſt error or miſtake, in the author now cited, unleſs perhaps he has incautiouſly expreſſed himſelf ſo as to be miſunderſtood; namely, that it is malice only, and not goodneſs, which can make us afraid. Whereas in reality, goodneſs is the natural and juſt object of the greateſt fear to an ill man. Malice may be appeaſed or ſatiated; humour may change: but goodneſs is a fixt, ſteady, immoveable principle of action. If either of the former holds the ſword of juſtice, there is plainly ground for the greateſt of crimes to hope for impunity: but if it be goodneſs, there can be no poſſible hope, whilſt the reaſons of things, or the ends of government, call for puniſhment. Thus every one ſees how much greater chance of impunity, an ill man has in a partial adminiſtration, than in a juſt and upright one. It is ſaid, that the intereſt or good of the whole, muſt be the intereſt of the univerſal Being, and that He can have no other. Be it ſo. This author has proved, that vice is naturally the miſery of mankind in this world. Conſequently it was for the good of the whole, that it ſhould be ſo. What ſhadow of reaſon then is there to aſſert, that this may not be the caſe hereafter? Danger of future puniſhment (and if there be danger, there is ground of fear) no more ſuppoſes malice, than the preſent feeling of puniſhment does (14)."

(14) Preface to Butler's Sermons, vol. i. p. xxii—xxviii. Glaſgow edit.

ſays the Biſhop, "in Engliſh three Dialogues, and but three, that are fit to be mentioned—all of them excellently compoſed in their way, and it muſt be owned, by the very beſt and politeſt of our writers. The Dialogues I mean are, the "Moraliſts" of Lord Shafteſbury; Mr. Addiſon's "Treatiſe on Medals;" and the "Minute Philoſopher" of Biſhop Berkley." According to Dr. Hurd, the ſole fault of theſe applauded perſons is, that they ſuffered themſelves to be miſled by modern practice, and with every ability to excel in this nice and difficult compoſition, have written beneath themſelves, only becauſe they did not keep up to the ancient ſtandard. An eſſential defect in his opinion, runs through them all. "They have taken," he adds, "for their Speakers, not real, but "fictitious Characters; contrary to the practice of the old writers; and to the infinite "diſadvantage of this mode of writing, in every reſpect (y)." Perhaps the Biſhop has here carried the matter ſomewhat too far. However, without diſputing the propriety of his general ſentiments upon the ſubject, one thing is plain, that the Earl of Shafteſbury is regarded by him as amongſt the firſt of our authors in the dialogiſtical form of compoſition. But the moſt complete eulogium on the "Rhapſody," is that which is given by Lord Monboddo: nor hath this learned writer ſatisfied himſelf with beſtowing upon it ſome general praiſes, but hath favoured the public with a large and elaborate analyſis of it, from which its excellence will more fully be diſplayed. This analyſis our readers will be glad to ſee below [L]; and when they have peruſed it, they will be ſenſible that it is not neceſſary to add any farther teſtimonies in commendation of the "Moraliſts."

Concerning

[L] This analyſis our readers will be glad to ſee below.]

"The fineſt dialogue of modern times, ſo fine, that I think it may be compared with any thing of the kind we have got from antiquity, is my Lord Shafteſbury's rhapſody, entitled The Moraliſts. It has every thing which a dialogue requires; for it has a fable, characters, manners, incidents, and ſcenery too, and in ſhort, every thing belonging to a dramatic piece. The ſubject of it is the converſion of a ſceptic to theiſm. This converſion is made by a Philoſopher, who is poſſeſſed of the nobleſt of all paſſions, an enthuſiaſtical admiration of God and Nature. So here are two very different characters diſtinctly marked: and in the courſe of the action, which laſts three days, there are other characters introduced; for my Lord has not fallen into the error, which, I think, Plato has committed, of making but one converſation of his ten books of Polity, and likewiſe only one of his thirteen books of Laws, and ſo drawing out each of theſe dialogues to an immeaſurable length, an error, which, as I have obſerved, Cicero has alſo avoided. In the firſt day's converſation, Philocles (ſo the ſceptic is called, who is the narrator of the dialogue), recites a converſation which paſſed betwixt him and his friend Palemon, in the Park at London, upon the ſubject of the miſeries of human life, in which Philocles having thrown out ſome things of the ſceptical kind that gave offence to Palemon, as tending to ſhow, that there is no diſtinction of right and wrong in actions, any more than of truth and falſehood in arguments,—Philocles, uſing the privilege, as he ſays, of a ſceptic, entertained him with a diſcourſe of ſome length upon the order and beauty which appears in nature, the government of the univerſal mind, which we ought from thence to infer, and to conclude, that all thoſe ills natural and moral, of which they had been ſpeaking, were no more than ills in appearance, being only the neceſſary conſequences of the univerſe being a ſyſtem. This ſudden change having ſurpriſed Palemon, he aſked Philocles what had produced ſentiments ſo different from thoſe he had before expreſſed. In anſwer to this, Philocles informs him, that ſome days ago he had had a converſation with a friend in the country, whom he calls Theocles, who had made a perfect convert of him to the firm belief of theiſm, and the government of an univerſal mind of infinite goodneſs and wiſdom. This converſation Palemon earneſtly deſired to hear; but, as it was then growing late, Philocles could not ſatisfy him at that time, but promiſed that he would become author for his ſake, and ſet it down in writing.

"This is the firſt day's converſation, and I think a very natural and proper introduction to what is principal in the piece, viz. the converſations with Theocles, which make the ſubject of the two other days. The ſcene of theſe is Theocles's country ſeat, where Philocles had gone upon a viſit to him. There he finds him in the forenoon, walking in the fields with a Virgil in his hand. This rural ſcene is very well deſcribed. Here, after ſome diſcourſe, which the company, that Theocles had with him, naturally gave occaſion to, the converſation took a philoſophical turn; and they began to talk of pleaſure and happineſs, and of what was good or ill in human life. Upon this ſubject they at laſt agreed, that, what made perfect happineſs, was the love and admiration of what was perfectly beautiful and good. Such an object, Theocles ſaid, was to be found in the univerſe, and which he promiſed to diſcover to him the next morning; for, by this time, a ſervant had come from the houſe to let Theocles know, that company was come to dine with him.

"And here we have an epiſode very naturally introduced, in which we have two new characters that give an agreeable variety to the piece, and furniſh matter for converſation on different ſubjects, but all having a relation to the principal ſubject of the piece. One of theſe characters is an old Gentleman, a religious bigot, and a man not at all of pleaſant manners: the other is a modeſt young Gentleman, and more agreeable in converſation.

"The dinner was ſuch, as to give occaſion to Theocles to ſpeak in praiſe of the virtue of temperance; from which it appears to have been a dinner very different from what is now given by men of faſhion. From temperance in eating and drinking, they came to ſpeak of temperance with reſpect to wealth and honours, and of virtue in general. Upon this ſubject it was obſerved, that to exalt virtue and its happineſs, was underſtood by ſome religious men to be depreſſing and undervaluing religion: for virtue, they ſaid, was miſery; and that there was no happineſs in this life, nor any except what religion promiſed in our future ſtate. By arguing in this way, Theocles obſerved it was impoſſible to convince an atheiſt, who, if he believed that there was ſo much diſorder in the preſent ſtate of things, would not be diſpoſed to think better of the future, and never could be perſuaded, that the world was under the government of a Wiſe and Good Being. This naturally led the converſation to ſpeak of atheiſm, and of the common way of arguing againſt Atheiſts; when it was obſerved, that if an author argued calmly againſt Atheiſts, and ſtated the arguments fully and fairly, he was underſtood to be a friend to them. This, it was ſaid, was the caſe of the learned and pious Dr. Cudworth: and the ſame objection was made to a late author, viz. the author of the 'Inquiry concerning Virtue.' And here Lord Shafteſbury introduces, I think not improperly, a defence of his own work from the mouth of Theocles, who ſpeaks of that author as his friend, and therefore very willingly undertakes his defence in a pretty long diſcourſe, where he ſhows, that the only way to convince an Atheiſt, is to treat him with good manners, and with calmneſs and moderation: that ſolidly to refute the arguments

Concerning the third volume of the Characteriſtics, we have little to ſay. It is entitled, "Miſcellaneous Reflections on the preceding Treatiſes, and other critical Subjects:" and is

ments of the Atheiſts, and to eſtabliſh upon ſound principles the exiſtence of a Deity, muſt neceſſarily be previous to our belief in any revelation from that Deity: that genuine theiſm and juſt notions of the Divinity muſt neceſſarily produce that divine love, which is acknowledged to be the perfection of religion, ariſing from the high idea we have of the Being which is the object of it. This, he ſays, was what his friend recommended, maintaining that we were not truly religious, unleſs our devotion proceeded from ſuch a principle, and not from the hopes of reward, or the fears of puniſhment; though ſuch motives might be very properly uſed, with thoſe who were by nature incapable of ſo liberal a devotion. This, ſays Theocles, I think is ſufficient to defend the morality of my friend's inquiry, and ſhew, that it is nowiſe inconſiſtent with religion, but quite the contrary. At the ſame time, as his work is entirely confined to morality, he has not proved that a Being exiſts worthy of that diſintereſted love and admiration, in which he makes the perfection of religion to conſiſt: to ſupply this defect, ſays he, I muſt become preacher, and give you a ſyſtem of theology agreeable to his principles.

"Here this converſation ended, by the coming in of ſome viſitants, who took up the remaining part of the afternoon in other diſcourſe. In the evening, the ſcene is changed from the houſe to the fields, and all the reſt of the company being gone, Philocles, with the old Gentleman and his young friend who remained, inſiſted with Theocles, that he ſhould give them the ſermon he had mentioned, which accordingly he did, taking occaſion to begin it from obſervations made by Philocles upon the ſtructure and organization of the plants they ſaw in the fields.

"And here begins what may be called the cataſtrophe or denouement of the piece, to which every thing preceding has a tendency more or leſs; I mean the demonſtration of the exiſtence of a Sovereign Mind and Supreme Intelligence, given by Theocles in language as beautiful and as much ornamented as ſcience can be delivered in. Nor does Philocles forget his character of ſceptic, and the part aſſigned to him of objecting to the arguments of Theocles, which part he acts exceedingly well; and thus the argument is fully laid before us, and according to the fair method in which even atheiſm, as Theocles thinks, ſhould be treated, every thing is ſaid in its behalf that can be ſaid, but to which Theocles gives a ſufficient anſwer. In this debate the old Gentleman takes a part ſuitable to his character, anſwering or endeavouring to anſwer the objections of Philocles, but in an angry paſſionate way: whereas the anſwers of Theocles are perfectly mild and good humoured; for he is a moſt amiable enthuſiaſt, without any mixture of that paſſion, violence, and furious zeal, which we often ſee in religious enthuſiaſts.

"What follows after this is to be conſidered as corollaries or conſequences of Theocles's demonſtration; tending at the ſame time to ſtrengthen it, by ſhewing that his theory is agreeable to fact and obſervation. The laſt converſation of this ſecond day is after ſupper, and the ſubject of it is prodigies, miracles, apparitions, and other things altogether out of the ordinary courſe of nature. By theſe the old Gentleman would prove the exiſtence of a Deity; but Philocles, taking up the argument of Theocles, ſhews that it is only from order, regularity, and uniformity in the operations of Nature, that we can infer the exiſtence of a Supreme Intelligence; but from ſuch violation of the laws of Nature, as thoſe mentioned by the old Gentleman, and the confuſion in the ſyſtem thence reſulting, nothing could be inferred except either the chaos and atoms of the Atheiſts, or the magic and demons of the Polytheiſts. This converſation is agreeably varied and diſtinguiſhed from the preceding converſations of the ſame day, not only by the ſubject, but by Theocles, who was the chief Speaker in thoſe, ſaying nothing in this, and likewiſe by the modeſt young Gentleman, who had been only a hearer before, now taking a very proper part in the converſation, and joining Philocles to the great offence of the old Gentleman, who gave him a rebuke in ſuch rough terms, that Philocles interpoſed, and finiſhed the argument, which the young Gentleman had ſo well begun, but his modeſty would not allow him to finiſh.—And thus ends the ſecond day.

"The third and laſt day begins with Theocles diſmiſſing his two gueſts early in the morning, (ſuch was the cuſtom in thoſe days) and going out to his morning walk in the fields, where Philocles finds him. It is the ſame beautiful rural ſcene, where theſe two met the preceding morning. Here Theocles, at the deſire of Philocles, addreſſed that Univerſal Mind in a ſtrain very different from that in which he had proved the exiſtence of ſuch a Mind. Before he reaſoned as a Philoſopher, now he ſpeaks as one inſpired, not by the demon which inſpired the Delphic prieſteſs or the Sybil of Virgil, but by Divine Love, which is mild, gentle, and humane. There is nothing therefore in Theocles of the os rabidum, or the fera corda, though his language be ſo much elevated, that it may be ſaid to be nil mortale ſonans. It is of that kind which the antients called dithyrambic, but much leſs obſcure than the dithyrambics of Pindar, nor indeed is it at all obſcure. It has thoſe looſe numbers, of which, as we have ſeen, the antients ſpeak ſo much, as much as our language will admit; and the only fault I find with it is, that the numbers are ſometimes too much aſtricted and altogether verſe, though that happens but very rarely. But, upon the whole, I think it the moſt ſplendid language we have in proſe, and the fineſt ſtile of the kind in Engliſh, but abſolutely unfit for any other purpoſe, except for that for which the author has employed it.

"There are, I know, who, now that inſpiration has ceaſed, will think ſuch extatic effuſions altogether unnatural. But thoſe men know not the powers of human nature, and judge of other men by themſelves. Even now the Improviſatoris and Improviſatrices of Italy will pour forth extempore, upon any ſubject aſſigned to them, a great many of their octavo rimo verſes, of more difficult compoſition than any verſe we now uſe in Engliſh, and much more difficult than the meaſured proſe of Theocles. And I have no doubt, but one of theſe, if he was as great a Philoſopher as Theocles, could make verſes extempore upon the ſame ſubjects.

"The firſt Rhapſody of Theocles, is an invocation in very ſublime language, but without any thing like what we call Fuſtian or Bombaſt, of that Sovereign Mind, the exiſtence of which he had proved, praying for aſſiſtance to enable him to trace, in the works of creation, the marks of Wiſdom, Goodneſs, and Power.

"In the ſecond Rhapſody (or rant, as thoſe who are not initiated into this Sublime Philoſophy, would call it), he, in a ſtill higher ſtrain, goes through the works of nature, obſerving how the vital principle, diffuſed through the whole, operates in ſo many different ways, producing ſtill new forms out of the ruins of the old, ſo that, amidſt the greateſt ſeeming profuſion, nothing is loſt. Here a great deal is ſaid of matter and of mind, and of thoſe two entities ſo difficult to be apprehended, Time and Motion. Then he proceeds in the ſame rapturous ſtrain to ſurvey the heavens, deſcribing the ſun, the planets, and the fixed ſtars, in language equal, if poſſible, to the ſubject.

"The ſubject of the third Rhapſody, is this our earth; where, in deſcribing the minerals and the four elements, and particularly fire diffuſed, as he ſays, through the whole globe, and animating every thing in it, he ſhows more of natural knowledge than I thought he had been poſſeſſed of.

"In his fourth and laſt tranſport, he ſurveys the ſurface of this our globe, going through every climate and every country of it, where there is any thing very remarkable, and deſcribing with great accuracy, as well as great pomp of language, all the wonderful ſcenes which it preſents to us.

"Betwixt

is a kind of defence and explanation of what had gone before. This volume abounds with pleaſantry, and contains a number of ingenious remarks; but we cannot regard it as deſerving

" Betwixt theſe ſallies there is interjected a great deal of cloſe reaſoning by way of queſtion and anſwer in the Socratic manner, which was very proper in a converſation betwixt them two, but would, I think, not have been ſo proper in the mixt company they were in before. The tendency of this reaſoning, is to ſtrengthen ſtill farther, the proof of the exiſtence of a Mind in nature, which unites the whole, and makes one of the univerſe. For proof of this, he appeals to every plant and every animal, in every one of which it is evident, that there is ſome one thing, which makes a whole of each of them. And, as every thing in nature is connected, as well as the parts of a plant or animal, for the ſame reaſon, there muſt be ſomething in nature which makes a whole of it. In this interlude, as it may be called, there is a moſt ſatisfactory anſwer given to an objection made before by Philocles, but which had not been anſwered, namely, that though there may be union, order, and regularity, in ſo much of the ſyſtem of the univerſe as we ſee, yet all might be diſorder and confuſion in the reſt of the univerſe, which is infinite with reſpect to the ſmall part of it that we can diſcover; for, if it were ſo, ſays Theocles, the infinite muſt prevail over the finite, and all be diſorder and confuſion.

" Betwixt the ſecond and third Rhapſodies there is nothing interpoſed, but an interruption which Theocles makes to himſelf, ſuppoſing that Philocles had ſomething to object to what he had ſaid; but Philocles ſaying that he had nothing to object, he proceeded to deſcant, as I have ſaid, upon the elements and minerals.

" Betwixt the third and fourth there is alſo nothing interpoſed except an admonition of Philocles, that he would not inſiſt ſo much upon the power of the element of fire, which, though ſo friendly to life, Theocles had ſaid, might, when let looſe, deſtroy every thing, and bring on an univerſal conflagration. But, ſays he, deſcribe to me the maſs of nature as it appears upon this our earth; and accordingly Theocles proceeds to give that beautiful map of the earth above mentioned.

" The concluſion of the work is very proper and ſuitable to the main deſign. The ſubject of this concluſion is, 1*mo*, Beauty, and the different kinds of it: 2*do*, The neceſſity of philoſophizing in order to be happy. As to Beauty, he ſhows, that it is eſſential both to virtue and religion; for beauty is the object of love, and we love no perſon, no action, no thing, in which we do not perceive beauty. Now, there can be no virtue without the love of virtue, nor any religion without the love of God. We muſt therefore perceive beauty both in God and in Virtue. Then he proceeds to ſhew, that body has in itſelf no beauty, but that the beauty we admire in it is all from mind: ſo that what we admire in the works of art is the genius of the artiſt; and the beauty in the works of nature, where elſe can it be, but in the Mind of the Sovereign Artiſt, who therefore is the fountain of all Beauty, whether of body or of mind, as well as of all Intelligence. As there can be no love without admiration, and as admiration to a great degree is enthuſiaſm, he from thence derives the enthuſiaſms of Poets, Painters, Muſicians, and the nobler enthuſiaſm ſtill of the truly virtuous man, and the nobleſt of all enthuſiaſms, that ariſing from the love and admiration of the Supreme Beauty.

" He next proceeds to ſhow, that the ſenſe of the fair and the beautiful, the pulchrum and honeſtum, the graceful and the becoming, not only in outward forms, but in ſentiments and actions, is in man from nature, not from art or teaching, inſtitution or habit. This is ſo clear a propoſition, that I wonder it ſhould be denied, or even doubted of by any: and yet I am told, that in a book lately publiſhed upon the ſubject of morality, it is at leaſt doubted of, if not denied. I think the author might have as well doubted whether ſuch a thing as virtue or religion exiſted; or indeed whether ſuch an animal as man exiſted: for I hold that there is nothing, which more eminently diſtinguiſhes the man from the brute, than the ſenſe of the fair and the beautiful.
